Serena: “Her Excellency Lamia Godwin? That’s someone I would have liked to have met once.”

Anastasia: “Really? What kinda person are they?”

Serena: “The Prime Minister knows more about her than I do. After all, it was the Prime Minister who wanted her to become Emperor.”

Serena shrugged as she held up her own sword, the blade of which waved through the air, and Anastasia turned her gaze to Berstetz.

The old man, who did not deny Serena’s story, nodded, his eyes so narrowed, to the point of being like threads, that one could not readily see as to where he was looking,

Berstetz: “She was a woman worthy of being the Emperor of the Vollachian Empire. If not for Vincent Abellux and Prisca Benedict being in the same generation, she would have been Emperor.”

Serena: “Could it be that she has risen as an undead to come and fulfill that ambition? Perhaps, Prime Minister, you might be forgiven if you were to pledge your allegiance once again?”

Berstetz: “—. Unfortunately, Her Excellency Lamia and I are losers. It is not in keeping with the Imperial way.”

Serena closed one eye and sighed as Berstetz slowly shook his head.

It seems Berstetz’s serious answer was not to Serena’s liking. Anastasia, too, could detect the mixed feelings between the former master and servant, but not much more.

???: “—Ana.”

Suddenly, as she was contemplating, Anastasia heard a call in her ear, and raised her head.

The call came from around Anastasia’s neck, from Echidna, disguised as a fox scarf. Glancing over, Echidna’s dark eyes turned toward the entrance of the guest room.

???: “—Anastasia-sama, I am back.”

Shortly after following her gaze, Julius appeared from the other side of the door.

The handsome Julius held his Knight’s sword in one hand and a slender man in the other. Julius had been ordered to separate from the others and pick him up.

The figure shook his long gray hair, and as he raised his head with a pitiful expression,

???: “Now now, I’m trooooubled by this all happening so suddenly. My chest is burning and aching, and with this swordsman here shaking me all about, it’s all so terrible.”

Anastasia: “Instead of complainin’ so much like a chitterin’ bird, shouldn’t ya be thankin’ me n’ my Knight? Ya might be their target, after all.”

???: “Whaaat?!”

Wearing a look of surprise, it was the one who had been restrained earlier in the back of the carriage, the Stargazer, Ubilk.

Apparently, he was in a position where he was a beneficial asset to the Empire, and was also a valuable source of information for it in its fight against the Great Disaster. In order to prevent him from being killed, Julius was sent to him.

Anastasia: "With Garf-kun, I thought there woulda been a lotta detours due to him wanderin' off 'n foolin' 'bout."

Garfiel: "I'm fightin' properly, ya know! Stop complainin'!"

Anastasia: "Really? If I didn't ask ya to do this job, wouldn't ya have gone to help Halibel outside instead?"

Garfiel: "Graarrr…!"

Snarling with an expression that proved she had hit the bull's-eye, Garfiel's fangs quivered.

The coupled dragon carriage was being continuously attacked by their enemies, but ensuring the biggest threat could not approach them, keeping the Evil Dragon at bay on his own, was Halibel.

The fierce Dragon's roar could occasionally be heard along with the accompanying sky-cracking boom—if he were not the strongest of the City-States, it would be impossible to stall the world's most powerful species.

Julius: "Garfiel, thank you very much for protecting Anastasia-sama and the others. I extend my respect for your bravery."

Garfiel: "Shut up! Just like the Captain, my amazin' self ain't too good at dealin' with ya!"

Julius: "That is regrettable. As with Subaru, I was hoping to become friends with you as well."

Garfiel: "GRRRRRRR!!"

Garfiel vigorously growled at the words Julius spoke in his face, thrusting out his fist. As if intersecting with Julius, the coordination demolished the undead that appeared behind one another.

Even if Garfiel would not admit it, the two top-notch warriors were perfectly in sync.

Anastasia: “However, this is all just a stopgap… I don’t wanna stop the dragon carriage, but if it stops then that’ll be the end of the line. We hafta get the situation movin’ somewhere, right?”

6

???: “NUUUGGGGH—!!”

With a deep and burly roar, a golden mace was swung.

The horizontal impact scythed down the undead clad in bulky armor all at once, and the enemies that had been flung off of the top of the dragon carriage, crumbled into dust even before they even crashed into the ground.

However, even after dealing with several enemies at once, the number of foes did not abate.

???: “Damn it damn it damn it! Such shrewd tricks!!”

Angered was his stern face, covered in beard and scars, and Goz Ralfon roared like a lion.

In Goz’s field of vision, he could see a swarm of undead flying dragons blanketing the sky, deploying the undead clutched in their talons down onto the coupled dragon carriages one after the other.

This bold method of transport was the worst possible mechanism by which the enemy soldiers could board the coupled dragon carriages.

—Throwing the enemy soldiers down did not ensure that every one of them could catch hold of the coupled dragon carriages.

Rather, nearly half of the soldiers failed to catch the coupled dragon carriages, and after being thrown by the undead flying dragons, simply fell to the ground below, and the outrageous occurrence of the impact reducing their resurrected bodies back into dust was repeated over and over.

However, even a military deployment that could only be called a suicidal act for a living soldier, turned into an efficient means of transportation that can be used without the fear of losses using dead soldiers.

And thus, implementing it was—

Goz: “—It is the Pruning Corps of Her Excellency Lamia!”

Goz had rushed to protect the ground dragons, who were of the most important position at the foremost wagon of the coupled dragon carriages, and he glared at the sky where the worst assortment of undead were being brought by the flock of deceased flying dragons.

The Pruning Corps were the malevolent group that had carried out what came to be known in the Vollachian Empire as the Great Purge.

Every member was clad in an armor that disguised their facial features, and wielding massive great shears, they pruned any person deemed unnecessary for their master’s supremacy. —That was the purpose of the Pruning Corps.

The reason the name of that group went down in the history of the Empire, was because a girl from the Imperial Family—Lamia Godwin, nine years old at the time, had massacred all the armies of the Mid Counts who had incited a rebellion.

The victims of the purge had been made to suffer gruesome torment, thoroughly tasting the hell of this world.

Naturally, the young princess had all her subordinates carry out all kinds of malevolent violence that would be a large burden for even those who got their hands dirty, thereby perfecting her malevolent squadron with ironclad loyalty.

Just how much control she had over the hearts of her soldiers, was on full display in this strategy. —The fact that even in death, that which gnawed at their very souls, Lamia's poison, had not faded in the slightest.

And then—

???: "—My my. Even though so many years have passed, to think you would remember me and my adorable beasts, I am glad."

Suddenly, a fear-inducing, sickly-sweet voice descended from above.

At that moment, Goz, paying no heed to appearances, raised his mace overhead, and deflecting the bright red swing head-on, lept backwards. Immediately after, the mace that Goz held caught fire.

It was a matter of course. —After all, the brilliance of the Yang Sword dazzlingly illuminated all things.

Goz: "By no means, to think that you would descend onto the battlefield yourself…! Your Excellency Lamia Godwin!!"

Lamia: "Is it really so surprising? With this body, that is the best choice, is it not?"

Clenching down on his molars, Goz glared straight ahead, and in his vision was a noble undead who smiled bewitchingly.

The blood-red opulent dress, the dazzling array of jewelry, and the natural beauty characteristic of the Vollachian Imperial Family, which caused the value of the items which adorned their beauty to plummet. —However that too, when coupled with the pale cracked skin and eerie golden irises, she was but a shadow of her former self.

In the past, during the Imperial Selection Ceremony, the Poison Princess Lamia Godwin had vied for the throne against Vincent Vollachia, and could have become the Empress—as if testifying that she had completely changed, she looked down at the half of her body that Goz had shattered with his counterattack.

However, where other undead would have crumbled to dust from such a blow, Lamia's body did not shatter. Instead, the cracks mended themselves, restoring her original form.

Goz: “That body…”

Lamia: “An immortal body that shall not be lost, no matter how much it is crushed or destroyed… alas, it does not seem to be something so convenient that I can boast about it in such a manner.”

Lamia, gently stroking the part that had been repaired, wielded the Yang Sword with that very hand, as if to prove that she had indeed recovered. In her arms, the dazzling beauty of the unfaltering treasured sword, instead seemed all the more blasphemous.

Goz frowned at that fact, to which Lamia muttered, “How unpleasant,”

Lamia: “Although you could not calm down and have a chat at the Crystal Palace either, I wonder if you could stop making such a scary face, General Second-Class Ralfon?”

Goz: “Guh…”

Lamia: “Ah, you have become a General First-Class now, have you not? I heard about that. So Vincent-niisama has reinstated the system of the Nine Divine Generals? That is very much like him to do.”

Placing the hand not holding the Yang Sword against her chin, Lamia parted her lips to the side.

Those gestures and speech were unmistakably those of Lamia, whom Goz had also come to interact with while she was still alive, and he was both horrified and angered by the technique that allowed for the undead to replicate her former behavior.

Indifferent to his inner thoughts, Lamia looked at Goz’s armor from top to bottom and said,

Lamia: “The Nine Divine Generals, it is structured so that rising to the top is measured solely by strength. It is the perfect way to gather mindless, easily controllable pawns.”

Goz: “…Certainly, part of the context behind His Excellency’s reinstatement of the Nine Divine Generals, was an intention to prepare a countermeasure against the current Great Disaster. That is something I acknowledge.”

Lamia: “Though from the way you say it, it seems you have an objection?”

Goz: “With all due respect!”

Lamia’s statement, it sounded like it was praising Vincent’s thoughts.

Before they opposed each other in the Imperial Selection Ceremony, it was said that Lamia had been quite fond of Vincent. Though life and death had separated their paths, her confidence in him remained intact even after death.

However—

Goz: “Your Excellency Lamia, how much do you know of the time when you were not alive?”

Lamia: “What a strange question. —Unfortunately, I know nothing from the time I was dead. Right now, I am in the middle of brushing up on all the various things that have happened. I would not mind if you were to teach me a little.”

Goz: “Then just one thing! Pardon my rudeness, I wish to correct you!”

Lamia: “…”

Goz: “As Your Excellency Lamia has rightly observed, the Nine Divine Generals of the present age are all highly capable. They are all strong individuals who make light of even myself… but, there is not a single one among them who is an easy pawn to control!”

Puffing out his chest adorned in golden armor, Goz emphatically boasted out loud.

Supposing that in preparation for the battle against the Great

Disaster, Vincent had reinstated the Nine Divine Generals in hopes of having pawns that would do exactly as they were told, it could be said that his plan had failed.

Every General First-Class was a hardened troublemaker, there was no way such a thing could be done so easily.

Goz: “It is not to the extent Your Excellency Lamia believes, the magnificence of the Empire is not summed up within His Excellency alone!”

Lamia: “—. I wonder, could that be an insult to Vincent-niisama?”

Goz: “No! Never! Not at all, Your Excellency Lamia!”

At Lamia’s narrowed eyes and the slightly sharp tone she had put into her words, Goz shook his head.

Lamia was angered by the feelings he had expressed about Vincent, but Goz was also sensitive to any disrespect or rude remarks made about His Excellency the Emperor. However, ever since the decision to abandon the Imperial Capital, his stance had changed slightly.

All of it, had not been influenced by Goz himself, but rather by a change in Vincent.

Goz: ““I am relying on your work”, he told me.”

Lamia: “…What did you just say?”

Goz: “Your Excellency Lamia, His Excellency Vincent Vollachia who your esteemed self knew was indeed outstanding! And yet! Now! Even more! His Excellency the Emperor is changing, striving for even greater excellence!!”

Lamia: “…”

Goz: “The Vollachian Empire, hereafter, will continue to flourish more and more! For that reason, we cannot let the hindrance from those who have once died go uncontrolled any longer!”

In the sense of seeking perfection from the Emperor, Goz and Lamia were very much alike. But, what decisively differentiated the two was their respective knowledge from the passage of the last nine years.

Those who continued to walk forward in time, they would leave behind those who had halted their step; that was a fact.

Goz: “A wise man who does not cease his onward march! Surpassing even the expectations and predictions of those who have halted, and pushing even further beyond! That, is the apex of the Vollachian Empire, His Excellency the Emperor!”

Raising the blazing head of his mace aloft, Goz shook off his hesitation, and he charged forward.

Up until that point, his love and reverence for Lamia, a member of the Vollachian Imperial Family despite her altered appearance, had fettered Goz. —But, those shackles were torn apart by a stronger and more fervent loyalty.

Goz: “OOORAAAAH—!!”

Raising a mighty roar, Goz’s singular swing drew a semicircle, and slammed down onto Lamia.

Possessing unparalleled herculean strength, a strike from Goz using all of his might was not easy to block, even if the opponent was one of the Nine Divine Generals. Even more so for the slender arm of a woman, even if that arm held the Yang Sword.

In fact, Lamia did not even try to block Goz’s strike with the Yang Sword that she wielded.

Lamia: “With that unwise head of yours, you sure talk a lot, General First-Class Ralfon. —I am actually rather impressed, so I shall inform you.”

Her thin lips moved, and Lamia fixed her gaze on Goz with a beautiful smile.

The figure of the woman received the head of the descending mace in its entirety, and without offering even the slightest resistance, it shattered like ceramic, and was blown away into smithereens.

Right after stating her intention to tell him something, she had been reduced to dust beyond any hope of repair.

Of course, there was also the matter raised in the war council earlier. Even if the undead were defeated, there was a possibility that they would rise again through the medium of the so-called Corebug that the magicians from the Kingdom had discovered.

Goz: “Even so…”

The defeat of Lamia here, it should be a turning point in the situation.

If the Pruning Corps no longer had someone to give them explicit orders, depending on the presence or absence of a commander—No, the difference in their ability would already be an advantage to his side.

That confidence of Goz was—

???: “—Are you listening, General First-Class Ralfon?”

Goz: “—Hk?!”

Once again, the moment when the sickly sweet voice grazed his ears, Goz’s mace was swung directly behind him; in its path, it slammed into the figure of the enemy and, piercing through the torso, had split their body in two with a sound like shattering pottery.

As that was smashed and blown away in the corner of his vision, Goz gulped.

Because the enemy he had reflexively struck down, that which had been turned into dust and vanished, had a face that should have been impossible.

The reason being that it was the very same as the one Goz had defeated with his own hands just a moment ago.

???: “Even though you rarely say clever things, it is just as you say.”

Goz: “Impossible…”

Faced with the strange sight that should have never been, the hand gripping the mace began to quake and tremble.

Whether that was out of anger or some other emotion, even Goz himself could not discern. What was certain, however, was that it was blasphemy.

A blasphemy against the Vollachian Empire, to which the Lion Knight, Goz Ralfon, had sworn his loyalty.

???: “—This is a war of annihilation, between us who were left behind in the past, and you lot.”

???: “—This is a war of annihilation, between us who were left behind in the past, and you lot.”

???: “—This is a war of annihilation, between us who were left behind in the past, and you lot.”

Having declared thus, Lamia Godwin, who should have been shattered, smiled at Goz.

—Wielding countless Yang Swords in their hands, innumerable Poison Princesses, innumerable Lamia Godwins, smiled at him.

SoupVEVO

Chapter 27:
Berstetz Fondalfon

1

Lamia: “Berstetz, I am entrusting this situation to you. Stand firm, even if it means your death.”

Berstetz: “Yes, Your Excellency. Please ensure your own safety.”

—That was the last conversation they had ever exchanged.

If one were to ask whether their bond was based on a so-called “strong connection” beyond a mere professional master-servant relationship, the answer would be “no”.

Still, sensing great potential in her intellect and demeanor, using the wisdom he had accumulated over the years, he sought to pave her path, guiding her towards the throne where the Emperor ought to sit.

Even without having loyalty or passion towards her, their master-servant relationship was genuine.

She had not been instructed how to count from one to ten. Yet this individual, once she understood “one”, she would comprehend “one hundred”, and think up “one hundred and one”.

She was someone able to judge for herself and others the roles befitting their abilities, and the duties befitting their position.

He had not been blessed with martial prowess, he always yearned to be the Sword Wolf of the Empire, yet he never quite reached it.

Not garnering respect from others, he could only live a life of scorn, but the fact that she had deemed him useful was perhaps something worthy of gratitude.

Thus, there was not a shred of deception in the last words that they had exchanged.

During the Imperial Selection Ceremony, he was sternly commanded to stand his ground, even if it meant risking his life, and he had resolved himself to do so.

Unable to proclaim himself a Sword Wolf, it was the final service of a man who had simply grown too old.

Even though he was a passionless servant, he was determined to become a martyr to fulfill his duty.

And yet, Berstetz had survived.

And the master, who had hoped for his safety, had lost her life.

To this day, Berstetz Fondalfon continued to live in shame.

Without fulfilling his duties, pursuing the position of the Emperor that leads the Empire towards decline, he remained unaware of the schemes behind the Great Disaster that had unfolded. To call himself a Sword Wolf now would be nothing short of hubris and disgrace.

Despite not fulfilling any of the commands given to him, he continued to live in shame.

2

???: “General First-Class Ralfon, what has come over you?”

???: “Is this not quite uncharacteristic for someone with a fondness for the Vollachian Imperial Family?”

???: “Or perhaps, you no longer favor me since I was defeated in the Imperial Selection Ceremony?”

The same voice emanated from different mouths, and Goz Ralfon found himself under the unrelenting gaze of countless golden eyes.

Goz Ralfon, clad in golden armor of the same color as those eyes, distorted the scars on his face and gritted his molars at the horrifying reality reflected in his eyes.

With all his might, he struck a hammering blow with his mace.

The blood of the Empire's Sword Wolf coursed through Goz's veins, screaming in defiance as he struck down Lamia, a respected member of the Imperial Family, now deemed an enemy.

Torn apart by the soul-crushing pain of his actions, Goz finally grasped the grim truth.

—The Great Disaster unquestionably threatened to destroy the Vollachian Empire.

Goz: "For what purpose…!"

As Goz's teeth ground together in rage, before him stood Lamia—Or rather, multiple Lamias tilting their heads in unison.

The sight of her cascading orange hair slipping over her slender shoulders fanned the flames of anger within Goz.

Goz: "Why do you allow this imitation?! Such… Such blasphemy cannot be! You are making a mockery of Her Excellency Lamia's life!!"

Riding on his surging anger, his voice trembled as the impending tears were seared away by his boiling blood; Goz addressed the countless clones of Lamia before him.

However, in response to Goz's heartfelt plea, the Lamias collectively placed the back of their hands to their lips, then playfully said,

Lamia: "Do not misunderstand, General First-Class Ralfon. This is something I did of my own volition, not something someone else forced upon me."

Goz: "…What, are you-"

Lamia: "That Witch is rather rigid in her thinking. If I can be resurrected after being shattered, then I can certainly resurrect myself back before being shattered. Receptacles can be made endlessly, so all I need to do is dilute the source and fill them all. Once that is intuitively grasped—Well, something as dreamlike as this can be achieved, right?”

Graciously smiling, Lamia Godwin, her pale face painted with a flush of mischief, proudly displayed the many versions of herself, mirroring her wit from when she was alive.

Goz: “…”

Seeing the dreamlike state Lamia described, Goz could not help but inwardly agree.

Lamia, endlessly multiplying, blasphemously replicating her own existence. And each one of these Lamias bore the Yang Sword, the symbol of the Empire.

If this was not a dream—or rather a nightmare, then what was it?

Lamia: “You know, General First-Class Ralfon, you cannot shatter dreams in reality. Why not accept that… and perhaps join us on our side?”

Goz: “—. What, what do you mean?”

Lamia: “It is not complicated. If you were to die, you would be in the same position as me and the others. Why not choose the winning side sooner rather than later?”

Lamia, her hands clasping her sword in front of her and tilting her head, beckoned Goz.

If one were to fall in battle, they would join the ranks of Lamia’s undead army. It was a reality unfolding on the battlefield, but imagining it brought an unbearable weight on one’s psyche.

The staunchly loyal Imperial Soldier, Goz, and the soldiers who shared his sentiments would, upon falling, align with those aiming to destroy the Empire without a second thought.

Just as Lamia Godwin, who once vied for the throne of the Empire’s Empress, had done.

There, upon its completion, would be an Empire of the undead. —In the country of the Sword Wolf, without even a shadow to be seen.

Goz: “I am undeserving of your words, Your Excellency Lamia!”

After tightly shutting his eyes, Goz lifted his face, and he confronted Lamia.

In the face of Goz’s intense spirit, Lamia’s beautifully arched eyebrows furrowed as she frowned.

Lamia: “You seem poised to refuse.”

Goz: “Generous as your mercy is, Your Excellency Lamia! I, Goz Ralfon, must respectfully decline!”

Lamia: “As expected, you have turned me down.”

Against Lamia’s narrowed golden eyes, Goz thought of the vision he had seen in his moment of closed introspection.

The vision where he, life extinguished, became an undead like Lamia and the others, his pale face bearing those golden eyes, wielding his mace to destroy the Empire—he shattered that vision into pieces.

Complete destruction, faced with that illusion that shrouded him, he roared.

Goz: “I must correct my earlier statement! I said that none of the Nine Divine Generals are entirely under the Emperor’s control! I am a loyal pawn of His Excellency the Emperor! Regardless of what others may do! I alone! Wish to remain so!!”

Rejecting the fate of becoming a harbinger of destruction in Death, he yearned to remain a living servant of His Excellency the Emperor.

That was Goz Ralfon’s way of being as the Empire’s Sword Wolf, his desired path.

Deep thoughts, lofty ideals, he left everything to his ruler, Vincent, intending only to fulfill his designated role.

That was to say—

Goz: “I am the ‘Fifth’ of the Nine Divine Generals chosen by His Excellency the Emperor Vincent Vollachia! I am Goz Ralfon!!”

He raised his golden mace, declaring his stand against the countless Lamias without taking a single step back.

The next moment, the multitude of Lamias, brandishing their Yang Swords, lunged at Goz, who had so boldly proclaimed this. With a single touch of the sword, the scintillating flame of Vollachia would incinerate a person down to their soul.

But before it could touch him, Goz’s muscles pulsated, and his mace swept through the air.

Goz: “—Hk.”

With unwavering intent, Goz’s swing struck the side of the attacking Lamia, smashing together about five of them in one fell swoop, turning their delicate, porcelain-like bodies to dust.

Witnessing this display, the remaining Lamias widened their eyes, their expressions changing.

They gazed at the obstinately straightforward Sword Wolf and smiled cruelly.

Lamia: “No matter how bravely you roar and rampage, upon your Death, you will become my slave you know?”

Goz: “If it is truly so difficult to resist! Then I shall turn to stone before my life expires! I shall remain undying, to offer my final act of loyalty to His Excellency the Emperor!!”

He swung his mace overhead, poised to ensure none of the gathered Lamias would escape.

If the Lamias wielding the Yang Swords scattered throughout the coupled dragon carriages, their radiant light might sear the eyes of Vincent. He was determined to prevent that.

And for that purpose, the colossal form of the Lion Knight was ever present. In his fury, Goz Ralfon raged on.

3

Lamia: “—It seems like you’ve steeled quite the valiant resolve, but alas, how unfortunate.”

At the foremost wagon of the coupled dragon carriages, as it barreled towards its destination, Goz Ralfon fiercely howled his reason for being, preventing the wheels of the carriages from being stopped.

While his ardor was quite considerable, his main desires would not come to fruition.

Unfortunately for Goz’s desperate attempts to keep the now undead Lamias at bay, they had already reached other parts of the coupled dragon carriages.

A matter of course. Even if she multiplied, there was no need for her to multiply in only one place. She was not bound by such limitations. While she would not say that Goz’s valiant efforts were in vain, they had little impact.

Thus, in a dragon carriage full of those among the Empire’s living who played crucial roles, the significance of keeping a formidable force such as Goz Ralfon occupied went without saying.

Lamia: “Unfortunately for you, you are not the one suppressing me, General First-Class Ralfon. I am the one subduing you.”

As Goz fended off against Yang Sword by his lonesome, while hindering his ardor, Lamia glanced into the distance as she headed for one of the center wagons.

In the distant sky, there could be seen the figure of a wolfman clashing with a mighty Blight Dragon, dark as blackened clouds.

Lamia: “It’s outside my calculations that Valgren is unable to be used, but to successfully keep that one occupied is quite the achievement.”

Through her narrowed golden eyes, Lamia was able to see just how exceptional the wolfman seen with Valgren really was.

Goz, one of the Empire's Nine Generals of the First-Class, was undoubtedly among the world's mightiest warriors. And that entity, surpassing even Goz, was contending with a being belonging to the world's most powerful lifeform.

—No, on the contrary, the Blight Dragon was the one who was being overpowered.

The only reason why the Blight Dragon had not been completely overcome was because its ability to recover exceeded the damage from the attacks it was suffering. Even when shattered time and time again, the shinobi was not able to finish off the regenerating Blight Dragon.

The fact that it could not be killed alone, already made it more than enough of an unusual sight.

Lamia: "But, it's unfortunate that the wolfman will be of no use to us even if he dies."

???: "—That's a comment I can't overlook."

At the sound of light footsteps, followed by a rough voice, Lamia slowly turned around.

Looking in the same direction that Lamia was, watching the battle between the Blight Dragon and the wolfman with a sidelong glance, stood a blond man—no, it was a boy.

Lamia gave a small snort, and cast a smile upon the boy.

Lamia: "Considering you have the stench of a foul beast, perhaps, you are half-beast?"

???: "…I don't wanna hear that from a woman who reeks of dirt. Nah, it ain't just that."

Lamia: "—?"

???: “Lotsa women who all got the same face lined up, for somethin’ like that, Nanna’s more than enough for me!”

With a firm thud as he clapped his fists together in front of his chest, the caustic words of the half-beast boy caused Lamia, and the other Lamias, to narrow their eyes.

The meaning behind the boy’s complaint was unclear. But, it was apparent that the boy had previously encountered another group of beings that all shared the same form, much like with the Lamias now.

Furthermore—

???: “I ain’t sayin’ that my amazin’ self is all buddy-buddy with that shiny golden oldie there, but he’s got a fuckin’ loud voice… So I know that outta all the ones who’re attackin’ here, you’re the toughest bastard!”

Lamia: “…”

Indeed, just after the boy bared his fangs and snarled, Lamia could sense a shift in the atmosphere.

Those were changes in various wagons of the coupled dragon carriages—assuming the whole motorcade was divided into five parts, Lamia was currently facing off with the boy in the third segment. Separate from Goz’s show of resistance in the first segment, these changes had occurred in the second and fourth segments.

The roof of the second segment had been engulfed in flames, while the fourth had been glaciated over by a freezing wind.

Both instances had taken place in wagons that had been boarded by Lamias separate to this Lamia, as well as the Pruning Corps.

Keenly understanding that reality from her experience, Lamia touched the back of her hand to her lips and smiled.

Lamia: “I seeee~. It seems that people from the Kingdom really don’t know when to give up.”

???: “…Why do ya know that our amazin’ selves’re from Lugunica?”

Lamia: “I only just figured it out. After all, you didn’t seem very characteristic of Imperial Citizens, so I just tried to ask. I find it rather adorable.”

???: “Nah, that ain’t it. Teasin’ my amazin’ self ain’t the only purpose.”

Observing Lamia’s smile as she mocked him, the boy shook his head.

It was not a matter of being unable to admit defeat. Nor, for that matter, was it insight. If it had to be put to words, it would be the boy’s instincts. It was a primal, innate ability to sniff out the truth.

In his mind, the boy had connected the dots between what he had sniffed out, and Lamia’s earlier words.

???: “Considerin’ the talk about how ya can’t use the Admirer, ‘n yer disappointment about where my amazin’ self’s from…”

Lamia: “—That’s enough chatter.”

Evidently, the boy was using his head despite it not being his forte.

Seeing someone give their utmost effort to that which they were unsuited for, was very, very irksome to Lamia.

As Lamia shrugged her slender shoulders, another Lamia slashed at the boy in response.

Ducking down, the boy evaded the sharp tip of the red blade, slamming the back of his fist into that Lamia’s abdomen. But, another Lamia slashed through the body of the Lamia who had been blown away. The bisected body of that Lamia caught fire, and from behind the curtain of the blazing inferno, a lethal thrust aimed for the boy’s life.

With a brief roar, the boy kicked off the roof, and leaped up into the air.

An undead flying dragon sliced through the air in its approach, and the boy who tried to escape into the air was snatched into the deceased dragon's maw. With the boy in its mouth, the undead flying dragon ascended, and shortly thereafter other undead flying dragons swarmed.

Lamia: "It was the same with General First-Class Ralfon, but those who need to close the distance will find that they have poor affinity with the Yang Sword."

Adjusting her grip on her unswung Yang Sword, Lamia spoke to the boy, who was being swarmed by the undead flying dragons.

With just one slash of the Yang Sword, its flames would scorch a soul until naught remained. The magical blade's effect, which boosted the physical abilities of the wielder, could transform even the pampered members of the Vollachian Imperial Family into top-notch fighters.

And, for someone who had dedicated time to the art of the sword, its benefits went without saying.

Lamia: "Now then, the boy with that beastly stench is dealt with. All that's left is Nii-sama's whereabouts…"

Taking her time, as Lamia was about to embark on a leisurely stroll, a thunderous roar suddenly rang out above her head.

The flock of undead flying dragons, so many had swarmed that it seemed like a round sphere, and over ten of them had been blown away mid-air, bursting into smithereens. Emerging from the center of that outburst, bearing not the slightest resemblance to the slender and agile boy from just before, was a mighty, gigantic tiger.

The large tiger, swinging its mighty arms, larger than bundles of many logs, blew away the swarm of undead flying dragons, and immediately swooped down. Its weight made the roof of the coupled dragon carriages creak, and in the next instant, it lunged toward Lamia.

Lamia: "…"

Whirling around, Lamia slashed the Yang Sword upwards from a low position.

She was momentarily taken aback. However, the beastification had made him a larger target. Against a wielder of the Yang Sword, where a mere graze could ensure victory, this was a bad move.

As the large tiger leaped toward her, its chest would instantly be sliced open by the Yang Sword—

???: "—RRRRRRAH!!"

Lamia: "—My my~."

A sound was made as the tip of the Yang Sword scraped against steel, and Lamia's golden eyes widened.

The giant tiger plunged forth, and rather than slamming its brawny arm into Lamia, it instead dug its claws into the roof a half of a step in front of her, forcibly upheaving it to use as a shield.

Lamia's sword stroke glided off its surface, and as the large tiger pivoted, it drove its other arm directly into her.

The impact tore away Lamia's upper body, and her shattered form was knocked down to the side of the carriage.

The giant tiger had exceeded Lamia's expectations. Yet, much like Goz, it was a futile effort.

Lamia: "Even if this "me" dies…"

As she crumbled to dust before hitting the ground, Lamia's lips spun words.

Even if this body were to perish, she would simply regenerate, just like her other selves. Moreover, the advantage of this regeneration was not just the fact that death did not mean the end.

The next Lamia to rise would inherit all of this Lamia's experiences.

Which meant—

Lamia: "…"

As Lamia fell, sensing the other Lamias and the Pruning Corps springing towards the giant tiger, her crumbling field of vision caught a glimpse inside one of the wagons of the coupled dragon carriages that she was leaving behind.

Inside that wagon, her eyes met with someone gazing out of the window. She had ascertained which carriage the person she sought was in, so that she could pass this information on to the next Lamia.

Lamia: "—Found you, Vincent-niisama."

4

Berstetz: "—Your Excellency."

It was undoubtedly Lamia Godwin, revived as an undead, who had just now been shaken off the roof and had smashed to the ground.

With his own eyes, Berstetz had already confirmed this fact.

As soon as he saw that the Pruning Corps, with whom he was well acquainted, was participating in this fierce assault on the dragon carriage, he knew full well that it was Lamia who was behind it.

Still, the sight of Lamia's body shattering and being reduced to dust shocked Berstetz.

Serena: "I had hoped to see you at least once, but I didn't expect it to be like this."

Berstetz: "High Countess Dracroy…"

Serena: "Don't look at me like that, Prime Minister. You saw the same thing I just did. If Her Excellency Lamia was crushed like that, might it stop her private army, the Pruning Corps? Am I understanding that right?"

Berstetz: "…"

Serena: "This doesn't look very promising, though."

The undead Lamia had just met her end outside of the carriage window, and Serena, smiling, shrugged her shoulders.

She spoke with dim expectations, and even though Lamia, to whom she had sworn her loyalty, was killed, there was not a shred of hope regarding the onslaught of the Pruning Corps.

Based on the previous discussion at the military conference, death did not seem to be the end for the undead.

Sphinx, the main perpetrator behind the Great Disaster, aimed to use even death itself to destroy the Empire. After all, if this Witch could do it, what could the Poison Princess not do?

Even without witnessing the undiminished fighting spirit of the Pruning Corps, the end of Lamia was surely ahead of them.

???: “Anastasia-sama, please stand back!”

Raising a dignified voice, a young man in a waso wielded a flowing sword.

A rainbow-colored slash easily sliced through the solid black armor of the Pruning Corps as if it were hot steel slicing through ice.

Even Berstetz, who was not blessed with martial prowess, could see that this young man—Julius, was no less capable than the Empire’s finest warriors.

Anastasia: “But, even my Julius can’t stay fightin’ forever. We gotta move the situation forward.”

Anastasia muttered as she stroked the scarf around her neck, protected by Julius’s struggle.

Julius and Garfiel, respectively, were fighting the enemy inside the carriage and on the roof, but along with Lamia, who had fallen earlier, both inside and outside were fierce battles.

It was a situation in which all the personnel who could fight were fighting, including the guards.

Ubilk: “Eeeven~ so, don’t you feel like we’re being targeted a bit too much?”

Anastasia: “Maybe, but ain’t it ‘cuz you’re here? I can see that sore on yer chest, looks like it’s been marked up pretty good.”

Ubilk: “Mark…? Whaaat~, it’s true!”

Ubilk, who had been taken out of his confinement room, looked down at his loose blouse and raised his voice.

As Anastasia had said, there were traces of a welt on his white skin that she had happened to glimpse, and if that had occurred at the same time as the attack—

Berstetz: “An Evil Eye to grasp the whereabouts of a target… It cannot be, His Excellency Palladio Manesque?”

Serena: “Well, well, well, are all of the participants of the Imperial Selection Ceremony here? Then, I’d like to reminisce with His Excellency Barthroy, who sent me flowers when I took the governorship from my father.”

The Evil Eye of Palladio Manesque, Prince of Vollachia, heir to the blood of the Evil Eye Tribe, had captured its target, which must have been why the Pruning Corps continued to attack this place.

Berstetz guessed thus, and Serena, who herself was using her sword to keep the enemy in check, licking her lips,

Serena: “Whether we move from this place or not, I don’t want to die because we made a choice between being in the front or the back. If we are defeated, the Empire is as good as dead; not just the head, but from the waist up. It will be interesting to see if there is any other way for creatures such as these to die…”

Berstetz: “I would be troubled if you were to say something unscrupulous. I am not sure about this old body of mine, but I cannot be replaced by the likes of His Excellency or you.”

Serena: “No one is irreplaceable, Prime Minister. Indeed, I am in awe of you, just as I am in awe that you were appointed to represent His Excellency, the Emperor. Be that as it may—"

Serena, who never lost her bitterness under any circumstance, was moved when she took a jab at Berstetz's conduct in the Imperial Capital.

The choice of whether to move forward or backward emerged from the choice itself.

???: "There you are! You've been standing your ground here, huh!"

Anastasia: "Natsuki-kun!"

Crossing the threshold of the door to the rear carriage, which had already been breached by the Pruning Corps' attack, a small silhouette rushed into the carriage where Berstetz and his group were.

At the sight of the black-haired boy at the head of his group, Anastasia raised her voice in welcome.

Those who had just hurriedly arrived were the boy named Natsuki Subaru, and a girl in a dress holding his hand. Following them were a deer girl, a girl with blonde hair, and two young ladies who shared identical features, apart from one having pink hair and the other having blue hair—.

Julius: "Subaru! What happened to Emilia-sama?"

Subaru: "Emilia-tan is fighting hard in the rear section! She's freezing the vehicle to reinforce it so that the enemies can't get in, and if we had stayed, we'd have ended up frozen too!"

Anastasia: "That's quite da high-handed move… But still, it's a winnin' one."

Subaru answered Julius's question, which was asked as he forced an undead back out the window as it was trying to break in. Anastasia batted an eye shut at the frowning boy's response, and then directed her light-blue gaze behind him—towards the blonde girl.

Girl: "Aau…"

Anastasia: “With all this goin’ on, I guess yer talk’s been put on hold?”

Subaru: “—No, I already concluded my discussion. It’s just that the opportunity to convey it to everyone’s been interrupted. What about that bastard Abel? Does he have the same mark as me?”

Standing alongside the blonde girl, Subaru spoke thus and pulled his shirt down to show them a spot on his chest. There, a raised welt identical to the one on the Stargazer, Ubilk, could be seen.

As soon as he noticed it, Ubilk loudly exclaimed “Aaah~!”,

Ubilk: “Seeee~, I knew it! You’ve got the same mark on you! That must mean we’re fellow Stargazers!”

Subaru: “I keep telling you, that’s not it! It’s not just on me, it’s the same on my cute Beako, and I feel sorry for her! What’s there in common here?!”

???: “—Most likey, it is marking the obstacles to the Great Disaster that need to be eradicated.”

This time, a voice had come from the door opposite from where Subaru and the others had entered, and the one it belonged to rushed in from the corridor that led to the car at the front.

Appearing side by side were Otto, a tactician of the Kingdom who had exerted a strong influence in the war council, and a girl who had devoted herself to healing the wounded soldiers.

Upon their entry, Subaru turned around, his eyes wide in surprise,

Subaru: “Otto! Petra! Are you both okay? I’m sorry about earlier!”

Otto: “Let us leave that discussion for later. Right now, we need to exchange crucial information.”

Petra: “The mark you were saying appeared on Subaru and Beatrice-chan, it’s appeared on Master too! Right now, Master is in the dragon carriage up ahead, drawing the zombies to him…”

Pink-haired woman: “Roswaal-sama also has the mark…”

Upon hearing the report from the girl called Petra, the woman with pink hair, likely a relative of Rem, cast her eyes downward.

However, if not only Ubilk, Subaru, and the girl named Beatrice, but also the Chief Court Magician of the Kingdom had the mark, then the qualifications needed for being marked had become somewhat apparent.

That being—

Anastasia: “—Margrave Mathers ‘n Beatrice-chan, who went up against Sphinx on the plain. Also, Natsuki-kun, who stopped the ambush on the dragon carriage, ‘n Stargazer-san as well, if I recall.”

Berstetz: “It cannot be confirmed from here, but there is a possibility that the same marking has also been carved on Halibel-san, who is fighting with that black dragon outside.”

Serena: “And also our Excellency the Emperor I guess. I’d say that’s quite likely. Every one of those named are all irreplaceable in their abilities.”

Serena made a quick jab at Berstetz’s prior comment, while also agreeing with the opinions of the experts.

Concerning the discussion that was started by Anastasia and the others, Berstetz also concurred. So long as the effect of Palladio’s Evil Eye persisted, endless assassins would be sent after the ones who were targeted.

However—

Rem: “Wait, please. If your guess is correct, then I don’t understand why the same mark hasn’t emerged on this child… On Spica-chan.”

The one who voiced this was Rem, who was holding on to the little girl’s shoulders from behind her.

This girl that she called Spica, although her importance had not yet been detailed, was said to be one of those named in Ubilk’s prophecy.

In that regard, there was no doubt that she was an important person for the Vollachian Empire—

Otto: “Spica, is it?”

At Rem’s appeal, Otto muttered with an emotion that differed from Berstetz and the rest.

Upon hearing his muttering, Subaru looked at Otto and, with a serious expression,

Subaru: “I’ve decided where I stand. The proof will be in her way of life from here on.”

Otto: “—. What an odd coincidence. I have just made a decision as to where I stand as well.”

It would have been impossible for an outsider to guess how many complex emotions were involved in this quiet exchange. Moreover, in the midst of this assault, it was a situation that would need to be put on the back burner.

Right now, the top priority should be—

Pink-haired girl: “We need to get a move on before Garf, who’s howling above our heads, turns into a grilled tiger.”

Subaru: “Don’t make it sound like he’s a grilled chicken… But, Rem had a point earlier.”

Subaru nodded at the pink-haired girl’s words, and when he turned around, everyone’s eyes were focused on the girl named Spica. The girl made a choked sound at the concentration of their gazes and looked around with a puzzled face.

Beatrice: “If this Stargazer is to be believed, this girl… Spica is the natural enemy of the Great Disaster, in fact. So then, why is she being overlooked, I suppose?”

Petra: “—? Is that really so weird? I mean, we would’ve never known if that guy hadn’t told us about it, right? If that’s the case, doesn’t that mean that they don’t know either?”

Subaru: “…So, does that mean there’s not a Stargazer on the undead’s side?”

Subaru muttered this realization as the girls continued to exchange questions.

Ubilk turned around at that remark, but he shook his head lazily with a forlorn look on his face,

Ubilk: “Yeaaah~, I’m sorry. I don’t even know that, since it’s not related to my commandment.”

Rem: “Even so, can you at least tell me what it is about Spica-chan that makes you say she is a shining light? It would be irresponsible for you to just fling her name out.”

Ubilk: “Sooorry~ for being so irresponsible.”

Ubilk’s seemingly defiant expression turned Rem’s face a tense color. However, Ubilk’s answer was less than desirable, but Rem’s skewed topic might have been worth considering.

???: “With what materials we have at our disposal at the present, we have no choice but to use the coupled dragon carriage, which could break up at any moment, to charge toward the Fortified City, all the while protecting those who have been marked. That city is supposedly still being repaired, too.”

Subaru: “I don’t think we have that much time left.”

Even as they spoke, the dragon carriage was slowly losing its original shape under the attack of the Pruning Corps. As had been previously discussed, if it were to stop moving, it would inevitably be destroyed.

To stop this battle, they must deal with the commander—Lamia, who was leading the enemy forces.

Berstetz: “…”

As they sought for means which were more than just coping remedies currently, Berstetz noticed in his narrow, thread-narrow vision that Subaru had a terribly conflicted expression on his face. The anguish that occupied his countenance was the result of having realized something and hesitating to say what it was.

A statement that the boy hesitated to utter in this situation. His conflict was different from Serena's, who did not examine her statements carefully enough, and the content of this conflict was—

Pink-haired girl: "—Barusu."

Otto: "Natsuki-san."

At the same time, two people called out to Subaru.

Much like Berstetz, they must have also noticed the change in the boy's facial expression. And the two, who knew the boy much better than Berstetz, were able to understand what was troubling him.

Closing his eyes at the intent of their gazes, Subaru took a deep breath and, tightening his expression,

Subaru: "—Spica's Authority, it could be the breakthrough in this situation."

5

???: "Oryaaaah~!"

Wielding a barbarian sword in each hand, Medium forcefully cut down the undead approaching in front of her.

As a result of that large swing, her back side was left completely exposed, and another pair of great shears from an undead were about to strike her. However, a slender longsword intervened in its path.

Jamal: "Don't mess with her so lightly, you big fucks!"

The one who howled and slashed wildly was the one-eyed Imperial Soldier who called himself Jamal.

Working together with Jamal, Medium was struggling to protect her brother Flop, Jamal's sister Katya, and the self-indulgent Abel from the constant attacks of the undead.

Even now, Medium stopped her foe in its tracks with a front kick, cut off its head with a barbarian sword, and turned the undead back to dust. Jamal also severed his foe's knees with his twin swords, skewered its chest, and destroyed it.

Jamal: "Most Honorable Empress Consort! I'll take care of this, you just stay back!"

Medium: "Like~ I~ said~! I haven't said yes yet!"

Jamal: "Candidate for the Most Honorable Empress Consort! Stay back!"

Medium: "Geez~!"

Medium, not accustomed to being treated so respectfully, could not hide her bewilderment.

It had been that way ever since the earlier discussion between Flop and Abel. Abel pointed it out already but Medium had cooperated with her brother without asking anything of Flop's thoughts.

In hindsight, she should have asked him a bit like Abel said.

Medium: "Then, I wouldn't have been so surprised…!"

Flop: "Dear sister! Worrying and fretting doesn't suit you!"

Medium: "And just whose fault do you think that is, big bro!"

Placing her frustration into her sword, Medium put all of her strength into her legs as she grappled with the great shears that were being thrust at her. She stood firm and pushed back so as to not be overpowered. A blade was thrust from under her armpit, and Jamal, who had moved to the rear, pierced the enemy through the chest and killed it.

After Jamal did so, while scraping his twin swords together in mid-air,

Jamal: "Katya! Don't get impatient! I'm not letting anything get near you!"

Katya: "J-just stop it… I don't care anymore… Th-There's nothing good even if I keep on living anyways…"

Jamal: "Don't be so stupid! If you die, Todd won't be able to rest in peace!"

Katya: "—Hk, m-my brother's stupid…! Are you going to say it? Y-you wouldn't say that, would you? Die! D-die, brother…!"

Katya, sitting in her wheelchair, began to weep when a name that Medium did not recognize was mentioned. Medium began to feel very sorry for Katya. If it was not for this current situation, she would have liked to confide in her as a fellow younger sister who was being pushed around by her brother.

But, there was no luxury for that anymore.

Because—

???: "…"Empress Consort", now that is something I cannot just ignore, don't you think?"

Medium: "—Hk."

???: "I wonder, are you qualified to accompany the Sword Wolf among Sword Wolves?"

Tilting their head, standing out from the black-armored undead who were rushing toward them, was a very beautiful undead, even from Medium's point of view.

If not for her pale skin and eerie, golden eyes, she would have been a sight to behold.

Whether the power of her words came from her being dead or from when she was alive, her words were remarkably intimidating, rendering Medium unable to answer back.

Vincent: “Whatever answer that girl would give you, it would be of no use, since you are already dead.”

And so, it was Abel, not Medium, who answered back.

Abel and this beautiful undead glared at each other with Medium, Jamal, and the undead soldiers in between, from the front of the carriage all the way to the very back. —Wrong, Abel and this beautiful undead stared at each other.

???: “Hello, Vincent-niisama. You look as dignified as ever… Maybe you have even lost some weight?”

Vincent: “Just when I begin to think that my brothers and sisters are no longer able to pester me, you and Palladio seem to have wandered back. It is inevitable that my cheeks would appear a bit gaunt.”

???: “Fufu, of course I would want to wander back. —You saved Prisca, right? Onii-sama.”

Vincent: “…”

???: “I wonder if you are qualified to punish me and Palladio-niisama when it was you, Onii-sama, who violated the premise of the Imperial Selection Ceremony? If the truth were to become known, no one would recognize you as the Emperor, would they?”

With a sneer, the undead princess laughed with her hand covering her mouth.

Abel’s black eyes shook slightly at her words. With those eyes, Abel tried to say something back to her, but—

Medium: “There’s someone! I think Abel-chin is the Emperor!”

Jamal: “Me too, Your Excellency the Emperor! There’s no need to listen to the dead!”

Unable to hold back, the voices of Medium and Jamal, who had taken advantage of the situation, shook the carriage.

Hearing both of their statements, Abel's eyes widened even more than before, and the Princess's eyes narrowed. With irises glowing of aurelian lustre, characteristic to the undead, she looked at Medium and Jamal, and,

???: “Do pray tell. These soldiers over there, do they have any idea of who I am?”

Jamal: “Huh? By the looks of it, you're a part of the Vollachian Imperial Family, but what does it matter when you're dead? Those who die a dog's death are losers, and those who live are Sword Wolves! That's it! That's the way of the Empire!”

Shouting out the world's most simple logic, Jamal resumed his melee with the enemy soldiers.

At the pleasantry of that momentum, Medium blinked her eyes and smiled. Smiling, Medium, like Jamal, resumed fighting.

Medium: “You're way cooler than Abel-chin, Jamal-chin!”

Jamal: “That's disrespectful, Most Honorable Empress Consort!”

Giving a wild grin at Medium's praise, Jamal rampaged with his twin swords.

The confrontation between Abel and the Princess continued, with those fights occuring in between. Abel narrowed his sable eyes at the Princess as the latter seemed to have become slightly displeased.

Vincent: “—I sense the presence of many Yang Swords. You are not alone, Lamia.”

Lamia: “So what? I suppose you may be happy that your cute little sister has multiplied? Or perhaps, since it's not Prisca, Vincent-niisama isn't interested?”

Vincent: “Supposing that you are making use of the undead's mechanisms to induce phenomena outside the realm of reason, for what reason do you appear before me without those numbers?”

At the mocking attitude of the Princess—of Lamia, Abel was not at all concerned. Yet, within Lamia’s silence, Abel went ahead and found a clue.

With his narrowed sable eyes, Abel gazed at his little sister, who seemed to have been completely changed,

Vincent: “There is a limit to your numbers. Moreover, the majority of them are being subdued. —Goz, hm?”

Lamia: “You say that so calmly, Onii-sama. If that’s true, then General First-Class Ralfon’s efforts would be worthy of a medal, no? That poor soul, saying that he’s fine with being a pawn—”

Vincent: “—And hence, I chose him.”

In a quiet voice, Abel interrupted Lamia.

Abel naturally crossed his arms on the spot and took Lamia’s gaze and words head-on,

Vincent: “He is one of the Generals that I have selected. It is only natural that he should work to that capacity.”

After stating so imposingly, Abel continued by calling her name, “Lamia”.

Then, to Lamia, as she looked at him with slightly widened eyes, he spoke.

Vincent: “I have never once thought of you as an insignificant being.”

Lamia: “…”

At the words that were spoken to her, Lamia’s expression greatly shifted.

Up until then, she had looked nothing but fascinated, very sadistic, and otherwise discontent, but upon hearing Abel’s words, the look on her face changed.

Her aurelian eyes widened, and she bit her lip.

Lamia: “—VINCENT VOLLACHIAAAAA!!”

The next moment, the expression that Medium had seen vanished in an unbelievable manner, and a different expression appeared.

Her face, in which no real blood flowed, housed a definite indignation, and as her aurelian irises violently spasmed, she reached into the air and unsheathed her treasured sword, shining a brilliant red.

The treasured blade of dazzling radiance in hand, Lamia stepped forth, kicking off the floor, kicking off the wall, slipping through the gap between the undead, she leaped toward Abel.

That radiance, as if flames or even light itself were being swung down, brightly illuminated the interior of the carriage filled with undead, and attempted to extinguish Abel in his entirety.

Staring at that head-on, the treasured sword swung down toward Abel’s nose.

Medium: “Abel-chin!!”

Kicking off an undead, Medium jumped back, catching the treasured sword with her barbarian sword. After time stood still for a moment, Medium’s barbarian sword melted, and the treasured sword continued in its trajectory.

Jamal: “Your Excellency the Emperor!”

A moment later, Jamal’s twin swords went to repel the treasured sword, just as Medium had tried. These, too, were engulfed by the treasured sword’s radiance, and their blades vanished in an instant.

Surmounting the obstacles presented by Medium and Jamal, Lamia’s sword strike was about to reach Abel.

At that rate, Abel’s entire body was going to be engulfed by the red light, and Medium screamed.

It was at that moment.

Vincent: “…”

Just what had happened, no one knew.

Neither was it that behind Abel’s imposing stance, Flop and Katya had both pulled on Abel’s jacket and made him fall on his rear on the spot, nor was it Medium, who felt a tremendous pain in her chest at the thought of Abel’s death, nor was it Jamal, whose face wore a look of despair at the thought that it was already too late.

—It was just that right there, as if struck by the wind, Lamia’s body collapsed.

6

Lamia: “To think you would yet live, you are quite tenacious, Berstetz. —Say, who won the Imperial Selection Ceremony? Vincent-niisama? Or was it Prisca?”

—Those were the first words she had presented to him upon their reunion.

The reunion with his master, whose physical appearance had undergone a radical change.

Even after nine years, when he would close his eyes, he could recall her appearance from back when she had been alive, almost as if it were yesterday. As humans age, events of the distant past tend to become clearer than what has happened the day before.

That was why he only needed a single look to understand the abnormality pertaining to his master.

Her fractured, pallid skin, and her golden eyes that no longer desired the light, were those of the dead who had consigned their life to oblivion.

He had also understood from the initial question she had given him.

The clock inside her had stopped ticking. That was right. That was how it should have been. The living and the dead must be kept far apart from each other.

Therefore—

Berstetz: “—Pruning, CEASEEEE!!”

He barked out the order, raising his voice to the point that he thought it might tear apart his parched throat.

Graced by the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion, neither the strong winds that were supposed to batter him nor the violent tremors of the dragon carriage were present, allowing his voice to soar and resound throughout the area.

The moment they heard the command, the undead, equipped with great shears in their hands, stopped moving.

The Pruning Corps suddenly halted their movements, and he did not know what to think about that fact. Should he lament it, or should he feel proud?

Entrusting their hearts to the Poison Princess, they were a symbol of fear with cold blood running through their veins. It was Berstetz who had reshaped them into such. They had met his expectations in accordance with his goals.

And, even after death, their bodies had reacted to the command of Berstetz Fondalfon.

Berstetz: “Time has stopped for the undead. If so, for them, that battle during the Imperial Selection Ceremony would have just occurred the day before… What is ingrained in their bodies can never lose its color.”

They had demonstrated the ideal way to follow their master even in death.

Lamia: “—And then? You are only able to subdue my animals for a moment, are you not?”

Berstetz: “…Yes. However, with this, now you are here.”

Turning around towards the voice behind him, Berstetz greeted her in person, alone.

With its roof and walls in ruin, the dragon carriage was a mere shadow of its former sublimity. Despite that, on one of the platforms of the carriage that was laden with the Empire’s hope, Berstetz and Lamia faced off against one another.

Confirming that he was visible in the reflection of Lamia’s golden eyes, Berstetz blew out a breath.

Berstetz: “I have been expecting you, Your Excellency Lamia.”

Lamia: “Yes, it seems that way. But, I wonder, why are you here alone?”

Lamia gave a slight tilt of her head, spreading her arms as her eyes scanned over the empty dragon carriage.

Aside from Berstetz, neither Serena nor those of the Kingdom were present. He had remained here alone because he had a secret plan to immobilize Lamia as well as the Pruning Corps.

As a matter of fact, he had been successful in doing so for the Pruning Corps, even if it would last for only but a moment.

Berstetz was certain his commands would never take effect ever again, but he knew that his fellow passengers in the dragon carriage were able to utilize the opening he had created with the few seconds of time he bought.

With that, Berstetz had kept his promise to those who had gone ahead of him.

Berstetz: “I am no longer at an age where I would make declarations I cannot keep.”

Lamia: “There is no need to put yourself down like that. Nine years have passed since then, but you really have not changed a bit. You are the same as when I had died.”

Berstetz: "—Perhaps it is as you say, Your Excellency."

Berstetz responded to Lamia's teasing words in a low, gravelly voice.

Lamia knitted her brows as she heard that. In front of her, Berstetz balled his bony hand into a fist, clenching his teeth that had miraculously not suffered a single loss.

He had not changed, even after nine years. What Lamia had said was correct.

Berstetz: "Since that moment, my time has also come to a standstill, Your Excellency Lamia."

Berstetz murmured, then took a step forward.

Full of determination, he took a large step. Once his outstretched foot met the floor, he took another. Forcing his elderly body to move, Berstetz continued stepping forward, one step at a time.

Lamia: "…"

Exasperatedly, Lamia narrowed her golden eyes.

The flow of time moved along slowly, feeling sluggish and stagnant. Not only did it feel as such, but it was slow in reality as well. Compared to Julius and Garfiel, who had been fighting to protect Berstetz and the others until a little while ago, it was terribly feeble to the point that making a comparison would be presumptuous.

He was a sheep painted black in a pack of wolves. He had become a sly old goat. Making his horns seem larger than they were, he desperately flaunted that he had his own role amongst the wolf pack.

Lamia: "—Yang Sword."

As Lamia reached out towards the sky, the hilt of the esteemed, crimson sword materialized in her hand.

Her slender fingers squeezed themselves tightly around it, drawing out the treasured sword, the symbol of Vollachia. The fiery red, scintillating flame trapped within the blade seared into his eyes.

He was glad he always kept his eyes narrowed. Thanks to it, his eyeballs would still have been protected, even if his eyelids had been scorched.

Carrying those trivial, useless thoughts with him, Berstetz lifted up his fist. Curled around one of his fingers was a ring. It was proof that he was the Prime Minister of the Vollachian Empire.

It was a Meteor, imbued with Mana of the element of fire.

Lamia: “I have already seen that.”

The coldness in Lamia’s gaze retained its ice, having already seen the Meteor in action at the Imperial Capital, within the Crystal Palace, inside the throne room.

Berstetz’s advance was terribly slow, and his last resort had already been subjugated once. On the other hand, his opponent possessed one of the ten Enchanted Swords, which wielded power relative to the top echelon of the world—

Berstetz: “—Your Excellency.”

He knew it would take less than a single second for her to cut him down and reduce him to cinders.

Despite that, out of his entire life, which spanned close to seventy years so far, Berstetz made full use of the longest second he had lived.

And then, he told his master what he had told her in the past, once again.

Berstetz: “—We have lost…!”

Berstetz threw down his raised fist as he spoke, pointing the ring at the floor.

There, he activated the Meteor. Flames swelled up and burst out beneath his feet, augmenting the elder's sluggish advance with blazing momentum.

With great intensity, Berstetz's entire body barreled towards Lamia.

Lamia's golden eyes widened upon seeing the old man's body throw itself at her from up close. In those wide, gold-colored optics, there was the reflection belonging to Berstetz Foldalfon.

Gazing into the face that Berstetz saw in her eyes, Lamia continued to hold up the Yang Sword, and,

Lamia: "—So, you were capable of making such a frustrated face."

They were lady and vassal, with a long-lasting affiliation while maintaining a respectable distance, who never had a heart-to-heart conversation with one another.

For the first time, Lamia's enigmatic vassal displayed an expression that she had never seen before. On that face, full of wrinkles and thin eyes narrowed to the point that his pupils were not visible, the elderly man appeared as if he were about to cry. Her hand stilled.

—Berstetz and Lamia's bodies met each other head-on.

Unable to mitigate the force of the explosion, the two hurtled into the wall of the carriage in a tangle of limbs. They were slated towards the wall that had been torn down by the Pruning Corps' break-in, and they were thrown out, just like that.

Squeezing tightly, with fingers as bare as a withered tree, the elderly man grabbed onto the dress of the beautiful girl and refused to let go.

Without separating from one another, their bodies were forcefully ejected out of the coupled dragon carriage—

7

—In that instant, a shockwave struck all of the countless Lamia Godwins that had appeared within the coupled dragon carriages.

Lamia: “…”

The Lamias fighting Goz Ralfon, the Lamias fighting Garfiel Tinzel, the Lamias fighting Roswaal L. Mathers, the Lamias fighting Emilia, and the Lamias in the other parts of the dragon carriage were all affected by the shock simultaneously.

A Divine Protection is a blessing that can be bestowed upon lives born into this world; their true natures have not been elucidated to this day, and much is still shrouded in mystery.

However, regarding Divine Protections, many hold a single conviction that they intuitively understand.

That is, that Divine Protections affect the soul, of the ones to whom they are granted and the ones on which they are targeted.

Whether this is true or not has never been proven. However, this much can be said.

—Berstetz Fondalfon was thrown out of the dragon carriage with one of the Lamia Godwins, and they were both excluded from the effects of the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion at the same time.

And then, as one of the Lamia Godwins brought her sword down on Vincent Vollachia, and both Medium O’Connel and Jamal Aurélie failed to block the attack, it was also the very moment when tragedy was about to strike in front of Flop O’Connel and Katya Aurélie.

Lamia: “—Hk”

As if having been struck by a gust of wind, the body of Lamia, who had raised up her Yang Sword, was pushed back.

At that moment, neither Lamia nor Medium and the others understood what had happened. However, the truth was that Vincent, who had been pulled down, extended his leg and kicked Lamia backward.

Then, behind Lamia, who had been punted away, the door connecting to the adjacent car was breached—

Lamia: “…”

A rainbow brilliance danced, and the Pruning Corps standing before the door were cut down.

Slipping past the light of that rainbow, three small silhouettes scrambled into the car.

One of them held up their hand, and a faint glow surrounded the three silhouettes, speeding them up as they rushed in. The one in the middle, who was holding hands with the previous silhouette, shouted out.

Boy: “—Lamia Godwin!”

With a raised voice, such was the shout of the black-haired boy who was holding hands with two girls on either side.

The girl in the dress had produced the glow, the young black-haired boy had called out that name, and the last one who had leapt in, with the hand opposite to the one that was linked with the boy, she reached out—

Girl: “—E ea.”

—Retracting her hand after touching the back that she had leapt towards, she stripped off the name of the Poison Princess.

Chapter 28:
Siblings of the Empire

1

A premonition had emerged within him.

When the Stargazer Ubilk had named her the light that would save the Empire, he had racked his brains in earnestness and plunged into thinking.

Just how could she possibly become the nemesis to the resurrected dead.

Just what about her, was unalike other humans.

Being a kind girl. Being earnest. Being able to endure for someone. All of that was wonderful, but those conditions applied to others as well.

It was not that, but a specialty she alone was endowed with, and no others were—.

Subaru: “—The Authority of Gluttony.”

Even if she wished to part with her past of having been a Sin Archbishop, that cross shan’t ever let her loose.

Subaru had pledged to her, that he shan’t let her loose from bearing that cross.

She had pledged to Subaru, that she would not escape bearing that cross.

—Thus, therein lied hope.

Subaru: “I have, the Authority of Sloth and Greed.”

The abominable Witch Cult, the abhorrent Sin Archbishops.

Petelgeuse Romanée-Conti and Regulus Corneas, the Authorities they wielded were now, through many series of events, within the deepest depths of Subaru's.

Why, had this happened. Repulsed as though they had passed the baton onto him, Subaru did not confront it with gravitas as befit. But, that was no longer possible for him.

For her, for Subaru who chose her, he must confront it.

And so—

Subaru: "—If you are going to choose a life as Spica, not Louis Arneb, then you should be able to change even the way the Authority is used, just as I have."

There were two sides to every coin, all tools depended on the way they were used. —No, not just tools.

Whether a person became good, or was lacquered with evil. It was oneself who drew the final line. There existed circumstances where something of such sort eluded capability. But, she had been bestowed the opportunity to do such.

—Ley Batenkaitos of Gourmet.

—Roy Alphard of Bizarre Eating.

—Louis Arneb of Satiation.

Wielding the power they were endowed with, ones who became sinners, never to be forgiven by the world.

Possessing the same power as them, an atoner who walked the path of indemnifying the world.

Subaru: "—Star Eating."

The inextricably intertwined siblings, who etched an antecedent of evil.

The atoner would eat anew their antecedent, the deeds of the sinners who inherited the names of stars.

The newborn girl who eclipsed stars, Spica of Star Eating.

Spica: “—E ea.”

Calling the Names of those resurrected in vessels concocted of earth, whose Memories were sealed within bugs, the Star Eating of the girl bestowed with the name of the Alpha Virginis, was activated with her protruding hand, with the touch of her fingers.

He knew of an empty place, white, where naught held meaning.

The place where the elements of all souls, be they beautiful or sullied, were scoured and born anew.

Eating their role, that of those who had been hauled down from that place.

Eating their fate, such that those souls could never again be food for another.

—Eating the deeds of the Sin Archbishops affixed with the names of stars, Star Eating came to materialise.

Spica: “—A ou o e ea.”

2

That instant, the Lamias were all engulfed by the wind, halting their movements.

Goz Ralfon, as he bore searing wounds all over his body, did not miss this fleeting opportunity.

Goz: “—Got you.”

In the midst of battle, he was exposed to the threat of the encroaching Yang Sword from every direction; however, Goz shed his flame-engulfed armor, enduring the onslaught.

As he skillfully handled each attack, Goz closed his eyes, his will to fight undiminished, devoting himself to the sounds around him.

Thanks to the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion, he could concentrate on the sounds of the Lamias he opposed. With more than twenty Lamias, and the sound between all of them remaining identical, Goz understood that he was facing a truly formidable foe.

But, for all the identical Lamias, their compatibility against Goz was the worst possible.

For some unknown reason, all the Lamias had collapsed simultaneously.

It must have been Vincent’s doing. The Vollachian Emperor, to whom Goz swore loyalty, had prepared a means to break the deadlock, even in such a situation. It was enough to bring Goz to the brink of tears.

Holding back his emotions, Goz raised his mace, and twisting the middle of its long handle, he disassembled it into the two parts of the striking head and the shaft. Using the shaft, he struck the striking head with great force.

In an instant, the shockwave of sound that erupted crashed against only the collapsed Lamias.

Lamia: “…”

The golden mace wielded by Goz, combining a long spear-like handle with a spherical striking head, was a masterpiece forged exclusively for his use.

Weighing as much as ten men with a single swing, when combined with Goz’s herculean strength and exceptional ears, it realized a technique unattainable for others—Each and every living organism possessed vibrations unique to themselves, and the “howl”, which could strike one’s opponents with those same vibrations in the form of sound, had been attained by Goz.

Contrary to his bold and dauntless appearance, Goz Ralfon possessed ears that could distinguish even the nuances in the sounds of the wind, and he had the skill of a genius who could delicately perform with any and all musical instruments.

That deadly “howl” was precisely why Goz was known as the Lion Knight.

Once he had seized her unique vibrations in the heat of battle, Goz’s “howl” assailed Lamia—No, it assailed all the Lamias, causing the cracks within each of them to grow, shattering the undead Princesses.

—The same events transpired in various carriages separate to Goz’s battlefield.

Deeming flames to be ineffective against the Yang Sword, and instead confronted Lamia and the Pruning Corps with blades of wind and landslides of earth, was Roswaal.

Using the immense strength from his beastification, his beastly claws ferociously tearing through Lamia, the Pruning Corps, and even the dragon carriage itself, was Garfiel.

Reinforcing the dragon carriages with ice as they were destroyed one after the other, slipping past the group of ice sculptures she had created to take on the Pruning Corps, and battling with the Lamias, was Emilia.

Everyone aboard the coupled dragon carriages did not overlook the moments of opportunity that had been created in an unexpected way.

They did not overlook the fleeting instance, believing that someone, even if they did not know who, would create such a moment.

With the radiant Yang Sword in hand, the Lamia Godwins, were shattered one after the other—

3

Lamia: “—Hk.”

Spica: “Auu!!”

Clenching down on her molars, Lamia spun her body around, and slammed her long legs against the girl who had touched her back—Spica. Receiving Lamia's kick, Spica's body was violently blown away. Subaru, who had been holding Spica's hand, and Beatrice flew an excessive amount together.

There was a reason for that other than simply the strength of Lamia's legs. Due to the effects of Beatrice's Murak, the gravity applied to Subaru and the other two had decreased as much as possible, and they had become as light as ping-pong balls.

Subaru: "Gooo!"

Julius: "On it!"

Slipping under Subaru and the others who had been sent flying, Julius stepped towards Lamia.

Tearing through the dust of the Pruning Corps, which he had cut down, the thrust of the Knight sword, clad in rainbow as it was, was unleashed upon Lamia. Housing an aurora, Julius's sword thrust even cut through the great shears of the powerful soldiers, as if they were pudding.

However, the Yang Sword held by Lamia released a light and heat more intense than the brilliant rainbow of Julius's sword, and halted the blow from the thrusting attack head-on.

As light erupted upon the clash of sword on sword, Julius and Lamia both repelled each other. Both parties counterattacked immediately, and the next sword fight—did not begin.

Lamia: "…Even in the Imperial Selection Ceremony, you never once did things by your own hand, now did you?"

Vincent: "—Yes, that is correct."

Loosening her lips, Lamia muttered those words like a sigh. Responding to that was Abel, who stood directly behind her.

In Abel's hand was gripped a half-melted barbarian sword, and although the blade had become short and dull, it still was able to pierce through Lamia's back.

Lamia: "At long last, you finally feel inclined to use your own hands to kill your blood-related sibling."

An undead's weak point was neither their heart, nor their cranium.

Operating within the vessels of earth, were the Corebugs discovered by Beatrice and Roswaal. As long as that remained intact, the activity of an undead would not come to a halt.

However, the Yang Sword, its red blade pointed to the floor, was dropped with a swaying motion. Before the tip of the falling Yang Sword could pierce the floor, it vanished as if it was swallowed by the air.

And the reason why Lamia had let it fall, was because the tips of her fingers had crumbled, and thus she was no longer able to hold a sword.

Lamia: "…"

Twisting her body, with the barbarian sword still skewered through her body, Lamia shook free from Abel's hand.

Taking tottering steps, her dying body was such that it seemed like anybody could take a weapon and cause her to fully crumble to pieces with just a single strike. In fact, Jamal swung his melted twin swords around, displaying his intent to slash at her, but Abel held him back by reaching his arm out.

Then, gasping very feeble breaths, Lamia looked back at Abel, and,

Lamia: "It seems that neither father, nor Barthroy-niisama, have come back. After all, those two were satisfied."

Vincent: "—Lamia."

Those brief words left behind by Lamia had caused Abel's sable eyes to waver.

Seeing that single reaction, Lamia narrowed her lifeless aurelian eyes, and her cracked face of pallid hue contorted into a smile. —It was an awfully devilish smile.

Lamia: "—General First-Class Temeglyph!"

Immediately after, Lamia's expression changed, and she called out a name with a shrill voice.

It was not a name that was known to Subaru, but for several of the people currently present, that name held immense significance.

Of course, that also went for the very person whose name was called out.

Julius: "Al Clauseria!"

With an instantaneous reaction, it was Julius who briskly painted an aurora of rainbow.

Springing the tip of his readied sword up, Julius borrowed the power of his Spirits and created a barrier of intense light. Thanks to Julius's quick judgment, the lives of everyone in the carriage had been saved.

But at the same time, since the aurora, laid out in order to protect them, had hindered their mobilization, they were slow on the next move.

Responding to Lamia's call, a bullet of light had come from the side of the coupled dragon carriages and perforated the wagon.

The bullet-like object had blown away the wall of the dragon carriage, and the aurora had prevented it from shooting out the people inside. However, a light orb that had not been stopped was able to tear off the roof, and it fully exposed the inside of the carriage.

Slicing through the air and approaching the exposed wagon, was one from the flock of undead flying dragons that had been deploying the Pruning Corps one after the other—No, it was one that had mastered acrobatic flight to an extent utterly incomparable to that of the rest of them.

Clad in a fierce wind, that dark, undead flying dragon swooped down upon the dragon carriage, and snatched up Lamia.

Having dropped the Yang Sword, Lamia's arm had already been reduced back to its shoulder, and she was swept up into the air; sat astride the undead flying dragon, the undead who had performed that act was—

Julius: "—Balleroy-dono?!"

Vincent: "Balleroy…"

Flop: "Balleroy?!"

At that unexpected figure, several voices of astonishment were raised.

But, one among them was most potent with shock, and at the same time, it was the most heartbroken.

Medium: "Ballebro?"

Her blue eyes opened wide, Medium's mutter was met with no response from the undead she had called out to.

Only, pulling the reins of the undead flying dragon he was mounted on, he immediately ascended with Lamia snatched in his arms. As the undead rode the undead flying dragon, it faced its head toward the rear of the dragon carriage, and flew in that opposite direction.

As much as the coupled dragon carriages ran, as much as the undead flying dragon flew, the distance between the two of them increased.

Medium: "BALLEBRO! BALLEBROOO—!!"

Losing control of herself and stretching out her arms, Medium tried to chase the silhouette that had immediately faded out of sight.

From behind, Flop jumped at his little sister and put a stop to her rash actions. The Pruning Corps still remained in the coupled dragon carriages.

Pruning Corps: “Ohh, RAAAAHHHHHHH—!!”

Those who covered their faces with black helmets raised a deep roar, and fiercely raised their great shears overhead.

It was just as if their collective will was to try and fulfill their master’s escape.

In the past, when their master was killed in the Imperial Selection Ceremony, that was something they had been unable to accomplish due to being defeated by the Blue Lightning; so now that they had been turned into undead, that was the dying wish they would attempt to fulfill.

Anastasia: “Everybody, don’t lose focus till it’s all over!”

Anastasia shouted a command, and Julius, being the first to receive that ardor, burst into action.

Those who could fight took up their weapons and clashed head-on with the Pruning Corps who had just raised their own spirits. Thus, the current clash annihilated them down to their very last soldier.

—But, having bought time until their master could make her escape, there was no doubt that the final moments of this raid by the Pruning Corps had certainly blossomed into a flower of success.

4

—Around the same time when Balleroy Temeglyph had snatched up Lamia Godwin and flew away.

Far, far away, collapsed on the tracks left behind by the speeding coupled dragon carriages, the old man covered his face with his hands.

His entire body creaked in pain, and his hideously burnt legs impudently cried out. Yet, neither the pain nor his inflamed wounds were things the old man had desired.

Pain and wounds and the like, he gave not the slightest care. —Why, why had he failed to die yet again?

???: “I was given an opportunity.”

To the old man who was lying on his back, cursing his own disgraceful self, she said so.

She was not in human form. But, her supple yet strong beastly appearance epitomized what the humans of the Vollachian Empire deemed to be superior and beautiful.

Acting with the forces that were left behind at the rear of the dragon carriage, chasing after the coupled dragon carriages in order to deliver a message, she had certainly witnessed the figure of the old man leaping out with the flames of the Meteor.

And, just before the old man was about to slam against the ground, she had snatched him away from death.

Man: “By opportunity, you mean…?”

Woman: “When you were thrown out of the dragon carriage, I could not have made it to you in time with these legs of mine. But, the undead that flew out with you sent you flying.”

Man: “…”

Woman: “In that brief bit of time, my legs were able to make it. That is all I am able to say.”

Shaking her head slowly, the beautiful, golden-furred leopard informed the old man.

He understood what she had said, along with the intentions behind it. However, he did not know the absolute truth.

Perhaps that person had merely pushed the old man who had jumped at her aside, finding him bothersome. She was a person whose true intentions he was not able to understand in the slightest.

Thus, him having no idea about what someone else was thinking, was something that applied to every member of the Vollachian Imperial Family.

???: “—So, you were capable of making such a frustrated face.”

Berstetz: “—Hk”

Recalling her surprised expression when she had said that, the old man’s throat clogged up on something.

Just what that was, even the old man did not know. He just had this, only this one thought.

Berstetz: “If you even went as far as to kill your younger sister… to kill Her Excellency Lamia, in order to obtain this Empire, then take responsibility…! Fulfill your duty as Emperor… hk!”

Was he perhaps a sheep or a goat that had disguised even his own fur, merely feigning as a Sword Wolf? The old man, who was simultaneously none of these things, and still somewhat all of them, wrung his voice out.

Those were his own true feelings that lay deep within his eyes, narrowed to the thinness of threads.

The old man—The Imperial Prime Minister, Berstetz Fondalfon, reflected upon the shame of his life, and wrung it out as words.

5

—The Crystal Palace, often appraised as the world’s most beautiful castle, had undergone a major change to its state of affairs.

The undead roamed freely within its walls, and the wounds from the recent conflict that was centered in the Imperial Capital had not healed in the slightest; remaining there was only death and destruction, without the counterparts of life and restoration.

For this reason, the Crystal Palace had lost its original beauty and had become a dreadful realm of rampant repulsiveness.

However—

???: “…”

Quietly opening the eyelids that contained those crimson eyes, was a being who, even in this realm of suffering, had not lost their beauty.

Her long orange hair was unraveled and frayed, her luxurious blood-red dress was torn all over, her snow-white skin was marred by dust and grime, but none of it tarnished her allure in the slightest.

For those who were truly beautiful possessed traits that had no need for any superficial adornment.

But then again—

Woman: “Compared to your current appearance, even frayed hair and torn clothing appear as excellent as gold.”

???: “…That is something that you would say, Prisca.”

At the sickly-sweet tone of voice that called her by her old name, Priscilla Barielle narrowed her eyes.

Her arms were raised overhead, restrained by special chains, and her appearance was that of a prisoner of war being forced to stand. Despite this, there was not the slightest hint of vulnerability in Priscilla’s eyes or demeanor.

After all, no matter where she was restrained and made to stand, there was not a single reason for her to yield.

Priscilla, who had been locked in the dungeon of the Crystal Palace in the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, was skeptical of the one who had expressly come to visit her—the now undead Lamia Godwin.

She appeared to be of the same age as when she had died nine years ago, and while she possessed the skin and eyes that were characteristic of the undead, her alluring presence that had earned her the name of the Poison Princess was very much intact.

With her dress in tatters and half her body destroyed, she was now but a mere shadow of her former self.

Since she was an undead, she should have been able to restore the parts that had crumbled. Even if that was not the case, she could easily just transfer herself to a new earthen vessel. Having observed the undead and made those inferences, Priscilla then understood.

She grasped why Lamia, who despised unsightliness and disgracefulness to the extreme, had appeared before her in such a sorry state.

Priscilla: “What, are you going to die yet again, Lamia?”

Lamia: “My, that is quite the way to speak to your elder sister. But, indeed. After all, my connection to the empty box has been severed… no, it is more like the connection has been eaten.”

Pricilla: “…”

Lamia: “Ah yes, listen to this, Prisca. Vincent-niisama did this to me with his own hands. This is something he has never done for you, whom he holds so dear, right?”

Lamia placed her hand, still intact though about to crumble, over her mouth and laughed.

Whether or not that was something that merited boasting was a matter of one’s own sense of values, but Priscilla just sniffed quietly. At her reaction, Lamia narrowed her aurelian eyes and said,

Lamia: “Truly, it has been quite dull. Apart from you and Vincent-niisama, there exists nobody else capable of holding a proper conversation with me.”

Priscilla: “Albeit between you and mineself, the number of proper conversations had could be counted on one’s fingers.”

Lamia: “It is not a matter of quantity. Foolish little sister.”

With that murmur from Lamia, the hand she had placed over her mouth had crumbled and vanished.

Slowly, Lamia was losing what was left of her form. Since she stood directly before her, the sight filled Priscilla’s vision whether she wanted to see it or not.

However, Priscilla did not shut her eyelids. Those crimson eyes, trained their gaze on Lamia.

And, with that gaze trained upon her,

Priscilla: “If your role has concluded, swiftly make your exit, Lamia. —Once more, mineself shall attend your deathbed.”

At Priscilla’s words, Lamia raised her eyebrows slightly.

Then, with a smile akin to sweet, sweet poison,

Lamia: “Such an unlovable little sister.”

As far as Priscilla could remember, those were the exact same words and smile as her final moments from the time she was alive.

6

???: “For a final convo between fellow sisters, was that ‘nough to satisfy ya?”

To Priscilla, who had just witnessed the end of Lamia, the lighthearted voice of a man called out from somewhere.

Turning her face in the direction of the faint footsteps, she met eyes with the undead who had descended the dungeon staircase, wearing a dauntless expression. Golden brilliance looming within black, he possessed eyes shared by all undead.

However, just like Lamia, the atmosphere he exuded set him apart from the other undead of poor craftsmanship.

Priscilla: “So it was you? That is, the one who brought Lamia back to the palace.”

???: “She sure was a tough cookie, now wasn’t she? With her body in such a state, she came down to the basement all on her own. As expected of a noble Vollachian Princess… as an Imperial Citizen myself, it makes me rather proud.”

Priscilla: “For a rebel who turned his fangs on the Emperor, those words are plenty shameless.”

???: “I ain’t got any ground to stand on if ya say that to me, but… if it’s in the sense of being a rogue to the Empire, there ain’t much of a difference between myself and M’lady.”

With such a manner of speaking, the standing figure stepped forth out of the darkness.

The person’s form clearly entering her vision, Priscilla confirmed the guess she had made based on voice alone. The name of this undead was Balleroy Temeglyph, a former member of the Empire’s Nine Divine Generals.

And in the past, he was an acquaintance of Priscilla’s during the times when she had still been in the Empire. That was when Priscilla had been the wife of an Imperial Mid Class Count, her first husband.

Nonetheless, this was not a case of the living and the dead renewing an old friendship from bygone days.

Priscilla: “What business have you? ‘Tis impossible to think your foolish question earlier was the whole purpose.”

Balleroy: “Of course, ascertaining the last moments of Her Excellency Lamia was part of my job… but, I’ve also brought a meal for M’lady.”

While saying that, Balleroy raised a silver platter that he had been hiding behind his back.

With a similar silver lid resting on top, it adhered to the formalities one would see in a restaurant, but as Priscilla narrowed her crimson eyes,

Priscilla: “Needless.”

Balleroy: “Well now, that goes without saying. After all, we’re all dead, right? Since we ain’t got the need for food, it’s unthinkable that we’d have food for living people like M’lady. If I didn’t bring anything, a rare beauty woulda been ruined.”

The color of his skin bereft of life, Balleroy smiled as he lifted the lid off the meal.

Then, a warm steam and aroma diffused, and Priscilla closed one eye at the dish before her.

For something made by an undead, it appeared to be rather respectable cooking.

Balleroy: “Unfortunately, I couldn’t sample it since my sense of taste is gone, but I’ve got experience with cooking, so I don’t think it’ll taste bad. Uh-oh, please forgive me for giving ya the cuisine of commoners.”

Priscilla: "…"

As Priscilla remained silent, Balleroy took the fork that was on the platter and used it to stab the food; then, he brought it towards her mouth.

Priscilla's arms were bound to the ceiling. She knew she had no choice but to do that, but.

Priscilla: "I shall lop off your head with my own hands."

Calmly announcing that, Priscilla ingested the food presented to her.

It was not bad. But, it was cheap. Even when using ingredients from inside the palace, if the skills and conceptions of the chef were cheap, the finished product could not be designated as high quality.

At Priscilla's silent pressure, Balleroy gave a wry smile with the face of an undead. Within that smile, Priscilla caught a glimpse of something other than what was being directed towards herself,

Balleroy: "Nah, this just reminded me 'bout how there was a time in the past when I fed a young lass like this, since she was locked up as punishment for causing mischief."

Sensing a change in atmosphere, Balleroy divulged the true meaning behind his wry smile.

While sensing displeasure in his answer, Priscilla voiced a "Wipe" to have him wipe her mouth, and then,

Priscilla: "For what reason are you lot destroying the Empire? In resurrection, what is it you desire?"

Balleroy: "—It ain't my place to give an answer for the former. But, the latter is quite simple."

Upon receiving that question, his wry smile from just before and his light-hearted tone both disappearing, Balleroy responded.

In response to the change in atmosphere surrounding Balleroy, Priscilla became alert once again. Inside of him—No, it had been in Lamia too, was that definite indignation.

Without betraying Priscilla's impression—

Balleroy: "The desires of the dead have been fixed since the dawn of time, it's to clear up any remaining grudges or pent-up resentment."

Indeed, revealing the heartfelt desires of the undead, Balleroy Temeglyph spilled those words in a voice of lifeless laughter.

7

Man: "Did I… get killed? Fucking hell!"

Kicking off the wet road with a splash, he turned the corner ahead of him with vigor. That instant, his hips slammed against the wooden crate directly in front of him, and he forcefully tumbled over as he screamed an "Uggh".

Inside the helmet as it crashed against the wet stone pavement, pain flashed through his forehead, and he saw a spark in his vision. But, as a halo of birds spun above his head, this was not a situation in which he could afford to collapse.

Placing his right hand on the ground, he had no choice but to hurry and get back up.

If he did not do so, the man would come. —Garbed in black, the one who wished to observe him, the one known as Viva the Dissector, would come.

Man: "If I don't, he'll make my organs spill out again…"

Viva: "I have already come, got it?"

Man: "—Hk."

Feeling a chill in his lungs, he drew the Blue Dragon Sword from the back of his waist in the blink of an eye. Lacking any technique or form, he swung it around in order to hit his opponent through brute-force sweeps, no matter where he may be.

However, though it ought to have landed a hit no matter where the opponent was, the Blue Dragon Sword missed; instead, a scorching pain passed through his armpit, and the Blue Dragon Sword slipped right out of his hand.

Man: “Gah… hk.”

Viva: “Resistance is futile, got it? Even in the best of circumstances, the conditions you meet differ from those of the others, got it? If you shed blood in futility, unable to conform to the Emperor’s desires, you will be of no value, got it?”

Constricting the arm where the blood was spurting out of his armpit, he struggled in vain trying to reduce the amount of blood he was losing. He would have wanted to support the open wound with his opposite hand if possible, but it had already been too long since he said goodbye to that arm for such a wish to be granted.

Behind him as he let out cries of pain, dual-wielding curved-edge knives and concealing his mouth with a black cloth, a blue-haired undead turned to face him.

The pair of golden eyes glared at him, intently observing him as he shed blood.

That his opponent enjoyed gradually torturing people to death, was not the case. As long as he believed what Viva had said several dozens of times up till now, his opponent’s aim was experimentation.

Using the body of a living person, it seemed there were things he wished to ascertain. Likely, that was something he had been doing over and over since the time he had been alive, which was why his alias was the “Dissector”.

Man: “So neither can I fight, nor can I escape… I wanna move on to the next one, so could you just make it painless?”

Viva: “To make it “painless” would be illogical, got it? It is not as though I wish to torment you, there are merely things I wish to ascertain, got it?”

Man: “As I thought~… So be it.”

Giving up all hope that he could reason with his opponent, he shifted his gaze towards his fallen Blue Dragon Sword. Fortunately, it was not lying very far from him, and it seemed like he would be able to jump to it.

The problem would be whether he would be successful in cutting off his own head or not. If he failed, the suffering would be hopelessly prolonged. —This was no time to hesitate.

Man: “—Hk!”

A judgment was made in one second, a resolve was settled in one second; not even one second was needed for him to burst into action. Before the Dissector could commence his malevolent deeds, the man immediately dived towards the Blue Dragon Sword without warning.

Viva’s response to that act was a move too slow, and in that opening he would use the blade of the Blue Dragon Sword to slice through his own neck—

???: “No no, isn’t it a little too soon to abandon this life and move onto the hereafter?”

Man: “Ah?!”

As he tried to slice with the Blue Dragon Sword, something was pinning the blade down against the ground. From what he could see, what had done that was a small leg, and continuing upward, was a slender waist, and a crazy smile.

Standing on the Blue Dragon Sword with one leg, was the reckless act of a child wearing a Japanese-style outfit.

Viva: “A child, this is yet another undesired condition, got it?”

Upon the entry of that child, Viva spun the two knives in his hands and, without a shred of hesitation, attempted to drive the same attack that had gouged the man’s armpit into the vitals of the child.

It was the most horrible routine of rendering the arms and legs useless, then proceeding to perform an inspection on the internal organs.

Seeing those blades close in on him, the child raised an eyebrow and,

Child: “Hoho! To completely ignore the sudden pretensions of an intruder, I must say bravo! Although…”

Viva: “—Hk?!”

In the subsequent instant, Viva’s head, his eyes wide open, came flying off from his torso.

The child had kicked the hand gripping the knife Viva had tried to swing, and as that arm shattered, it was instead Viva’s own head that had been severed off by his own knife.

And then, the child nimbly switched the foot he had standing on the Blue Dragon Sword, and his next kick perforated what remained of Viva’s torso, and the body of the undead, on which Dissection would not be required, was pulverized to smithereens.

Child: “Unfortunately, co-starring with a villain of poor-tastes such as yourself is NG!”

In contrast to the death battle he was taking part in, the child declared so in a frivolous tone.

On the opposite side of that remark, the head of Viva, whose body had been destroyed, gave an astonished expression as it crumbled to dust, engulfed by the winds of the Imperial Capital.

The man could do nothing but watch with a dumbfounded look on his face in his collapsed state, and still with one leg raised, the child turned to face him,

Child: “Pardon me for standing on top of your sword. You see, the floor is wet right? It would be really uncomfortable for me if my zori got wet. So that’s why I’m acting like this!”

Man: “Ah, I don’t really mind that though…”

Looking up at the dimwitted pose of the child with one leg raised, he got himself up from his collapsed position and plopped himself down into sitting cross-legged. Just as the child said, it was unpleasant for his butt to get wet, but he was already in a state where it was too late for that, no matter what he did.

Man: “More importantly, I wanna ask someone to lend me a hand for things that aren’t too late yet. Could I count on you to help me out? “

Child: “Ah, having only one arm would certainly be an inconvenience. That considerably striking form is exceedingly favorable for me so it would be a waste if we parted here! That shall do fine!”

Giving an indifferent smile, the child vigorously added, “However!”, and pointed at the roof of the building directly next to them,

Child: “As I have informed you, I don’t want to get my zori wet! So let’s move to higher ground first. Until then, please take care not to lose blood, Mister Helmet!”

Man: “…My name is Al, you yancha boy.”

Child: “Hahahaha! Yancha boy! The way you speak is kinda similar to Boss!”

As the child roared with laughter, the man, still constricting his armpit—Al, gave a long sigh.

The child was clearly not an ordinary person, but Al could keenly feel the influence of a certain someone who knew many of the words that the boy was spewing out.

Whether this encounter would turn out to be a good thing or a bad thing, either way—

Al: “Wait for me, Priscilla… I, no matter what, will definitely save you.”

Strength no longer remaining in its three heads, the colossal body finally lay limp on the ground.

With wings torn asunder, and many ninja tools piercing its body, even when most of what could be said to be vital points were pierced and destroyed, it was difficult to tell just which had been the fatal strike.

If there was just one thing he could say—

Halibel: “This won’t do, I ain’t good against “zombies” that ain’t human, that’s for darn sure.”

Waving his sleeves about, Halibel muttered as he watched the Three-Headed Dragon entirely turn to dust.

The three additional bodies that had split off from himself also disappeared, and he took a lengthy breath from the exhaustion. As expected, fighting against an opponent on the level of a Dragon took a whole lot of effort.

If possible, he never wanted to be put on monster extermination duty again.

Halibel: “Tho’ that may be so, lil’ Ana and the rest of ‘em said somethin’ like the same girl could keep becomin’ a zombie.”

If that was true, it was also quite possible that the Three-Headed he had just defeated would reappear.

Next time, Halibel would probably win again, but he was unsure if they would be in an environment where people nearby would not get dragged into the fight. Moreover, he would feel uneasy as a hired guard if his hands were busy during that occasion.

Julius was also quite competent by Anastasia’s side, but—

Halibel: “Seems like he ain’t up ta my level.”

Cracking the joints in his neck, he set fire to the kiseru which he had not smoked during the battle, and inhaled its fumes.

From there, after ascertaining that the Three-Headed’s body had fully disappeared, he turned around in search of the coupled dragon carriages, which had left him behind as they ran far, far away into the distance.

And then—

Halibel: “Golly, after workin’ so dang hard, I kinda want some candy… Ah, oops, I’d die if I were ta eat candy.”

While grumbling those words, he began to chase after the tracks left behind by the dragon carriages as they continued into the distance.

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Wolves:
Death unto the Weak, No Mercy X
(LQ AI Translation)

1

Man: “It is precisely for that reason that now is the time we must rise.”

A man’s low voice faintly stirred the air of the dark cellar.

The hushed tone that kept a wary eye on the surroundings was proof of the guilty secrecy that must not be overheard. The tavern’s cramped basement felt musty and rank, enough to make one’s stomach churn.

Not that the queasiness came only from the stagnant air of the cellar.

Voices: “That reprobate of the Abellux Family, who counts neither parent as parent nor vassals as so much as the nails upon his hands—the villainous Dragon Child, the Fresh Blood Prince, Vincent Abellux…!”

Voices: “That werewolf at heart who does not spare even a single drop of our blood a thought…!”

Voices: “We shall—indeed we shall—make him a dead man!”

Even hushed, the heat crammed into those voices could not be concealed.

In any case, with the cellar’s gloom and the hoods pulled down over their heads, not one of those assembled could make out another’s face; only the color of the flames kindled in their chests was the same. Namely, hatred for Vincent Abellux, one of the Vollachian Imperial Family—styled the Fresh Blood Prince, a boy who continued to carve bloody footprints along the path he walked.

Chisha: “…”

Feeling that pitch-black heat, Chisha Gold pulled his hood down deeper. He had little fear of his face being seen, yet his discomfort won out. There was no doubting the earnestness of those gathered here. He was the one out of place.

He, too, was among those who harbored resentment toward Vincent Abellux, and yet—

???: “What is the matter, will you not raise your voice with them?”

Chisha: “…If I were thought the sort to attempt something so foolhardy, I must say I would take offenseee.”

Answering the voice that had come from right beside him, Chisha let out an audible sigh. In response, the other gave a small snort. “Hmph.”

He had recently learned that when this person snorted thus, it tended, if anything, to indicate a moderately good mood. Care was required; the way he expressed his feelings differed from ordinary people.

Should one misremember where his likes and dislikes lay, the consequences would be irreparable. Even so—

Chisha: “…I cannot help but call this a curious and vicious endeavor, such is the case.”

The gathering in which Chisha thus murmured was an underground meeting place where the dissident elements of the Abellux Domain had assembled, and Chisha’s station was, nominally, that of a confidant to Vincent Abellux, the lord of that very Abellux Domain.

In addition—

Vincent: “They, too, must have things they would wish me to hear. Is that not their heart’s desire?”

And the companion who leaned back with such mean-spirited pride as he said so was none other than the very Vincent Abellux in question.

Vincent Abellux had many enemies.

Born as one of the Imperial Family of Vollachia, where the strong are revered and the weak are scorned, he distinguished himself not so much at a young age as already in childhood, and inherited the headship as a prodigy. To display that capability, the quickest way was to exercise his skill and drive others out.

Vincent: “Improving food supply and enforcing thorough flood control are of course to be carried out as a matter of course, but they take too long to sink in as tangible results. To win hearts quickly requires results that can be seen.”

Chisha: “I see, I see. Then the clan purges of House Gold were most convenient, were they not.”

Vincent: “Fool. Convenient things do not simply occur if one sits and waits in a daze.”

Chisha: “…I seeee.”

This was an exchange when he asked about the process of taking the headship and establishing his position as lord, and Chisha was greatly impressed by his thirteen-year-old lord. House Gold’s claim had been that a child lord was no vessel to be counted upon and thus they rose in revolt, but apparently all of that had been guided by Vincent, who desired achievements. He had his vassals betray him of their own accord, and by punishing them proved his own ability.

Vincent: “Would you denounce it as a base and despicable deed?”

Chisha: “…No. It is reasonableee. Compared to the facts of the outrages of House Gold—of our house.”

To his lord’s testing question, Chisha slowly shook his head from side to side.

Originally Chesha Trim, he now went by the name Chisha Gold. The setting was that he was one of the members of House Gold that had been abolished; his answer followed that.

In truth, the conduct of House Gold—vassals of House Abellux—had many points that were hard to overlook. Clashes with the commoners and unreasonable taxation; even if the Empire’s way was for the weak to toady to the strong, there were rather more problems than a little. When Vincent sought a sacrifice to solidify his base, it was only natural that the first name to come up would be theirs.

A family of bad behavior, for whom even granting an opportunity to mend their ways gave one pause. Therefore—

Chisha: “They would be so careless as to do something like having an envoy approach meee.”

Lowering his face under his hood, Chisha murmured so, half in exasperation and half in comprehension. The underground gathering to which he had slipped in, embracing hostility toward Vincent Abellux, was not because he had infiltrated it, nor because he had betrayed Vincent. He had been invited as a supposed survivor of House Gold, sacrificed to the “Fresh Blood Prince.” Needless to say, that was not true. Chisha was born to an exceedingly ordinary commoner family. The name “Gold” was nothing more than a name Vincent had affixed either in play or out of laziness.

Chisha: “Or was it that Your Excellency had foreseen matters to this extent when you bestowed it?”

Vincent: “Fool. Even I cannot see so far through the conduct of the rabble. That they contacted you may, for once, be termed “convenient.”“

Chisha: “It is good to see you in high spirits. Even so…”

Vincent: “What is it.”

Chisha: “For the very person being singled out to attend a clandestine meeting is, I must say, a matter of poor taste, such is the caseee.”

To Chisha, who frankly stated his feelings, Vincent gave a snort, “hmph.” When the envoy of the malcontents, who had stored up resentment toward Vincent, made contact, Chisha promptly reported it to the man himself, and proposed that the underground gathering in question be dismantled and crushed. However, Vincent’s reaction and actions in response betrayed Chisha’s expectations. The result of that betrayal was manifest in the present situation.

Clad in shabby clothes and a hood to hide his identity, Vincent narrowed those black eyes. His sharp profile, unbefitting an age that could still be called a child, fixed upon those making ready to turn their blades upon him, and showed not a trace of agitation or bitterness.

He was a far cry from Chisha, who, tired of being shunned and treated harshly by others, had abandoned his village.

Rebel: “We have many comrades. First we shall seize the villages of the domain and tighten the noose around the Abellux lands…”

The rebels never dreamt that they were being seen and heard by the lord of the domain himself. As Chisha pitied them beside him, Vincent seared every word into his mind—

Vincent: “Too soft!!”

—such that he had no endearing inclination to content himself with so timid a plan.

Vincent’s shout, which painted over the prior hushed exchanges, spread surprise and dismay among the rebels around them, and next drew their attention this way. Taking it head-on, Vincent, still with his face concealed, declared once more, “too soft,” and—

Vincent: “So many have gathered, and how utterly ruled by cowardice they are. With such methods, you will sooner or later hit a dead end, and you will suffer the counterattack of the “Fresh Blood Prince.”“

Rebel: "…Then what would you do."

Vincent: "Naturally, in one stroke, thrust the "Fresh Blood Prince" down into a pool of blood."

Rebel: "Nonsense!"

As he raised one finger and so replied, those around mocked Vincent's bombast. They harbored hatred for Vincent Abellux, and at the same time they believed that their opponent had not attained his present position by luck alone.

Even if they aimed at the keep from the outset, it was not a head to be easily taken.

Rebel: "With such barbarity, it is plain to see you would be suppressed at once!"

Vincent: "But what if it were possible to slip through that net?"

Answered in a calm tone, the rebels were at a loss for words.

He hid his face, and though that slender figure's voice was that of a boy not yet grown into an adult, before the confidence and vigor contained in his tone, such doubts could not even bud. While everyone, before they knew it, was lending an ear, Vincent looked over the faces of the rebels one by one—and suddenly, he clapped the shoulder of Chisha, who was watching the situation right at his side, and—

Vincent: "This one here is a survivor of House Gold, sacrificed to Abellux's tyranny! And now, he stands at the side of Vincent Abellux, entrusted with office!"

At the instant his shoulder was struck, Chisha, who had had a bad premonition, managed not to raise his voice. Otherwise, he would not have been able to hold back a scream or an angry shout at this unannounced declaration. Had it come to that, he would have failed to respond to the even harsher gazes around them.

Chisha: "As my lord's man says, I am at present in attendance at the side of Vincent Abellux."

However, thanks to that instant of steeled resolve, Chisha did not disgrace himself. Feeling the sensation of the color and heat of their gazes changing, Chisha, in turn, slowly looked over the faces of the rebels.

Chisha: “That prince conscripts the survivors of those whose houses he has purged, and seems desperate to flaunt his authority. It is for that reason that I am granted my present station, such is the caseee.”

Rebel: “…But how are we to trust you, who, though your entire clan was rooted out, now serve Abellux? Has not your heart bowed, and are you not with us in name only?”

To the suspicions thrown at him, Chisha answered “correct” in his heart, yet took his time in giving his reply. Vincent’s earlier outrage, and his posture of dumping the situation onto Chisha; and to begin with, it was none other than Vincent who had given him the name “Chisha Gold” and fabricated, then spread, the information that Chisha was a survivor of House Gold. Because that fabrication was perfect, the rebels could not doubt Chisha and made contact—

Rebel: “What is the matter. Why do you fall silent. So after all you harbor a double heart—”

Chisha: “…Indeed, if you cannot perceive my intent to this degreeee, I cannot help but feel some measure of unease at the thought of counting you all among our allies, such is the caseee.”

Suddenly switching the flow of the rhetoric, Chisha made the rebels stir, “what,” but their reaction was not of such importance. Chisha’s attention was on Vincent at his side. On those black eyes fixed upon Chisha, narrowing as if to check the answer.

Stifling a sigh at that gaze, Chisha continued.

Chisha: “To begin with, with whom do you think it was that arranged to call out to you all and gather you here?”

Rebel: “Impossible…”

Chisha: “Who is it that, having had his entire clan rooted out, hates Abellux the most—that is the question at hand, is it not.”

At Chisha, who declared it so boldly, the rebels faltered, and no voices of objection were raised. Chisha’s statement was nothing but a bluff; had there been an initiator who had in fact moved the rebels, it was content that could be denied at once. But it did not turn out so.

The initiator would not raise a hand. He was busy stifling his smile at Chisha’s side.

—It was Vincent Abellux who had gathered the rebels and orchestrated the holding of the underground assembly. Naturally, it was also he who had arranged for an envoy to be sent to the “survivor” of House Gold. The aim was the same as in the clan purge of House Gold, one strand in a scheme to sweep away the malcontents within the domain. If that was the case, Chisha would have liked to have been told beforehand, but—

Chisha: “Vincent Abellux is cautious, a schemer to the point of being insidious. Even so, if he believes he has already broken someone’s spirit, signs of carelessness appear. I shall incite the “Fresh Blood Prince,” and lead him to a battlefield you all have prepared to perfection. There, we shall—”

Rebel: “—slay the “Fresh Blood Prince”…”

Chisha: “Impale that werewolf who, boasting of the amount of blood he has spilled, puts on airs as a sword-wolf.”

Rebels: “O-Ooh, oooooh!!”

Consciously twisting his lips into an evil smile, Chisha’s words lit a fire in the rebels.

At once, they rose to their feet, and with a force like blowing away the stagnant air of the cellar, raised their voices, and the heat of the underground assembly leapt to its peak.

Feeling that change in the air upon his skin, Chisha sent a sidelong glance at Vincent. Wondering whether this ill-natured lord was satisfied with Chisha's bluff. To Chisha's suspicious gaze, Vincent, with only the mouth not hidden by his hood, smiled.

Vincent: "To call me a werewolf—one sees you had quite the pent-up resentment."

Chisha: "Now then, whatever could you be talking about, I wonderrr."

3

Chisha: "Your Excellency, regarding those malcontents, there is a report that they, together with the troops they had gathered, were taken in one fell swoop."

Vincent: "I see. Those who shared your aspirations were cut down; your heart must ache terribly, must it not?"

Chisha: "I merely matched the talk at the time, such is the caseee. I cannot quite tell what you are saying."

Shrugging his own shoulders thus, Chisha brushed aside Vincent's ill-natured jab. About ten days had passed since attending the underground meeting, and, just as he had promised the rebels there, Chisha made use of his position as Vincent's subordinate to move Abellux's private soldiers at will. Using them, he handily lured the rebels out and annihilated them, sweeping away the unrest within the domain.

Chisha: "Even if the main faces do gather at an underground meeting, the branches and leaves will not be fully assembled. In that case—"

Vincent: "It is all the better to egg them on and make them send out their entire force. Well done."

In the office, Vincent, seated at a desk still large for a boy whose limbs had yet to fully grow, thus offered his thanks, then knit his brows and questioned Chisha with, "What is it."

At that question, Chisha ran a hand through his black hair, Chisha: “I am grateful to be thanked with “well done.” However, I would like to ask one thing… just how long do you intend to keep testing meee?”

Vincent: “Are you dissatisfied?”

Chisha: “Hardly. Do you expect me to answer that I am not watching Your Excellency’s mood at all?”

At Chisha’s words, which were something like a riposte, Vincent stilled the hand holding his quill pen. Possessed of deep black eyes, Vincent fixed Chisha head-on and said,

Vincent: “Do you think that, in this matter, I toyed with you out of mere whim or idle fancy?”

Chisha: “No. Your Excellency cannot be that unoccupied.”

Vincent: “That you are being tested means that I too am being tested.”

Having only that to say to Chisha, who had shaken his head, Vincent set his quill moving again. He seemed to judge that he had said what should be said, but it was a most unkind attitude. With few words, he indicated: from one thing, lift out as much as I would.

—While testing Chisha, Vincent was himself being tested. Interpreted in Chisha’s own way, that meant that acts like Vincent’s this time would not cease. For to test is to prove change. And an imperial of Vollachia cannot survive unless he continues to move forward, to press on. To live. And to realize the ideal that lies beyond that, he will continue to test.

Chisha: “Good grief, to have been received by a lord troublesome from the heart, such is the caseee—I am at a loss.”

How many more times would he be tested? Feeling heavy-hearted at the thought, and at the same time exasperated to the core at his own disposition that, in some corner, enjoyed it, Chisha Gold, who claimed to be a survivor of House Gold, was thoroughly disgusted with himself.

END

Anastasia's Search for Her Companions: First Chronicle

1

—Around the same time that Emilia's group was planning to smuggle themselves into the Vollachian Empire following Natsuki Subaru's disappearance from the Pleiades Watchtower.

Anastasia: "Yep, looks quite nice. As expected, a handsome man's a handsome man no matter what he wears, that's for darn sure."

Julius: "It is an honor to receive your praise."

Seeing Julius's sharp kimono-clad figure in front of her, Anastasia joined her hands before her chest, and she became convinced that her own selection had not been mistaken.

His Knight's uniform also suited Julius, but with his looks, the shades of a kimono gave him a little more freedom to play around. The coloring and patterns of kimonos were much more flashy than the general clothing of the Kingdom of Lugunica, and if the wearer's radiance did not lose out, then the overall sense of glamor would be multiplied.

She praised herself for drawing out the maximum quality from the talented individual known as Julius Juukulius.

Anastasia: "If I'm bein' honest, it woulda been better if we coulda prepared a special order kimono to precisely fit Julius instead of a ready-made one, but we ain't got the time, so that's too bad."

Julius: "There is no need to be so concerned, as this kimono fits my body well enough. At least, it poses no hindrance to my movement… I am surprised."

Anastasia: "Hm?"

Julius: "This is my first time wearing this kind of waso-style clothing, but it has far more functionality than one would presume based on its exterior appearance. Just like with anything, there is so much one cannot know until it is experienced first-hand.”

Anastasia: “Fufu, the most important thing’s that you’re pleased with it. I ain’t really able to tell the difference, but it seems to have a surprisingly good reputation among people who move a lot while fightin’. One of the famous people in the Empire also supposedly likes waso.”

Anastasia nodded at Julius as he moved his arms to get a feel for the kimono he was wearing.

Waso was one part of the wafuu culture that was unique to the Kararagi City-States, and it was very familiar to Anastasia, who was born in Kararagi.

Recently, seldom had she wore a kimono, but that was just because she had been trying to assert the impression that as a Royal Selection Candidate, she wanted to familiarize herself with the customs of the Kingdom of Lugunica.

As a person from another country, not to mention a representative for a Trading Company of that other country, the handling of her impression was very important.

And, that was the same as how Julius was now wearing a kimono like this.

???: “Oh! Almost didn’t recognize ya, Julius! I guess a handsome man’s a handsome man no matter what he wears!”

Then, after he had finished changing, Ricardo examined his face inside the shop and gave a big hearty laugh with his mouth.

Julius widened his eyes at Ricardo’s compliment, and Anastasia placed her hand on her forehead.

At the reaction of the pair, Ricardo tilted his head with a “What?”.

???: “It is nothing, Ricardo. Those were just the exact same words of praise that Ana gave to Julius. It seems like Ana got embarrassed by that.”

Ricardo: “C’mon now, don’t’cha worry ‘bout such minor things! Me ‘n the young Miss’ve known each other since she was a tiny lass.”

???: “I also think that way. This is what makes a maiden’s heart so complicated.”

Anastasia: “Heyy, don’t say things like that on yer own. Jeez, since when did ya go ‘n become a spokesperson for my heart?”

Rebuking Ricardo and the one who took advantage of Anastasia’s silence to talk about this and that on their own, Anastasia hit the base of her neck.

The fox scarf that her hand touched was Echidna, who had been Anastasia’s partner for many years.

For a long time, Echidna’s existence had been hidden, even from Ricardo, but ever since the incident at the Watergate City, the circumstances were revealed and Echidna had been getting on well with Ricardo and the others.

Echidna: “Well, from my perspective it was just that I had no opportunities to converse, so it has been a one-sided fellowship for ten years now. On the other hand, I think the adaptability of Ricardo and the others ought to be commended.”

Ricardo: “I was real darn surprised ‘bout that, but as Echidna says, I wouldn’t find it too strange if the young Miss is still hidin’ a thing or two from us! Is that huge handbag gonna start speakin’ as well?!”

Anastasia: “It won’t. Well, I wouldn’t really mind if it did tho’…”

Responding so to that good relationship between Echidna and Ricardo, deep down it was something that relieved Anastasia.

Even though Ricardo spoke in that manner, secrets were things that could easily become causes for misfortune. Even after going on for so many years, she ought to think of herself as blessed.

The fact that Ricardo was a person of such character had saved Anastasia, both back then and now.

Anastasia: “I really hit the darn bullseye when I looked at Ricardo ‘n chose him as the first member of my camp.”

If life was a series of looking at things and choosing, then Anastasia’s first choice had been that.

And now after bouncing from place to place, Anastasia had brought him with her all the way to this position in such an important bout.

Then—

Anastasia: “Well then, have ya steeled yerself, Julius?”

Julius: “Indeed. Wearing this kimono, I believe both my body and mind are firm. Let us proceed.”

Returning a reliable answer, Julius straightened his posture, and together with him, Echidna, and Ricardo, Anastasia proceeded outside of the store.

—And for the first time in a while, she set foot onto the soil of her birthplace, that of the Kararagi City-States.

2

In the midst of the ongoing Royal Selection of the Kingdom of Lugunica, Anastasia Hoshin broke the prohibition that she had intended to avoid doing for as long as possible, and made her return to the Kararagi City-States.

The reason that was a prohibited move, of course, was because there was concern that it would negatively influence her in the Royal Selection.

As the head of a large company in Kararagi, the Hoshin Trading Company, Anastasia had made use of that supporting base, but the scale of that influence served as a double-edged sword.

Of course, the people of the Kingdom were not favorable to influence from other countries getting stronger. That was a sensible fact harbored by all those belonging to the Kingdom, regardless if they were an expert or just an ordinary citizen.

Anastasia: “It’s a bit troublesome if ya just say “For some reason”. People’s choices ‘n decisions are somethin’ that can be swayed by their mood a whole lot more than they think. “For some reason I hate it”, “For some reason I don’t like it”… there ain’t a single good thing ‘bout thinkin’ like that.”

If it was concerning likes and dislikes that had reasons behind them, then it would be easy to take measures to compensate. However, it was hard to search for measures regarding fickle likes and dislikes that had no reasons; therefore, there was also the fear that they would be easily overlooked.

Hence, Anastasia had taken various measures to ensure that these “For some reason”s did not damage her.

Wearing clothes that were not waso, and returning to Kararagi as little as possible, all of it was in order to not grant any careless “For some reasons”s to the people who paid attention to Anastasia’s every move.

However—

Julius: “Anastasia-sama, you have settled your resolve to return to the Kararagi City-States. In addition, that is not for your own sake, for the sake of Subaru and Emilia-sama, who are of a different camp.”

Anastasia: “—. I just wanna settle this debt as soon as possible. It woulda been fine if it’d been me doin’ the lendin’, but this time no matter how ya look at it I was on the borrowin’ end. It ain’t to my likin’.”

Julius: “…”

Anastasia: “Jeez! What’s with those eyes!”

As Julius maintained silence at Anastasia’s reply, she reflexively slapped her knees and raised her eyebrows. But, seeing that reaction, Julius just said “Pardon me” and shook his head sideways.

Feeling somewhat avoided, Anastasia rested her chin in her hands in discontent.

—Currently, Anastasia's group was using beast carriages to cross the border between the Kingdom of Luguncia and the Kararagi City-States, and they were heading for the Kararagian City of Ivada.

Anastasia: "In the Kararagi City-States, the mayors of the ten big cities got some real influential voices, but Ivada is one of them ten cities, and it's the place where the Hoshin Trading Company is located."

Julius: "In Anastasia-sama's absence, who has been managing the company in Kararagi?"

Ricardo: "The young Miss communicates with letters, but most matters are handled by the vice-president, Chuden."

???: "Uncle Chuden! He always gives Mimi snacks so I like him. He's reeeally fat!"

???: "O-Onee-chan, you shouldn't speak like that…!"

Hetaro chided Mimi, who had made such a comment while flapping her short legs with a pitter-patter.

Accompanying them on their journey was the sibling duo of Mimi and Hetaro, and they were quite energetic after having recuperated from the Watergate City incident. Their other younger brother, Tivey, had stayed behind at Priestella and was entrusted with the management of the Iron Fang and the Hoshin Trading Company's activities within the Kingdom.

That also included looking after Julius's sleeping younger brother, Joshua.

Julius: "Mimi, Hetaro, I am delighted that I am able to travel together with you once again."

Mimi: "Oh? Then that's reeeally good! But, Mimi's real sorry that we don't remember!"

Hetaro: "O-Onee-chan…!"

Julius: "No, I do not mind. Mimi, that attitude of yours is very comforting to me."

Julius, who had entrusted the younger brother of the two with taking care of his own younger brother, now laughed at Mimi's candid words.

Suffering harm due to the Authority of Gluttony, Julius's Name had been forgotten by everyone around him. The memories she had made together with him that spanned longer than one year were no longer present, and for Anastasia, that was an extreme failure.

However, on the other hand, the relationship between them did not completely collapse with that, and she could believe so since Julius still stayed by her side through the Watergate City and the Pleiades Watchtower.

For that reason, even though it would not be able to fully compensate,

Anastasia: "In order to find Natsuki-kun and Rem, I hafta use all the cards available in my hand."

Echidna: "Right. I will say this now, but that plan of Emilia-kun and the others to smuggle themselves in from Lugunica, it's, you know?"

Anastasia: "Even if ya didn't say, I'd understand. Emilia-san ain't good at lyin', so you're sayin' it ain't suited to her?"

Echidna: "After all, she is far too honest."

As Echidna was choosing her words, Anastasia understood what she was trying to say and nodded.

Emilia's group was searching for the disappeared Subaru and Rem's whereabouts from a different angle to Anastasia's group.

She had heard that they were planning on crossing over to the Empire from the Commercial City, but it was a plan that went hand in hand with hardship.

Worst-case scenario, the identity of Emilia's group would be revealed and they would be deported, and it was quite likely that they would need to give up on entering the Empire. By some chance, she may try to break through with sheer force and things would escalate to becoming an international problem, but the people around her would probably stop her before that could happen.

Anastasia: “But, in that case, it’d become real difficult for Emilia-san ‘n the others to search for Natsuki-kun. That’s why…”

Echidna: “Ana is acting as an alternative… You are quite engrossed in this.”

Anastasia: “…What? Are ya tryna say that I’m mistaken on somethin’?”

Echidna: “No? It is simply, this is a first, so it also feels rather fresh for me.”

As Echidna tickled her nape while stirring about, Anastasia pouted her lips.

The “first” she had pointed out was probably referring to the motivations for Anastasia’s actions. Anastasia also had self-awareness that she was acting for a reason uncharacteristic of herself.

It was the exact same reason why Julius had laughed at her earlier.

Anastasia: “It ain’t a lie that there’s a debt involved.”

But, supposing that there had not been one, Anastasia would have needed to be more careful when deciding on this matter.

Because she was aware of that, Anastasia was unable to respond to Echidna and Julius’s somewhat lukewarm gazes with her usually sharp tongue.

3

The line of beast carriages arrived at the Third City of Kararagi, Ivada, as planned.

Here, the plan for Anastasia’s group had been to converge with the Hoshin Trading Company, having sent a letter in advance, and make arrangements to head towards the Vollachian Empire, and then cross the border.

However—

Chuden: “—The timin’ was just awful, president. Traffic to ‘n from the Empire has just been completely restricted in terms of both people ‘n goods, even I’ve got my hands up with no clue as to what to do.”

Then, greeting Anastasia and the others as they converged in Ivada, Chuden raised both of his hands.

The giant, middle-aged man with a big belly, flabby chin, and dressed in a costume that made lavish use of cloth, got right into the heart of the main topic in his greeting for their first reunion in quite a long while.

The speed of that conversation was certainly that of a merchant—It was probably a relic from before the Chuden Trading Company had had its name changed to the Hoshin Trading Company, and he had been the president.

Anastasia: “Prepare exactly what is wanted for the person who wants it. Even tho’ ya used to be that kinda person, have ya forgotten how to do business in the time ya were bloatin’ yerself ‘n gettin’ fat?”

Chuden: “Ya sure say some harsh things. Just who d’ya think drilled the fundamentals of business into ya? Even if I’ve handed over the seat of president, my thinkin’s still a long ways away from gettin’ rusty.”

Anastasia: “If that’s so, then what’s the meanin’ of this?”

Shaking his head, the saggy flesh of his cheeks and chin shook all together. Gazing over him, Anastasia stared at Chuden with an impatient feeling.

If that were true, he would have quickly made the preparations for crossing the border, and it would have been the point where she would have wanted Julius to reevaluate them with an “As expected of the Hoshin Trading Company”. The fact that there was a setback was not amusing to Anastasia in the slightest.

However, Chuden’s following words were even less desirable.

Chuden: “It seems that the current restriction wasn’t just from the Imperial side, but the City-States also agreed to it.”

Anastasia: “—The Kararagi side did as well? Something so rare pretty much never happens.”

Frowning at Chuden’s words, Anastasia pondered. Then, standing by Anastasia’s side, Julius called out to her saying “Anastasia-sama”,

Julius: “This is a difficult situation, but is this something rare? I often hear that the Empire bans traffic with the Kingdom and the City-States…”

Anastasia: “Demands from there are frequent. But, fundamentally it’s fixed that the Empire just asserts somethin’ on its own, and the City-States grumble about the heavy losses… But, this time, they agreed.”

Julius: “…In other words?”

Anastasia: “Kararagi’s League of Cities is at work.”

Hearing Anastasia’s answer, the gravity of the matter was conveyed to Julius.

The Kararagi City-States were made up of multiple cities, and their League of Cities was a congress made up of the mayors of ten cities, an organization that possessed the right to decide on the management of the City-States.

The fact that they had placed a ban on traffic between Kararagi and Vollachia meant—

Chuden: “If we ignore the official notice, even the Hoshin Trading Company will likely mercilessly have its business permit revoked. Even if not on a large scale, the Company has already shown its readiness to move, so ya ain't gonna be able to talk your way outta it by sayin' somethin' like "I don't know nothin' 'bout Vollachia"."

Anastasia: "Ugh, to think that showin' the true strength of the Hoshin Trading Company would backfire like this…"

As her fingers trembled, Anastasia was irritated by the abhorrent judgment of the League of Cities.

Julius: "So, there is nothing we can do?"

Anastasia: "—Don't be sayin' such stupid things. I ain't gonna back down here."

However, while making an unpleasant face, Anastasia roused her spirits upon hearing Julius's question. That instant, she saw Julius's lips loosen, and felt like she was either being tested or guided.

But, Anastasia switched over to the belief that this was proof of his trust.

Anastasia: "Vice-president, ya weren't just waitin' here to give us bad news, now were ya?"

Chuden: "Now, I wonder… It's just, the dignitaries of the League of Cities are present in the next city over, Fusumi, so I've already gone 'n completed preparations for ya to head over there."

Anastasia: "Jeez! Stop sayin' each 'n every thing like you're sellin' me an expensive favor!"

Puffing her cheeks up at her business teacher Chuden's way of speaking, Anastasia turned her back to him. At a glance, she could see that the next beast carriages and provisions for the journey had already been shrewdly prepared outside of the company.

Anastasia: "Hey, let's get a move on! "Time is Money"! Why did the League of Cities release such a rare announcement? We ain't gonna be able to enter the Empire if we don't sort that out!"

Julius bowed to Anastasia, who forcefully clapped her hands, while Ricardo, Mimi, and Hetaro ran around boarding the beast carriages and getting ready.

Looking over their state, Anastasia wiped the sweat off her brow and muttered.

Anastasia: “Good grief, you’re makin’ me sweat… This’ll cost ya lots later, Emilia-san.”

So she declared.

END

The Dragon Kingdom:
Meili's Witchbeast Observation Record IV

1

Meili Portroute was traveling through the Augria Sand Dunes along with Felt and her camp, heading for the Pleiades Watchtower. The journey was going well after overcoming the difficult Sand Time obstacle, but right before they reached the tower, they were faced with an unexpected problem.

A mighty impact violently shook the dragon carriage. The ferocious voice of a young girl echoed amidst the sandstorm. "Didn't expect to be greeted by the Divine Dragon!"

Listening to her voice next to her, Meili concentrated on her divine protection. For Meili's case, this meant she had to focus and imagine heat was building up in the middle of her forehead. Every user of a divine protection had their own unique method of concentrating on their power, requiring each to learn on their own in order to discover the most suitable method for themselves. Meili's method was influenced by the way witchbeasts licked each other's horns as a sign of friendliness. As a young girl who had been raised by them, she had experienced having her forehead licked as well. In either case…

"I'll keep my concentration," Meili said. "Buuut…"

"But what?!"

"There isn't a single witchbeasty that'll come near us when we're being so rowdyyy!" As Meili exclaimed in a high-pitch voice, another one of the impacts struck the side of the carriage. She held onto her seat as the carriage shook violently, holding back the urge to scream. This had been happening repeatedly, but the dragon wasn't going after anyone in the carriage. The impacts were merely the shockwaves from its attacks, intending to hit its primary target.

Felt clicked her tongue. "Give us a break already. What the hell is Reinhard doing? He better not be goin' easy on it!"

"Don't be too hard on him, Miss Felt," Ezzo admonished. "Sir Reinhard is certainly extraordinary, but the opponent he's facing is none other than one of the three heroes, the Divine Dragon, Volcanica!"

"Oi Reinhard! If you lose, you're nothin' but a dead weight!" Felt yelled at Reinhard as he continued to parry the white beams coming towards him, holding Meili by her shoulders.

What a daring thing to saayy, Meili thought, considering the person Felt was yelling at was someone she saw as a monster.

"My apologies, but my opponent is quite formidable."

"Don't give me excuses!" Felt yelled. "Show em' what you're made of for once!"

Confusion overtook Meili, causing her to panic at the voice she suddenly heard echoing in her mind. "Wha, wha, whaaat? What was that voice just noooww?"

"Calm down, Miss Meili," Ezzo soothed, before beginning to explain the nature of the voice he had also heard. "That was Sir Reinhard's Divine Protection of Telepathy."

Contrary to Felt, who was bickering with Reinhard's voiceless voice as if it were the most natural thing to do, Ezzo bit his lips—a rather normal reaction for someone in his situation, one might add.

"There'll be no end to this situation if it continues on like this…" Ezzo muttered. "Miss Flam! Miss Grassis! Are you two well?"

"We're managing, somehow," answered Flam.

"But not for long," responded Grassis.

Receiving their responses, Ezzo made a sour face like that of a young boy, agonizing over their predicament. "If only we could distract the Divine Dragon for even a second."

However, he knew all too well that they would just get in Reinhard’s way if they tried to interfere. We sorely lack the strength to jump into the battle between the Sword Saint and the Divine Dragon. Such was his analysis on the matter.

Glancing at Ezzo’s profile as he desperately searched for an effective method, Felt clicked her tongue. “Meili! How about you make a witchbeast throw itself at the Divine Dragon?”

“I told youuu,” Meili responded. “There isn’t a single soul bold enough to get in the middle of their battle, not even a witchbeastyy! If you think there’s some convenient way to help Mister Red-Hair from here, then…” You’re mistaken, were the words she wanted to say. However, before she could utter them, Meili came to a halt.

Felt tilted her head. “What’s wrong?”

Meili began searching her breast pocket and took out a small pouch, something Natsuki Subaru had made.

“Miss Meili, what’s inside that pouch?” Ezzo asked.

Meili dropped its contents onto her palm, and Felt and Ezzo looked down at it.

“It’s black but it doesn’t look like jewelry,” Felt assessed as she laid her eyes on the black object on Meili’s palm. “What the hell is it?”

“Uhh, I don’t know how to say this, buuut…” Meili said hesitantly as she looked away from them. “Emilia said that if we have thiiis, then the Divine Dragy won’t get maaad.”

The object was a Dragon Talon given to her by Emilia, who had formed a friendship with Volcanica. In other words, it was a passport, which would allow them to get past the Divine Dragon safely.

“Why the hell didn’t you take out such an important thing sooner!” Felt yelled, erupting in anger.

By preventing his feet from sinking into the sand through his Divine Protection of Sandplay, kicking and flying through the air with his Divine Protection of Air Dashing, and protecting himself from the dragon's blasts with his Divine Protection of Second Sight, Reinhard continued his battle with the Divine Dragon. The last divine protection, which allowed him to intuitively respond to attacks he'd seen before, proved especially effective when he faced formidable opponents, and such was the case with the Divine Dragon, as he had yet to take a single hit.

"But I can't close the distance," Reinhard muttered to himself.

Even though he was sure he was the dragon's target, there was no saying if it would change its mind or not. The distance he created between himself and the carriage carrying everyone was close enough that if the dragon decided to switch targets, he could manage to prevent it from getting to them. However, if he went any further than where he was, he wouldn't be able to stop the dragon from getting to the carriage in time. Bearing this in mind, he was unable to close the distance and go on the offensive.

If it's only a matter of evading and blocking its blasts, then I can withstand it however long it wants, but what if it never grows tired? What then?

"…"

As he began searching for a breakthrough, he felt a sudden disturbance that tore his azure eyes away from the Divine Dragon. Keeping the remainder of his five senses on the dragon, his eyes caught hold of the change in the desert.

Felt, who had been told to stay put, was leaning out of the carriage, holding something up.

"Lady Felt…" he muttered as he sensed another change. The Divine Dragon, Volcanica, had also turned his attention to the carriage—nay, to Felt.

Reinhard immediately prepared to draw his sheathed Dragon Sword, which he had only been using to parry the dragon's attack until now. However, no matter how hard he tried to draw the sword with his steel-ripping strength, the handle wouldn't budge. Without wasting a second, he gave up on unsheathing the sword and swung it in a semi-circular motion, gouging out the desert and kicking up a sandstorm. Each grain of sand had turned into a lethal bullet, creating a wall of sand as formidable as Sand Time. However, a certain entity broke through this wall with ease.

"…"

With his magnificent blue wings outstretched, the Divine Dragon Volcanica soared away from the watchtower toward Felt at an astonishing speed, despite being ten times larger than an earth dragon. Reinhard kicked into the air as well and readied himself to make a slicing motion with his hand, aiming to sever the dragon's elongated neck.

"Reinhard."

Right as he was about to attack the dragon from its flank, Reinhard halted in response to his mistress's calm voice. When he turned to face her, he detected a strong conviction in her expression and intuited that his action would only inconvenience her. To ignore this would have been a betrayal of her trust. Trusting his instincts, he stopped. However…

"Farsale, thy recklessness tires not only me but all the rest of us."

Reinhard's anxiety persisted until the moment Volcanica's dignified voice spoke these words after landing a few steps away from Felt.

3

"So with this talon Meili was hidin' from us, the dragon greets us with grace, huh?" Felt said with every intention of poking fun at Meili for causing a once-in-a-century battle due to clumsiness.

"Like I saaaid, it's not like I was hiding it on puuurpose," Meili retorted as best as she could, but lacked any strength in her voice.

In her defense, she neither hid it on purpose nor forgot about its existence. She simply expected the talon to be requested in a more peaceful manner, so when they were attacked so vehemently, her mind went blank.

“Besides, Emilia was the only one who told me the dragon went on a rampaaage.”

“However, considering the fight Sir Reinhard had to put up, Miss Emilia definitely deserves praise for even coming back alive after fighting it,” commented Ezzo, on Emilia’s overwhelming power after hearing Meili’s story. “That, of course, has nothing to do with her receiving support from Roswaal…”

“There goes Ezzo’s weird stubbornness,” commented Flam.

“A man’s stubborn pride,” added Grassis.

It feels kind of good when Emilia gets praised, though, Meili thought. However, they still couldn’t completely relax.

“Sooo?” Meili asked, “Are you alright, Feltyyy?”

“Huh, can’t you see? Nothins’ all that different,” Felt responded, gesturing at the window behind her seat. “Although, it’s not tryin’ to bite us or anything, so that’s good I guess.”

Outside the window, a colossal outline ran alongside the dragon carriage. It was Volcanica, his wings neatly folded, matching the carriage’s pace with his lengthy strides.

“I, am Volcanica. In accordance with the ancient covenant, the will of thee who hath reached the top shall be questioned.”

“This is all it says, no matter what we ask,” Felt said. “Is this thing really the legendary Divine Dragon?”

“As someone who faced it, I can vouch for that,” Reinhard commented. “I can guarantee there isn’t another dragon with the same tremendous power that fits his description.”

“There’s no mistake, huh?” Felt muttered while resting her face on her hand. She then grinned, flashing her fang at Reinhard. “By the way, the face you had when you came flyin’ back was priceless.”

Reinhard furrowed his brows. “Lady Felt, I say this time and time again, but, please be more careful. I still can’t believe you exposed yourself to the dragon like that… And Ezzo, Flam, Grassis, what are you here for if not for protecting Her Ladyship from danger?”

“Sir Reinhard, I understand what you want to say, but I merely agreed with Miss Felt’s judgment,” Ezzo responded from the driver’s seat. “As soon as I noticed that the talon emitted the same type of Mana as the Divine Dragon, I was certain the plan would succeed.”

Reinhard listened quietly.

“That being said, it could have been myself, Flam, or Grassis to go out of the carriage. Since we didn’t volunteer to do so, I suppose your point is somewhat valid…” he concluded, shrugging his shoulders.

Reinhard lowered his brows, perplexed by Ezzo’s explanation.

“Young Master, a Sword Saint shouldn’t make a face like that,” said Flam.

“You look like a sad, wet puppy,” commented Grassis.

“You too, Flam, Grassis?” Reinhard lamented.

Stretching her neck, Felt pulled her legs up onto the seat and crossed them.

“You’re always so overprotective… But I guess I can’t blame you too much this time, since we were dealin’ with the Divine Dragon. It’s only natural for you to panic.” She put her hands on her knees and bowed. “My bad.”

As someone who had observed their odd dynamic, this scene came as a surprise for Meili. However, she noticed she wasn’t the only one thrown off by it.

“Lady Felt apologized to the Young Master,” said Flam in awe.

“This must be a bad omen,” commented Grassis, astonished.

“Miss Felt, have you accidentally consumed poisonous sand?” Ezzo asked worriedly. “We must treat you immediately.”

“Shut up, all of you!” Felt exclaimed. “I’m more than capable of apologizin’ to Reinhard when I think I did somethin’ wrong!”

“Thou, who hath reached the top of the tower. Step forth onto the first floor, almighty petitioner.”

“Shut it! No one’s talkin’ to you!” After having been teased by the people around her, and even Volcanica, Felt sulkily rested her face on her hand. “Well, I’ll admit I was able to do something so bold because I knew you were there. Though, I guess it must’ve caused you quite a bit of anxiety.”

“No.” Reinhard shook his head awkwardly. “If that was your intention, I have nothing to say…”

Different from his usual calm, confident demeanor, Reinhard couldn’t hide his shock. Sensing this from his profile, Meili couldn’t help but feel bad for him. Just like Subaru and Emilia, and Julius and Anastasia were, I suppose being a royal selection candidate’s knight is no walk in the park.

“Felty has Mister Red-Hair wrapped around her fingeeer, huh?” Meili sighed.

Hearing Meili’s comment, Reinhard smiled bitterly. “To be honest, I’m not very fond of that interpretation.”

Reinhard and Meili both made a mistake that caused them to look like fools during the incident. They glanced at each other and agreed to drop the subject. However, there were still certain things they needed to discuss.

“Why does the Divine Dragy call Felty by some weird naaame?”

“It called Miss Felt ‘Farsale’,” Ezzo said. “That’s the name of the king of Lugunica who made a covenant with the Divine Dragon, Volcanica, and was last to be called a Lion King.”

“So, is the Divine Dragon mistaking Lady Felt for Lord Farsale?”

Reinhard inquired.

“Hey, this guy’s a man, right?” Felt exhaled sharply through her nose. She then looked out the window at Volcanica. “Dontcha think it’s rude to mistake me for some guy?”

However, there was no response from Volcanica, leaving Felt scratching her head.

“But if even the Divine Dragon mistook Your Ladyship as royalty…”

“Enough, Reinhard. I told you before. No matter my lineage, I am who I am,” Felt declared in a cold voice.

Reinhard paused and composed himself as he bowed. “Yes, you’re right. Do excuse me.”

Meili narrowed her eyes at their unique interaction and pulled her knees in. Even with Volcanica walking by their side, there were daring witchbeasts that tried to approach them. As she kept them away with her Divine Protection, she watched as the carriage slowly approached a tower on the desert horizon—the tower where she had been just a few days prior, and where she had rekindled her will to live.

“That giant door better open once we get there,” Felt huffed.

“You won’t need to worry about thaaat,” Meili reassured. “But you do need to think of what to do with the Divine Dragyy.”

“Why am I always in charge of the monsters…”

As Felt lamented her predicament, a crimson scorpion crawled out of Meili’s hair and began clicking its pincers triumphantly upon making it back home. As Meili petted it, a thought popped into her head.

“If a whole lot of people are coming, won’t we need more of the Divine Dragy’s taaalons?” she muttered to herself, glancing outside the window at Volcanica.

I bet Felt would get irritated if I asked her to cut the dragon’s nails…

END

Comic Alive Collection 9

Lugunican Hustle
(CA)

1

With a clang, the table tilted, and the glass slid off. A beat later, I realized that I couldn't reach it, and the glass crashed to the floor, shattering with an ear-piercing thud, the cold contents soaking under my feet. But I could neither crouch down to wipe my shoes nor apologize for the fact that I had broken the glass. Because, just before the sound of shattering glass pierced the air, we were surrounded on all sides by a hostile group.

"Yo! What the hell are youse guys doin' in here?!"

"Don't think we're lettin' youse off the hook!"

"Yo! Git over here! Take that!"

Furious verbal threats were directed my way. I felt the blood drain from my entire body all at once, making it difficult to breathe. All I felt was dread that I would never experience the light of day again… Not unless I could come up with some kind of death-defying explanation to give them. My breathing became more and more labored.

In that instant, I forgot how to breathe. Should I inhale or exhale? What action must my body perform to stay alive? The strange and thunderous sound of blood coursing through my veins was deafening, as if my heart was located right behind my ears. They were so loud, a vivid image of my heart exploding near my ears and turning me into a chunk of meat covered in blood crossed my mind.

"Relax," came a voice, accompanied by a gentle tap on my tense shoulder, sending the earlier explosion's echoes fading into the distance. "Dontcha worry. Jus' leave it to me."

Before me, a petite woman stepped forward, unwavering despite the intimidating men surrounding us. Without a trace of fear in her small frame, she confronted the aggressive group. She then clapped her hands loudly in front of her chest, grabbing the men’s attention. “Come on, quit makin’ such a fuss. That’s all I’m askin’.”

The men exchanged puzzled glances as the woman’s smile remained unwavering, unaffected by their threats. Standing behind her, I couldn’t help but feel a sense of unease, wondering if the men would escalate the situation. I couldn’t help but reflect on how I had ended up here like this. How could we have found ourselves in such dire straits, in a place frequented by those who didn’t dare tread out in the daylight?

Thus, Joshua Juukulius cursed his fate. This journey into despair had begun just several days prior.

2

Rich, vivid colors and sophisticated, skillful brushwork—these were the hallmarks of extraordinary artistry that could, at times, create an experience that was powerful enough to reshape the viewer’s life. People defined this as art, and those who channeled their inner worlds into such creations were bestowed with the title of artists.

The works crafted by these artists invariably stirred envy within those lacking the ability to conceive such beauty. And envy was a driving force behind the amassing of vast wealth, transcending any age and era.

On occasion, those of affluence extended their patronage to these artists, commissioning masterpieces for their own personal pleasure. Many even acquired these creations in an endeavor to sate their desires for possession and a heightened degree of self-importance.

Throughout the ages, exceptional art has consistently aroused fervent desires in the hearts of many individuals. Yet, behind these desires lurked those scheming to exploit them for ill-gotten gains. Hence…

“Hmmm…” The girl with purple hair let out a soft hum as she stared intently at the object before her. Her locks cascaded in soft waves of purple, with a charming, well-defined profile and crystal clear, pale blue eyes exuding intelligence. She was adorned in an outfit of white, with a white fox collar wrapped around her neck despite the day's warm weather.

At first glance, she appeared to be a gorgeous young girl with a certain ethereal air about her. However, her remarkable background was not defined by such external factors alone. For she happened to hold one of the most significant positions in the Kingdom of Lugunica, standing amongst the top five individuals of importance.

What had captured her attention and made her hum in interest was a single piece of artwork, at which she gazed as if to appraise it. It was a masterpiece of meticulous brushwork, depicting a delicate, slumbering woman resting her cheekbone on her hand. This piece, known as "Sleeping Miderine," was a distinguished work of art, dating over 100 years back.

The painting was grand, encased in a frame that was as tall as the girl. The bold strokes of the brush and the faint scent of oil hung in the air—it was a moment of profound assessment. Yet, her evaluation was not driven by a desire for ownership.

"Wh-What do you think, Lady Anastasia?" Beside the girl conducting the evaluation stood a gray-haired elderly gentleman, looking somewhat unsettled. The slender gentleman pressed a handkerchief to his cheek as he awaited her verdict.

Straightening up her previously hunched posture, the girl gently touched a hand to her cheek, and smiled gracefully.

"I hate bein' the one to tell ya this, Mr. Olsen, but it's a phony. I'm so sorry." With that, the girl, Anastasia Hoshin, extended her sympathy to the unfortunate customer who had fallen victim to a counterfeit piece of art.

3

Currently, the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica had found itself in the midst of a prolonged period of crisis due to its absence of a king. In order to prevent chaos, the Council of Wise Men, an assembly of senior nobles, together with the Royal Knights, worked diligently to manage the situation. However, the lingering unrest stemming from the vacant throne was undeniable.

Therefore, a competition was being conducted to determine the next person to fill this void, known as the Royal Selection. And Anastasia Hoshin was one of the candidates taking part in it. Half a year had passed since the royal selection commenced at the royal castle. During that time, the candidates had engaged in various activities to prove their worthiness, and Anastasia was no exception. And today, she had been invited by a renowned art collector in the capital as part of her efforts.

“I was bracing myself for this,” Olsen lamented, “but actually hearing that it’s a fake… Well, it’s more disheartening than I imagined. What a shame for a collector!”

Nico Olsen sighed with a weary look on his face as he spoke. He only barely managed to keep his composure, as he was standing before a guest. But once that guest took her leave, he would surely collapse into a heap. After all, one of his favorite masterpieces was evaluated as a forgery. For a collector of his caliber, it was tantamount to the sudden loss of a darling lover.

“I deeply sympathize with you, Lord Olsen.” A handsome man sitting on the visitor’s couch consoled the despondent Olsen. This was Julius Juukulius, a tall man donning a knight’s uniform and carrying a knight’s sword at his waist. He was a member of the Royal Guard of the Kingdom of Lugunica, and a knight in the service of Anastasia. “Your collection of masterpieces is so well-respected. It’s a shame to think they’d be subjected to such a terrible fate.”

Julius’s consideration brought a smile to Olsen’s glum face. “I appreciate your concern,” he replied. “I apologize for displaying such embarrassment, especially considering my connection with the Juukulius family through your brother, Joshua.”

“Please, no need to apologize. I have only heard good things about you from my brother. So I was hoping to deliver good news today, but…”

As they exchanged words, Julius couldn't help but steal a glance at Anastasia, delicately sipping from a cup of tea she had been served.

"What is it?" she asked, tilting her head. "You ain't thinkin' there's somethin' wrong with my appraisal, are you? Sure, I coulda lied jus' to make him happy. But why would I do somethin' so unacceptable to my pride?"

"Such was not my intention," replied Julius sincerely. "I only regret the misfortune of the event that occurred. If possible, I would have hoped that you could have dispelled Lord Olsen's sorrow."

"Hmph, see? You are making me look like the bad guy," Anastasia huffed. "Well, as a connoisseur, I'm used to that kinda reaction, so it don't really bother me."

Julius found himself somewhat vexed by the sulky tone in her voice. Feeling somewhat satisfied at the sight of his confused, furrowed brows, Anastasia set down her cup and thanked the man for the tea.

"Gettin' back to the story. I'm sure Mr. Olsen's feelin' disappointed he was given a phony. However, he's a master art collector, so bein' able to fool someone like him is quite the feat. Honestly speakin', if I hadn't been asked to appraise it, I wouldn't have suspected anythin' myself."

"Lady Anastasia… please be a little more considerate of Lord Olsen's feelings," Julius started. But Olsen halted him before he ended up offending his master.

"No, it's fine. She… Lady Anastasia is right," replied Olsen in agreement with Anastasia, who raised her shapely eyebrows at his words.

"Oh, dear. Mr. Olsen, no need to use titles here. This is business, after all. At least lemme loosen up a bit when I'm doin' merchant work, or I'll get burnt out."

"Ah, my apologies," Olsen responded. "But I just can't get used to it. As a royal selection candidate, you hold one of the most prestigious positions in this country. How can I treat you as a mere business partner?”

“In that case, you shouldn’t have called us to appraise the painting, yea?” Anastasia criticized. “It didn’t even hafta be us. There’s gotta be at least a few other connoisseurs out there, no?”

“Indeed, you are correct,” he agreed. “It’s tough. But you understand, don’t you?”

Anastasia placed her hand over her mouth, chuckling. “That’s why we didn’t cut corners either. I hope you appreciate it, though, right?” To this, Olsen relaxed his expression. Julius, however, continued to watch their exchange with a slight sense of tension.

Baron Nico Olsen, while not holding a particularly high rank among Lugnica’s nobility, was a renowned art collector, and a notable figure in his own right. Widely respected in the realm of the arts, Olsen could certainly be called a major figure in a less conspicuous sect of the kingdom.

As a royal selection candidate seeking to garner the support of as many influential individuals as possible, Anastasia had everything to gain and nothing to lose by establishing a connection with him. In fact, he was someone she should have reached out to. Therefore, it seemed like a stroke of good fortune that Olsen had approached her first with his proposal.

“So the famous Sleeping Miderine is a fake,” Julius thought aloud. “Lady Anastasia, please forgive my lack of knowledge, but how exactly does one determine the authenticity of a painting?”

“Hm? Well, let’s see. In most cases, I can usually tell by the artist’s signature or the paint they used. Of course, fakes are painted after the originals, so the materials used tend to be newer.”

“I see…” Julius responded, glancing at the fake Sleeping Miderine, placed in a corner of the parlor and covered with a white cloth.

Unfortunately, Julius did not have the expertise to distinguish the authenticity of a painting. But upon Anastasia’s explanation, he nodded in apparent understanding. Yet, recognizing such nuances naturally required not only proper knowledge, but a discerning eye, honed through extensive exposure to various artworks. Lady Anastasia's insight is truly astounding.

"I am continually amazed by your keen eye, my lady," he praised. "I never realized that you possessed such an extensive knowledge of art."

"I may not look it, but I happen to dabble in art collectin' myself, y'know," Anastasia responded. "Although I'm afraid I can't hold a candle to the true collectors, especially you, Mr. Olsen."

"I assure you, it's not a mere matter of having a large collection," Olsen spoke softly, shaking his head languidly. "As you see, even I've fallen victim to counterfeits such as this. It's nothing to be proud of." No words could relieve him of his humiliation. What Olsen truly needed was not mere consolation, but some progress in the situation.

"Lord Olsen, may I ask where you acquired this painting?" Julius inquired.

"Although I understand your suspicions of the dealer, he's someone I've known and trusted for a long time as an art dealer," Olsen explained. "He was probably unaware of its inauthenticity himself. I'm practically certain."

"How can ya judge the authenticity of someone's favor if ya can't even recognize the authenticity of a paintin' yourself?"

Anastasia's relentless inquiry challenged Olsen's initial denial, leaving Julius momentarily breathless. However, Olsen softened his demeanor, replying, "That's pretty harsh. You waste no time with flattery or consolation. You operate in a world where such things are unnecessary. Which is precisely why I called you here."

"I reckon ya might be givin' me way too much credit. It's a bit scary bein' raised up so high, but…sure. Anyway…" With stern gazes fixed on each other, she adjusted her posture and returned her attention to the painting, gesturing at it with her hand. "Mr. Olsen, what made ya think it was a phony?"

"Well…" Olsen hesitated.

"Like I said, that phony's a masterpiece," Anastasia interrupted. "If ya didn't have any doubts, ya wouldn't even bother appraisin' it in the first place. So where'd those suspicions come from? Ain't that far more important than where the paintin' is from? Or is it just me?"

"Can't pull the wool over your eyes, I see," Olsen conceded. Anastasia, with one eye closed, watched him cast his gaze down in contemplation. He then reached into his pocket, retrieved a letter, and placed it on the desk—a plain, unremarkable letter.

"You see, this letter arrived at my home the other day. The sender didn't even leave a name. All they wrote was a single sentence: The Sleeping Miderine you own is a fake."

"May I have a look?" Julius took the letter from the desk and scanned its contents. He adjusted his posture to make it easier for Anastasia to see, who had been peering over his shoulder. As they examined the letter side by side, they confirmed that indeed, it contained a single sentence, just as Olsen had said.

"It's concise an' to the point…not that I mean to be praisin' it," remarked Anastasia. "But that's all ya got? Nothin' else at all from that sender?"

"No, not a single thing after that. Of course, it could just as well have been a mere prank. It's well known that I possess the Sleeping Miderine. It could simply have been some prankster who knows about it playing tricks. It's just that…" Olsen hesitated before continuing.

"Your pride as a collector would not permit you to let it slide, is that it?" Julius offered.

"That's exactly right," Olsen concurred. He turned his cloudy, yellow eyes toward Anastasia, peering through his deeply wrinkled face. "That's why I turned to you, Miss Anastasia, to appraise the authenticity of the artwork. I've heard that you were a collector of art yourself, and one of Kararagi's finest connoisseurs. So I thought, in that case…"

"As a member of the Lugunican nobility, an' for the purpose of assessin' one of the royal selection candidates, ya brought this matter to my attention… I reckon yer quite straightforward yerself, Mr. Olsen," Anastasia concluded.

"Your words are rather direct," Olsen replied, raising a brow, "but I also know that your Hoshin Company has many opportunities to deal in works of art. Given our mutual involvement in the art world, shouldn't we be more concerned about such forgeries circulating in the market?"

Anastasia met his gaze, and a quiet struggle ensued between the two for a moment. Both were influential figures—one a royal selection candidate, the other a member of the nobility, both negotiating with silence.

Eventually, the silent standoff came to an end, with Anastasia raising her hands. "No need to provoke me. I ain't thrilled about it, either. So long as we're in business, we can't afford to be damagin' our reputation wit' subpar work. So, give me some time."

"Splendid," Olsen replied. "As for how to use that time, may I ask you more about that later?"

"Sure. I reckon we'll be gettin' pretty busy ourselves, too," Anastasia said as she rose and stretched her back. Julius rose with her and handed her her jacket. She accepted it with a small nod of gratitude to Olsen, a soft 'ah' escaping her lips. Then, she smiled softly and held up a finger.

"Oh yeah—an' this is important—if we happen to stumble upon the real Sleeping Miderine, Mr. Olsen… How much are ya willin' to pay for it?" she inquired in a blend of cunning charm and business acumen.

“Still, that was pretty surprising,” Julius said as they departed Baron Olsen’s estate and climbed into the awaiting dragon carriage.

“Hm?” Anastasia, settling into the plush comfort of the seat inside the elegant Juukulius family dragon carriage, tilted her head in response to Julius’s unexpected comment. “Surprisin’? What was?”

“Our discussion with Lord Olsen. I honestly had no idea about your hobby of collecting artwork, Lady Anastasia. So…”

“What? Hard to believe a quick-witted gal like me could have an appreciation for art?”

“No, no. I meant nothing of the sort,” he replied hastily in an attempt to correct himself.

“Oh, I’m jus’ kiddin’ around,” Anastasia chuckled reassuringly, finally settling into her seat. “I know you’d never think somethin’ like that, Julius. Although yer not entirely off the mark. I ain’t necessarily a fan of paintin’ or the arts.”

“But you had an engaging conversation with Lord Olsen,” Julius continued. “And most importantly, you have enough expertise in the subject of paintings to be considered a connoisseur. So…”

“That don’t mean I’ve fallen in love with art, though, y’know?” Anastasia replied, her thoughts a bit more pragmatic and straightforward than Julius’s. “Though I reckon it’d be nice if that were the case.

“It’s true that I got some art on hand, but they’re for givin’ as gifts to those who want ‘em. Bein’ a connoisseur’s essential for a merchant, that’s why I studied it,” Anastasia explained. Of course, I understand people’s passion for the arts, an’ their natural appreciation for ‘em. How can I do business with ‘em if I don’t? It just ain’t aligned with my own desires for ownership.

“I do appreciate Mr. Olsen’s honesty as a collector, like how he contacted us to check the authenticity of his own paintin’,” she continued.

“That’s because you have an admirable trait of affirming the desires of others," Julius acknowledged.

"You're a tad mistaken," Anastasia clarified with a smile. "I prefer affirmin' my own desires more than others'. I jus' think that bein' honest about what ya want makes life easier an' happier."

Anastasia was known for her ability to understand and respect the desires of others. She had made her philosophy evident in the hall on the day that marked the beginning of the royal selection. Such was Anastasia Hoshin's approach to life.

"I reckon Mr. Olsen gathered from our conversation that I ain't much of a collector at all. But my philosophy an' his appreciation for art can coexist. That's why I get along well with collectors. Ain't his proposal in line wit' such expectations?"

"Baron Olsen has yet to disclose who he will support during the royal selection. Are you considering this a litmus test for determining his position?" Julius inquired.

"Well, it's only natural that people wanna support those that get 'em. Also, frustratin' as it is, it ain't fun seein' fakes goin' around. So it works out for both of us." It's scary, Anastasia thought, lips forming a wry grin at Olsen's old-fashioned behavior.

He refused to let his mistake in acquiring a counterfeit go beyond a mere blow to his pride. Such avarice ain't bad. I reckon he's someone I'd rather have as a business partner than oppose as an enemy. However, what truly piqued her interest even beyond Olsen was something else.

"It ain't every day we see a phony of that caliber. We definitely gotta find out who's behind it an' put a stop to 'em."

"Lady Anastasia, are you perhaps taking this on as your true mission?" Julius asked, narrowing his eyes as he questioned her true intention.

"No way," she said dismissively as she pointed out the window to distract him. "Oh, look, we're almost back at yer mansion, ain't we? We gotta prepare to unload the goods we got. Come on, come on."

Across from her, Julius only let out a small sigh as the roof of the mansion came into view.

Back at the mansion…

“Wh-What the—?! Th-This is the Sleeping Miderine! Why on earth is this here!” Joshua exclaimed in utter shock at the sight of the painting being lowered from the dragon carriage.

This was Julius’s brother. Yet despite his striking resemblance to his older brother, the expression he wore was one rarely, if ever, seen on Julius’s face. His monocle slid down, perfectly capturing the magnitude of his astonishment.

Anastasia watched Joshua’s reaction with a satisfied nod. “Yeah, yeah, that’s exactly the reaction I expected. Thanks, Joshua. I’m totally satisfied.”

“What do you mean you ‘expected’, Lady Anastasia?” Joshua asked.

“I’m of course talkin’ ‘bout yer over-the-top reaction. Oh, how funny,” Anastasia responded amusingly with a hand over her mouth as Joshua looked at her in disbelief.

Watching their interaction from the sidelines, Julius shook his head exhaustingly. “Lady Anastasia, please don’t toy with my brother so much. And Joshua, you need to calm down too.”

“How am I supposed to calm down?” Joshua retorted. “Why is this painting here? Isn’t this one of Baron Olsen’s collections?”

“You’re right about that. As a matter of fact, it was Baron Olsen himself who entrusted it into our hands. Though technically, this painting isn’t really the Sleeping Miderine. It’s a fake.”

“A fake?!” Joshua exclaimed aghast as he gazed at the magnificent framed painting sitting on the floor of the entrance hall. His expression gradually evolved from one of sheer surprise to one of contemplative appreciation of the artistry.

From an early age, Joshua had been plagued by physical fragility, confining him indoors more often than not. Rather than outdoor adventures, he spent much of his time buried in a book, dabbling in poetry, and cultivating his painting skills. Consequently, he ended up acquiring a deep knowledge of the arts, and a profound affection for them. In this regard, Julius was far behind his brother in the area of familiarity with artistic pursuits.

“So it’s really a fake?” Joshua remarked, his voice laced with disbelief. “Ever since I’ve seen it at Baron Olsen’s residence, I could only imagine that it would be genuine.”

“Regrettably, I lack the confidence in my own abilities to accurately evaluate a piece of artwork. However, Lady Anastasia’s discerning eye is beyond compare. Even the baron himself trusted her judgment,” Julius explained.

“Which means, this is a counterfeit with the capability of deceiving even the meticulous eyes of Baron Olsen himself…”

For someone with his deep understanding of art, an esteemed art collector such as Olsen was in a class of his own. Joshua grappled with the shock of the notion that even Baron Olsen could be hoodwinked.

“Mr. Olsen mentioned that y’all are good friends, ain’t ya, Joshua?” Anastasia questioned.

“Good friends might be an exaggeration,” Joshua admitted. “We simply had the chance to show each other our paintings through a common acquaintance. And ever since, he’s been nothing but kind to me. He even showed me this Sleeping Miderine. It was utterly overwhelming.”

“Joshua is an artist in his own right,” Julius added. “Some of his creations even grace the walls of my room. As his older brother, I take great pride in his talent.”

“J-Julius…” Joshua stammered, bashful under Julius’s praise. Yet Julius’s words were not mere flattery. He had intended to show Anastasia Joshua’s works later. Despite his amateur perspective, they were remarkable masterpieces in his eyes. Julius couldn’t help but nurture the hope that his younger brother might one day ascend the ranks of the master painters.

“It’s simply a painting masquerading as a masterpiece,” Joshua said dismissively. “You are giving me too much credit, my dear brother.”

“There is nothing wrong with making a living doing what you love. In fact, I find it admirable.”

“Haha. It would indeed be nice if I could do that,” Joshua responded modestly, seeming to take Julius’s words with a grain of salt. Julius hoped to break that bad habit of self-depreciation, but before he could continue speaking, Anastasia clapped her hands before her chest, interrupting the brothers’ conversation to get their attention.

With a brief glance at the fake painting, she spoke. “As lovely as it is seein’ y’all bondin’ over there, let’s move on to the main issue. For the sake of our esteemed Mr. Olsen, we gotta find the copycat responsible for this. I reckon we’re gonna hafta start lookin’ for clues one by one,” she declared.

“Clues from the copycat? How would one even go about…” Joshua trailed off in uncertainty.

“Oh, are you talking about that letter Baron Olsen received?”“ Julius asked.

“Yeah, exactly,” Anastasia affirmed, retrieving a letter from her pocket that had been left in her possession with the painting. She unfolded it, revealing a single, unambiguous sentence. The writer’s handwriting was devoid of any trace of the author’s identity. Searching for the informant, as they called him for the sake of convenience, through this letter seemed impractical.

“Or maybe not…” Anastasia mumbled.

“Lady Anastasia?”

“If our copycat were really so talented, this ain’t likely to be his only piece, right? Which must mean that Mr. Olsen ain’t the only person that this informant has tipped off, no?”

"I get it. So are you suggesting that this person may have sent a similar letter to other collectors who might have other counterfeit pieces by the same copycat?" Julius asked for clarification.

"Well, I'm sure relieved that no one sent somethin' like this to me," Anastasia commented with a relieved sigh, modestly rejoicing at her good fortune. "Had it turned out that the ones I'd gone through all the trouble of collectin' were fakes, too, I reckon my credibility woulda also been shattered, not to mention my self-respect."

Julius, on the other hand, couldn't help but marvel at Anastasia's logical reasoning. Upon hearing that they would be searching for the copycat, he assumed it would be as elusive as grasping at a cloud.

"I never thought of all that, Lady Anastasia. Have you ever done something like this before?" Julius asked.

"Searchin' for a copycat? Nah, I' ain't never done nothin' like that. I jus' try to find the possibility that makes the most sense."

"Even so, I was very surprised," Julius admitted, charmed by Anastasia's bashful, blushing response. He continued speaking while looking at the painting. "However, if you had already deducted so much, why did you borrow the painting from Baron Olsen? It does not seem that there is much we can learn from it." Anastasia's speculations made so much sense, he found the reason for this puzzling.

"Oh, that?" she responded. "Well, the paintin' itself ain't what's important to me right now. I jus' wanna confirm somethin' using that well-done phony. Joshua?"

"Eh, um, me? Yes! What is it?" Joshua asked, caught off guard. Julius furrowed his brow, for he also couldn't understand why she called his name. Anastasia held up a finger in front of the two brothers.

"I want ya to help us wit' somethin' for a sec, Joshua."

"M-Me? Sure, I don't mind…"

“Really? Great, that’ll be a big help, alright. I’d expect nothin’ less from a man from the Juukulius house.” Lady Anastasia smiled as she spoke warmly, gesturing toward the Sleeping Miderine with her hand. “Ya mentioned earlier that ya got mutual friends wit’ Mr. Olsen, right? I’d be thrilled if ya could show this paintin’ to all those art-lovin’ friends of yours.”

5

“Wowee! Julius was right, this is awfully impressive,” Anastasia exclaimed, eyes sparkling as she admired the various paintings adorning the room.

Within her gaze were landscape paintings depicting a variety of vistas. Some were of the royal capital, while others appeared to be distant, fantasy landscapes that appeared to have sprung right off the pages of a storybook.

While some pieces made one want to avert their eyes due to their amateurish nature, there were others that exuded a certain level of confidence. They were all displayed side by side, not as a mere art collection, but as a collection of works by a dear family member. It was Joshua Juukulius’s own personal art gallery within Juukulius Manor.

Although to call it a “gallery” might be a bit of an overstatement. The artworks were of varying quality, and their value as art pieces was subjective. At least, that’s what the artist himself believed.

“Ya know,” Anastasia began, “Julius mightn’t look it, but he’s somethin’ of a family guy. So I reckoned he was jus’ bein’ nice wit’ his words. But it seems he wasn’t kiddin’. I’m impressed.”

Anastasia’s unreserved and straightforward manner of speaking did offer some relief. However, it hinted at a particular evaluation of Julius, which couldn’t be easily overlooked. Julius Juukulius, the Finest of Knights, was a man of honor, and an exemplary knight through and through.

“Do not doubt my brother’s eye for art,” Joshua said defensively. “I simply cannot produce results that meet my brother’s evaluation.

He is always looking ahead toward the future.”

“Ah, so both of y’all are family guys. I hadn’t realized,” Anastasia remarked, sticking out her tongue playfully. She gazed at the paintings with a hint of apology.

Since painting was simply a hobby for him, Joshua rarely revealed his works to anyone other than family. So taking this as an opportunity, he began to explain his paintings to Anastasia, even though she hadn’t asked.

“All I have are landscapes, but very few of them are actual places I’ve seen. I mostly paint the scenes that I imagine from books or scenes that I have heard about from my father or my brother. Like scenes from their travels, for example.”

“Ya mean ya drew somethin’ like this from yer imagination? That’s pretty darn impressive, ain’t it? I ain’t very crafty wit’ my hands, so I admire ya for bein’ able to paint like this. I’m envious.” Anastasia looked at the paintings sullenly as she spoke, and Joshua scratched his own cheek with a troubled look on his face.

Today was the day they had invited his acquaintances to the mansion, in accordance with Anastasia’s request. As they awaited their arrival, Joshua fulfilled Anastasia’s wish by showing her the paintings he had created.

However, for Joshua, this situation came with a complex mix of emotions. If only Julius were here to keep Lady Anastasia company.

Unfortunately, Julius had adamantly declined attending this day’s gathering.

Julius offered considerate words of reasoning before leaving: “I do not wish to make your friends uncomfortable, Joshua. So please just enjoy yourselves as you normally would. And please take good care of Lady Anastasia.”

Because of this, Mimi from the Hoshin Company had come in his place. However, her carefree nature meant that she spent most of her time in the dining room, snacking away, pretty much leaving Anastasia unattended.

“I don’t mind having my brother around at all, but…” Joshua said to himself.

However, he was well aware of the artists’ tendency of eccentricity, and therefore could not predict how they would interact with Julius, a royal knight. In that sense, Julius’s considerate remark was undeniably accurate, making Joshua’s feelings as a younger brother quite complex.

“Hmm…” A voice interrupted his inner musings.

“Oh, I’m sorry. I was lost in thought. Is something the matter?”

“Nah. I just thought you might be goin’ through some stuff at your age. Must be tough,” Anastasia offered comfortingly.

“It’s nowhere near as tough as what you and my brother face, Lady Anastasia,” Joshua replied, slightly embarrassed as she peered into his contemplative expression. However, in response to his words, Anastasia straightened her back and placed a finger on her lips.

“Oh? Well, ain’t no point in comparin’ our struggles, y’know. That don’t change nothin’ for the person experiencing’ it, so there’s no need to be underminin’ yer own achievements.”

“Well…”

“Y’know, Joshua? I reckon yer serious, worryin’ personality shines through in yer paintin’s. I ain’t so skilled in that field, but ain’t such sensibilities what make art enjoyable?”

Standing inside before a conspicuously large piece, Anastasia looked up at it. It was a depiction of the very Juukulius Manor in which they stood. For Joshua, this was the mansion he had called home since birth, and thus the very origin of his world.

He had dedicated a significant portion of his life to complete this single piece. That time was the equivalent to the time he invested in confronting his own world head-on.

“Yer paintin’ skills are pretty darn impressive. Ain’t ya ever consider a future as an artist?”

Joshua remained silent, gasping slightly as her question caught him off guard. Nonetheless, it was an anticipated and familiar inquiry. After all, it was only natural to assume that one who could handle a paintbrush so well would consider pursuing that path.

Joshua responded with his usual faint smile. “Unfortunately, I do not possess that level of talent. Both you and my brother greatly overestimate me, Lady Anastasia.”

“Well, perhaps. Bein’ an artist requires dedicatin’ your whole life to it, an’ only those who can truly commit can make it. Besides—” She paused for a beat before continuing without turning around. “It ain’t always guaranteed that yer abilities an’ desires will align.”

Her words felt several times sharper than what had silenced Joshua just before. So sharp, the heart they pierced felt as if it had been torn apart by their sting. “Um, Lady Anastasia?”

Unsure if he grasped the true intent behind her words, he furrowed his brow. But Anastasia only raised her hand in response to Joshua’s questioning tone.

“Sorry, sorry. Didn’t mean to cause ya any confusion. I reckon yer paintin’s are way better than ya give yerself credit for. If ya improved just a tad more, I’d even like to sell ‘em.”

“I am honored by that. However, I do not paint for the sake of money,” Joshua replied humbly.

“Ain’t that even better, then? Imagine havin’ something ya only do for fun end up bein’ worth something.”

Well, I don’t know about that. Joshua didn’t want to criticize Anastasia’s values, but he couldn’t help but have reservations. I do, of course, believe everyone’s values are unique. And I also agree with Anastasia’s philosophy on respecting those diverse perspectives. But—

Honestly, Joshua had never been particularly fond of Anastasia. The fact that the Juukulius family supported her was mostly because of Julius, who was the next heir of the family. For Joshua, he had merely been following his brother’s request to assist her. But he was uncertain whether Anastasia was suitable for the kingdom’s throne. He had yet to determine whether or not he truly wished to support her wholeheartedly.

“Missy! Missy! The guests are here! And they look suuuper important! So cool!” The excited voice of Mimi rang out from downstairs. It seemed their visitors had arrived, and she wasted no time being the first of their servants to report it.

The pitter-patter of Mimi’s footsteps clattered beneath the staircase, prompting Joshua and Anastasia to exchange glances.

“Sounds like our guests are here. Shall we go give ‘em a warm welcome?”

“Yes, let’s…” Joshua said. “Um, I know I’ve said this before, but please allow me to say it again. My friends may come off as somewhat eccentric, but please remember, they are not bad people.”

“I know, I know,” Anastasia reassured. “Julius already warned me to keep yer buddies outta trouble, so don’t worry. Anyway, they’re art lovers, right? In that case, I reckon they could become customers of our company. I’ll deal with ‘em properly.”

“Deal with them…?” What exactly does she mean, ‘deal with them’? Unable to muster the courage to ask her directly, Joshua accompanied Anastasia to the room where Mimi was waiting, heading downstairs to greet their guests.

6

“So, thanks to Joshua’s friends, I gathered quite a few interestin’ things,” Anastasia reported to Julius upon their reunion at the mansion after the guests had left.

“Interesting things, you say?” Julius asked.

Seated at the same table, Joshua nodded in agreement. “Today, I showed my art enthusiast friends the fake Sleeping Miderine," he explained. "Seeing the actual painting in person, some of them said intriguing things."

"Is that to say that everything went as Lady Anastasia had anticipated?"

"Bullseye!" Anastasia affirmed. "Seems some of 'em also got a mysterious letter from someone. Polite anonymous reports sayin' one of their paintin's a phony, with the name of the paintin'!'"

"So what did they do after they received those letters?" Julius asked with a stern expression, having confirmed the existence of multiple counterfeits in circulation.

"Absolutely nothin' at all," she replied. It seemed that although the art enthusiasts had indeed read the contents of the letters, they had simply put them aside. "Ya see, they were all well-authenticated masterpieces, havin' already passed all their appraisals 'til now. So nobody really felt any need to doubt 'em jus' 'cause one anonymous person sent 'em a letter."

"However, they seem to have changed their mind after seeing the Sleeping Miderine," Joshua continued. "Baron Olsen wouldn't have let go of this painting unless he was certain it was fake. That seems to have been a deciding factor for them."

"Which means that if there's really a copycat out there who can produce such elaborate imitations, then as the letter suggested, their own masterpieces also run the risk of being possible fakes," Julius summed up.

Upon learning that not only the magnificent Sleeping Miderine before them, but their own collection of masterpieces could be fake, the connoisseurs had flown into a panic and ran home, having forgotten even the most basic of etiquette. Undoubtedly, they had also been in a rush to validate the authenticity of their own pieces in their possession. In that regard, Joshua, aside from his interest in art, was relieved that he wasn't a collector.

"So, now that we've confirmed that, as Lady Anastasia suspected, letters were indeed delivered to other collectors… What now? It seems like a dead end in terms of leads,” Julius pondered aloud.

“A dead end? No, it ain’t nothin’ of the sort. For starters, we ruled out the possibility of the sender jus’ bein’ a prankster wit’ grudge against Mr. Olsen, right? And it’s gotta be someone who can discern the authenticity of paintin’s, too. Now, if only we knew their motive…”

“Motive?” Julius speculated. “To eradicate the circulation of counterfeit paintings throughout the world, perhaps?”

“Ahaha! Julius, you’re a riot! Puttin’ on such a serious face, then comin’ up with such jokes!” Anastasia laughed and applauded, but Julius looked unamused. Without a doubt, these were Julius’s true thoughts, but they had been received as a far-fetched dream. It is said that twenty percent of masterpieces currently circulating in the world are fakes. Criminals scheming to exploit people’s desires never stop existing. It’s futile to even dream of eradicating every existing fake in the world. However, the informant’s action of sending these letters in the first place did seem to suggest some hostility toward the copycat.

“Well, what if the informant was actually the copycat himself?” Joshua suggested. “It could simply be a mischievous act to mock the collectors who are unable to detect the phonies on their own.”

“Haha, that’d be pretty amusin’ too. If that were the case, findin’ the sender would mean findin’ the copycat at the same time. Like hittin’ two birds wit’ one stone! Super convenient.” Anastasia clapped her hand in enthusiasm.

“In this case, I don’t think the other party is necessarily thinking about gain or loss…” Julius said with a wry smile.

However, with the limited information Joshua had on the culprit, that was about the best they could come up with. After all, what benefit would the sender even gain from engaging in such actions?

“Or maybe their actions are completely unrelated to gains and losses?” Joshua speculated.

“Nah, that definitely ain’t the case,” Anastasia dismissed, wagging a finger at Joshua, who was getting desperate. “Whether material or psychological, humans never engage in actions completely detached from some sorta benefit. So there’s gotta be someone gainin’ something, for better or worse. An’ whoever that is, is none other than our sender.”

“Lady Anastasia, what kind of possibilities are you considering?” Julius asked.

“Me? Well, let’s see. I don’t think whoever’s sendin’ these letters is doin’ it for money. As Joshua would say, this won’t yield any gains. Of course, if they exposed the phonies an’ came back sellin’ the originals, that’d be a different story.”

“At the moment, there don’t seem to have been any such offers,” Joshua confirmed.

“Then the sender’s target’s gotta be the copycat’s, no? Maybe it’s an attack on the copycat, or some other motive. Either way, it’s still up in the air.”

“I see. So they’re fixated on the copycat?” Julius inquired. Anastasia’s speculations certainly carried conviction, especially considering her ability to discern the authenticity of paintings. Suddenly, Joshua felt oddly embarrassed by the ineptitude of his own deductions.

Sensing Joshua’s embarrassment, Julius nodded and said, “There’s no need to worry about it. What you said earlier also showed a keen observation. I would not have come up with that myself. I’m sure even Lady Anastasia was impressed. Isn’t that right?”

“Thank you for that, Julius,” Joshua acknowledged. “But had it really been an idea I came up with, I’m sure you and Lady Anastasia would have both said something right away. No need to be so modest with me.”

“Says the one being so modest himself…” Anastasia murmured while adjusting her scarf, watching Joshua and Julius talk. Then, with a slight shift in her own demeanor, she continued, “While it’s good to get an idea of the culprit's identity, gettin' too hung up on it now might lead to biases and preconceptions. Anyways, I got a feelin' there'll be some movement soon. Don'tcha agree?"

"I understand what you're saying about preconceptions," Joshua noted. "But movement, you say? From which side? The informant or the copycat?"

"Hmm, well, neither of 'em. Rather, from your friends from earlier." Julius and Joshua exchanged glances at Anastasia's matter-of-fact reply. Smiling at their reactions, she pointed at the window and started counting down: "Three, two, one…"

Taken aback, they both glanced over silently, half-doubtful, half-expecting. "Anand… zero. Ah well, I reckon that woulda been way too convenient," Anastasia said with a shrug, flashing an embarrassed smile.

Just then, before the Juukulius Manor gate, a dragon carriage approached. It was a rather eccentric carriage, belonging to one of the enthusiasts who had just stopped by several hours back. And thus, Anastasia's prediction that one of his friends would make a movement, turned out to be remarkably accurate.

"I reckon I shoulda waited another five seconds or so," she mused, turning around, one eye closed. "That really woulda been somethin'." Julius respectfully bowed as if in admiration, and Joshua hastily followed suit. However, in Joshua's mind, he was more impressed by Anastasia's uncanny foresight, rather than mere admiration. What she had done could be called predicting and directing the thoughts and actions of others. And if she could do that—

"It's as if she's able to read minds." Such an idea was terribly frightening to Joshua, causing his shoulders to tremble against his will. Although he couldn't quite pinpoint the reason for that trembling.

7

Only three days had passed since they accepted Nico Olsen's request, and they now found themselves approaching the residence of Azla Eastern.

“It appears that nobody is home,” Julius said, turning back toward the others. They were on an unremarkable corner of the commoner’s district, with the lively bustle of the royal capital echoing in the distance.

There’s no nameplate on the door, but this is undeniably the correct address. The lack of response must mean that either the person in question is absent, or that he lives a more nocturnal lifestyle that seems to be common among artists. In any case, there is no other way to obtain the detailed information we need than to ask the person directly.

“But it is indeed rather surprising. To think that we would identify a suspect of the informant so quickly,” Julius remarked.

“Is it?” Anastasia asked. “Thanks to Joshua, we came across a few other copycat victims amongst his friends. I reckon they wouldn’t make such a fuss had it been anyone else. But bein’ a matter of their own, everyone got desperate. Even if we did nothin’, I reckon they’d go off lookin’ for the culprit on their own, an’ let us know whatever they find.”

Joshua looked at her in surprise. Raising a finger, she continued her proud explanation. “But seein’ as we provided the information first, think of it as a favor in return.”

Certainly, things had turned out just as Anastasia had described. After discovering the possibility of a phony amongst their own art collection, the art enthusiasts spared no effort in searching for the identity of who sent the anonymous letters to their homes. As a result, Joshua and his friends had become a hub for such information, piecing clues together in an attempt to narrow down a culprit.

Their currently available information suggested it was a tall young man with rust-colored hair, clean-cut but lacking extravagance, who also enjoyed painting by himself. And while several names came up, at the top of the list was the one called Azla Eastern.

Azla was a young man residing in the royal capital, often seen coming and going from a trading company, engaged in tasks such as handling materials. It was said that on rare days off, he would take up a brush and paint portraits in the square.

“While the description matches, we can’t do much if he doesn’t respond. Should we set him aside for now and move on to our other suspects?” Julius suggested.

“Ya seem to be enjoyin’ this, Julius,” Anastasia teased.

“I am…sorry about that,” Julius said, clearing his throat. “Although I routinely have the opportunity to patrol as a knight, it is not very often that I get the chance to conduct a serious investigation such as this.”

Julius, while admonishing himself for his words and actions, was not dressed in the white uniform of the knights, but in his everyday attire. At Anastasia’s request, this was a deliberate measure to avoid intimidating the other party.

Nevertheless, the effect was questionable, as Julius’s appearance did not detract from his dignity and grace, as his style of dress was still sophisticated despite being his own personal wear.

“Your refinement simply cannot be hidden… Truly impressive, dear brother,” Joshua praised.

“Joshua’s brotherly favoritism toward you notwithstandin’, it’s actually the fact that we’re all so eye-catchin’ that’s bothersome. We’re so good-lookin’ standin’ side by side, our disguises are practically pointless.”

“I am at a loss for how to apologize for that,” Julius replied. “But first of all, it would certainly help if you could also take the initiative and disguise your own beauty, Lady Anastasia…”

“Well, I don’t need you tellin’ me that… But all jokes aside, I don’t reckon we should be lingerin’ around for too long.”

Anastasia turned her head, letting out a thoughtful “Hmm…” However, she abruptly interrupted her train of thought. With a decisive expression, she clapped her hands in front of her chest. “Alright, I got it. Hey, don’t y’all hear a baby cryin’ inside the house?”

“Huh? A baby? I don’t hear anything…” Joshua said, confused at Anastasia’s sudden suggestion.

“I see,” Julius nodded in an understanding manner. “If there is a baby crying inside, then this is indeed an urgent matter. We must hurry.”

Disregarding the confused Joshua, Julius moved swiftly, placing his hand on the door of the Azla residence.

From the cuff of his sleeve, a quasi-spirit named Ia emerged, emitting a faint red glow. Ia flew straight into the keyhole of the front door, and within seconds, the lock clicked open.

“J-Julius?! Isn’t this a crime…?!” Joshua exclaimed.

“No, this is an emergency,” Julius clarified. “We must make sure that the baby is safe. Lady Anastasia has entrusted me with discretion in situations like this.”

“Wh-What a bad influence…!”

“Come on now,” Anastasia interrupted. “If we start fussin’ outside the house, people will start suspectin’ us.”

As Julius slipped in through the open door, Anastasia forcefully pushed the hesitant Joshua inside, right into the Azla residence.

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry,” Joshua apologized. “I didn’t mean to offend. I just couldn’t imagine my brother doing something wrong. So the problem must be with your suggestion, Lady Anastasia…”

“Well, yer quick to say sorry, ain’t ya? But there ain’t nobody here to apologize to. So relax.”

“Even so, it feels a bit heartless to find comfort in that…” Joshua, who had his eyes closed, slightly opened them and slowly surveyed the interior of the house.

Indeed, as Anastasia said, it seemed to be unoccupied. In that regard, Joshua was relieved that they weren't reprimanded for entering without permission. However, for Joshua, that reassurance would not last very long. Because what lay before them was…

"Lady Anastasia," Julius started.

"Yeah, I noticed it, too…" she replied, bringing her tone down a notch. "The place's been ransacked."

From their change in demeanor, Joshua could also sense that this was a dire situation. The Azla residence was in a state of disarray, and appeared to have been that way since long before they had broken inside.

This chaos had nothing to do with the presence or absence of tidiness. Furniture had been overturned, dishes were shattered, and signs of resistance had left their mark. The most concerning issue was the bloodstains on the floor.

Although the amount was scant, the floor was dotted with traces of blood. It was unclear whether this blood belonged to the homeowner, Azla, or to someone else.

"Whatever happened here was certainly out of the ordinary," Julius observed. "There were physical altercations, followed by…"

"The kidnappin' of the homeowner. That's how it seems." Squatting near the bloodstains on the floor, Anastasia looked at the window in the back of the room. Upon closer inspection, the bloodstains were leading in that direction, accompanied by a sizable shoe print left behind on the windowsill.

"After enterin' through the back, they waited for Azla's return before attackin' an' abductin' him… that scenario makes the most sense, don't it?"

"But who?! Who attacked him, who?" Joshua asked, dumbfounded.

"Well, if my assumption's correct, then Azla's definitely the whistleblower sendin' out all them letters. But that'd be a pain for the copycat, meanin' it's gotta be the copycat himself who's our prime suspect.”

Joshua, despite finding himself burning with anxiety, couldn’t help but agree with Anastasia’s deduction. Her composure contributed greatly, as for a person in the midst of such discomfort, composure served as a beacon. Anastasia’s soft way of speaking was more than enough to create such an impression in Joshua.

“Lady Anastasia, this seems like a situation in need of the guards,” Julius announced. “I will return shortly. May I entrust this place into your care?”

“Yeah, I reckon that’s best,” she agreed.

“Understood. Joshua, I entrust Lady Anastasia to you. I’ll call upon the guards and return promptly.”

“Y-Yes!” Joshua responded. “Julius, please be careful.” With that, Julius and Anastasia proceeded to take their next actions.

Leaving them in charge of the mansion’s security, Julius had entrusted Anastasia to Joshua, and quickly made his way to a guards’ station. As long as they had a case, it would be the guards’ duty to search for Azla from this point forward.

“Wait, Lady Anastasia!” Joshua called out. “Shouldn’t you wait here for my brother to return?!” However, disregarding Joshua, Anastasia immediately headed out of the room. He hurried after her.

Without looking back at him, she responded, “Listen. Once the guards come swarmin’ in, things are gonna get crazy. So before that happens, we gotta do what only we can. Somethin’ that can’t be done wit’ Julius around.”

“Something we can’t do with my brother around…?” Joshua asked, dumbstruck. “Does such a thing even exist in this world?”

“It might sound astonishin’, but I assure you, it exists,” Anastasia replied with a wry smile. “Take this, for example…”

With that, she headed to the house neighboring the Azla residence, and pounded on the door, calling out: “Hellooo? Yer neighbor, Mr. Azla, was jus’ attacked. Didn’t y’all happen to see anythin’?”

“W-Wait!” Taken aback by Anastasia’s boldness, Joshua’s face turned pale as he glanced between Anastasia’s profile and the door of the neighboring house. “I-Is it really okay to say something like that so directly? If they do know something, won’t they have already reported it to the guards?”

“Shh.” Placing a finger on her lips, Anastasia motioned for Joshua to be quiet. He couldn’t make heads or tails of her intentions. However, until now, Anastasia had demonstrated a consistent track record that defied expectations, leading them to Azla. Trusting that, Joshua shut his mouth.

“Hmm, nothin’ at all…” Anastasia muttered. “In that case, on to the folks ‘cross the street.” Unphased, she moved on to the next house.

Joshua, although puzzled, had no choice but to follow her lead. He had been entrusted by Julius to look after her. Swirling in a vortex of uncertainty about what he could do, he knew he couldn’t abandon his duty.

Keeping the momentum, Anastasia went around the vicinity of the Azla residence, asking questions to people left and right. And as a matter of course, she was ignored by everyone she asked. In the end, they came up with no clues, leaving Joshua to slump his shoulders in defeat.

After their numerous unsuccessful attempts, Joshua was waiting for Julius to return with the guards, when a rough voice shot out in their direction.

“Yo! Youse two over there! Ya got some questions or somethin’, don’tcha?” The owner of the voice was a man with a rather aggressive aura. He was surrounded by men with equally intimidating vibes. Joshua felt an uncomfortable cold sweat run down his back.

“Uh, well you see… Oh, we’re not suspicious individuals…” Shielding Anastasia behind him, Joshua tried to hold off the men.

Anastasia, however, spoke out from behind Joshua. “Yeah, yeah, we’re in a bit of a pickle. Mind spillin’ the beans, fellas?”

“L-Lady Anast…mmmph!” As Joshua tried to call out her name, a hand reached from behind and covered his mouth, rendering him speechless. At that moment, he heard Anastasia’s voice whisper softly into his ear.

“Don’t say my name.”

“Ah—” Releasing her hand from Joshua’s mouth, Anastasia stepped forward gracefully. He realized she had removed her familiar hat and scarf, transforming her appearance from her usual self.

Joshua realized that this was an effort to keep her identity as Anastasia Hoshin a secret. He also realized that the situation had gone just as she had anticipated. Taking a deep breath, Joshua steeled himself. “Well then, what should I call you for now?”

“For now, let’s go wit’ Ana. Gotta keep everythin’ under wraps, y’know? Alright, time for a social studies field trip.”

Surrounded by the men, Joshua felt a cold shiver run up his spine. Anastasia, on the contrary, winked playfully in complete composure. Astounded by her poise, Joshua realized that Anastasia had left her hat and scarf at the Azla residence as a message to Julius. He continued to follow along, all while pondering: “Are you sure we can trust this person, dear brother?”

And thus, they were led away by the men quietly, Joshua all the while addressing the absent Julius with his concerns.

8

One day, Anastasia Hoshin, one of the candidates for the throne of the Kingdom of Lugunica, received an unusual request from Baron Nico Olsen, an art collector.

The content of the request was rather peculiar: to locate the master forger responsible for replicating the baron’s treasured masterpiece, Sleeping Miderine. Anastasia, who occasionally dealt with artworks in her trade, shared a mutual interest with the baron in preventing the circulation of such exquisite forgeries and securing his support.

Upon accepting the task, Anastasia and her team began their investigation. Three days into their inquiry, they stumbled upon information regarding an individual who appeared to have reported the forger—a man known as Azla. Upon visiting his residence, signs of a possible assault and abduction had become evident.

In their pursuit of more information, Anastasia and her team began questioning the people in the vicinity. Suddenly, a group of rugged-looking individuals who seemed to know something emerged. They then guided them to a dimly lit tavern, which appeared to be their hideout.

“Are ya the ones who killed Azla Eastern?” Anastasia asked abruptly, catching Joshua off guard, making him let out a squeal. Inside the dimly lit tavern were a number of shadowy figures, all exuding violent air.

With Joshua, who was painfully aware of his slender build, it was a fair match in terms of arm and leg thickness against these formidable opponents. Amidst this group, Anastasia, who was even more delicate than Joshua, exuded a sense of brazen confidence. However, she knew that poise alone wouldn’t shield them from the others’ simmering anger.

Suddenly, a rough-looking man, startled by the inquiry, slammed his hand onto the table. “Uh-oh.” A sense of impending doom washed over Joshua, but it was too late. The table tilted, causing the glass to gracefully slide and shatter upon the floor.

“Wh-What the hell are youse guys doin’ here?” one of them demanded.

“Yeah! Don’t think youse can waltz in here and leave unscathed!” another chimed in.

“You heard ‘em! Come at me, punk!” shouted a third.

Anastasia and Joshua found themselves encircled by the angry men, who hurled insults in a deafening chorus, their fervor so overwhelming that the latter half of their words were indistinguishable.

Joshua's vision blurred, overwhelmed by the men's intensity. His heart raced as if it might leap from his chest, and nausea surged within him. But even in this dire situation, Anastasia remained unfazed.

"Well, now, let's not make such a ruckus," she calmly interjected with a graceful smile, unaffected by the men's chaotic uproar. She boldly continued to inquire about Azla's whereabouts amidst her rowdy acquaintances. "Would you be willing to hear us out? We have a request."

"A-A-Ana?! Do you have a plan?" Joshua asked, his voice trembling. In awe of her bravery asking these ruffians about Azla's whereabouts, he knew there had to be a plan behind her actions.

On initial assessment, the group before them seemed to number no fewer than ten. Even in a one-on-one confrontation, Joshua knew he couldn't adequately protect Anastasia. It seemed hopeless. "If only Julius were…"

Restraining the words that nearly escaped his lips, Joshua shut his eyes tightly. Julius, who had been accompanying them during the investigation, had separated from them to report the vandalism at Azla's home to the guards. Naturally, had Julius been present, there would have been no reason for Joshua to feel apprehensive, regardless of the number of opponents they faced. However…

"If Julius were around, I reckon they wouldn't dare come near us in the first place," Anastasia said, finishing his unspoken thought.

"So that was your intention, after all." Joshua exasperated.

"Oh, absolutely," she replied, a playful wink accentuating her demeanor. "If ya wanna win big, ya gotta bet big! Remember that, Joshua." Joshua couldn't fathom how she could remain so composed.

The men's posture didn't appear to be a mere bluff to Joshua. They genuinely seemed intent on getting rid of both himself and Anastasia completely, who they deemed little more than unwelcome guests. Anastasia, who held one of the most esteemed positions in the country, unaccompanied by none of her comrades—neither Ricardo, nor Mimi, nor above all, Julius Juukulius.

“Joshua, I entrust Lady Anastasia to you.” In that fleeting moment, as Joshua remembered his absent brother, the last words Julius had entrusted to him echoed in his mind.

I can’t even begin to imagine how taken aback he will be once he returns with the guards only to find us gone. And how worried he will be. Despite such thoughts, he reminded himself he had been entrusted with a specific duty. Now, he bore the responsibility for the well-being of Lady Anastasia Hoshin, the person who mattered most to Julius.

Holding his breath, Joshua forced his golden eyes open and surveyed the interior of the tavern. The men continued to eye them with simmering hostility. However, his attention wasn’t fixed on them; he had something else in mind, a strategy to navigate this challenging situation. For example, the ornamental swords mounted on the tavern’s walls. “Ana, over here!” he called out.

In a split second, Joshua’s hesitation faded. He quickly grabbed Anastasia’s arm and forcefully pushed through the encircling group. It seemed neither Anastasia nor the men had anticipated Joshua’s decisive move. Capitalizing on their momentary surprise, Joshua managed to slip through. Then, he reached for one of the decorative swords hanging on the wall.

Drawing the sword from its scabbard, Joshua positioned himself protectively behind Anastasia. Witnessing Joshua’s desperate resistance, one of the men taunted him with a sneer. “Hey now, you’re kidding, right?”

But it wasn’t just that man who found it amusing. The others seemed to regard Joshua’s actions as mere bluster. Instead of anger, their recent fury had morphed into amusement, akin to a cat toying with a mouse.

However, Joshua was dead serious, with no intention of jesting or playing games. Holding a sword he had no desire to wield for a joke was the last thing he'd ever do.

"Do not expect me to hold back," Joshua warned. "I haven't swung a sword in nearly ten years."

"Getta load of that!" one of the men taunted. "Punk says he ain't holdin' back! Ooh, I'm so scared I'm pissin' my pants! Yo, Mr. Swordsman! Ya gonna cut us all down or what?"

"I'm not a swordsman," Joshua corrected him. "I'm a knight."

"Eh?" The man's boorish grin disappeared. Of course, Joshua knew that this would only further agitate him. He knew this, but it was all he could do to provoke him. Because…

"I'm the son of a knight. Even if these feeble arms may disqualify me from such a position, my spirit will not break. Above all," Joshua lifted his head, his trembling arms gripping the sword firmly as he stared down the man, "I'm the brother of the most knightly man in the country. How can I back down here?!" With an uncharacteristic rage in his voice, Joshua stepped forward and swung the sword.

"What the—?!" the man exclaimed, his voice cracking. It was a feeble move. A decade without wielding a sword was no exaggeration. A boy ten years younger could have managed a more decent swing. Yet, even so, it served to strike down those with malicious intent. A sword wielded to protect the righteous against malice—it was truly a knight's sword.

"Urk!" In the spur of the moment, the man raised his arm to shield himself, but blood dripped from his hand as Joshua's blow struck.

The ornate sword that had been on display was indeed nothing more than decoration. The blade, neglected and lacking proper maintenance, was dull. Combined with the knight's lack of skill, it only managed to nick the thin skin of the man's hand. Yet, it was a strike sufficient to display Joshua's resolve. And it was enough to infuriate the men who had been basking in their superiority of tormenting the weak.

“You sonuva—!” The man, whose palm had been shallowly cut, lunged at Joshua in a fury. His palm appeared to be a far more dangerous weapon than the sword of the hapless knight. But before it could reach its target…

“Really, boys always gotta be showin’ off, don’t they?” Anastasia, shielded behind him, uttered with a sigh. Her voice resonated deeper in his consciousness than the furious clamor of the enraged man. Distracted by her voice, Joshua was yanked by the collar and stumbled backward.

In that instant, the man’s arm, still dripping with blood, passed right before his eyes as he narrowly avoided it. As Joshua staggered backward, his falling body was supported by a slender, delicate arm. “L-Lady Anastasia…”

“It’s Ana. But given that ya did look pretty cool out there, I reckon I’ll let this one slide,” Anastasia said, directing a soft smile at Joshua, who accidentally called her by her real name in the heat of the moment.

But we’re not entirely safe yet, Joshua told himself after seeing Anastasia’s smile. If that guy takes one more step, his dangerous palm could easily reach us.

“What the hell are ya punks cozyin’ up there fer?! Ya punks are—”

“Why am I cozyin’ up, you ask?” Anastasia said, poking her head out from behind Joshua. “I mean, I got two knights here to protect me. What’s there to be scared of?” She stuck her tongue out playfully.

“Two…?” Before Joshua could fully comprehend the meaning of her words, the answer made a dramatic appearance before them. In an instant, with a deafening crash, the closed doors of the tavern burst open.

From the other side of the busted doors, behind where the men stood dumbfounded, emerged a handsome man with light purple hair. “Sorry about that. I guess I knocked a bit too hard.”

“J-Julius! Why are you here?!” Joshua gaped in amazement as Julius entered the shop in what seemed like a miracle. Witnessing his brother’s reaction, Julius briefly let a sense of relief, a sentiment shared only among family, appear at the corners of his mouth.

“Oh, nothing,” he said with a shake of his head as he quickly composed himself. “When I returned with the guards, I couldn’t find a trace of the two of you. I thought something might have happened, so I conducted a search in the area…and found this.”

“That’s Lady Anastasia’s…” He noticed the white fox fur collar that Julius held up. It was something Anastasia always wore, but she had undoubtedly discarded it when the men brought her to the tavern to conceal her identity. It must have tipped him off to the men’s base of operations.

“Lady Anastasia, are you—mmph!”

“Ya been way too careless since earlier,” Anastasia said, cutting off Joshua’s words by pushing her finger to his lips. “It’s Ana. I only let it slide that one time.”

“I see, that’s what you’re going for,” Julius said, grasping Anastasia’s intent in using her alias. “In that case, I am Juli.”

“You’re really fond of that name, aren’t ya?” Anastasia said, giggling at his choice of pseudonym for reasons Joshua didn’t understand.

“Y-You bastards! How dare you ignore us!” The men regained their composure in the midst of the invaders’ calm exchange. “So there’s one more pretty boy. So what?! You’re just a—”

“Sorry, but we are tired of your insults,” Julius coolly responded, cutting the man off. “Never mind me, but the two behind me, especially.”

The man who had confronted Joshua barked at Julius in the same manner. Or at least, he tried to, but to no avail. In the middle of his words, Julius appeared to have vanished from the man’s sight. In reality, he had crouched down low and slipped through them like the wind. But the fact that their eyes couldn't even keep up made the gap in their strength abundantly clear.

As Julius made his entrance, Joshua and Anastasia whispered in relief. "That's my brother," Joshua commended.

"And that's my knight," Anastasia added. Immediately following, the man who had been barking at them tumbled headfirst to the floor.

Julius's long legs swung out, sweeping the man off his feet. The man, who was still looking for the vanished Julius, collapsed before he could realize what had happened. In an instant, Julius rose before the other stupefied men who had just watched him take one of their comrades down. He stood protectively with Joshua and Anastasia behind him.

"Twelve in sight, two more behind the bar. Hiding is futile. Insults will be repaid with revenge. However…" Julius unfastened his knight's sword from his hip, and handed it to Joshua behind him. Joshua took the sword and was immediately surprised by its weight, to which Julius smiled. "You did well, Joshua."

Joshua, having been praised, however, couldn't find the right words to say.

"Today, I am not a knight," Julius said, turning his attention toward the men. "Therefore, I shall not use the sword. Instead, I will engage you as Juli, a wandering mercenary, with these fists. How does that sound?"

Hearing this, Joshua's vision blurred with tears as the men rekindled their rage. As they surged forward with incomprehensible insults, Julius casually rotated his arms and stepped forward.

"Juli, don't hurt yerself," Anastasia cautioned.

"Understood," he replied. Encouraged by Anastasia's unwavering support, Julius struck with fists like an arrow. A blow to their leader's chest sent him flying, causing those behind him to lose their momentum.

Although superior in number, it was not enough to secure victory, hence the fate of the men had been sealed. In a matter of seconds, all fifteen men, including the first one who fell, were wiped out.

And thus, looking down at the fallen men, Julius sighed, unscathed. He reflected on his victory, attained from his position unreachable by anyone else. “This can hardly be called an elegant outcome.”

9

“Look, it ain’t us who raided Azla’s house! We been lookin’ for ‘im too!” Perhaps due to the overwhelming defeat of the fifteen men, they had become more cooperative in answering Anastasia’s questions. However, the answers they obtained were far from what they had hoped for.

“So y’all been lookin’ for Azla, too, huh? Is that why y’all were askin’ us ‘bout him, too?” Anastasia asked.

“Yup. Cost us a good deal of dough too, ya know?” one of the men answered.

“In short, you were lured in by the reward. Meaning that someone hired you and instructed you to find Azla Eastern. Is that correct?” Under Julius’s gentle prodding, the man sitting on the floor nodded several times. Julius maintained a soft attitude, keeping his courtesy toward the other party. However, that didn’t diminish their fear of being beaten down. The men’s faces were pale.

“I’d expect nothing less of you, my dear brother. Even hundreds of them would be no match for you.”

“No matter how skilled I am, hundreds of them would probably make me hesitate. Of course, if those hundreds were targeting you or Lady Anastasia, I wouldn’t think twice.”

“Julius…” Joshua was impressed by Julius’s attitude. But Anastasia cut into their display of brotherly love with a clap of her hands.

“Alright, alright, enough sappy siblin’ comedy.” Then she turned to the slightly embarrassed Julius. “Thanks again for helpin’ us, Juli. Ya did a great job trackin’ our leads.”

“Well, seeing it so boldly placed right in the middle of the road, it was pretty hard to miss. Honestly, I am relieved that somebody else did not pick it up before me. It sends a chill down my spine simply thinking about it.”

“Right in the middle o’ the road?” Anastasia remarked. “Honestly, that girl really has a knack for carelessness…”

“Ana?”

“No, no, it’s nothin’. Speakin’ of which, it’s pretty refreshin’ bein’ called Ana by you, Juli,” Anastasia said cheerfully to Julius, still in disguise.

Cracking a smile, he responded softly, “Anytime you wish… But putting that aside, it seems there are others besides us looking for Lord Azla.”

“Seems like it. Hey, y’all ever ask your employer why they been lookin’ for Azla in the first place?” Anastasia inquired of the men.

“N-No, we ain’t ask nothin’…” the man responded. “But…”

“But?”

“But they were actin’ all jittery. Sayin’ some crap about how we’ll all be in cahoots if we don’t hurry it up.” It was unclear how reliable the man’s impression of their employer was, but he didn’t seem to be lying. After a few more questions that didn’t yield much more useful information, Anastasia and her companions quietly left the tavern.

“Seems y’all ain’t lookin’ to draw any attention. I reckon y’all get outta here before the guards show up.” With those parting words of advice from Anastasia, they left.

“Even still, this situation has become quite complicated, hasn’t it?” Julius said.

“Sure has,” Anastasia replied with a sigh. “Seems both us and them guys from earlier jus’ missed Azla. Meanin’ if Azla’s kidnappin’ was someone else’s doing…”

“That means there are at least three factions after him,” Julius added, finishing her thought.

As they left the tavern and gathered in a shop facing the main street to organize their information, the conclusion they reached left the trio with solemn expressions.

The ruffians in the tavern failed to secure Azla. And after confirming that they weren’t the ones who ransacked his house, the only other explanation was that another faction was responsible. And without a doubt, it was the faction that abducted him who currently held the most advantageous position.

“They say the one who hired those ruffians is a woman named Amilét…”

“Amilét Megis… A pretty notorious antiques dealer, handlin’ stolen goods and stuff,” Anastasia explained. “There’s a buncha unsavory rumors about her goin’ ‘round.”

“Why would someone like her be after Lord Azla?” Joshua questioned, tilting his head in confusion. Julius wore an expression of contemplation. However, Anastasia muttered in agreement.

“Lady Anastasia? Did you figure something out?” Julius asked.

“Wait, Juli,” Anastasia cautioned. “Those guys from earlier might still be followin’ us. Let’s not let our guards down, ‘kay?”

“I see. Well then, Ana, what did you notice?”

“Hehehe… The enemy’s motive,” Anastasia replied with a knowing smile. “Listen up.” She motioned for the wide-eyed brothers to listen carefully and huddle up. “The antique dealer Amilét’s motive’s pretty straightforward. She’s after Lord Azla, who’s been exposin’ art phonies ‘cause it disrupts her business.”

“Disrupts her business, you say? Does that mean…”

“That she was knowingly selling counterfeit paintings,” Joshua blurted out, excited as he came to understand Anastasia’s speculations. Whoops, how embarrassing. That was unprofessional of me, wasn’t it? But to his surprise, Anastasia nodded in agreement with his answer.

“Joshua, ya hit the nail on the head,” Anastasia affirmed. “The antique dealer Amilét’s been knowingly sellin’ phonies to her customers.”

“Meaning Lord Azla’s accusations are an inconvenience to her… If she has been selling fakes as the real deal all this time, the price difference must be enormous.”

“And it ain’t always easygoin’ folks like Mr. Olsen who wanna buy art. I reckon there’s a buncha art lovers millin’ around in the rough-an’-tumble businesses, too.”

Anastasia’s speculations made sense. Indeed, if this were the case, the antique dealer who had been dealing with counterfeits would not only suffer great financial losses, but could also be in grave danger. It only made sense that they would panic and try to take Azla into custody to silence him.

“But they slipped up, lettin’ someone else get first dibs on Azla before ‘em.”

“In that case, it is reasonable to assume that Ms. Amilét and the copycat are connected, is it not?” Julius asked. “To buy and sell counterfeits, one must presumably have a hand in the business.”

“Yep, ya got it,” she agreed. “They’d need a direct link to the copycat. Though I reckon findin’ Ms. Amilét’s whereabouts will be jus’ as challengin’ as findin’ Azla himself.”

“If she’s aware that she’s being pursued, wouldn’t she be on the run?” Joshua wondered. Despite coming to understand her situation, we still haven’t gotten to the heart of the matter. Frankly speaking, although our initial goal was to find the copycat, on an emotional level, we can’t just forget about Azla. We still don’t know his reason for exposing the fakes. However, without his whistleblowing…

“At the very least, we wouldn’t have known that the Sleeping Miderine is a fake, and the tarnished pride of the collectors would have gone unnoticed,” Joshua continued.

“Well, Joshua, ain’t ya enthusiastic?” Leaning on her cheek and smiling, Anastasia’s words made him embarrassed.

“Uh, no, sorry. I got a bit carried away…”

“It’s fine, relax. Anybody’d get all worked up upon findin’ out somethin’ they loved was a phony.”

It’s sometimes difficult to deal with how this girl can take such reckless actions, and even influence the otherwise upright Julius. I do believe it is simply her way of dealing with things, but either way, I don’t mind.

“So, Ana, what do we do from here?” Julius asked. “We still don’t have any leads.”

“Hmm, that’s true. We already struck out in this direction. Guess we’d better start lookin’ for leads from another side.”

“Another side? Um, do you have more shenanigans planned?” Joshua couldn’t help but let his true feelings slip.

“Joshua, that’s a rude way of asking,” Julius commented, rubbing his brow in frustration. Joshua quickly covered his mouth, realizing his gaffe, but Anastasia was not offended.

“No need to apologize. If anythin’, it looks like Joshua’s startin’ to understand me better. Though I ain’t sure I can meet those expectations…”

“You mean because Ricardo and the others aren’t here right now?” Julius asked.

“Unlike Joshua,” Anastasia continued, “my knight ain’t all that charmin’.”

“Right now, I’m more a mercenary than a knight, though,” concluded Julius. Anastasia made a somewhat unamused expression at his seamless response. It was as if she had been outwitted, and Joshua was impressed by his witty remark.

Although they originally got along well, their chemistry had improved even more since becoming master and servant. Considering the battle for the royal selection, this was as good as it could get. However, at the same time…

“It also means that my brother is changing,” Joshua thought. Just as that sense of desolation escaped his mouth, another voice called out to them, cutting him off.

“Oh, Miss! I found you. I’m glad you’re here!” Upon closer inspection, an orange-haired kitten boy approached them near the window from outside the store. It was Mimi’s younger brother, Hetaro. He wore a relieved look on his gentle face as he patted his chest with a sigh. “I was so worried, Miss! When I got to the address, there were guards all over the place!”

“Oh, that was Azla’s place,” Anastasia said. “Sorry, I didn’t have time to let y’all know about it. Anywho, how’d y’all manage to find us?”

“Julius and Joshua have a really unique scent,” Hetaro explained.

Joshua was taken aback by Hetaro’s sniffing. “Huh? Not only my brother, but me as well?”

“Joshua, why are you so surprised?” Julius asked with a stare. Joshua had assumed that it was only natural for Julius to have a flowery scent, but was genuinely surprised to find himself treated the same way.

“Julius and Joshua have a similar scent,” Hetaro continued. “Both have a mix of hard and soft scents, but Joshua’s might be a bit more oily.”

“O-Oily?” Joshua asked, dumbfounded.

“It must be the smell of art supplies,” Julius thought. “I also get that from Joshua at times."

Joshua sniffed his sleeve, but couldn't detect anything unusual. Although it would be odd to compare his sense of smell to Hetaro's, who was a demi-human. I guess it's best not to worry about that.

"By the way, Hetaro, why were you looking for us?" Joshua asked.

"That would be for my other shenanigan." Anastasia laughed with a mischievous smile, poking fun at Joshua's earlier comment. "So, Hetaro, how'd y'all manage?"

Hetaro, who didn't understand this exchange, tilted his head at Joshua, who shrugged his shoulders. "Just as you said, Miss, there was someone who had been collecting old paintings that weren't very famous, and we were able to track down their workplace somehow."

"Oh my, y'all kids are awfully capable, ain't y'all?" Anastasia nodded in response to Hetaro's report, petting the young cat-boy's head. He blushed and smiled bashfully. "If y'all figured out that much, I reckon that's all we need."

However, the Juukulius brothers tilted their heads in response to his report. As far as they were concerned, it was another piece of the puzzle leading them to the copycat. "Ana, I don't quite follow. I'm sorry, but could you explain?" Julius asked.

"Yep, I'll explain as we go," Anastasia said, stretching slightly and wrapping the white fox fur collar that she had been holding around her neck once more. "Although I hate leavin', it's about time I return to bein' Anastasia."

Although the weather on this day was warm enough to deem a scarf unnecessary, the fair-skinned girl wore it naturally and with grace, without so much as a hint of discomfort. "There's the Anastasia we all know and love," Julius remarked at the sight of his mistress. "Beautiful."

"Well, you ain't wrong. Come on, Julius and Joshua, let's skedaddle."

“Right, understood. So, um, where are we going?” asked Joshua.

“It’s obvious, ain’t it?” Anastasia shrugged at Joshua’s flustered question. Then, she wore her typical mischievous grin and replied boldly, “We’re headin’ to the copycat’s place.”

10

Following Anastasia, they headed toward their destination—the residence of the copycat. According to the information provided by Hetaro, it was the gallery of an obscure painter named Hogey Marshepo.

“I’ve never heard of him. It’s an unfamiliar name,” Joshua remarked.

“Ain’t it more convenient that way for a copycat?” Anastasia pointed out. “If he’d been famous, people would recognize his painting style. Bein’ an unknown artist is essential for a copycat.”

“But for someone to create such impressive paintings…” Thinking of the forgery that was the Sleeping Miderine, Joshua couldn’t help but wonder.

The Sleeping Miderine, the masterpiece that Anastasia had identified as a fake, was indeed one that had deceived many as an authentic painting for years. With that level of skill, it’s plausible that the copycat has considerable talent of their own—talent that makes them far more gifted than someone like me, who only wields his brush as a hobby.

“There is always a reason behind people’s actions,” Julius speculated. “There must be a significant reason for this person, Hogey, to become a forger.”

“Is there really a convincing reason to paint forgeries?” Joshua questioned.

“I would not know. I suppose I am as much of an art lover as anyone else. In that respect, you are probably much more capable than I am, Joshua. Lady Anastasia—”

“Yeah?”

“What made you think that Hogey Marshepo was the copycat?” Julius asked as they walked and talked. In response to his question, Anastasia raised a finger mid-gait.

“Lemme refresh your memory,” she began. “Remember how to tell between a fake paintin’ and the real deal?”

“If I recall correctly, the style and technique are important, but so are the materials used,” he replied. “Sometimes, counterfeit artists use materials that were not available at the time of the original work, which can be a clue.”

“Bingo,” Anastasia confirmed. “An’ those materials include paints, brushes, and… paper. Paper’s a material, too, ain’t it?”

Joshua’s eyes widened in realization at Anastasia’s confident statement. “I get it! To create forgeries of art from a specific time, you would need paper from the same period. So, they must have gathered up unsold paintings from that time…”

“And used it as a canvas to make a new paintin’,” she finished. “Well, I reckon that’s one way to do it.”

“I had no idea…” Paper-making techniques have changed significantly from the past to today. Paper, which used to be made from animal skins, has evolved into something entirely different. The same goes for art supplies.

“They went out of their way to collect old, unsold paintings, then painted their own fresh works right on top… The world of forgery is built upon some extraordinary ideas, isn’t it?” Julius mused.

“Well, yeah, that’s another part of it. Anyways, we’re here,” Anastasia said, pointing to their location: the gallery of Hogey Marshepo.

And if our previous speculations were correct…

“Azla Eastern might be here, too.”

“For both the art dealer sellin’ the phonies and the painter creatin’ ‘em, the presence of an accuser would be nothin’ short of problematic… So this gotta be the place.”

Upon hearing Anastasia’s words, Julius questioned his mistress with a serious look in his eyes: “Well then, shall we go inside?”

If it is indeed true that Azla is inside, the more time we take, the more risk that his life is in danger. In such a case, a frontal assault would be the most appropriate choice.

“To think that I could ever have such a thought… Could this be her influence?” Joshua lamented.

“Well,” Anastasia interrupted, “I don’t think rushin’ in is the best idea. Not ‘cause of your worryin’, Joshua, but ‘cause it’s an art gallery, after all. Why don’t we try knockin’ politely?” With a wry smile directed at the doubtful Joshua, Anastasia knocked on the gallery door. After a moment, a flurry of footsteps approached from inside.

The door opened, and a thin, bearded, middle-aged man revealed himself. “Sorry to keep you waitin’. Folks don’t come ‘round much these days. If you don’t mind me askin’, who might you fine folks be?”

“Pleasure to meet ya, I’m Anastasia Hoshin. If y’all ever heard of the Hoshin Company, we’re a kinda big deal.”

Seeing Anastasia confidently take charge and introduce herself, the man’s expression quickly changed. It was evident from the man’s reaction that he was well-informed. “Well I’ll be, the Hoshin Company? Well, even before that, the moniker you just mentioned…”

It was endearing that someone would get so nervous when met with a candidate, recognizable in name and face, for the royal selection that had been rocking the entire kingdom. Joshua sympathized with him.

“So, you’re Mr. Hogey Marshepo, ain’t ya?” Anastasia asked.

“Well, yep, that’s about right. Name’s Hogey Marshepo…” Even though he was flustered, Hogey managed to confirm his identity. In response, Anastasia nodded multiple times with a friendly smile. And then, keeping the momentum of her nods, Anastasia looked at Hogey with her light blue eyes.

“Ya see, I reckon that it was you, Mr. Hogey Marshepo, who mighta been the one responsible for forgin’ that fake Sleeping Miderine painting,” Anastasia said bluntly. “Whaddya say? My assessment way off?”

Hogey froze, speechless at her straightforward interrogation. Observing from the sidelines, Joshua couldn’t help but think aloud, “Going straight for the heart of your opponent to gain control… Isn’t it a tactic that only manipulative adults use?”

“Joshua, that isn’t a very nice thing to ask,” rebuked Julius, wearing a stern expression.

11

Hogey led the three into his gallery, where he surprisingly confirmed their suspicions with unexpected candor. He readily admitted to being the copycat responsible for the counterfeit painting, the Sleeping Miderine. “As you’ve figured out, I am indeed the forger you’re talking about.”

The sincerity of his words and actions was enough to make one inclined to question him. But as they looked around the gallery, such suspicions were quickly cast aside. Because at the very moment, Hogey had been in the process of creating one of his works. Forgeries, to be precise. Forgeries of numerous famous paintings that anyone with even a passing interest in art would recognize.

“Quite the extravagant undertakin’, ain’t it? I mean, if famous paintin’s like these started poppin’ up left an’ right, ain’t that jus’ asking for loads of unwanted attention?” Anastasia asked.

“Oh, I wouldn’t be so careless,” Hogey explained, scratching his head. “I have no plans to sell these, mind you. I’m just trying to see if I am capable of recreating them myself."

Joshua responded bluntly to Hogey as he studied the forgeries. "And have you confirmed that ability?" It was a simple query, one that had arisen naturally within Joshua.

The forgeries of famed artworks on display were of remarkable quality. While many were still works in progress, to Joshua's eyes, they held hardly a difference to the originals. Without a doubt, these fakes were painted in a near-identical process to the genuine versions.

"If you're capable of painting such works…" Joshua started.

"Sadly, I still fall short," Hogey said, averting his gaze. "I can't hold a candle to the real deal. All I can manage is a feeble imitation, nothing more."

For some reason, despite his words, it was Joshua who felt a sense of disappointment. But it wasn't the disappointment born from the lofty standards of being an artist. He was well aware of that. However, he couldn't precisely grasp what exactly it could be.

As Joshua and Hogey conversed, Anastasia contemplated their discussion while admiring the paintings. "Lady Anastasia, what are your thoughts?" Julius inquired, to which she let out a thoughtful hum.

Julius's question served as a confirmation of Anastasia's earlier speculation. Namely, the idea that Hogey, the forger himself, was the mastermind behind the attempt to silence Azla, the accuser.

However, that theory started to waver within Anastasia's mind once Hogey himself readily affirmed their suspicions. She couldn't understand why he would answer her question so easily if he were indeed the copycat and had reason to conceal his own works as forgeries.

"Well, when ya hit upon somethin' ya don't understand, it jus' makes sense to ask," Anastasia said. "Hogey, ya ever hear the name 'Azla Eastern'?"

“Huh?!” As soon as she brought up Azla’s name, Hogey’s expression noticeably tensed.

“Oh dear, that’s a greater reaction than I was expectin’,” Anastasia remarked. That only makes things more confusin’, she thought. So is he a cold-hearted copycat, or an art connoisseur wit’ a guilty conscience?

However, Hogey, seemingly resigned to the accusation, nodded and said, “So, you heard my pieces were forgeries from my son, huh?”

“Huh?” Hearing Hogey’s unexpected confession, Anastasia and Julius were taken aback.

“My son… Azla… he spilled the beans about my craft, didn’t he? He always despised me working as a forger.”

“Please wait a moment,” Julius said. “Your response deviates slightly from our expectations.” We had assumed that Hogey and Azla had a perpetrator-victim relationship, but now, a new connection has been unveiled: Hogey is Azla’s father.

“Allow me to confirm once more, Lord Hogey. Azla Eastern…is your son? Your biological child?”

“Yes, indeed, that’s the truth,” Hogey confirmed. “I met his mother many years ago, when I was just a young man. But with my financial hardships, I couldn’t marry her like I wanted. Being an unsuccessful painter isn’t exactly an ideal occupation for supporting a family.”

“I see, it’s all startin’ to make sense,” Anastasia surmised. “An’ that’s when Amilét Megis approached ya askin’ ya to paint more phonies to assist her own business.”

“That’s the gist of it,” Hogey said, reluctantly nodding in agreement.

It must have been a bitter decision, Julius thought. Hogey, unable to marry his wife due to financial issues, chose the path of a counterfeit artist. He then used the proceeds from his forged works to support his wife and child.

"But my dear wife passed away two years ago, and that's when my son learned the truth—that he was raised by his father's dirty money earned by a shady living. And that made him angry."

"So the reason he exposed your forgeries by reporting them to the owners was…?" Julius asked.

"I suppose it was his way of seeking revenge," Hogey said, slumping his shoulders heavily. He stood before his unfinished painting and traced the edges with his finger. "I haven't the foggiest idea what exactly he studied, but he must have done some pretty extensive research, seeing as how my forgeries led him straight my way. He begged me to stop making them right away. His hatred for my work—his own father's work—was entirely justified. But I've been doing this for well over twenty years now. It's too late for me to change now."

Hence, Hogey rejected his son's pleas and decided to continue his life as a copycat artist. Azla's subsequent accusations were the result of his building resentment and desire for revenge against his father.

"In that case, it seems rather… Lady Anastasia?" Julius asked.

"Hmm, well, I get the story an' all, but still… Ain't it a bit unsettlin'?"

"Unsettling? Isn't it more heartbreaking to have such a misunderstanding occur between a parent and child?" Julius asked, trying to decipher his master's cryptic words.

However, Anastasia herself couldn't quite articulate her feelings. Hogey's explanation made sense. His son's anger toward him and the subsequent accusations had incurred the wrath of the criminal underworld involved in the counterfeit business.

As they hadn't met Azla in person, it was difficult to make further deductions. That's when Joshua, who had been silent until now, spoke up: "Could Azla's anger really be simply about the forgeries?"

Even Joshua himself seemed surprised by the words he had involuntarily blurted out. Everyone turned their attention to him.

"Joshua, what do you mean by that? Are you suggesting that Lord Hogey is lying?"

At Julius's question, Joshua looked away and touched his own chest. "No, no, I don't think he's lying. I only meant that words can fall short at times. Even between families, not everything can always be fully understood."

This answer made Julius hold his breath. Joshua turned his gaze toward Anastasia. Anastasia's light blue eyes stared back, filled with curiosity and expectation. "Well, Joshua? Whaddya think? Speak up."

"I can't say there was no anger at all," Joshua began. "I imagine Azla must have felt some dissatisfaction upon learning he was brought up thanks to forgeries. But given how deeply Azla was involved in art, to the extent of being able to discern authentic pieces from counterfeits, I don't think that was the only reason."

As he spoke, Joshua stood in front of the unfinished forgery—or rather, the painting. He narrowed his eyes at the vibrantly colored world it depicted. "That Sleeping Miderine was magnificent. All the works here are. The value of a painting isn't determined solely by its authenticity. Authenticity is transcendental."

"My artwork couldn't possibly have so much value…" Hogey started.

"That's an insult to the collectors who desired your paintings," Joshua said with deliberate force, staring down Hogey. Although he hadn't had much experience in holding others accountable, this time, he felt it was necessary. As one who lacked such a gift, he felt the need to speak up for those who were unaware of their own. "Azla told you to stop making forgeries, didn't he?"

"Yes, that's right. He told me to stop making forgeries. It's just that…"

"That's because he wanted you to paint your own art."

"Eh?" Hogey, whose face could neither confirm nor deny his own actions, was dumbfounded at that statement.

Seeing the oblivious look on his face, bitter emotions filled Joshua's heart. Perhaps it was frustration, or something close to it. To think that someone who could create such magnificent paintings would give up on their own talent. "You are an incredible person. Why don't you realize that?"

"It's just that…"

Joshua approached Hogey, who shook his head with uncertainty. "You have talent. You can create such magnificent art. You have an expressive power that rivals renowned masterpieces, so why?!"

At this emotional outburst, Julius gently gripped Joshua's shoulder. "Joshua, calm down."

Feeling the touch of his brother's hand, Joshua realized he had become too heated and apologized. But my apology is not for my words. I stand by what I said. I'm sure Azla would feel the same.

"I second Joshua's opinion," Anastasia chimed in.

"But it's a risky gamble," Julius said. "To accuse your own father, who works as a counterfeit artist, of his work being counterfeit…"

"That's why he ain't mentioning his father by name," Anastasia concluded. "Simply bringin' to light that the paintin's were phonies woulda made it easier to back out… But draggin' Amilét into it, well, she probably had it comin'." Given that they were wittingly sellin' phonies, a day of reckonin' was bound to come. But that don't mean there won't be anger directed at Azla.

"To think my own flesh and blood would do such a thing…" Hogey lamented.

"I would like to second Joshua's opinion that words aren't always enough." Julius's gaze briefly shifted towards Anastasia, and she nodded in agreement. "Of course, this is merely speculation, and we would need to hear the details from Azla himself."

At this point, it was safe to dismiss the theory that Hogey had tried to eliminate Azla for accusing him of his forgeries. Although their father-son relationship in no way exonerated them from suspicion, the unfolding of events made it evident that it would have been an unlikely scenario. However, one question remained: “So who abducted Azla?” Joshua thought aloud.

“What?! My boy was abducted?” Hogey was taken aback by Joshua’s contemplative words, clearly unaware of the situation.

Seeing Hogey more surprised at this than when he was accused of being a forger, Joshua made up his mind to explain the situation from the beginning. “Well, it all started when the collector, Baron Nico Olsen, requested Lady Anastasia to authenticate his Sleeping Miderine…”

“Oh, no…” Upon hearing the beginning of Joshua’s explanation of the investigation, Anastasia muttered to herself. She covered her face with her hands and began to groan.

“Huh?”

“Lady Anastasia?” Joshua said. “What happened?”

“To think that I been actin’ all high an’ mighty only to just realize somethin’ so obvious… So embarrasin’.”

“Well, um…” Joshua was puzzled by Anastasia’s attitude. However, Julius understood the intention behind her distress.

“So, do you have any leads on Azla Eastern’s whereabouts?” Julius asked. In response to his question, Anastasia slowly removed her hand from her face and spoke.

“Yeah, got it,” she said. “Let’s go question the mastermind right now. Oh, Hogey, I reckon ya should come wit’ us.” With a vexed expression, Anastasia led the three of them out of the gallery. Given her attitude, she seemed fairly confident about Azla’s whereabouts.

Half-convinced, Joshua and the others followed her lead. Along the way, Hogey was given an explanation about the situation, and his face paled as he contemplated the danger his child might be in.

“You ain’t need to worry so much. Azla is safe. Since he’s…”

“Wait, this is…” Joshua said in surprise, his eyes widening as he realized where Anastasia was headed. It was a place familiar not only to Joshua, but to Julius as well. Because the owner of this mansion was none other than someone they were already acquainted with.

“Seems everythin’ went jus’ as you planned, Mr. Olsen,” Anastasia remarked.

“My, my, you managed to find your way here in just three days. Truly, your insights are remarkable.” And thus, Baron Nico Olsen, the very man who had triggered this investigation, welcomed Anastasia’s visit as if he had been eagerly anticipating it.

12

The mastermind behind it all was none other than Baron Nico Olsen. And indeed, all unfolded precisely according to his plan. Azla, the son of a master forger, wanted little more than to make his father quit. However, recognizing that his direct appeals were in vain, he resorted to more drastic measures.

It was he who dispatched those letters to the owners of the forged paintings, exposing them as fakes. Yet, even this audacious move failed to elicit his desired response. So in his frustration, he decided to take a more extreme action—exposing the information to Nico Olsen, the art collector in possession of the counterfeit Sleeping Miderine.

This was his last ditch effort to cut off any means of escape for Hogey, his father, and end his career as a forger. Nico Olsen, however, respected Azla’s plea and longing.

“Of course,” Olsen explained, “initially, I was filled with anger toward the counterfeit artist. But then I had a change of heart. I became intrigued by the world of this artist who was capable of crafting such exquisite forgeries.”

“So, you chose to assist in ending Mr. Hogey’s career as a counterfeit artist. But what prompted you to involve Lady Anastasia?" Julius asked.

"As I understood it at first," Anastasia recalled, "it was also part of my assessment. Mr. Olsen was committed to fulfillin' his duties as a baron an' preservin' his honor as a collector."

Anastasia crossed her arms, shooting a disapproving glare in Olsen's direction. As Olsen welcomed Anastasia and her group into his residence and began to serve tea, he offered a faint smile and nodded.

"I could have visited Lord Hogey directly after hearing Azla's complaint," Olsen admitted. "But where's the thrill in that? It was also our way of getting back at the counterfeit artist, you see."

"Baron Olsen, ya truly are an intriguin' character," Anastasia remarked. Olsen, unperturbed by her comment, openly confessed that he had orchestrated the entire affair. In fact, he appeared to find it rather amusing. Anastasia, on the verge of reprimanding him, was momentarily taken aback.

"Wait, then what about Lord Azla's home being ransacked?"

"I anticipated that once the counterfeit allegations surfaced, it would naturally draw the attention of some unamused dealers who might target him. So I took the initiative to stage an abduction. The bloodstains left at the scene were Azla's idea, actually. Pretty effective bluff, wouldn't you agree?"

"Baron Olsen…" Julius was at a loss for words at the man's audacity. Of course, considering his position, Olsen's actions should have warranted severe consequences, but one could also argue that it was Olsen's protection of Azla that had prevented any harm from coming to him.

"So even that was all part of Baron Olsen's schemin', huh?" Anastasia said with a sigh. "Then I reckon Hogey an' Azla are havin' a touching' family reunion in another room now?"

"Yes," Olsen confirmed. "Artists often believe that it is enough to put their thoughts into their works. However, that's not entirely correct. People still need to communicate with each other."

"So, does our discussion pass accordin' to your own personal beliefs, Mr. Nico Olsen?" Anastasia asked.

"Well, I sure would have liked to see Lord Hogey squirm a little more, but yes," Olsen replied with a mischievous grin. Anastasia let out a sigh, deflating her pouty cheeks and relaxing her expression. It was indeed a quintessentially Anastasia-like, business-like smile.

"Well, I did reckon that everythin' was in yer hands, Mr. Olsen, which wasn't interestin' at all," Anastasia started. "But I'm glad to say we might finally be outdoin' ya."

"Oh, outdo me, you say?" Olsen asked with surprise.

"We gotcha some souvenirs. My youngsters should be deliverin' 'em soon. Jus' watch—three, two, one…" Anastasia counted the seconds on her fingers, uttering "Zero" the moment she put down the last one.

"Hey! Sorry for the wait, Miss! Take a look! We got the lady you were looking for!" With a clamor, a figure burst into the parlor of the Olsen residence. The owner of the resounding footsteps was Ricardo, a hulking, dog-faced demi-human with a towering physique.

Having anticipated Ricardo's arrival, Anastasia smiled and said, "Thanks for your help. So, whatcha do with 'em?"

"Bringing her along would've just caused a big ruckus, y'know? So I tied her up and left her rolling around in the dog cart! When I went to check out that tavern those good-for-nothings you mentioned were in, jackpot! Hahahahaha!" Ricardo laughed, his mouth open wide as he made his report. Joshua and Julius had a pretty good idea of who he had captured.

"Do you mean… Miss Amilét?" Julius confirmed.

"I figured if they had hired someone to catch Azla, they'd want to know how it went, y'know?" Anastasia explained. "And I was right on the mark. Here's your souvenir, Mr. Olsen."

Until that point, Olsen had always been one step ahead in everything. But now, he sighed in admiration. "I see, I've been outsmarted."

It was Amilét Megis, the antique dealer who had been selling the counterfeit works. And the most likely person responsible for selling the Sleeping Miderine to Olsen.

"Any talk 'bout damages oughta be between you an' Amilét, Mr. Olsen. But seein' as we're the intermediaries, kindly steer clear of any rough antics," Anastasia warned.

"I never intended to in the first place, but sure, you have my word. Also, my hat goes off to you." Olsen rose from his chair and knelt before Anastasia. Then, the baron took a deep breath, and bowed deeply. "I apologize for testing you, Lady Anastasia. You exceeded my expectations. As a nobleman and a collector, I salute you."

Such was Olsen's declaration of defeat. At the same time, it could also be taken as his clear declaration of his position in the royal selection.

"An' wit' that, the case is closed" Anastasia said with a triumphant smile. But Joshua, having been dragged around in all this, felt a mix of complex emotions.

13

"In the end, everything went according to Lady Anastasia's plan. Indeed, what she sees is different from what we do. Don't you agree, Joshua?"

"Your words are always correct, Julius. However, I must admit that today's events were a bit of a shock."

The Juukulius brothers spoke amongst themselves in the mansion that night after the incident had been brought to a close. It had only lasted three days, but they were three intense days. Although the majority of the situation had culminated on the final day, Joshua was overcome with sudden fatigue from the non-stop action.

Fortunately, with the intervention of Baron Nico Olsen, although the father-son duo of Azla and Hogey were not completely absolved of guilt, they wouldn't face severe punishment. From that point onward, as his son desired, Hogey would abandon his life as a forger and receive Olsen's endorsement in creating his own artwork.

The specifics of the interactions between the dealer Amilét and the buyer Olsen remained shrouded in mystery. But it was evident that she had deceived more than just Olsen. In order to avoid retaliation from even more dangerous adversaries, she had no choice but to surrender unconditionally to Olsen. The incident of the counterfeit painting, as well as the matter of who he would support for the royal selection, was concurrently settled, and the situation drew to a close.

"You seem a bit displeased. Is something bothering you?" Julius asked.

"Well… I do think it's great that things came full circle. But I still can't be certain if Hogey can actually paint his own art."

"Hmm." Seeing Joshua lost in thought, Julius narrowed his eyes while brushing his own bangs. Unexpectedly, these recent events had led to Joshua spending a substantial amount of time with Anastasia, inadvertently exposing him to different perspectives. This experience, centered around art and paintings, had proven to be a significant opportunity for Joshua to expand his horizons.

Perhaps owing to the circumstances of Joshua's congenital health conditions, Julius harbored a deep desire for his brother to be able to see a more diverse world. This was his genuine wish. Certainly, during his early childhood, Joshua grappled with frail health, rarely venturing beyond the confines of their home. However, as he grew older, his constitution improved, albeit not dramatically, and he was no longer haunted by the fear of illness.

Still, the reality remains. Pursuing the path of knighthood that he once yearned for will prove challenging. Nonetheless, Joshua shouldn't let this stop him from opening all the other doors available to him. And I believe Lady Anastasia is the person who can help broaden his horizons. Her philosophy of validating other people’s desires will surely manifest greatly once she becomes Queen.

“Julius?”

“Ah, my apologies. I was lost in thought for a moment. Hogey’s predicament is still shrouded in uncertainty. After all these years, he’s never painted a single artwork for himself. Can he truly create his own original works with those brushes? Only time will tell. However…”

Julius’s words trailed off as he quietly gazed at Joshua. Under that gaze, Joshua shifted his posture nervously and averted his yellow eyes. Julius nodded at his younger brother, who lacked assertiveness, but was filled with potential beyond himself.

“Today, I witnessed a person who, despite not wielding a sword for over ten years, was capable of picking one up for the sake of another. That alone gives me hope,” Julius said proudly.

“Ah…”

“It could get worse,” Julius continued. “There’s certainly apprehension about that. But at the same time, I want to have hope. I want to wish for a tomorrow brighter than today, a simple and common wish.”

Azla’s wish for his father was simple: that he could become a celebrated painter that everyone could take pride in. Julius preferred a tomorrow in which Hogey could fulfill that over one in which he could not. “He hadn’t completely abandoned this path, so then it’s all about changing his mindset.”

Even if it was as a forger, Hogey continued to wield his paintbrush. So there was a chance. Moreover, in the grand scheme of things, it did not concern anyone else. Even if one were to face death tomorrow, there was no inherent reason not to change.

Julius had already decided that the path he walked was the only path for him. There was no haste, and no turning back. Knighthood was the way of life that Julius himself aspired for, and what he wished to be.

“Joshua, I hope you find something like that for yourself too. Time is not an issue. I will take care of the matters concerning the Juukulius family and Lady Anastasia.”

“Julius…”

“Simply share with me your heartfelt wishes, and I will support you to the best of my abilities. That is the pledge that I, Julius Juukulius, take as the brother of Joshua Juukulius.”

Joshua had many friends, many of whom would gladly offer their support. However, among them, none could fight more bravely than Julius. Such was Julius’s pride, not only as a knight, but as an elder brother.

Upon hearing Julius’s pledge, Joshua spoke up unexpectedly. “Please don’t laugh when you hear this.” Seeing Julius look up at him, he hesitated before continuing timidly. “After everything that just happened, I’ve developed a strong desire to paint. If possible, I’d love to capture the landscapes I’ve witnessed with my own eyes.”

“I think that’s a wonderful idea,” Julius said supportively. “You have the freedom to paint any breathtaking scenery you envision.” Hearing Joshua’s unusual desire made Julius aware of a warmth in his heart. Expressing one’s wishes and desires was truly a delightful thing to do.

“What would you like to see?” Julius asked. “There are many beautiful things both in and around the royal capital. Oh, that’s right, Joshua, you once mentioned you wanted to see the Watergate City, didn’t you?”

“Yes, Priestella,” Joshua replied. “A place known for its scenic beauty. I would be thrilled to visit someday.”

“Then let’s propose it to Lady Anastasia. She will surely find a way to bring us there in her own unexpected way.”

Strangely, even though they had yet to utter a word, Julius could already imagine Anastasia and Ricardo eagerly conspiring to fulfill Joshua's wish. Julius softened his expression. Seeing this, Joshua lowered his gaze and started to speak. “Someday, please allow me to paint a portrait of you, Brother.”

“Of me?” Julius asked in surprise. “But Joshua, you've never painted portraits…”

“Yes, that's true. I've never attempted it before. But I want to give it a try.” Joshua peeked up from his lowered gaze with a bashful expression. He appeared somewhat anxious, as if he were being too hasty with his requests. However, Julius was genuinely delighted by his brother's enthusiastic plea.

So, in accordance with his brother's wish, Julius offered a knightly bow in acceptance. “It would be an honor.”

END

Golden Siblings
(CA)
(Edited Machine Translation)

1

???: “Garf, let us go out.”

???: “Huh?”

Garfiel tilted his head at such an invitation at fire hour, with the clear sunlight shining beautifully.

Curled up in the garden of the mansion, he had just been grooming himself. There was no need to groom himself in that particular spot, but he couldn’t help but feel most at ease within that part of the mansion grounds.

Although there was a room reserved for Garfiel in the mansion, he was hesitant to sleep anywhere that his own scent had not already seeped into.

Therefore, instead of staying in one spot, Garfiel spent his days in various locations throughout the mansion.

His behavior having no rhyme or reason; whenever Otto or the others had business with Garfiel, they had to wander around the mansion aimlessly,

Meaning, the only person who could find Garfiel in one try was Frederica, who currently stood right in front of him—except for Ram, whose side Garfiel would come to if she called him.

Frederica, who shared many points with his appearance, with her long blonde hair and emerald green eyes, was Garfiel’s biological sister. To be precise, they were siblings from different fathers, but neither of them seemed to care much about that.

If they were to worry about something, there were more important things than that to be concerned about. For example, the long, long years they had spent apart.

—Garfiel and Frederica had spent over a decade apart.

Garfiel was 14 years old and had lived apart from his older sister for more years than he had lived with her now. Still, a beast-man's blood was a strange thing, and it would be impossible to mistake a person with the same blood in their veins for another.

No matter how much her appearance had changed since they separated, he could tell that she was his blood relative, for whom he had had complicated feelings for for a long, long time.

Garfiel: "…"

Frederica: "Garf, is something wrong?"

Frederica asked the suddenly silent Garfiel.

Uncharacteristically lost in his own musings, Garfiel shook his head and said, "Nah"

Garfiel: "Jus' kinda not used ta Sis being so huge and so…Guh?!"

Frederica: "Please stop saying huge this and huge that about a woman's height and physique, geez."

Garfiel: "S-Say that before ya hit me…"

Garfiel's head was in his hands, thanks to the greater-than-expected retaliation to the comment he had inadvertently blurted out. Sighing at her brother's state, Frederica gazed at her own shoulders.

Frederica: "I would love to be cute and dainty too. Not to say like Grandmother or Petra, but at least a physique like Ram's…"

Garfiel: "Ahh, like Granny ya got no hope, but that little kid is still growing up. Besides, ya, lookin' like Ram… Ha! Don't make me laugh."

Frederica: "I would love to know more about that laugh, and what it means.”

Frederica exuded a sense of dread as she put her hand over her mouth and hid her fangs while smiling. Pressured by this, Garfiel swallowed hard and lightly clicked his fangs.

Garfiel: “So? What’cha talkin’ about? What do ya mean, go out?”

Frederica: “Again with the happy-go-lucky misdirection… Sigh, very well. If we were to go off on a tangent and waste time on it, we would be putting the cart before the ground dragon.”

Garfiel attempted to change the subject, and Frederica was taken aback, but took him up on it.

Then Frederica held up one finger and said,

Frederica: “Actually, I have the day off after lunch. So I thought we should go out to the city together. That is why I came to ask you out.”

And that was what she said.

2

—The “Sanctuary” had been liberated, and Garfiel had stepped onto land outside of his home village for the first time in his life.

In reality, he had stepped foot outside the Sanctuary half a day before its liberation, but he had realized the magnitude of his action at the same moment as the Sanctuary’s residents had.

Garfiel: “…”

To be honest, Garfiel had his doubts when it came to that matter.

In the Sanctuary, he had clashed with Subaru and his friends, and although he had been up against many at once, he had still been forced to submit and had surrendered to them. He knew that if he had not cooperated with them to break the barrier, the village would have been swallowed up by the swarm of the “Great Rabbit,” and its residents would all have been killed.

Even so, Garfiel still felt some doubt as he gazed at the snow-covered landscape of the Sanctuary. —He thought to himself, how unreasonably stubborn it had been for him.

No doubts, no hesitation, straightforward.

Many originally viewed Garfiel as such a decisive person, but in Garfiel's opinion, that was ridiculous. He had always thought that there had never been anyone before or since who had sweated the small things as much as him.

So that was why he was drawn to truly decisive people, he thought.

One of the best examples of that was Garfiel's dearest love.

???: "I see, with Frederica. That seems quite alright. Why don't you go have some fun?"

Garfiel: "Well duh, my amazin' self wouldn't be turnin' it down either, but…"

Garfiel couldn't hide his confusion, as if saying he didn't know what to do. Ram, who was folding the laundry in front of Garfiel, mumbled, "Such a fool," without looking directly at him.

Frederica had invited Garfiel to go out with her, and he had reluctantly agreed.

However, he could not quite grasp the significance of his sister's offer, so he used the short time he had before meeting up with her to come to Ram for advice.

However, there was not much to discuss with her. He just tilted his head in concern, not understanding the meaning of Frederica's offer.

Or maybe it was just a dig at Garfiel, given the events that happened in the Sanctuary.

Ram: "That would be a misguided presumption. Frederica simply wants to make up with you, Garf. She is happy to be reunited with her estranged brother. Even if it is a brother like you."

Garfiel: “I don’t like how ya phrasin’ it there. It’s like, “Tomorrow’s a cloudy day for Amelie.””

Ram: “What? You cannot believe Ram’s words?”

Ram stared at Garfiel, scratching his short blond hair and scrunching his cheeks. Garfiel’s eyes were pierced by the sharp gaze of the woman of his dreams, and he involuntarily straightened his posture.

Ram: “You’ve come a long way, haven’t you? What in the world have you become?”

Garfiel: “Don’tcha get me wrong, there’s nothin’ I believe more than Ram’s words, other than… Granny’s, the Captain’s, and also—uuuh, anyway, there ain’t too much else.”

Ram: “—. Foolish. But that is the kind of thing Ram likes about you, Garf.”

Garfiel: “Oh, yeah? What part?”

Garfiel blushed when Ram smiled at him.

Reflecting back on his remarks, he was unable to see the answer as to what in the world he had been praised for. The answer, it seemed to him, was that he had not been able to narrow down which thing was the most important; it seemed to him to be an unmanly answer.

Anyway—

Ram: “If you can trust that much, then trust Frederica too. At the very least, Ram can assure you that Frederica is thinking of Garf.”

Ram stopped folding laundry and said, “Because,”

Ram: “Ram is also an older sister, just like Frederica. As an older sister, Ram knows exactly what that feels like.”

Garfiel: “That person is…”

Garfiel expressed his sullenness at Ram’s remark.

Reflexively moving his gaze, he saw the sleeping face of the girl who was the cause of his sullen face.

It was a girl sleeping in her bed, faintly breathing. Her face was the spitting image of Ram's, the only differences seeming to be the color of her hair and eyes.

—Rem, that was her name, and she was the twin sister of Ram, so it seemed.

It was a strange thing to say that 'it seemed', since Garfiel and Ram had known each other for nearly a decade and, of course, her twin sister should have been no stranger to them.

No one remembered the existence of Rem except for Natsuki Subaru now.

Garfiel: "…"

Beside her quiet sister's sleeping face, Ram was folding laundry that smelled of the sun. Everyone in the mansion knew that she had been visiting her sister's bedroom for some time now.

Even within Ram, who said that, there were no memories of Rem left. Still, Ram went to visit her sister frequently, trying to fill the void of what was missing.

Ram: "That is what an older sister does."

Garfiel: "…Didn't say anythin'."

Ram: "Yeah? Maybe not. Then it is Ram monologuing. Precious, right?"

At Ram's remarks, Garfiel tried to click his fangs out of habit. However, he hesitated to do so because he felt it would disturb the sleeping Rem.

But Garfiel was not sure about which was the right choice in this case.

Ram: "Ha! It is not like Garf to be considerate."

Garfiel: “Mragh, well, sorry, that ‘m not actin’ like myself.”

Sullenly, Garfiel averted his gaze. Turning his head to the side.

Ram: “It’s not quite. —like there was anything wrong with that.”

Garfiel’s heart was thrown for a loop as he heard those gentle words from Ram.

3

???: “Frederica nee-sama, it’s wonderful!”

Petra’s round eyes lit up when she saw Frederica, who had changed outfits from her maid uniform.

With her light brown hair cut to neck length, she looked like a girl who embodied the word “lovely.” Looking at Petra’s cheerful face, one could not help but smile.

Frederica: “I should not, I am…”

Putting her hand over her mouth, she restrained the laxness caused by Petra’s cuteness.

She admonished herself in order to maintain her dignity, both as a senior maid and as a surrogate older sister. Though Petra’s cuteness was a blow to her dignity, Frederica barely held her own at the water’s edge.

Petra’s pure eyes constantly tested Frederica’s inner strength.

For Frederica, who always strived for perfection, Petra was simultaneously her greatest enemy and greatest ally.

Petra: “Frederica nee-sama, did you hear me?”

Frederica: “Oh, uh, what was that? I am sorry; I was just a little distracted.”

Upon looking, it seemed that Petra was slightly puffed up, as Frederica had not heard some of what had been said. Such a situation was adorable, but telling her about it only would make her pout more.

Frederica said, “I am sorry,” apologizing,

Frederica: “So, what were you talking about?”

Petra: “So, I was telling you that the Master is terrible; if he was going to give Frederica nee-sama the day off, he should have told us earlier, not on the day of. Since then…”

Frederica: “Since then?”

Petra: “I would have prepared more for Frederica nee-sama.”

Everyone looked helpless in front of Petra, whose appa-red cheeks were puffed up in anger.

Petra’s anger was directed at Roswaal, the owner of the mansion who had granted Frederica a half-day off.

Roswaal was the object of animosity of most of the people in the mansion for a number of reasons, but Petra was the one that had the greatest amount of resentment.

As for Frederica, Roswaal was a man for whom she owed a debt of gratitude that words could not describe. Because of that relationship, Frederica would have liked to defend Roswaal—

Frederica: “The Master has blundered such that there is no excusing him…”

Even if a person was a great benefactor, some deeds were not worthy of being defended.

Roswaal’s actions had been just like that, and Frederica had given up on defusing Petra’s anger.

Although Frederica at least tried not to look too harshly upon the same incident.

Besides, because of those circumstances, Petra was now eager to complain about everything Roswaal did, from one thing to another, hence her anger.

Frederica: “But it was the Master who told me to go out with Garf. Petra, are you sure you are not appreciative of that?”

Petra: “Uh… but, but in the case of the Master, the deducted points from before are so much more than that.”

Frederica: “You are being stubborn. But I cannot change that, either.”

Unfortunately, she failed to correct the image of Roswaal within Petra. In that situation, it was debatable whether Petra was being stubborn or whether Roswaal’s deeds were that much of a stubborn stain.

—As previously mentioned, Roswaal’s granting of a half-day off to Frederica was abrupt. He also specified using that time off as time to be spent with Garfiel.

Frederica: “…The Master knows everything, doesn’t he?”

She muttered to herself only quietly, because Petra’s good look would disappear otherwise.

No doubt Petra, at least, would not be pleased with Frederica’s characterization of Roswaal as such.

With consideration for her newly formed sisterhood, Frederica placed her hand on her chest and closed her eyes.

There lay her true feelings. —To Frederica, Roswaal was a magician.

Not a magician as a mere profession or skill, but a “magician” in the sense that he was a special being that could do anything.

It seemed as if he knew everything and could anticipate everything. This was still the case even now that Emilia and the others had subverted his schemes involving the Sanctuary.

Because that was how Roswaal was, the reunion of the older sister and younger brother, which had happened at the time of the liberation of the Sanctuary, and the subsequent awkwardness of their relationship must have been well known to him.

In order to remain in the same camp going forward, it would be best to resolve that rift as soon as possible. She thought that must have been the true meaning for the half-day off.

Leaving Frederica's inner turmoil aside, Petra, despite her anger, was helping her get ready for the day.

Frederica did not have a lot of plain clothes, as she usually spent most of her time in her maid uniform. However, Petra transformed these few options by combining them and altering them in different ways, and as if by magic, Frederica became more and more colorful.

Petra: "Frederica nee-sama is tall and has long legs, so she looks wonderful no matter what she wears…"

Frederica: "It seems to me like Petra is a bit of a magician, too."

Petra: "I really don't want to share a job with the Master."

From Frederica's point of view, it was the highest form of praise, but Petra dismissed it with a smile.

Even though she felt sad, Petra's finished decorating Frederica with her "magic"—

Petra: "—It's finished. What great results."

Petra gazed at her finished work on Frederica, her eyes filled with a sense of accomplishment and admiration.

Frederica's eyes widened as she examined herself in the dressing mirror, basking in Petra's rapturous praise.

Unlike her usual maid outfit, her jacket and skirt were made of loose-fitting fabric, and her jewelry, while not gaudy, was somewhat ornate, and from top to bottom, she was finished in shades that complimented her blond hair and emerald green eyes.

With Frederica’s usual attire, this kind of outfit would not be the first thing that came to mind.

Petra: “Whew, that was satisfying. Let’s dress up Emilia-sama and the others together next time!”

Frederica: “Petra, Petra, you are changing the purpose of this.”

Petra: “Ah.”

Noticing her own excitement, Petra cupped her head as if to reflect. Frederica gazed with a smile at such a gesture, and once again turned her attention back to her appearance.

Despite only going out with her younger brother, she seemed to have put a good bit of enthusiasm into it.

Frederica: “It’s a great battle emotionally speaking, is it not?”

And then, taking a deep breath, Frederica brushed a hand through her long blonde hair.

4

—The mansion was named the New Roswaal Mansion, according to Natsuki Subaru.

The former mansion was burned down for various reasons, and due to that, the Emilia camp now resided in a different mansion.

Most importantly, this one had a much older history as a mansion. The burned one was a subsidiary residence of the Mathers family, while this one was the main residence of the Mathers family.

The size of the mansion was the same as the one that burned down, although this one was more convenient, due to the famous Industrial City of Costuul—One of the Five Great Cities of the Kingdom of Lugunica at its doorstep.

Since there was only one small village near the former mansion, she was told that it was inconvenient in many areas, such as buying necessities.

If so, it still remained a mystery as to why anyone would choose to settle in such a remote location…

Frederica: “You see, the Master is quite the eccentric, is he not?”

Garfiel: “Ain’t that sorta a wild conclusion, though?”

At Frederica’s answer, founded in Roswaal’s personality, Garfiel frowned. Even if the answer was correct, it was hardly what Garfiel wanted.

And then there’s the fact that, to begin with—

Garfiel: “My amazin’ self doesn’t want to listen to anythin’ else about that bastard Roswaal!”

Frederica: “…That is right. I am sorry; I will be more careful.”

Garfiel clicked his fangs in displeasure, and Frederica apologized with downcast eyes. The self-reflective look on his older sister’s face made Garfiel regret his ill-chosen words.

He didn’t know how to put it, but he was like this with his sister in all of his exchanges with her.

This awkwardness did not exist when he challenged the “Bowel Hunter” at the mansion in order to save their lives. However, as soon as he left that deadly battlefield, he didn’t know what to say.

When Frederica showed up at the meeting place in an outfit that was not her maid uniform, he was so surprised and bewildered that he was left speechless.

Garfiel: “Grrrr…”

Garfiel’s throat trembled as he realized this is what it meant to be thrown off.

Originally, Garfiel avoided having thoughts about Frederica as much as possible during their time apart. This was not out of dislike for his sister, but because he thought it would be pointless.

Garfiel was ready to stay in the sealed "Sanctuary," believing he would never see his sister again.

As a result of the collapse of his assumptions and the reunion with his sister, Garfiel was unsure of what to say to her. So consciously trying not to think about it had, in the end, backfired.

If this were Ram he was dealing with, there would be no shortage of topics to talk about because he is always thinking about her.

Presently, after getting stuck on the subject, topics of conversation such as Roswaal, whom they share in common as a subject, got brought up, and so on and on in a vicious circle like never before.

Garfiel: "…"

While Garfiel continued to agonize over this, Frederica was facing the same problem.

However, in her case, unlike Garfiel, she did not have a history of intentionally pushing her estranged brother out of her thoughts; on the contrary, she never forgot her family, even for a single moment.

Despite their distance, Garfiel and Ryuzu were irreplaceable family members to Frederica. Nothing had changed since their reunion.

Swiftly said, Frederica's problem seemed simple.

—There were so many things she wanted to talk about, but she didn't know what to talk about.

Sending Frederica's rather astute mind sinking, the various questions and answers she had prepared in advance of her reunion with her brother came up one after another in a flurry of questions and answers.

Frederica was bright, yet compassionate. Frankly, she wanted to know everything about Garfiel during their time apart, but was too afraid to go for it and ask questions that might put him off.

A family that finally reunited. What if a rift were to emerge with said family that would be unrelated to distance or time?

The thought of it made the hairs on Frederica's entire body stand on end. Her mind was so agitated that she was about to transform into a beast for no reason.

Frederica: "…"

The fact that she went out in a different outfit with Petra's help now seemed like a mistake. Not because of Petra, but because of Frederica's ever-present attitude.

Naturally, Garfiel was dressed in his usual attire, and Frederica was the only one dressed up. Perhaps it was this preparation that made Garfiel feel defensive.

Frederica: "Well, you see…"

Garfiel: "Well, uhhh…"

Their voices overlapped just as they were about to make up their minds and change the subject.

Frederica: "…"

They crushed each other's start and created a tenuous atmosphere where it became awkward to move.

Frederica: "Ga-, Garf, you should speak first."

Garfiel: "Well, Sis, I think it'd be better if ya said somethin' first."

And, when both parties began to yield the reins of the conversation to the other, the issue turned into a quagmire. Ultimately, both sides were unable to say anything, and silence once again fell between the two.

The two of them walked side by side for a while, awkwardly passing the time like that.

—The trip was uneventful, and the two were now in sight of the Industrial City of Costuul.

Frederica: "This town is always bustling, as usual."

The road from the mansion merged into a large highway along the way, and after giving way to a hastily moving dragon carriage, the Industrial City gently came into view in the distance.

Prided as the largest among Lugunica's Five Great Cities, not for nothing, Costuul had a population of nearly 100,000 residents and was a large city.

Naturally, with its vast area that corresponded to its population, and the various establishments and people that came and went to support it, it would be quite a spectacular sight to see the cityscape for the first time.

In short—

Garfiel: "Oh, ooh…"

Frederica: "Garf?"

Garfiel's emerald-green eyes, open wide, eagerly gazing at the city, was the ideal image of a countryside man who had come to the big city.

Garfiel: "W-, well, it's a lot different in person, ain't it? They say, "Gasock is bigger than it sounds.", don't they?"

Frederica: "An idiom with a very succinct thought. Well, before that, was this Garf's first visit to Costuul?"

Garfiel's unexpected response caught Frederica by surprise.

It had already been more than ten days since moving out of the Sanctuary and into the current mansion. During that time, Frederica had frequented Costuul numerous times. Of course, Frederica and Garfiel's roles at the mansion were different, hence the discrepancy between the two.

Garfiel gave Frederica an awkward look, and said, "What's wrong with that?",

Garfiel: "It couldn't be helped, ya know. I was busy scentin' up the mansion first, ya know. So I left lookin' around outside for later."

Frederica: “Placing a scent, that is…”

Frederica was taken aback by her brother’s sulky remark, and put her hands to her forehead.

Even though he did not know anything about the world outside of the Sanctuary, such behavior is indeed unacceptable, and could only be described as eccentric. For one, a lesson in outside common sense was in order.

Frederica: “It is alright, Garf. You are newly relocated from your old home now, and you have a lot to learn …A lot to… Oh, ooh, ooooh…!”

Garfiel: “Oh, Sis?! Are ya okay?! Ya sick?!”

Garfiel stared up in astonishment when Frederica stopped mid-speech and covered her face with both hands. Frederica groaned for a moment, then shook her head, saying, “N- no.”,

Frederica: “As I recall, ten years ago, when I first left the Sanctuary, I did exactly the same thing as you, Garf…”

Looking back on her actions, Frederica was struck by the shock coming a decade too late.

For Frederica, it was exactly ten years ago, but at that time, she, like Garfiel, exhibited a variety of eccentric behaviors due to the anxiety of being away from her hometown and her lack of common sense—Behaviors that now can only be described as eccentric.

In addition to putting their own scent all over the mansion, she often prowled around late in the night to check on her territory and to instill a hierarchical relationship with the animals living in the surrounding area; the list went on and on.

Frederica: “Well, at that time, Clind, who was the head servant, disciplined me to correct it, and…what a surprise. I had no idea that Garf and I were so much like sister and brother…”

Garfiel: “What’cha surprised about, course it’s normal for my amazin’ self and Sis to be like sister and brother…”

Garfiel scratched his head and sighed as Frederica quivered and trembled. However, Frederica looked up with a start when Garfiel said that to her.

Garfiel: “Sis?”

Frederica: “No… No, you are right. It is a matter of course. It is a normal thing for us to be like.”

Gently patting herself on the chest, Frederica smiled at Garfiel. Garfiel’s now seemingly obvious comment lightened the load on her chest.

Absolutely, her younger brother is right. —No matter how long they have been apart, no matter what they have talked about since their reunion, Frederica and Garfiel were still siblings.

There was nothing to be excessively fearful of.

Frederica: “Hehehe, thanks to you, I am unburdened. Well done, Garf.”

Garfiel: “…Just when I thought ya were going all “Oooh” and “Aaah” and stuff, ya suddenly look all relaxed, th’ hell’s going on with ya? Sis, did ya start goin’ all senile like granny t-…Gkh!”

Frederica: “That was a few too many words, you said. No, it is more than a few extra abusive words when you take into account that outburst against your grandmother. You should reflect on that.”

Garfiel: “Y-Ya don’t have to hit me over it, ya know…”

Garfiel looked at Frederica with a grim look in his eyes after taking a fist to the top of his head. Frederica smiled, covering her mouth, laughing, and then turned her attention to the cityscape of Costuul.

Frederica: “Come on, let us go. We do not have that much time. We have come all the way here as siblings, so we have to enjoy ourselves in our own way.”

And so, accompanied by his elated sister, Garfiel's tour of Costuul began.

However, in terms of tourism, none of the Five Great Cities had as few attractions as Costuul.

Frederica: "Costuul is a key industrial center for the kingdom, which is why there are fewer recreational things to do in the city, which is preferable for me, but…"

Frederica, who had comparatively more experience with Costuul than Garfiel, described the city. The tepidness of her explanation indicated that she was concerned that she might bore Garfiel with a lack of novelty.

But—

Garfiel: "Hey, hey, Sis. What's that big box over there?"

With wide emerald eyes, Garfiel pulled on Frederica's sleeve, enjoying the city to the fullest.

Frederica sighed with relief at the sight of her brother, inquisitive and simply fond of big, squarish things.

Frederica: "Calm down, Garf, not only that one over there, but all the factories throughout the area use Magicreation Tools."

Garfiel: "Magicreation Tools, huh?"

Garfiel tilted his head and clicked his fangs at the unfamiliar words. Frederica, pleased by Garfiel's reaction, asked, "Now listen, okay?". Frederica, pleased with the reaction, held up a finger and began to elaborate.

—"Magicreation Tools" were the most important secret that supported the Industrial City of Costuul.

Garfiel called it a "big box," but Costuul had a wide variety of Magicreation Tools, each of which has its own function in relation to the products it manufactures.

Frederica does not know the details of how the device works, but its power source was a magic stone; it was a complex and bizarre assembly of iron and wood that does the job faster and more accurately than manual labor.

Frederica: “The city of Costuul was one of the first to incorporate the Magicreation Tools system into its work, and it has expanded and become one of the Five Great Cities. Unlike the other four cities, it is a rare place that is recognized for its new ways of being rather than its old ways.”

Garfiel: “Wow, that’s amazin’.”

Frederica: “Of course it is, of course, it is.”

Garfiel: “…Why is Sis so proud about this?”

Upon explaining the origins of the city, Frederica seemed pleased with herself, to which Garfiel looked annoyed. Frederica continued, “Actually,” in response to Garfiel,

Frederica: “Now, Garf has acknowledged Magicreation Tools as an amazing achievement… but what if I told you that the master’s own Mathers family were involved in the creation of Magicreation Tools?”

Garfiel: “…”

Frederica: “Oh, my dear, what a grim face… it is not the Master himself, but rather his father, you know?”

Garfiel: “Don’t talk about anythin’ that has to do with that bastard Roswaal.”

Having been explained plainly, Frederica fell silent with a sour look on her face. It was a failure.

Garfiel sighed grimly, but the fact remained. The Industrial City of Costuul was supported by Magicreation Tools, the achievement of Roswaal’s predecessor.

Roswaal K. Mathers, the previous head of the family, was a great benefactor to Costuul. That was why the Mathers family's main mansion is located so close to the city.

Frederica: "Technically, I guess you could say that he made the city that was near his main mansion flourish…"

One would like to think that even Roswaal's predecessors would not have foreseen this far into the future, but the Mathers family is so unfathomable that one can hardly be so sure.

Anyways—

Frederica: "If you are interested, Garf, why don't we take a tour of the area?"

Frederica suggested this to Garfiel, who was repeatedly glancing at the factory and itching to see it. Garfiel responded, "Oh!" as his eyes lit up.

Garfiel: "Oh, but 's y'know."

Frederica: "What now? You sound pathetic and unmanly. Are you so offended when the products are connected to the Master?"

Garfiel: "That's one of the reasons, but it ain't the only one. But if my amazin' self does whatever I want, Sis is gonna be bored."

Frederica: "…"

Frederica choked up at Garfiel, scratching his cheek with one finger.

It was an entirely out-of-place concern. If he could extend that consideration naturally to everyone, even Ram would show a bit more interest.

Frederica: "…No, that is not possible. That girl is an iron wall. A pity."

Garfiel: "Wait, wait, wait, why are ya suddenly starting to pity my amazin' self, Sis? I won't be satisfied with something like "The distance between Picqitt, and the moon is unbridgeable."."

Frederica: “It is nothing. Besides, your concern is unnecessary, Garf.”

Garfiel: “Ah?”

Frederica: “I was the one who invited you today, Garf. That would be better if this were our last opportunity, though it probably is not, right? …then it is best that you enjoy it.”

It was not like it was back then when they wanted to, but didn’t have the opportunity. There was a decade-long rift in the relationship between Frederica and Garfiel, but now there were no obstacles in the way of bridging the gap.

Thinking about it that way, it was no trouble for her to spend the whole day today for her younger brother’s sake.

Garfiel: “…Thanks.”

Frederica: “You are very welcome.”

Frederica’s hesitation was fleeting, and upon Garfiel’s honest thanks, Frederica responded with few words.

As it was, the pair’s legs walked to one of the factories they could see.

Frederica: “It looks like this is where they are processing magic ore.”

As they approached the factory, they could see the full extent of the large-scale Magicreation Tools, visible from a distance.

Piles of magic ore surrounded the Magicreation Tools, and a faint scent of mana tickled their nostrils.

The effect of the crystallized mana-bearing ore became more acute when the ore was processed. It can then be used for various purposes, such as ornamental items or as a crystal lamp.

This factory appeared to be another factory specializing in the processing of such magic ores.

Frederica: “If there is a staff member present, we can speak to them…”

Garfiel: “— Sis.”

Frederica: “Garf?”

While Frederica’s eyes wandered around, looking for someone, Garfiel suddenly stopped her with a low voice. When she turned around to see what was the matter, Garfiel’s gaze was directed toward the rear of the factory.

Frederica turned her gaze in the same direction and saw a strange and mysterious figure.

Frederica: “—Huh?”

An unexpected sight caused a feeble voice to escape Frederica’s throat. This was completely unexpected, a surprise from something that came from beyond her thoughts.

It was an existence that could only be described as a strange “object.”

It was about the size of a dog at most, appearing to be in a low, hunched posture like an animal. However, its entire body was covered with shiny, hard skin, the color of which shimmered in an unnatural manner. It was a strange “object” that seemed to be covered with coils of flames and water.

Frederica: “That is…”

At first glance, it appeared to be an ornamental object made with a sensibility that was hard to comprehend. That is, if it were not wriggling.

That is, if it did not turn toward them, what seemed to be its light.

And then—

Garfiel: “You…”

The moment Garfiel tried to take a step forward, a wind occurred.

A sharp, life-threatening wind struck Garfiel and Frederica.

6

Without even waiting to see how it would react, Garfiel snapped his fangs at the attacker.

Before his eyes, the identity and intentions of the other party were unclear. However, it was nice to know that its intention could be easily understood. Hostility for hostility, just like "Yakkgaran's reversed day and night."

Garfiel: "So, if you're goin' for it, I ain't going to give ya any quarter."

Garfiel said this as he deflected the blade of wind that came from directly in front of him.

The magic also had intensity; the magic of a skilled mage was denser. If that was expressed in terms of the quality of magic, the quality of this blade of wind was very close to the worst.

Since the most recent Wind magic he saw was Ram's, the difference between them was even greater with consideration of his favoritism.

And, finishing his evaluation of the situation instantly, Garfiel lightly tapped the ground with his toes. The impact that was released from his toes was used to deliver a blow through the "Divine Protection of Earth Spirits," hitting his opponent.

Garfiel: "…"

The entity, which was more like a mass of glowing objects as opposed to a cluster of glowing lights, was shattered by the impact.

There was a high-pitched sound of stones breaking, but it was not the death cry of it itself. While some animals do not have vocal organs to make sounds, this felt different.

First, it was too fragile. Though it was of poor quality, for an entity capable of wielding magic to have this sort of durability…

Garfiel: “You’re an inconsistent one, ya bastard!”

Thinking it was aiming for something, Garfiel took one more step forward.

The “Divine Protection of Earth Spirits” blow could not be aimed very precisely. By its nature, the blessing’s basic principle was that it drew mana from the earth and transformed it into vitality for the user.

Garfiel reversed this basic principle by sending force into the earth rather than drawing it up, thereby reversing the flow, and causing the ground to cave in or rise up.

Divine Protections are not magic, and the sensation could not be explained to those who do not possess the same Divine Protection. The results that occur resemble magic, but unlike magic, there was no way to convey them. It is like the process of breathing.

He never thought that his unknown opponent would be so fragile that he could be crushed by the effort of a mere breath. And, Garfiel’s theory was correct.

Frederica: “Garf!”

Frederica, now standing two steps behind him, shouted, and the hairs on the back of Garfiel’s neck stood on end.

He did not take his eyes away from it. The “object” that was shattered by the blow was still there in front of them. And yet, Frederica’s cry suggests a different story.

—A strange “object” rained down from above the roof onto Garfiel’s head.

Garfiel: “Hah!”

With a sharp exhale, Garfiel clasps his palms together powerfully above his head. The “object” that had just fallen between the palms was hit and shattered, its physical durability immediately overwhelmed.

As the shimmering debris dispersed, his palm felt a rough sensation. Feeling as if he had crushed a lump of sand, Garfiel wrinkled his nose and kicked away the ensuing flames and wind.

Garfiel: "…"

As with the first wind blade, there was a resurgence of wind and a confluence of flames.

However, both were still of low-quality magic and were easily overcome by Garfiel's physical counterattacks. Of course, while this level of threat was nothing to be concerned about—.

Garfiel: "Damn, there's so many of them, it's "Heeromedoi's Brute force.""

Grumbling, Garfiel sniffed; there was an alien smell that slowly crept into his olfactory senses. It was not a bad smell, but it was at the same time a fishy and iron-rust sensation.

Although it was only a rough estimation, he could sense that there are more than a dozen of these "objects" similar to the two that he had just seen.

Frederica: "Garf, what do we do?"

Raising her voice, Frederica quickly countered one of them with her bare hands. With a single blow, with only using her transformed wrists, her ability to switch instantly was quicker than Garfiel's.

However, once he saw Frederica's cuffs were torn as she did so,

Garfiel: "Tsk."

With a click of the tongue, Garfiel glared at the dangerous "objects" that surrounded them.

Although he and Frederica could probably wipe them out without so much struggle, Garfiel: “I’ve got no more reason to go at’cha bastards for too long. No…”

Rather, the opposite was true.

Garfiel: “I’m gonna blow ya to bits right now, ya bastards!”

Frederica: “—Hk! Garf, please wait! Doing that here would be…”

Blood boiling in his head, Garfiel swung his leg over his head with a mighty swing. Just before his foot fell, Frederica shouted to stop him, but it was too late.

As the force of the attack hit the ground, an overflow of power permeated the earth through Garfiel’s heels, and “objects” in various parts of the factory were struck from directly below——The next moment, the factory building itself crumbled as if it had experienced a massive explosion.

“…”

7

???: “I have a clear understanding of the events that took place. I also know that it was a difficult situation that required extremely difficult decisions.”

Their hands were laced on an ebony desk, and their stern voices and expressions looked at them directly. Their gaze gave her the illusion of physical weight, and so Frederica was hurriedly bowing her head.

Frederica: “Yes, I am very sorry… and see, Garf too!”

Garfiel: “Oh! Ow, ow! Sorry, I know it’s my fault…”

Tugging on Garfiel’s ear next to her, she made him express the same apologetic gesture as she did. Although the gesture was not polite, Garfiel was sorry in his own way, and it was probably true.

The question was whether or not he will be able to convey his remorse to the other party, however—

???: “I accept your apology.”

Frederica: “…Re-, really, you accept it?”

???: “Why such a need for validation?”

Frederica: “It is…”

Frederica muddled her words as she looked at the other person’s face. This was not polite, but with this man on the other end of the line, it was not surprising.

After all, this person’s expression never varied from when Frederica and Garfiel entered the room until now. It was a quality of a politician not to let his expression be read, but he was too thorough.

The owner of these steely-looking features was Leno Rex. —He was the mayor of the Industrial City of Costuul, one of the Five Great Cities in the Kingdom of Lugunica.

Long story short, he was the most powerful person in Costuul and was also responsible for the magical ore processing plant and other facilities that Frederica and Garfiel had unceremoniously blown up.

—Frederica and Garfiel’s outing took a dramatic turn when they were attacked by strange “objects” at a factory they were visiting for a tour of the Magicreation Tools, resulting in a massive explosion.

Naturally, Frederica and Garfiel were unable to leave without being taken into custody by the responding guards, leading up to the present situation.

Leno: “About those strange “objects” you have come across…”

Frederica: “Well, you may not believe us, but, they did exist, okay? But we could not just let them attack us without a fight, so we struck back…”

As a result, the “objects” were destroyed, and the evidence was lost and scattered. However, Frederica was still uncertain as to what the objects were, unable to find the right words to describe them.

At this point, she didn't want to sound like she made up an excuse on the spot to get out of the situation, but—

Leno: "No need to worry; we have confirmed their presence here as well. We are currently having a difficult time with the "Lightbugs.""

Frederica: "Lightbug, is it?"

Leno: "They are called that for convenience."

In answer to Frederica's question, Leno wrinkled his brow. This was the first time he has changed his facial expression since their arrival, but the change, causing his already stern face to appear even sterner, was unwelcome.

Leno tapped his fingers on the desk, and looking into Frederica and Garfiel's faces,

Leno: "Those of you who are involved with Margrave Mathers know how this city has developed. It is now called one of the Five Great Cities in the nation, and I have been appointed as city mayor, among other things, although I am not as qualified as I should be…"

Garfiel: "Yeah, it's only gotten bigger in the last few decades, hasn't it? Sis told me that. So?"

Leno: "Behind that rapid development, the existence of those Lightbugs has been confirmed time and again. This is a largely unknown fact to the outside world."

Garfiel: "…"

Leno: "Curiously, I have never heard of any sightings of Lightbugs in other cities. The Lightbug has thus been considered an anomaly, existing only in the soil of Costuul."

Frederica frowned with her shapely eyebrows as she listened to Leno's explanation.

There were always problems that come with every place.

The existence of the Sanctuary, with its barrier and tomb, was a prime example of this.

As Leno told them, this was the first time Frederica had heard about Costuul's Lightbug. It was a topic that has been handled with such scrutiny and so much thought, she realized.

Why did he confide such an important issue to Frederica and Garfiel?

Frederica: "Leno-sama?"

Leno: "I regret my inability on this matter, but I would like to ask Margrave Mathers to help with this. Right now, the city is experiencing an unprecedented outbreak of Lightbugs, which is disrupting the operation of the factories."

Frederica: "Disrupting the operation… Ah."

Frederica placed her hand over her mouth at Leno's plea, without changing her complexion or tone of voice.

The factory where Frederica and the others were attacked by the "object"—A Lightbug, was unoccupied. However, Frederica and Garfiel were curious about the tools that had been left abandoned, obviously in the process of being worked on, and the magical ore scattered about.

That was probably the result of the Lightbugs occurring during the operations and forcing them to evacuate.

Garfiel: "What's the point of talkin' to that bastard Roswaal?"

Frederica's contemplation aside, Garfiel's voice unapologetically cut in when Roswaal's name was mentioned.

For a beat, Leno pondered the relationship between Garfiel and Roswaal, but quickly snapped out of its stagnation, taking a breath with a "Hmm", Leno: “I thought Margrave Mathers would have wisdom on how to solve the problem. You all must have thought that Lightbug’s ecology was strange as well.”

Frederica: “Although they were weak, they did have the ability to use magic.”

Leno: “Up until now, we have only had minor injuries, however, if we have serious injuries… much less, if deaths begin happening, it will be too late. The Margrave is also no stranger to Costuul’s problems.”

Frederica took in the strong language of the city’s safety, swallowing her words.

In fact, Roswaal’s title was “Margrave of the West,” and the Industrial City of Costuul was also located in a location that in a broad sense would be managed by Roswaal.

Damage to Costuul could call into question the Margrave’s ability to do more than merely collect taxes, of course.

That could be a fatal blunder as the sponsor of Emilia’s participation in the Royal Selection.

Frederica: “It is one problem after another, so busy with it all indeed…”

Leno: “Wherever you are, peace does not last. It only makes a difference if things happen in the city or in the kitchen. That is what my wife tells me.”

Frederica: “Ara, that is an excellent point.”

Frederica’s lips relaxed slightly at the jest, which felt quite unlike him.

Regardless, the appeal certainly needed to be shared with Roswaal. Although the outing with Garfiel would have been a letdown, the priority was work.

So, Frederica, hiding a slight disappointment, called out “Garf” next to her,

Frederica: “Garf, you heard him. As for today, let us report to the Master at…”

Garfiel: “Nah, don’t think so.”

Garfiel simply shook his head at the request. Frederica sighed at his attitude.

Garfiel’s dislike of Roswaal was very serious, but this was a situation where issues of like and dislike must be put aside.

Frederica: “Garf, please do not make this personal. This is an important matter for Costuul.”

Garfiel: “It’s not that I don’t wanna do it because the bastard pisses me off. I’m talkin’ about the fact that he can’t just come over and fix it right now.”

Having said that, Garfiel got up from the couch. Turning his gaze to the far end of the city mayor’s office, Garfiel then,

Garfiel: “It’s here.”

He snorted.

Garfiel: “…”

Immediately afterward, Garfiel’s gaze turned to where something unusual was happening. Near the wall, a bookshelf filled with books shook violently, and something slid out from behind it.

Without hesitation, it tried to jump toward the window of the room. However—

Garfiel: “I’m not gonna let ya get away!”

Garfiel stepped in with a roar, his fist slamming into the foreign object that traveled up the wall. The impact excessively exceeded its durability, and the sound produced by the light and the shattering of the wall rippled through the room.

Leno: “That just now was…”

Frederica: “A Lightbug.”

The shattered entity sparkled and dispersed under Garfiel’s blow. Seeing this, the voices of Leno and Frederica overlapped in turn.

Frederica saw that it was the exact same as the Lightbugs that they encountered at the magic ore processing plant.

Frederica: “The wall aside, …Leno-sama, are Lightbugs all over the city?!”

Leno: “Negative. At the very least, the instances of finding them were limited to the area around the factories. Even on the rare occasions when they went out into the city, they were never found in City Hall.”

Garfiel: “No way. Did they follow us?”

Garfiel’s eyes narrowed as he picked up a piece of the smashed Lightbug.

There is no doubt that Garfiel’s mutterings were the most plausible theory at the moment; it was more realistic to say they were following them from the processing plant than that the Lightbugs were lurking everywhere.

Frederica: “But what is the purpose of this? The Lightbug’s proclivities, perhaps?”

Garfiel: “They suddenly attacked my amazin’ self and Sis, ya know? That kinda thinkin’ isn’t something my amazin’ self would expect at all.”

Frederica: “Ga-, Garf, you are smart enough to…”

Aside from his usual apprehensions, Garfiel’s intuition when it came to fighting was sharp. And, Frederica had no hesitation in following Garfiel’s instincts.

In this situation, the Lightbugs tracked Frederica and Garfiel to the City Hall—.

Leno: “Definitely, to overhear what was said…”

Garfiel: “This is proof that someone is controllin’ these insect things.”

Leno: “Impossible. As I said, The Lightbugs have been around since this city began to be developed.”

At the conclusion, Leno stood up and waited. Indeed, if his testimony was true, this Lightbug-controlling entity has been involved since their outbreak.

The aim of their efforts, the nature of Lightbugs, and everything else remained unclear.

Frederica: “…Hk.”

Within the line of sight of Frederica, who swallowed spit, a crack appeared in the city mayor’s office wall. It was not the effect of Garfiel’s blow, but a deliberately inflicted destructive force.

Besides, the destruction was not only on one of the walls, but extended to all four walls—No, even to the floor and ceiling. In other words, fine fissures were appearing all over the City Hall.

Garfiel: “They’re crystal fuckin’ clear!”

Garfiel, with a twinkle in his eye, howled when he realized it was an enemy attack.

With that, while coming to the same conclusion as her younger brother, Frederica looked back to Leno.

But, in the midst of a rapidly changing situation, priorities should be carefully examined, and,

Frederica: “Leno-sama! How many people are in City Hall now?”

Leno: “—. Twelve.”

Understanding the meaning of Frederica’s question, Leno instantly arrived at the answer.

In response, Frederica shouted, “Garf!”.

Frederica: “Please break a hole in the floor! I am going out!”

Garfiel: “Tsk!”

As soon as he was told, Garfiel immediately stomped the floor. At the same time, Frederica leapt to Leno, carrying the large man easily and launching him backward into the window.

With a high-pitched crash, Frederica shattered the window, falling with Leno to the ground below.

Leno: “…”

Even in this predicament, Leno’s tenacity to not let out a single scream was remarkable.

The city mayor’s office is on the third floor of City Hall, a height that Frederica could easily land from. But that would not be the case for ordinary people.

So—

Garfiel: “Sis, let’s go!”

Frederica: “I understand!”

With an aggressive voice, Garfiel signaled to Frederica.

In response, the windows of the second floor of the City Hall broke one after another in front of Frederica.

It was the City Hall employees being thrown out of the building with a mighty crash that was the cause of it.

Frederica: “…Hk!”

Frederica caught them falling, blue in the face and screaming, just outside. She rescued one and immediately lowered them to the ground to rescue the next.

Eight times in a row, and after more than half the number of people Leno had mentioned had been successfully rescued,

Frederica: “The building is…”

The first signs of its collapse completely spread throughout the building, causing the City Hall to collapse in front of Frederica. A plume of smoke and shock surged through the air, while Frederica’s blonde hair fluttered wildly, her eyes straining to see.

The four missing staff members and Garfiel, all of them now lying on the ground, are speechless.

Such a long, uncomfortable silence, and—

Garfiel: “Bha!”

And then, one figure broke through the plume of smoke and leapt out with great force.

—No, there was only one figure, but the figure had one person in their right hand, one in their left, one on their back, and one in their mouth.

Frederica: “Garf! Are you all right?!”

Garfiel: “Kaa-pfft! Who the hell do ya think my amazin’ self is? Well, for a moment, it looked like we weren’t gonna make it out in time, but…”

Garfiel answered by lowering the four people he helped onto the ground and turning them around by their shoulders, feeling relieved that there was no sign of injury other than black smudges on their faces from the fumes.

However—

Frederica: “Surely a collapse this large is not a coincidence, is it?”

Garfiel: “Right? This means we found out somethin’ inconvenient to ‘em, and they want to keep us quiet.”

Frederica shuddered as Garfiel looked behind him at the wreckage of City Hall, muttering to himself.

It was unexpected that a half-day vacation together with siblings would turn out to be entangled in such a situation.

Leno: “Thank you all for your help. On behalf of the staff, I thank you as well.”

Then Leno, who was also involved in the same devastation, approached. Leno thanked them, but having already fixed his clothes, his composure did not match that of the victims in this disaster.

Leno: “I was particularly amazed at the way you carried yourself. I admire it greatly.”

Garfiel: “Oh, oh, so ya are. Ya know, I’m kinda losin’ my groove, but we don’t have time to talk about this.”

Leno: “Indeed. —This is a clear attack on the city.”

The tone of his voice dropped a degree, and Leno clearly recognized the current situation with his words.

An attack on the city. —The attack was aimed at City Hall, the hub of the city, and the city’s mayor. It was definitely a situation that needed to be recognized as such.

Frederica: “The perpetrator is manipulating the Lightbugs and plunging the city into chaos. Though their aims are unknown…”

Garfiel: “Our amazin’ selves have noticed.”

Frederica: “And, the other party must have realized that we have noticed. The situation is not in our favor.”

Unexpected and unanticipated interactions may be mutual, but there was a difference in the level of preparation that has been built up to that point. By nature, a battle depended on preparation before it even began.

The mindset of the one who was not prepared to be hit was different from that of the one who was prepared to be hit.

The situation proceeded as if to support the conclusions of Frederica and the others.

Frederica: "…"

People from all over the city rushed to the collapsed City Hall to see what had happened. Amidst all this, a roar was heard in the opposite direction of City Hall— The area where the factories were located.

For the second time today, there was a roar in the area where Garfiel caused the explosion. Frederica's emerald-green eyes widened as she turned to see what had caused it.

Frederica: "—Hk, that is-!"

Surprise escaped her lips as a tower of light shot up in Frederica's gaze.

A spire of light, decorated with complex and bizarre patterns, shimmering with non-uniform colors over its entirety— The sight of its surface writhing in the distance was a frightening realization that it was not a tower at all.

That was a collection of Lightbugs.

They gathered together at a tremendous rate and formed a tower of light.

Frederica: "This is a terrible day off…!"

Garfiel: "Damn… I knew it; goin' out of the forest would be no good!"

Frederica and Garfiel's respective lamenting voices overlap, echoing up into the sky.

—The Industrial City of Costuul, and the day off of the demi-human siblings, was swept away by a shimmering malice.

8

The appearance of the shimmering Lightbugs shattered the peace and quiet of the Industrial City of Costuul.

Starting with an explosion in the factory district, followed by the collapse of City Hall, and then finally an outbreak of light in the factory district again—all of these were the work of a mysterious creature called the Lightbug.

Garfiel: “Tsk! Ya lookin’ down on me…!”

The Lightbugs, clustered together, became spires of geometric hues of light, and Garfiel clicked his fangs and howled as many of the city’s residents were shaken by their presence.

He had just rescued about ten people from a collapsed building. However, the determination throughout his body had not waned; he remained determined.

With a beastly expression, he was about to run toward the swarm of Lightbugs, his fangs bared.

Frederica: “Please wait, Garf!”

However, it was Frederica who stopped Garfiel from rushing in with a raised voice.

She looked to her younger brother, whose nose was scrunched up, and pleaded with him as she tended to an injured City Hall employee who was caught up in the collapsed building.

Frederica: “The priority is providing aid to people. Garf, your healing magic should be up to the task.”

Garfiel: “What’cha ya sayin’? There’s that damn huge thing goin’ crazy right in front of us. If we just beat it up…”

Frederica: “For the moment, there is more harm being done. Do you not sense it, Garf?”

Frederica gave a scathing look and sniffed at Garfiel, who pointed at his enemy and insisted. At his sister’s rebuke, Garfiel snorted and clicked his tongue likewise.

Garfiel and Frederica, siblings with mixed beastman blood, had five keen senses. Among them, their sense of smell was unparalleled to that of humans, and even in this situation, they were able to distinguish various odors.

The sudden appearance of the Lightbugs and the ensuing chaos, with no small amount of it, the smell of blood—

Frederica: “It is proof that the number of wounded is increasing, even if we could eliminate the Lightbugs…”

Garfiel: “There’s no point, is what’cha mean? …Shit, so what should I do then?!”

Frederica: “—. Very well done, Garf.”

Frederica smiled at Garfiel, who was receptive to her opinion on the matter, and was ready to give priority to providing aid. Then, she once again turned her emerald eyes to the Lightbugs in the distance—the huge Lightbug.

Frederica: “…”

A colossal Lightbug, like a tower of light, appeared in the center of the factory district. However, at least at the moment, there was no indication that the large Lightbug had begun to destroy anything. Although the combat power of the smaller Lightbugs encountered earlier at the factory were not significant, one cannot be optimistic about the behavior of an enemy of this size.

Based on what was overheard in the conversation at City Hall, it was certain that there was a master who was controlling the Lightbugs. Their aim was unknown, but it would be convenient if they had no intention of mobilizing the Lightbugs right now.

With this in mind, Frederica called out “Leno-sama,” to the tall City

Mayor who stood by her side.

Frederica: “Please send an evacuation order for the factory district and send relief to those who are injured. Fortunately, there is no sign of movement from the Lightbugs. Collect the injured without provoking them and gather them in one place for treatment. Garf… my brother should be able to help you there.”

Leno: “Agreed. Our first priority is to avoid casualties.”

Frederica’s prompt and efficient instructions were followed without hesitation by Leno Rex, who was always ready to listen to the opinions of others, instead of sitting on the laurels of his position as the city’s mayor. These were the qualities of a politician. As one would expect from a man who was in charge of one of the Five Great Cities, he was an outstanding person.

As Frederica was impressed, Leno looked up and said, “But,” staring at the Lightbugs from a distance.

Leno: “Your younger brother is correct; we cannot leave that thing alone. We need to send a strike team immediately to…”

Frederica: “—I would not worry about that.”

Leno: “Wha-”

The next moment, Leno’s expression, which had seemed to have never been upset, slightly tightened. Frederica saw this out of the corner of her eye and felt a slight euphoria, though it was not quite enough to compensate for the grief she was causing Petra.

Leno: “…”

Leno’s cheeks hardened, and standing on the grass in front of his gaze was a four-legged beast with a beautiful golden coat of fur.

Her appearance was similar to that of a leopard, with emerald eyes, sharp fangs, and a commanding face that somehow hinted at intelligence and grace. With its elegant physique, it was a golden female leopard that even brought an out-of-place feeling of excitement.

In terms of sudden appearances, it was as abrupt as the Lightbugs. But unlike the Lightbugs, the source of the leopard was clear. —If one looked at the scattered clothes under her feet.

Leno: “Frederica-sama’s Beastification?”

Frederica: “This is an emergency situation, so please do not be offended by the vulgarity of my behavior. —I will return to the mansion and inform the master.”

Leno: “It would be reassuring if Margrave Mathers could come.”

Once the initial shock had passed, Leno acclimatized very quickly. He immediately affirmed Frederica’s decision and turned to the surrounding personnel.

Leno: “I know you are all in a state of confusion and turmoil. However, every second counts. Every second here is worth a human life, so please follow my instructions.”

Everyone: “…”

At Leno’s calm command, the personnel looked up. Then, a moment after, they nodded from wherever they were, stood up, and began to move to deal with the disturbance.

They were highly trained. —No, it was a difference in consciousness, or so it felt when they were only Leno’s subordinates.

Frederica: “Garf, please comply with Leno-sama in case of an emergency…”

Garfiel: “Make yer own decisions, right? I ain’t a little kid, I know what I’m doin’.”

Frederica: “No matter how much time has passed, you will always be a kid to me.”

At the words of his older sister, in her leopard form, Garfiel clicked his tongue in a sulky manner. Frederica’s four paws kicked the ground as she gazed on with a ferocious grin. A moment later, her figure shifted into a golden wind.

The beastified Frederica ran so fast that it seemed as if it were an illusion.

Garfiel: “With Sis like that, it won’t take long for that bastard Roswaal to get the message. Our amazin’ selves are…”

Leno: “Let us move forward with the same dedication as that of Frederica-sama. Evacuate the people from the factory district, treat the wounded, and prevent the damage from spreading. Can we count on your healing magic?”

Garfiel: “Ha! “Getten’s net-work”, Who’da ya think you’re talkin’ to?”

Garfiel responded to Leno’s confirmation with gnashed teeth and looked behind him.

What was the purpose of the huge Lightbug, unmoving at the end of his gaze?

Garfiel: “…I don’t like the idea of bein’ left behind, Sis.”

9

Kicking the ground with her four beastly legs, bathed in a fierce wind, Frederica felt euphoric.

Even though she knew that it was not the time for this, she could not stop herself from being excited. Perhaps it was the delight of the beastman blood that flowed within her.

She had never spoken with another beastman or half-beastman before, wondering if they had ever questioned their own existence. —In her own heart, there was endless self-questioning.

So, which of these two forms was truly who she was?

Frederica: “…”

She could not say.

Beastification itself was a special kind of transformation that only those who were half-beastman possessed. It invoked the blood that flowed within oneself, and one abandoned one's human body and underwent a complete metamorphosis into the body of a beast.

Just as Frederica became a leopard, Garfiel had the power to transform into a tiger. There were more than a few half-beasts in the world with similar powers.

What did they think? Did they not wonder? If the real her was the one that stood on two legs, then what was the true nature of this feeling of liberation and euphoria when she became a beast?

Was it not because she was so constrained by her normal self that she felt liberated at the moment she became a beast? If so, was her true self a person or a beast?

Frederica: "If it were Garf, he would not even have these worries…"

Frederica's beastly mouth drew a wry smile at the thought of her younger brother.

That was not to say that Garfiel was reckless and simple-minded. He was surprisingly sensitive, timid, and a real handful.

The fact that he sacrificed himself for more than a decade to preserve the Sanctuary spoke for itself.

So the reason Garfiel did not have the same doubts as Frederica was that for him, the root of Frederica's problems was trivial. They were undeniably siblings by blood, yet Frederica and Garfiel's personal circumstances are different.

However, she had no intention of going out of her way to talk to her brother about this particular issue.

Frederica: "—Far too many distracting thoughts. Right now, my top priority is to inform the Master as soon as possible."

Shaking her head lightly, Frederica concentrated on the speed at which she ran.

Frederica's speed, like a golden wind, reduced a ten-minute walk to less than a minute, which, considering the distance from Costuul to the Roswaal mansion, was more than enough for a round-trip.

Despite these jumbled thoughts, her speed was unhindered, and her judgment was not wrong.

—But only if things were limited to the chaos in Costuul caused by the proliferation of the Lightbugs.

Frederica: "…"

The moment her forelegs stepped onto the ground, Frederica's nose caught the scent of hostility.

It was not instinctive, but more like a genuine, well-crafted intent to harm. With a single swoop, it came at Frederica's legs, which kicked the ground. A split-second decision had been made.

She slammed her paws into the dirt, sending up a cloud of dust, and changed directions. Flying sideways while maintaining her speed, the female leopard evaded the threat that was closing in on her. However—

???: "—That's nice, tomboy. I'm also fond of teaching some manners to people like ya."

Frederica: "—hk."

The speed with which the enemy was moving was effortlessly catching up to Frederica, who was now leaping to the side at high speed. Frederica stiffened at the sound of a man's voice whispering in her ear and swung her claws.

Without mercy, she would gouge her opponent's face with a blow that would leave claw marks on even the thickest steel plate. The front leg was swung with tremendous force, but was stopped before it could strike her enemy directly.

Then, a powerful kick to Frederica's exposed torso sent her into a silent fit of agony.

Frederica: “—hk!”

Spittle flew out of her mouth, as Friederica let out a pained cry at the tremendous force knocking her sideways.

Although the durability of beastmen was extraordinarily high, even among demi-humans, it was not so much the case for Frederica. Even taking this into account, the power of that blow was still unbelievable.

???: “Normally, I’d just tear off a limb or two here, but my client insisted, ya see? They ordered me to do no more damage than necessary. So, about that…”

Frederica: “Kugh…”

???: “Would ya mind putting up a little more of a fight? If ya resist, I can make the case that I hurt ya to make ya behave. —Well, by the looks of it, that’s not gonna happen.”

The man with a ferocious demeanor looked down upon Frederica, who was panting in agony, and laughed brazenly. He had dull golden hair tied into a knot at the back and wild-looking facial hair.

No further information could be gleaned by Frederica in the spur of the moment—

???: “You should sleep for now. Chances are, you’ll be happier if ya don’t wake up.”

Such were the man’s last words before Frederica’s consciousness faded.

10

—The change in the huge Lightbug’s movement conveniently came when the treatment of the severely injured was over.

Garfiel: “—hk, What the?”

Wiping his bloody fingers with his waistband, Garfiel looked up and wrinkled his nose.

This was right after he followed Leno's directions and applied healing magic to every single one of the gathered wounded.

The workload would have made a conventional mage dizzy, but Garfiel still felt strong. This was thanks to Garfiel's Divine Protection of Earth Spirits.

As long as Garfiel's feet were in contact with the earth, the power of his Divine Protection allowed him to draw upon the earth's vitality — or in other words, mana. Of course, that amount also had its limit, but it was far more than the ordinary person; it had reached a point in which it was possible for him to make frequent use of his mana. In Subaru's words, "It's like a spare tank of gas".

At any rate, Garfiel, who was hardly affected by the use of healing magic due to this blessing, saw movement in the huge Lightbug at the edge of his vision.

Garfiel: "…"

Since its piercing emergence from the factory district's ground, where it had caused damage to the surrounding area with that powerful impact, the unmoving, glittering giant, its head glared at the surrounding area.

That gesture, it was as if it were searching for prey.

Garfiel: "Yo, City Mayor-san. Sis hasn't come back yet… but if this thing goes on a rampage, it'll be a crazy mess. Before that…"

Leno: "You are going to subdue it? I respect your decision."

Garfiel: "…"

Leno, who had understood Garfiel's intentions and was taking command of the battle, immediately nodded his head.

It helped that he was quick on the uptake, but he was a man who never said no to a proposal, even one from Frederica. It made one wonder if he was not decisive, but just unthinking.

Leno: "Without a doubt, you are currently the strongest force in the city. I wish to entrust it to you."

Garfiel: "Ha! Ya get it, don'tcha? My amazin' self will take care of everything!"

Nodding, Leno's statement gave Garfiel a push forward, throwing away his doubts. Then, extending his arms to those around him, he stepped forcefully on the ground and…

Garfiel: "Anyone who is far away, listen to the sound! If you're close, then gather yer eyes here! My amazin' self is going to beat all yer enemies with my fists!!"

Chanting a speech he had learned from Subaru, Garfiel's body launched like an arrow.

The city's residents were astonished by Garfiel's instantaneous disappearance. Leaving their astonishment behind, Garfiel vigorously shattered the cobblestones, flew across the rooftops, kicked the walls, and made a suicidal attack on the huge Lightbug.

Garfiel: "Oh—"

With the residents having already evacuated, Garfiel sprinted through the now deserted city block. He leapt, flew, and advanced to the heart of the huge Lightbug, as a flood of Lightbugs rushed his way from the street corners.

The huge Lightbug was formed by the gathering of many Lightbugs —but, there were still plenty of Lightbugs that were not swallowed up by it. It was a clever trap for a bug.

Garfiel: "That ain't enough to stop my amazin' self!"

A few puny Lightbugs were not enough to slow down Garfiel's advance.

The fire and wind attacks that they unleashed were extinguished with a swing of his arm and a stomp of his foot, and the Lightbugs, having lost their strength, were unable to maintain themselves and collapsed. It was a desperate attack.

Their behavior was less than that of insects, unnatural, as their desperate behavior meant nothing.

Garfiel: "…What sorta shitty bastard is controllin' 'em?"

Inwardly irritated by what was happening, Garfiel clicked his fangs.

There was no doubt that the Lightbugs had intent behind them, as evidenced by the fact that they targeted City Hall. And it was clear that this was the result of human malice, not animal instinct. Therefore, there was a mastermind directing the actions of both the huge Lightbug and the Lightbugs.

There was a mastermind, but, their plan was too poorly executed; the Lightbugs' futile deaths were a good sign of that—

Garfiel: "Aaah?"

With this thought, Garfiel, who was growing angry at his invisible enemy, noticed an unexplainable presence and raised his eyebrows. His gaze turned not to the huge Lightbug, but to the ground a short distance in front of it.

Garfiel: "…"

That presence, there was the fast-moving back of a person that ran straight down the street in a straight line to the huge Lightbug.

As Leno said, no one was more capable than Garfiel in the city right now. The city's security forces were also prioritizing the evacuation of the residents and should not have the capability to take on the huge Lightbug.

So, even seeing their back, the impression at first was of a reckless, out-of-control resident running loose. But their steps were fast, and it was hard to believe that they were just a confused resident.

Then, the identity of the person became immediately apparent.

???: "—Garfiel-sama."

A figure running at tremendous speed looked back without slowing down. As they continued to run backward, a young man with dark blue hair and a monocle was looking toward him.

—It was Clind, a butler who served Annerose, a relative of Roswaal.

Garfiel: “Wha—”

The question that Garfiel was trying to ask was to the effect of “What are you doing here?”.

No sooner than that, the huge Lightbug launched an attack on Garfiel and Clind.

Garfiel and Clind: “…”

Multiple lights blended together, and the light that was emitted was dyed white as rays of heat burned through the streets. Buildings and trees along the way could be seen vanishing as they were burned by the intense heat.

Although weak individually, thousands of Lightbugs could accumulate extraordinary power when united into a single body. Even Garfiel would not be able to survive their heat rays.

The only reason he did no’t get hit was because of Clind’s hand signals as he ran backward—not words, but hand gestures to warn him of the incoming danger. Thanks to that considerable service—

Garfiel: “—Rraa!”

Garfiel dove under the huge Lightbug’s legs and slammed his fist into its massive body. The moment his fist hit, it felt like stone had cracked and shattered on impact, gouging out a chunk of it.

However, there was nothing endearing about a huge Lightbug made from several combined that could be subdued by a single fist strike. Instead, it was a colony that only appeared to be a huge body. Only one of the Lightbugs could be killed with a single fist strike; in short, the enemy had several thousand lives left.

One shot was far from enough, and even with a hundred, it would still appear lively.

Garfiel: “If that’s the case, I’m gonna put 10,000 punches into ya!”

Barking and declaring ten times the number of blows required, Garfiel’s entire body resonated with energy in order to destroy. With the sensation of boiling blood, his muscles swelled, and his Divine Protection sucked up the power of the earth.

Fists, claws, and fangs were swung, and the body of the huge Lightbug was vigorously devoured.

Garfiel: “…”

While shimmering in complex and mysterious ways, flakes of light peeled off from the writhing, huge Lightbug. All of them consisted of the Lightbugs that made up the huge Lightbug, releasing mana like an explosive burst.

Chain explosions of light erupted under the feet of the huge Lightbug, and Garfiel, unable to defend against the resulting range, was also thrown in it and blown away. He put his hands into the ground, forcibly breaking his movement, and looked up.

Although he was not injured, there was bitterness at being forced to start over. Furthermore—

Garfiel: “They just keep comin’ ‘n comin’, there’s no end to ‘em.”

However many he removed or scraped, more Lightbugs were incorporated into the huge Lightbug to be replenished afterward.

Garfiel had no intention of getting pushed around whatsoever, but the damage to the city would be enormous at this rate.

Clind: “You seem to be having difficulties. Assistance.”

Garfiel: “Ya?”

Against the advancing Lightbugs, Garfiel made a motion of his hands as if literally swatting an insect, and then glared at Clind, who had come up next to him.

He was a calm-faced young man whom he had only met a few times in the month before.

The reason was that it was Annerose, his master, who provided housing for the residents who had been displaced from the Sanctuary, as well as for the people in the Roswaal mansion, which had burned to the ground.

From that time on, he had always thought that he had a very unusual demeanor, but—

Garfiel: “Help me; what the fuck can ya do?”

Clind: “Indeed. I am but a butler, so I am proud to say that I have a wide variety of small skills in that regard. Proficiency.”

Having said that, Clind stepped forward and gently lifted his hand behind Garfiel’s back. Then he clenched his five fingers. —Immediately after, the torso of the huge Lightbug exploded.

Clind: “…”

The huge Lightbug was split in half down the middle of its body and could no longer support itself. Clind looked at its upper body, which was falling down toward the city.

Clind: “That is not good. If I make a mess, Annerose-sama will reprimand me. —Delight.”

Narrowing his eyes at the future reprimand, Clind continued to move the fingertips of his outstretched hand. With that simple movement, the upper body of the huge Lightbug, which was about to smash into the street, was completely disassembled.

If the once formidable mass dispersed and broke into countless Lightbugs, the damage to the streets would be trivialized in one fell swoop.

There was a sound of something granular and hard steadily dropping, and the scattered Lightbugs fell like stones. They quickly rose up and gathered again, trying to get back together to reform the huge Lightbug.

Clind: “If the structure is disturbed, then they cannot reform. A little creativity. Instantaneous.”

Garfiel: “Ha! I don’t get what’cha doing, but…!”

Clind’s attack and ingenuity were neither seen nor understood whatsoever. But as long as Clind was on his side, he did not care. Garfiel was able to come to that conclusion.

He stomped down, cracked the streets, and the rising earth drilled the Lightbugs from directly below.

This was the same technique that was used at the factory, much to Frederica’s outrage, but it was the best solution for killing a large area of targets. Afterward, he would have to convince Leno that the damage was unavoidable.

Garfiel: “So, why’re ya here again?”

Clind: “I was on my way to the Master’s residence, accompanied by Annerose-sama. Seeing that, Annerose-sama ordered me to deal with the situation. Commanding.”

Garfiel: “Oh, that little miss, is it?”

The huge Lightbug, which had been broken apart and reduced to half its original size, released a ray of heat that was also reduced to half power. The upraised shield of earth caught it, and the two exchanged a few words behind the mud wall.

Clind’s answer made Garfiel recall an image of Annerose, and it made sense.

She was nine years old, but she was so mature that it was hard to believe that. In fact, Garfiel, who did not know much about the world, had a lot of level headed youths around him.

Certainly Annerose, but also Petra. Sticking close to Frederica and so on, Petra often glared at Garfiel with her round eyes, as if he were an enemy.

This time, she was very hostile to the idea of him going out alone with his sister.

Garfiel: "—. Oh, that's remindin' me, Sis sure is takin' her time."

Clind: "Frederica? I do not see her, but she accompanied you? Inquiry."

Garfiel: "Oh, she went to the mansion to fetch that bastard Roswaal…"

If it was his sister's beastly legs, then she should have arrived at the mansion around the time the huge Lightbug started to move. From there to here, there should have been some kind of follow-up to the attack and defense.

It was then that Garfiel had such a question—

???: "—Hii, yahh!"

The shout coincided with a long spear of ice being thrust into the torso of the huge Lightbug.

Garfiel: "…"

With Garfiel and Clind firmly rooted in place, the huge Lightbug was trying to reconstruct its shattered body in the meantime, and its intentions were successfully thwarted by a single, powerful shot.

The huge Lightbug was thrown back by the impact and fell to the ground, scattering fragments. The air hissed as the large hole in its body froze over. It was a "regeneration-killing" blow that interfered with the regrowth of its huge body.

And the one who unleashed that merciless icy blow was—

???: "Garfiel! And Clind-san! Are you two okay?"

A young girl with flowing silver hair, Emilia, rushed down the street with nimble footsteps. She was probably the one who delivered the coup de grace that was too powerful to be called just a reinforcement.

Seeing that figure, Garfiel closed one eye, and Clind politely bowed.

Clind: “Emilia-sama, I apologize for the inconvenience. Regretful.”

Emilia: “Huh? Don’t worry about it. I should be sorry; I just came out of nowhere and didn’t even talk to you two. From a distance, I just saw someone being attacked…”

Garfiel: “That’s a very Emilia-sama-like answer…”

She rushed in and made her opening move with such power. It was the ultimate display of her character, but her nonchalant attitude was all the more frightening when you saw the results of her attack.

Emilia: “Roswaal told me just to freeze the wounds of those little ones who were sticking together.”

Garfiel: “Ha! So that’s the bastard’s meddlin’, huh? No wonder I thought ya were so merciless… So, I don’t see Sis; did you leave her behind?”

Emilia: “Frederica?”

Emilia’s eyes widened in surprise. Her reaction made Garfiel feel uncomfortable, and he tilted his head in puzzlement with an, “Ah?”.

Garfiel: “Sis went to the mansion to ask for help. That’s why ya showed up, right, Emilia-sama?”

Emilia: “I came because I happened to see a big light in the distance. I talked to Roswaal and rushed over. Subaru and the others will be here later…”

Garfiel: “Sis didn’t come back?”

Garfiel’s cheeks stiffened at Emilia’s unexpected statement. Frederica, who had gone to tell them about the huge Lightbug, would not have taken any detours along the way. First of all, if she had not passed Emilia, who had come straight here from the mansion, then—

Garfiel: “Sis got stopped by some enemy…?”

Clind: “…”

Emilia: “Huh? What?”

Clind silently narrowed his eyes at Garfiel’s intuition. Only Emilia couldn’t keep up with the situation, so her being confused could no’t be helped.

Garfiel tried to choose the right words, wondering how to explain it.

Clind: “Emilia-sama, while this is impolite, can we leave this to you? Delegation.”

With that said, Clind skipped most of the explanation and told Emilia just the conclusion. Then, in front of the two astonished people, he indicated with his hand toward the huge Lightbug.

Clind: “We believe that the adversary who controls that thing has kidnapped Frederica, putting the custody of Frederica between him and me. I would like to ask Emilia-sama, who is a good match to dispatch that thing. Petition.”

Emilia: “—. Is everything okay with the two of you?”

Clind: “Assuredly so. Promise.”

The exchange between Emilia and Clind was established, leaving Garfiel behind.

With a promise exchanged, Emilia faced the huge Lightbug with a serious look on her face, holding up both hands and outpouring powerful mana. Seeing that power, the huge Lightbug’s attention was drawn to Emilia.

Behind her, Clind looked back at Garfiel, and,

Clind: “As you have heard. Leave this place to Emilia-sama, and we will go to Frederica. Search.”

Garfiel: “Oi, oi, oi, are ya sure ‘bout that? But Emilia-sama is an important person not only to the Captain, but to that bastard Roswaal as well. That’s…”

Clind: “Putting something in a frame and displaying it is not the only way to treat it with care. Differentiation.”

Immediately after Clind’s words, the huge Lightbug emitted a screeching cry—or rather, a ray of heat that made the atmosphere scream, but Emilia’s shield of ice defended against it, and it was reflected back into the sky.

Emilia’s ranged attack power and adaptability were better suited for a fight that did not cause damage to the city.

Clind: “And thus, we have our roles to play. Right people in the right place.”

Garfiel: “Role…”

To Garfiel’s question, Clind closed one eye and then answered.

Clind: “—Frederica, to rescue her. Immediacy.”

11

???: “—It’s about time you woke up, Lassy.”

At such a call, slowly, Frederica’s consciousness was roused.

Frederica: “…”

The first thing she felt was two different kinds of cold against her body. One was a cold wind that caressed her skin directly, and the other was a hard, cold feeling that rested against the entire backside of her body.

Futhermore, what she noticed after feeling the cold was—

Frederica: “Both of my arms…”

???: “You are being restrained. Apologies, but I’d like you to refrain from using your beastification. If you don’t, the blade on the inner part of the shackles is designed to slice through that beautiful skin. I would like to avoid that. At any rate…”

Frederica: “…”

???: “—Lassy’s blood would be wasted, wouldn’t it?”

Both of Frederica’s hands were shackled, and she was restrained by chains; within her field of vision, a figure entered. It was a strange-looking man peering at her as she lay on a bed of iron.

He had slicked-back gray hair and a sickly-white face. His bony cheeks and neck gave the impression of emaciation, but it was his eyes that were most striking.

His gaze, devoid of temperature, was colder than the wind and the bed.

And when the man said the word “blood”, Frederica’s fangs trembled.

Frederica: “So you are after my…blood, right?”

???: “Surely you are aware of this, Lassy of rare blood. Your blood is a treasured resource.”

Frederica was more than convinced by this simple statement. The enemy’s goal was clear.

—The term “Rare Blood” mentioned by the man meant, as one might expect, blood that was extremely rare.

The blood was different from that of normal people; Frederica did not know the specific differences, but the taste, smell, and various other things contained within the blood were different from those of normal people.

In many cases, the difference seemed to be ritually useful, and Roswaal once told her that more than a handful were seeking Frederica’s rare blood.

This rare blood led Roswaal to agree to take Frederica out of the Sanctuary in the first place.

???: “To be honest, I was surprised. I never thought that someone with such rare blood as you, Lassy, would come to the city so openly. Not once, not twice, but many times.”

Somewhere, Frederica heard the man’s voice, trembling with glee as she observed her surroundings.

The chill in the air and the wind indicated that this was most likely a cave where the sun did not reach, or underground. It was annoying to the unbeastified and completely naked Frederica that she was not allowed to wear even a piece of cloth. The other truly uncaring party probably thought Frederica was a blood bag or something.

Truly, the fact that his interest was only in her blood stirred the recesses of Frederica’s mind.

Frederica: “What are you going to do with my blood?”

???: “Oh, interested? That’s good. Lassy has a right to hear. —That’s because Lassy’s name should belong to the great achievement that will begin here.”

The man nodded his head brilliantly like a doll and took a step to the side, looking amused. Frederica was taken aback upon seeing something that had been hidden behind the man’s back.

For there were cabinets and innumerable glass vessels, also filled with blood, lined up in rows.

Frederica: “These, are…”

???: “These are the blood samples of my soul. I am a researcher. I am searching for a way to save people that does not rely on magic. Particularly with blood. Like mana, there are many mysteries surrounding blood in the human body that haven’t been uncovered.”

Frederica: “The mysteries of blood…”

???: “To unravel them is akin to unraveling the secrets of life. That’s why I turned to your blood, Lassy. —Rare blood will advance my research into the future!”

Frederica was flabbergasted to see the man’s eyes glowing with ecstasy. There was no hint of a lie or hesitation. The man was serious about saving people.

His words of salvation were his genuine intentions, not the construction of a desire for knowledge or curiosity.

???: “Consider that a drop of your blood, Lassy, saves one life. Isn’t that a great honor? Rare blood is a chosen honor.”

Frederica: “An honor… you caused chaos in the city to capture me?”

???: “Using the rare forms of life that occur in Costuul. The shallow ones disparage it as a “Lightbug”, but it is nothing of the sort. Despite appearances, it is a being that was naturally born.…”

The man responded to Frederica’s question without hiding his frankness. But the answers to those questions only left one’s mouth open in surprise.

Within a month, the man spotted Frederica’s rare blood, and in a much shorter period of time, he developed a plan to get his hands on Frederica. So he managed to create a diversion and capture her simultaneously.

Truly, he was a maddeningly obsessive opponent that was hard to deal with.

???: “—Yo, Doc. Can I talk to ya for a sec?”

Then, a thick, wild voice, the opposite of the high-pitched man’s voice, overtook him.

The voice sounded familiar. The figure of the other man also quickly came into her view. It was the muscular blond man, the one who had beaten and restrained Frederica.

The man looked at Frederica on the bed and whistled.

???: “Wowie, That’s a nice view. This is so good, I could stay here forever.”

???: “What’s going on, Hayden-kun? I am speaking right now of my noble mission to the rare-blooded woman…”

Hayden: “Ahhhhh, those things can wait. It seems like we’ve got a visitor coming our way. Whaddya wanna do, Doc?”

The researcher, who was called “Doc” by the man who radiated a ferocious presence, had a clouded face. As it was, the researcher bit his nails and muttered in a nervous voice, “You”…

Researcher: “Once again, what meaning is there in stopping my noble mission… You, you, you, you! You ruffian who doesn’t understand the gravity of the situation!”

The researcher became enraged and grabbed one of the blood samples from the cabinet. He thrust it at the man in front of him.

Researcher: “Hayden-kun! Hunt down the intruders! Fulfill your duty!”

Hayden: “Good grief, I hate it when people treat violence as my duty. Well, ya ain’t wrong.”

Having said that, the man took the blood sample with two fingers and went to follow the researcher’s instructions. Just before he did so, he turned back to Frederica, gave her a wink, and,

Hayden: “I hope you look forward to my return. The Doc wants ya and I to partner up, my dearie, in order to increase the supply of rare blood.”

Frederica: “—I certainly will not.”

Hayden: “A strong-willed woman, I like ya.”

Waving a hand that held a blood sample from over his back, the man disappeared from sight.

Seeing this, Frederica tensed her arms. The chains clinked, and pain shot through her wrists.

Researcher: “I said it’s useless. You can’t remove them, Lassy. Oh, what a waste.”

The blade inserted inside the handcuffs sliced a shallow cut across the skin of Frederica’s wrist. Then the researcher looked at the dripping blood and shook his head, sadness in his eyes.

Then the researcher cleared his throat, and,

Researcher: “I was going to wait until Hayden-kun was back, but then again, I can’t. I want to enjoy the taste of rare blood and its mysteries… Well, at least one part of it.”

Frederica: “Uu…”

The wide-eyed researcher knelt beside her and gently brought his face close to the wound on Frederica’s wrist. Feeling the man’s rough breathing, Frederica gnashed her teeth and endured her shame.

If Hayden was sent to intercept, then someone had come to Frederica’s aid. —Whether it was Garfiel or Roswaal, she didn’t know.

Frederica: “…”

Frederica was terrified of the sensation of having her wrist licked, but she simply held her breath and closed her mind to the humiliation that she endured at this moment.

12

Garfiel: “Usually, when ya kidnap someone, you cover yer tracks, don’t ya? But this one left such an obvious stench behind. What’re they doin’…?”

Clind: “Common sense would suggest that either the criminals were careless or it is a trap aimed at us; given that Frederica was taken, the latter is more likely. Conjecture.”

Not long after leaving Costuul, Garfiel, and Clind were standing in front of a cave.

It was a cave dug out from under a cliff, with the entrance to the hideout being magically disguised. The clifftop offered a great view of the Industrial City in the distance, making it a perfect location for nefarious schemes.

However, other than the disguised entrance, it was a lousy trick.

Garfiel: “I can smell Sis from the inside. She smells like blood, too…”

Clind: “Yes, but why? Questioning.”

Garfiel: “It doesn’t smell like Sis’s blood. But there’s a shitload of it.”

Wrinkling his nose, Garfiel was sickened by the smell of blood wafting from inside the cave.

There were individual differences in the smell of blood, and the smell of Frederica’s blood was particularly distinctive. When compared to his memory, the smell of blood in the air was not from Frederica. The smell of blood was too strong.

Garfiel: “Ten or twenty people ain’t enough for this amount…”

Clind: “The smell of blood other than Frederica’s rare blood… is it the kind of vampire that seeks rare blood? Rumination.”

Garfiel: “Rare blood?”

Garfiel cocked his head at the unfamiliar term. Clind responded with a short “affirmative” while repositioning his monocle.

Clind: “Frederica is the owner of a unique type of blood known as rare blood. This blood has ritualistic influence and a strong sensitivity to mana. —Even Dragons are captivated by it. Divine qualities.”

Garfiel: “Huh? I ain’t ever heard of it! If Sis is like that, then my amazin' self is…"

Clind: "No, rare blood is…it's unrelated to genetic siblings or parent-child relationships. Rare blood is more like a single-generation mutation; Frederica's blood is special, for better or worse. Absolute."

Garfiel: "…'n some bastard is tryin' to get it? Fuck that."

Sharply gnashing his fangs and laying his anger bare, Garfiel stepped into the cave. Just the same, Clind also followed behind his back; their footsteps echoed in the dark passageway.

Naturally, if the entrance was disguised, there would be no traps in the cave. Since the hiding place was their hideout, there was no way that anyone would be foolish enough to lay traps.

To start with—

???: "—If we gave ya that kinda welcome, it wouldn't have been worth the trouble of inviting ya, would it?"

Garfiel: "…"

A voice greeted them as they entered a passageway and arrived at a slightly open space.

In front of them, a tall man with tied-up golden hair and a ferocious smile awaited them. Garfiel's muscles rejoiced at the ferocious dread that overflowed from this man's entire body.

—He was undeniably a formidable opponent.

Clind: "This is most unusual. A half-breed of the lionman tribe. Scarce."

Garfiel: "Really? To see through him at a glance, it seems you're not just some smug bastard."

Having his lineage discovered at a glance, the man who had been paying attention to Garfiel then took interest in Clind.

The man crossed his strong arms and smirked as if to flaunt his white fangs.

???: “Correctly guessed, I am the lionman, Hayden Garo. This will probably be very short-lived, but I’m looking forward to getting to know you, both of you. Especially that blonde boy.”

Garfiel: “Ya picked my amazin’ self; ya gotta be full of yerself, ain’tcha? …Well, who was the one who had made a show of leaving Sis’s smell behind?”

Hayden: “It’s a love letter to ya. I’m thrilled ya followed it for me, boy. Ya see, I love to beat the shit outta younger guys. —I’m really fond of breaking guys like ya, my friend.”

Garfiel: “You’re gonna break my amazin’ self? What the fuck are ya talking about…”

Clind: “—Truly, you do not understand. Disappointment.”

Garfiel: “Oh?”

Hayden: “Yeah?”

The man who identified himself as Hayden as well as Garfiel turned to Clind at the same time. At the end of their gaze, Clind simply shook his head, as if depressed.

Then, he gently placed his hand on Garfiel’s shoulder beside him.

Clind: “Admittedly, Garfiel-sama’s heart is immature and green, and, therefore, precious. However, if you are yearning for the brightness of its potential, the pleasure you take in casting shadows upon it is shallow and thoughtless. It is too careless a judgment and desire, I must say. Disappointment.”

Hayden: “—I see. You’ve come all the way here in your fancy clothes. I thought ya must be a weirdo, but I guess that don’t make ya any less a scholar”

Clind: “Comparisons are meaningless. I am what I am, and he is what he is. There is just a difference in principle. Separation.”

Garfiel: “I really don’t get it, but…”

Garfiel scratched his head and narrowed his eyes at the exchange between Hayden and Clind. As he did, he looked over at Clind, who was standing beside him.

Garfiel: “So what’re you tryin’ to say ‘bout my amazin’ self?”

Clind: “You have an unbreakable brilliance. Our adversary who speaks of breaking it, for example, is laughable. Absurd.”

Garfiel: “—Ha! That’s pretty easy to understand, ain’t it!”

Hearing Clind’s answer, Garfiel’s previously hazy face cleared. Garfiel glared at Hayden in front of him, slamming his fists together in front of his chest.

In short, Garfiel found himself in a fight. And on top of that, his older sister was also kidnapped.

Garfiel: “Then I guess I don’t need to go easy on ya. …Go, Clind.”

Clind: “—You do not mind? Affirmation.”

Garfiel: “The bastard wanted me, right? It’s also sickening for Sis’s blood to be drained outta her. I’m countin’ on ya.”

Clind: “I understand. Certainly.”

Hearing Garfiel’s request, Clind took a step back. Hayden, who had been watching the exchange, held out his hand and said, “Hold up,”

Hayden: “Stop talking away as you please. If you pass me by, that researcher will be furious. Then I won’t get any of my owed blood, either.”

Garfiel: “Blood?”

Hayden: “That’s right. That researcher’s completely nuts…but he’s getting results. People who are really crazy come up with ideas that others normally wouldn’t!”

As he said this, Hayden raised the glass container he had been hiding behind his back—a vessel filled with blood, above his head and poured its contents into his own mouth. There was a sense of disgust at the act itself, but that too was fleeting.

—Overshadowing the disgust, a powerful sense of caution rushed through his entire body, and Garfiel assumed a battle stance.

—Immediately after, Hayden's kick, closing the distance in the blink of an eye, hit Garfiel, who had been holding his ground, right in the middle of his crossed arms, sending him flying backward.

Hayden: "Ha ha! Your lovely big sister took one of those shots to the belly and collapsed!"

Garfiel: "—hk, what the fuck are ya doing to Sis's belly? Ya perverted bastard!"

Garfiel howled, swinging his kicked arm. For an instant, he turned his gaze to where Clind was. This should be an opportunity to go and rescue Garfiel's sister. —But his figure was already gone.

Seeing this, Garfiel put strength into both his legs. And then—

Garfiel: "Raah!"

To get back at him, Garfiel launched a spinning back kick, aiming for the advancing Hayden's chest. The rock-crushing blow caught Hayden in the torso, and the big man backed off with a cry of pain.

Hayden: "Oh! That's good, that's good, that's good! But now it's my turn—"

Garfiel: "What crap are ya talkin' 'bout?"

Hayden: "—hk."

His knee thrust into the face of the once-delighted Hayden, leaving his body shaking from the blow. Bending over, he grabbed him by the back of the neck, blood dripping from his nose, then slammed him down hard onto the ground head first.

Garfiel laughed, snorting at the rising discontent and the smell of Hayden’s own bleeding.

He furiously crushed his resented enemy for doing something so outrageous to his older sister—

Garfiel: “Ya know, my amazin’ self came outta the Sanctuary to smash misguided bastards like ya.”

Right above his head, Hayden’s face took a direct hit from the sole of Garfiel’s shoe. The impact, which shook the entire cave violently, mercilessly shattered his bitter enemy’s nose.

13

The wind blew; that was the moment he was eluded.

Clind: “—You should put on this coat. Your appearance is unsightly. Indignation.”

Upon speaking, he placed the coat on her naked upper body. That assured concern was infuriating.

The humiliation of a moment ago was overlaid by another humiliation.

Wondering why, of all people, he had come to this place.

???: “—hk. How did you get in? Hayden-kun is…”

Clind: “If that was him, he is in the middle of entertaining my companion. I do not expect him to survive for very long, but it would be insensitive for her to remain in this place for any longer. Separation.”

???: “Likewise…”

Clind: “—Blood sample collector, Leonardo Baroness, your savagery ends here. Demise.”

Frederica, her movement restrained on top of the bed, was unable to see the entire exchange. However, she could see the back of the young man putting his jacket on—Leonardo, the researcher, faced him.

Leonardo's cheeks stiffened as he shook his head at the young man's pronouncement. Then, as if he could not accept his own demise, he reached for the blood samples behind him.

Leonardo: "There is, there is no way I will stop! You will not keep me from my progress! Myyy breakthrough!"

His voice trailing off, Leonardo swept away the blood samples with his arm and dropped them to the ground in one fluid motion. The sound of shattering glass echoed throughout the darkened room, and the smell of blood permeated the air. —Leonardo, thus bathed in a large amount of blood, began to let out a low growl.

—His body, which had been only skin and bones, bulged out, and the color of his pale skin turned bright red.

While maintaining his human appearance with merely a single layer of skin, Leonardo was transformed by the power of the abnormal blood. Upon smelling the fragrant blood samples, Frederica was overcome with nausea.

It was impossible to imagine how many people were sacrificed and what was produced by this mixture of blood.

Leonardo: "With this all-powerful blood, all wrongs will be eradicated! Lassy here will be the foundation for this—"

Clind: "Unfortunately, I cannot spare the time to listen to your unbearable delusions. Apology. —Moreover, she is the Master's property. It is my contract to protect her. Adherence."

The young man dared not step back in the face of the bloated Leonardo's caustic words.

Hearing this quiet declaration of war, Leonardo's bright red eyeballs trembled, and he thrust out his arms.

It was a simple movement, but his arm was being swung with an extraordinary amount of muscle mass, making it an impressive weapon of destruction. A single blow would shatter even the thickest stone wall, and it approached the young man's slender body without mercy.

However—

Clind: "—The attitude of aiming high is commendable. It is an idea I would not have had. Impressive."

Leonardo: "Is that so!"

Clind: "However, there are too many problems with that methodology. Reckless."

The sole of Clind's shoe met the blow of his arm, and the young man's body lightly flew through the air. Then the young man, twisting in midair, reached out and clenched his five outstretched fingers. With that, Leonardo's left arm was flattened without a sound.

Leonardo: "Ga, aaaaah?!"

Leonardo's enlarged arm was crushed entirely at the wrist, elbow, and shoulder joints. The same damage was also done to his right arm.

It was all linked to the opening and closing of the young man's hand, a guaranteed kill.

Clind: "This, is not the most desirable method. Tristitia."

Leonardo: "Not…not yet!"

Clind: "Oh my. Admiration."

The young man who had landed and brushed off his knees widened his eyes. The reason for this was the presence of Lightbugs crawling across the lab floor, where the smell of blood lingered, attaching themselves to the young man's limbs.

If the disturbances in Costuul were Leonardo's doing, then of course he would be the one who was manipulating the Lightbugs. Whether that was through blood or some other means remained unclear—

Leonardo: “If I seal that hand, you won’t be able to attack me again!”

Leonardo let out a deafening howl at the certainty of victory, as if his pain were being erased by some sanguine magic power. Leonardo rushed forward with a shout to crush the young man, whose movements were being sealed by the Lightbugs.

Then, just before the massive body’s tackle caused the young man’s body to burst—

Leonardo: “—ah.”

Clind: “I am truly sorry. My hand, is inconsequential. Fascination.”

Leonardo’s knees were crushed, and he fell headfirst to the ground, helplessly. The huge figure was left completely at his mercy, and the man, with all four limbs crushed, lost his fighting strength.

It was an overpowering offensive and defensive battle that lasted less than a few seconds.

Clind: “Frederica, are you unharmed? Confirmation.”

Frederica: “Y, yes, I am fine. As long as you take off these shackles…”

Immediately after she said this, the iron shackles that restrained her wrists were abruptly torn off and removed. What Frederica struggled so hard to remove was removed so quickly by him that she could not tell if it had been touched.

However, Frederica did not refer to it and got up, covering herself with a jacket.

Frederica: “—So, what has happened to Garf and Costuul?”

Clind: “To say that as soon as you get up is unacceptable. Confirming your well-being should be the first priority. Imperative. Of course, it is ridiculous for a servant to cause concern for their master. Pitiable.”

Frederica: “Ugg…answer the question! Actually, why are you even here? This is not funny, Clind!”

On the iron bed, Frederica was fuming, forgetting to cover her mouth, and the young man—Clind, ostentatiously covered his ears. Frederica’s anger only grew at that gesture.

Ignoring Frederica’s concerns, Clind told her, “You need not worry,”

Clind: “Garfiel-sama is fighting that man’s companion, but they are no match for him. Costuul is being attended to by Emilia-sama. Perfection.”

Frederica: “Garf aside, Emilia-sama…? Why not the Master?”

Clind: “The Master has his own plans. Forward-thinking. Now then…”

Frederica: “Now then, what is it?”

Frederica cocked her head in astonishment, and Clind looked back at her and sighed. Then, furrowing his shapely eyebrows,

Clind: “—As I expected, seeing you grow up is a disappointment. Regret.”

Frederica: “Which part of a person do you look at when you say that?! You pervert!!”

It was an outburst that made her lose all interest in thanking him for saving her life.

14

Garfiel: “That perverted scientist and the lionman bastard were workin’ together. So, did that lionman bastard have the same rare blood as Sis? Realizin’ that, the perverted scientist got greedy.”

Having welcomed the unharmed Clind and the half-naked Frederica, Garfiel lowered the big man to his feet and explained to them what had happened.

The large space was heavily marked by intense signs of the fight between the two men. The blows were also etched into Garfiel as scars, but not as many as the instantly felled Hayden.

The white-eyed Hayden had all of his fangs in his mouth broken off and fainted, with blood bubbling out of his mouth.

Frederica: “He is knocked out, right?”

Garfiel: “He’s a tough bastard, ain’t he, so he ain’t dead. He kept cockily prattlin’ on ‘bout being a lion, so I wasn’t ‘boutta lose to him as a tiger.”

Garfiel was smiling nonchalantly in his triumphant glory, with no trace of sadness on his face. Although that was a relief, did he remember that his older sister had been kidnapped?

Frederica: “Well, I was responsible for getting captured…and it is not reasonable to blame Garf for that…”

Garfiel: “Oh? What’re ya talkin’ ‘bout, Sis? I’m really relieved. I was really worried for ya.”

Frederica: “Really? You have not forgotten about it until just now?”

Frederica glared at him with scornful eyes, and Garfiel scratched his head and looked away. Then he puckered his lips in an apologetic manner.

Garfiel: “But I thought if Clind were there, you’d be okay. Actually, it did work out.”

Frederica: “…It annoys me that your statement is not wrong.”

When told of Garfiel’s reassurances, Frederica was unable to say anything about their validity. The nonchalant man right beside her was an absolute equal to Roswaal for Frederica.

Unlike Roswaal, he was just not someone in whom one could place their trust in without any qualms.

Frederica: “Nevertheless, those Lightbugs, this place, and these people…”

Clind: “An ostracized researcher, who was expelled as a heretic. Amongst which was only one other man, for certain. Frederica, you have nothing to worry about. Evil.”

Frederica: “…”

An ostracized researcher, expelled as a heretic.

Frederica’s eyes were downcast at Clind’s words, and she went deep in thought. She pulled Clind’s jacket tighter around herself and looked at the already-closing wounds on her wrists.

She felt ashamed that the blood that flowed within her had brought about this situation. A long time ago, Clind had told Frederica about the dangers of rare blood, and now she felt pathetic that she had erred in front of him.

He would be disappointed that she couldn’t do what he told her to do. —It was an unpleasant feeling.

On top of that, she also caused trouble for her brother, the master she served, and the many other people who were kind to her.

Clind: “—. You think too much. Misapprehension.”

Frederica: “Huh?”

Clind: “How can the people you care about not care about you? That is just the way it is. Fact.”

Frederica: “…”

Having expected to be reprimanded for her lack of ability, Clind’s words took her by surprise. Her fangs trembled, and heat surged into her ears.

Garfiel: “Oh, yeah, Sis. It really ain’t good to be completely naked. I picked up some of yer clothes just in case.”

Frederica: “Um, ah, thank you for helping me, Garf! I, I will get dressed right away!”

In the corner of the room, Frederica was shown the clothes that Garfiel had brought with him, and she accepted them, then returned to the hallway and happily got dressed. Turning their faces away from her, the men stood side by side.

Garfiel: “I don’t know what rare blood is, but there was a lotta trouble caused in the city just for the sake of Sis, wasn’t there?”

Clind: “It has value for its own sake. —Be wary, Garfiel-sama. Warning.”

Garfiel: “…What is it?”

Clind: “The Master is rarely moved by mere good intentions; if taking Ram is a milestone for the future, Frederica is certainly another one. Keep that in mind. Heed.”

At Clind’s emotionless advice, Garfiel lightly touched his fangs. Then, nodding his head with a “yeah”,

Garfiel: “I never trusted that bastard Roswaal from the get-go. He fits someone you should be suspicious of.”

Clind: “It would seem. It is impossible for Frederica to do that. Devotion.”

Garfiel was dismayed to learn that those words implied Frederica’s trust in Roswaal. Speaking of dismay, there was a presence right behind him—

???: “—hk! Ya let your guard down, ya two!”

The previously fainted Hayden jumped up. He laughed with a bloody, evil look on his face and swung his strong arms at Garfiel and Clind, who had their backs turned to him.

At that moment, Hayden’s vicious blow was about to strike both of them in the back.

Frederica: “—How dare you ruin my time with Garf.”

Hayden: “…”

Leaping out of the darkened passageway, a powerful elbow struck Hayden directly in the face. Hayden flipped around with great force, spinning once before slamming to the floor, and this time being completely silenced.

At Frederica’s strike, Garfiel and Clind, who had been about to intercept Hayden, looked at each other.

Then Frederica, breathing furiously and still with her fist up, turned to them and said,

Frederica: “Thank you for what you did today. —But I am not the kind of person who is so pretty that I have to be protected all the time. I beg your pardon.”

Saying so forcefully, Frederica brushed away her long blonde hair with her hand. Garfiel sighed after seeing her attitude and the words and actions that struck the villain.

Garfiel: “Gu-ha! Ha-Ha-ha-ha! Don’t make me laugh, Sis, ha-ha-ha-ha!”

Frederica: “Wh, what is so funny?”

Clind: “Frederica, childish bravado is the prerogative of the young. With you, it is painful. Disparity.”

Frederica: “Disproportionate, is that not an exaggeration?!”

Garfiel laughed loudly, and Clind lamented. Hurt by the pair’s attitudes, Frederica relaxed her shoulders.

Frederica: “Good grief…”

—Her skirt, which had been ripped just now by the elbow strike, was now ripped even more than it already was.

—And though that would have been a good way to end it.

???: “Ah! Thank goodness all three of you are okay! So, did you figure out how to stop these little things?”

So shouted Emilia, sliding down the streets on a slab of ice and escaping the attacks of the huge Lightbug. Frederica was made speechless by her question and the city streets that had been ravaged by the fierce attacks.

Next to her, Garfiel and Clind also had an “Oh no” look on their faces.

???: “Emilia-tan is doing a great job, but if we don’t do something, they’re going to run out of town! It’ll be like a big Kaiju battle if it does!”

???: “Subaru! You need to look where you’re going, I suppose! If you make such careless moves, you’re going to end up flattened, in fact!”

Subaru: “Uooowaa!”

Unlike Emilia, who danced about brilliantly, it was Subaru who was running around on the ground holding Beatrice, desperately trying to get the situation under control.

Although it was understandable that he rushed from the mansion and struggled to help Emilia, his abilities would be of no use here. —The city had fallen into that much chaos.

Emilia: “Clind! Did this person tell you how they manipulated the Lightbugs…?”

Clind: “They are in a deep coma, and waking them up would be exceedingly difficult. Infeasible.”

Garfiel: “Well, we’ll just have to destroy ‘em steadily. —Emilia-sama, I’ll lend ya a hand!”

The two main offenders taken out of the cave were unconscious and incapable of being questioned about the Lightbugs’ operation.

In response to this desperate answer, Garfiel immediately opted for an aggressive solution and immediately joined the battle with Emilia, who was pleased.

Clind looked over at this and exhaled; leaving his jacket in Frederica's care, he then said,

Clind: "I have my orders from Annerose-sama. I, too, will assist Emilia-sama. Your—."

Frederica: "—I am also coming."

As Clind was about to proceed, Frederica lined up and said that to him. Hearing this, Clind took a moment to say something, then stopped.

Clind: "You have always been stubborn. Exasperated."

Frederica: "That is my line!"

They argued, and then Frederica and Clind also entered the battle for the defense of Costuul.

In the end, the battle raged on until just before the day's end, when the leading figure, Roswaal, was finally deployed, and the situation was completely quelled.

In response, ironically, Emilia's reputation in Costuul skyrocketed.

Behind the scenes, both Garfiel and Clind secretly received severe reprimands from Petra for ruining Frederica's day-trip outfit.

—But, that was another story.

END

Brotherhood of Pleiades
(CA)

1

—In the west of the Vollachian Empire, there was a lone island surrounded by a lake of isolating waters, Ginunhive. The island, also known as the Gladiator Island, had some unique rules imposed over it.

On the whole, the people who lived on the island were divided into two different groups—the guards who controlled, and the gladiators who were being controlled. Many of the gladiators were criminals or people in debt, or perhaps just people who were simply unlucky enough to be captured by slavers and sent to the island; every single one of them had their own individual circumstances.

But, no matter what their reason for being sent to the island was, the way they were all treated there was impartial.

All that was required of the gladiators was that every few days, when their turn would come around, they just needed to participate in Sparka, a show that turned the techniques and lives of people into a spectacle, and survive through it.

If they had enough luck and true strength, then they would not only be able to survive through many Sparkas and live a long life, but they could also buy their own freedom as a reward, or even gain a position of superiority on the island.

Where personal history and humanity were irrelevant, it was a utopia for savages where only physical strength was esteemed—that was the place known as the Gladiator Island Ginunhive.

???: “—There are lotsa guys who got that misconception, but if ya ask this guy right here, I’d say it’s a fucking dumbass way of thinking.”

Saying that, the man gulped down some cheap alcohol from a coarse wooden cup.

He was a person with ashen-brown hair, dark skin, and thick lips. He had a white scar that seemed to cover his right eye, and present behind the closed eyelid was an artificial replacement eye.

It was not something that could substitute for the eyeball he had lost, but it seemed like something he would be lonely without.

The man's name was Jawsrough. One of the gladiators who lived on this Gladiator Island, and he was quite the celebrity here. — According to the rest, he was known as the lone-wolf Jawsrough.

The reason he was called that was not simply because he did not hang out with anybody else.

Jawsrough: "This place's got the system of Units, where ya gotta trust that strangers've got your back, and they also gotta trust that ya got theirs. Together with one another, ya put your lives on the line. That'd also prolly happen when things get desperate. But…"

???: "But?"

Jawsrough: "If the guy whose back ya gotta look out for is a despicable fucking asshole, then what?"

Confronted with a question right after tilting his head, Natsuki Subaru frowned as he began to ponder.

Occupying a small table in a corner of the dining hall on the island, Jawsrough intently glared at the silent Subaru with his yet functioning left eye.

Subaru's form, reflected in Jawsrough's single eye, appeared to be only eleven or twelve years young.

If one were to think using normal standards, it was not an age where one could possess an answer to Jawsrough's question. However, Jawsrough's gaze had not the light of someone making fun of an ignorant child, nor was it trying to rush Subaru as he pondered; it was merely awaiting a response.

It was likely that hidden under the surface of Jawsrough's attitude, there were expectations for Subaru.

In that case, he had no choice but to meet those expectations.

Therefore, as Subaru took a breath through his nose,

Subaru: "On this island, there are also criminals who messed up outside of here. Maybe they stole, or killed someone, or violated some rule. And among them…"

Jawsrough: "…"

Subaru: "There are also guys who did stuff like stealing from women and children, or even killing them. Are they "fucking assholes"?"

Jawsrough: "—. Hey, you forgot to add the "despicable" part."

At Subaru's words after he had finished thinking, Jawsrough muttered this as he shifted his gaze to the alcohol in his cup. Subaru had not been so twisted as to take that to mean refusal or rejection.

At Jawsrough's attitude, Subaru readjusted his posture in his chair and continued.

Subaru: "The kinds of people that you can't trust with your back. If anything, you wouldn't even want to see their faces to begin with. Was it because those sorts of guys were abandoned by your Unit, that you ended up all alone?"

Jawsrough: "That's also incorrect. They weren't abandoned. They were cut down and discarded."

Subaru: "From the back…"

Jawsrough: "If it's a back that ain't worth looking out for, I'd feel much better just cutting 'em down right away. Ya wouldn't be able to say that the same thing won't end up happening with your comrades either, right?"

Snorting his nose as he gave a cynical smile, Jawsrough tried to continue by saying “That’s why”. Likely, the words that would have followed after were exactly what Subaru was imagining.

If it was exactly what he was imagining, it was a statement that had no need to be said.

Subaru: “I’d be fine with that, then.”

Jawsrough: “…What?”

Subaru: “Whenever you like, if you think my back is unworthy to be looked out for, then you can just pretend that I’m big enough so that it’d be okay for you to cut me down. I’ll make sure you won’t regret it through the way that I stand and present my back to you.”

Jawsrough: “…”

At Subaru’s declaration, Jawsrough opened his eyes wide, and his artificial eye fell out of his right eye socket. Bouncing off the tabletop, it rolled right in front of Subaru. Having realized that, Subaru caught it with his right hand, and pinched it with his fingers as he hoisted it before his face.

Then, locking eyes with the wooden eye at point-blank range, he looked past the prosthetic eye towards Jawsrough. As he looked, Subaru’s mouth was engraved with the smile of a mischievous boy, and,

Subaru: “Give up already and become my comrade, Jawsrough. You’re the last gladiator.”

At Subaru’s encouragement as he flashed his teeth, Jawsrough pressed his hand down on his empty right eye socket, while his remaining left eye slightly wavered, and cast its gaze downward.

That was the final show of resistance before the former lone-wolf, Jawsrough, finally returned to the pack.

2

Subaru: “S-Somehow I even got Jawsrough to become my comrade… It was a long road…”

With a plop, flopping down onto the hard bed in his room, Subaru put his hand over his face.

Occupying his young body was an enormous sense of exhaustion, along with a sense of pride and accomplishment that could rival or even surpass that.

After all, at the current moment, the total number of gladiators held prisoner on this Gladiator Island was upwards of six hundred—He had succeeded in making all of those gladiators his allies, and having them enlist in the Natsuki Schwartz Camp.

Subaru: “That really, took a long time…”

With his view obstructed by his hand on his face, Subaru took a long and deep sigh.

Without thinking about the specific amount of gladiators, Subaru had resolved himself to do it as he got back up on his feet upon his restart. From there, he began to fight anew while considering the circumstances of the island and the situations of the gladiators one thing at a time; that struggle of his were such that both the reader, and the narrator, would shed tears upon its recital.

But, while it began to seem like he would drown in those tears, the fact that he never ceased his fluttering kicks as he swam forward had been rewarded.

Thanks to that, he had gotten one step—

Subaru: “—Closer to painting over that worst possible development.”

Clenching the hand that had been on his face, while a dirty ceiling was reflected in his now open vision, Subaru felt a certain response and reflected upon the progression of the situation.

—This life was Natsuki Subaru’s second lap around the Gladiator Island.

It was not that this was his second time using Return by Death. As far as Return by Death was concerned, it was not on the level of two or three times; the amount of times he had restarted was completely incomparable.

What was meant by the second lap in this situation, was something separate from all his piled up instances of Return by Death, and was a case of turning back time on a much larger scale.

Subaru: "—After all, the way the last lap ended was horrible…"

Flashing through Subaru's mind as he muttered was an ending of despair, one that merely the word "worst" could never fully express.

It had been an ending where his acquaintances on the island, those who he had mutually recognized as comrades, were slain by a murderous blade one after the other; all the other people on the island experienced a massacre; without preventing that, the starting point of Return by Death continued to fall forwards, and it finally solidified itself as a situation where nobody could be saved anymore.

Originally, it was supposed to have been too late. It was supposed to have been that he could no longer save even a single person.

However, Subaru had refused for it to end in such a way, and so, relying on the being that had bestowed upon him the power to fight against the Deaths that he had faced many times—relying upon the Witch, he had been granted a final chance.

Once more, returning to the very first day that he was sent to this Gladiator Island, he had been granted the chance to start over on his fight, so that he would never arrive at that hopeless conclusion again.

Subaru was already in the midst of a plan to avert the total annihilation of the Gladiator Island.

For that purpose—

Subaru: "I will make every single person on this island my comrade."

Once again, it was an absolutely preposterous plan. But, he had no choice but to see it through.

In the future where the Gladiator Island was completely annihilated, everyone on the island would be in the same boat.

In order to drive away the messengers who bring about that calamity, the unity of everyone was absolutely indispensable.

Then, when he had succeeded in making an ally out of the lone-wolf Jawsrough, who among the gladiators he had been unable to find any clues for how to persuade, Subaru had cleared one of the hurdles in the plan.

Subaru: “Honestly, it feels like a speedrun to earn favorability… in the time loop genre, the protagonist often starts to move efficiently and various things happen, but in reality, things don’t go so smoothly.”

In the various manga and games that Subaru had encountered, there were characters with similar circumstances to Subaru; thinking back on his hardships until now, and about the sheer difference that there would have been in the struggle if he would have swapped places with them, he dropped his shoulders.

Unlike video games, the people Subaru was encountering in reality also had consciousness and emotions, so if he were to undertake the doctrine of efficiency and ignore those emotions, those people would not honestly join hands with him.

For that reason, he had tasted the failure of being unable to construct personal relationships many times, and hence—

???: “—Basu! Basu! I heard all about it!”

As he thought back on those hardships, a boisterous voice sounded from the front of the room. Then, without hesitation, the voice’s owner forced the door open and burst in wearing a cheerful face.

His blue hair tied behind his head, clad in vibrant pink and blue clothes, was the pretty boy—Cecilus Segmunt, the problem child of the Gladiator Island who proclaimed himself as the owner of that name.

Cecilus Segmunt was the name of this country's strongest warrior, and though Subaru generally thought that the boy in front of him was probably the real deal, it was still an unsettled matter, and hence it would continue to be treated as a self-proclamation.

In any case, with quite the delighted face, Cecilus looked upon Subaru on the bed, and—

Cecilus: "It seems that you've finally persuaded Jawsrough-san, now haven't you?! My my, when Basu first said something like "I'm going to make everyone on the island my comrade", I was really quite happy with all that big talk, but dear me, I really must say bravo, I'm quite amazed that you've come this far!"

Subaru: "…Ahh, ummm, is that a congratulations? Ceci…"

Cecilus: "Congratulations? Indeed, it certainly is congratulations! Although there are many gladiators who have come to the Gladiator Island Ginunhive thus far, there's been nobody who has harbored ambition and aspirations quite like Basu and come so close to realizing them! It's something that should be extolled as an incredibly great undertaking!"

Subaru: "Then, now at the end, are you going to boast about how powerful your own fate was that you picked me up along the coast?"

Cecilus: "That's absolutely right! As I was aimlessly and innocently going on one of my occasional walks outside, I ended up picking up Basu. That is the precise evidence of what I possess! Perhaps it's the basis as to why I am the leading actor of this world!"

Openly singing his own praises, Cecilus gave a smile while feeling good, and Subaru gave a wry smile in return.

Cecilus was firing out a series of words as if he was a machine gun, but surprisingly, he felt no discomfort in being made to listen to those overwhelming words. The person concerned had no hesitation or restraint while speaking, and yet perhaps it was because his choice of words was fair and delicate.

Just as he called himself the leading actor, it seemed that he had the dignity to not speak of things he did not want others to hear.

Cecilus: “Nonetheless, you really shouldn’t be careless, Basu.”

Subaru: “Careless?”

Being told so, Subaru sat up straight on the bed. Then, as Cecilus nodded with a “Yes, indeed”, he thrust his finger at the speed of lightning to the tip of Subaru’s nose.

It was really too fast for even his eyes to perceive, and bad for his heart.

Subaru: ““Careless”, just what am I being careless about?”

Cecilus: “I think that you must certainly feel pretty good about winning nearly all of the gladiators on the island over to your side, but Ginunhive isn’t so easy that your conquest would be completed with only that. It’s an island that has only ever had a single escapee since it first became known as the Gladiator Island.”

Subaru: “Escapee…”

Cecilus: “It’s not something unrelated to you, right? After all, Basu’s objective is to get off of the island.”

Thinking about how he had been rambling on and on, he now cut into the crux of the matter with a brief comment.

Witnessing that good use of conversational arts akin to a combat style, Subaru scratched his cheek. He had hit the bullseye, but until now, Subaru had not spoken even once to Cecilus about something like getting off the island.

Cecilus: “Oya oya it seems like you are quite surprised but it’s a matter of course. After all, if it’s become this much of a rumor across the island, my ears have also happened to hear the leak about Basu’s identity.”

Subaru: “Don’t tell me that the guards also know about this?!”

Cecilus: “Ah, you don’t need to worry about that. I may have gone a little over with the things I just said. What I mean by rumors on the island is merely just within the network of gladiators. Okay?”

Subaru: “OK OK geez, you’re confusing me…”

Because Cecilus had limited the words that he had used to express himself, it almost seemed like Subaru’s plan was about to collapse.

Of course, regarding the topic of Subaru’s “identity” that Cecilus had just brought up, he would make effective use of it against those who controlled this island, but it would be inconvenient if the management had already heard about it.

If they were to hear about it, he would ensure that it would be during the scene where the display would be the utmost effective.

Subaru: “However, I just narrowly escaped it there, but it wouldn’t be strange if it were to slip out sometime…”

Cecilus: “stare~~”

Subaru: “On that point, I guess I should remind everyone to not spread the rumor, and…”

Cecilus: “stare~~, stare~~”

Subaru: “…What is it, Ceci? Your stare and emphasis are really noisy.”

Subaru had placed his hand to his chin as he pondered, and Cecilus had given an intense stare to his side-profile. He had even gone out of his way to add emphasis to the intensity of his stare by using vocalizing onomatopoeia, but upon seeing Subaru’s frowning reaction, Cecilus let out a “No no no!” as he began to exaggeratedly wave his hands around, and,

Cecilus: “You are quite seemingly looking straight ahead to the future but you are still neglecting that which is under your very feet, Basu! Don’t you understand? I only said nearly all of the island's gladiators. Isn't there a difference between nearly all and all? That should be doubtless!"

Subaru: "Yep, I do know that though."

Cecilus: "So then so then so then! That stubborn lone-wolf Jawsrough-san may have certainly been quite the formidable obstacle, but even he was nothing more than an opening act that served as a prelude to the main event! You shouldn't be forgetting such an obvious fact!"

Subaru: "Yep, I also know that."

While listening to Cecilus, who used up the entirety of his lung capacity each time he spoke, Subaru turned his head back when Cecilus unusually made one or two valid points.

Indeed, securing Jawsrough had been a large step for the sake of Subaru's objective, but he was only one of the hurdles which Subaru had to overcome, not the entirety of the obstacles.

At Subaru's answer and expression of determination, Cecilus slightly widened his eyes.

From there, his cheeks eased into a very delighted look.

Cecilus: "Is that so now, is that so? In that case, what do you intend to do next?"

Subaru: "Well, I'll just say that a secret is a secret for now, and that it's something I want to discuss with everyone. In regards to the main event of this island, we'll also go into more detail about that during that conversation."

Cecilus: "Fufufu, I see, I see, you're building to the climax. But alas! No matter how much advanced preparations and war arrangements you make, the height of the wall that is the main event is not something you can be so sure of!"

Putting his hands in the sleeves of his kimono, Cecilus flapped the fabric around as he felt elated with triumph.

Cecilus had devoted himself to preaching about the greatest enemy, the thing known as carelessness, and giving a nod to his manner of speaking, Subaru got up off of the bed and headed towards the hallway.

Then—

???: "—Schwartz-sama, everyone is currently gathered in the dining hall."

With that, greeting Subaru as he exited the room was a young girl, clad in a kimono different to the one worn by Cecilus. Out of her head grew two splendid horns, and she was a deergirl of the same generation as the current Subaru, Tanza.

Tanza had a reason to survive through this Gladiator Island, where she had been sent off to together with Subaru. Giving that cooperative young girl a large grin, Subaru gave her a pat on the shoulder and let out a "Got it",

Subaru: "Well then, shall we begin?—Conquest of the Gladiator Island, Final Stage."

Such had been the manner of his declaration to both Tanza and Cecilus.

3

Hiain: "Yo, bro, we're all good to go whenever you are. So when are we gonna begin?—The simultaneous uprising, where we'll seize full control of the island!"

As Subaru arrived at the dining hall, waiting for him at their usual table was the lizardman—Hiain, who gave a big wave of his hands, and dropped such a bombshell announcement in a loud voice.

He was scared of this information getting out; such a thought unconsciously discouraged the resolve which Subaru had just settled in front of his room, but Hiain, carefree as he was, received a hard bash to the back of his head from somebody.

Screaming out a "Gyaaaargh!" Hiain cowered as he embraced his own head. The one clenching their own fist behind him was a man who had skeleton-like tattoos over his body, Weitz.

While wearing an angered expression that amplified the fierce look he had from his tattoos,

Weitz: “Stop incessantly blathering on with that loud voice, ya lizard bastard… Think about Schwartz’s position…!”

Hiain: “S-Still, that ain’t something ya should hit me over! It really ain’t!”

Weitz: “If that were true, then I would’ve had to slit yer throat there…”

Hiain: “The fuck’s wrong with ya, asshole?!”

Receiving a glare from Weitz as he spoke in a hushed voice, Hiain glared right back at him, speaking in a loud voice.

There were many times when these two, who could not get along no matter what, would quarrel and glare at each other in this way.

Idra: “Good grief, the more you two cause a ruckus like that, the more attention you’re going to attract. That would probably be much more bothersome for Schwartz.”

Ignoring the quarreling duo and giving a wry smile was the other person seated at their table, Idra. Stroking his beard, he pat his hand on the chair next to his own, and,

Idra: “Schwartz, come and sit. I’m no Hiain, but I was hoping to speak with you.”

Subaru: “Yeah, I also intended to do just that. Tanza, next to me. Ceci, if you’re gonna be noisy, go over there. If you can be quiet, then feel free to sit with us.”

Cecilus: “To tell me to be quiet is a rather futile effort but I suppose it’ll have to do. I’d much rather stay silent than not be able to be present for the conversation beyond this point.”

Giving a very long and drawn out explanation, Cecilus seated himself at the edge of the table. Ascertaining that, Subaru seated himself next to Idra, and next to him sat Tanza.

Even Hiain and Weitz, who were wrangling, upon seeing Subaru and the rest take their seats, had no choice but to cease their dispute, and sit at the table.

And then—

Hiain: "—So, when are we gonna do it? I said it earlier, but everyone is good to go."

Weitz: "Lizard bastard…"

Hiain: "What the hell! I'm talkin' in a really quiet voice, the hell did I do wrong?!"

Despite lowering his voice, Hiain received a death stare from Weitz upon digging up the topic from just earlier. Just when it seemed like those two were about to go at it for a second round, Subaru extended his arms out and exclaimed "Wait!".

To begin with, it would be futile for the two of them to begin fighting here.

In any case—

Subaru: "Sorry for getting you all fired up, but we won't be doing a simultaneous uprising. For all the gladiators to seize control of the island, and for us to be its rulers… that's not what I desire, after all."

Hiain: "Ngha?!"

Weitz: "What…?"

When clearly told that they had misunderstood their course of action, naturally Hiain, and even Weitz, who ought to have been opposed to the former, both widened their eyes in surprise.

Somehow, even though he had rebuked Hiain's hasty conduct, it seemed that Weitz had also believed without a doubt that their course of action was to seize control of the island by brute force.

Subaru: “Well, I guess it really would be a strategy befitting of violent gladiators, but…”

Tanza: “There would be no chance of victory. Have the two of you forgotten? The Governor of this island, Gustav Morello-sama, has imposed a Curse Rule over us.”

Hiain: “Ghk…!”

Subaru deepened his wry smile, and to his side, Tanza voiced her astonishment while remaining expressionless.

Upon hearing what the little girl had pointed out, Hiain’s throat clogged up, and Weitz also made a bitter face.

—The Curse Rule was something that bound the prisoners of the Gladiator Island, chains of a curse invisible to the eye.

If the Curse Rule were to be violated, the lives of the gladiators would be taken without mercy. And, the one who imposed that Curse Rule over everyone was the Island Chief, Governor Gustav Morello.

If he ever felt the need to do so, he could completely annihilate the gladiators of the Gladiator Island in the blink of an eye. If he was able to specify the target of the Curse Rule, it would be easy for him to destroy only the ones participating in the insurrection.

Tanza: “As long as that Curse Rule is not dispelled, seizing control of the island is a dream within a dream. Do the two of you now understand just how thoughtless the things you have been saying are?”

Weitz: “Tch…”

Hiain languidly slumped his upper body on the table, and Weitz folded his arms as he clicked his tongue in displeasure. Though, the most important thing was that both of them understood the gravity of the matter at hand.

Idra: “However, even if you were to go through the trouble of making all the island’s gladiators your allies, the moment the Governor suspects you, we’re all done for. I doubt that your desire is just to be the king of the hill, Schwartz.”

Subaru: “As expected, Idra is quite astute.”

At that comment, Subaru snapped his fingers, and Idra snorted slightly and relaxed his lips.

Just as Idra had pointed out, if they did not do anything about the Curse Rule, then Subaru’s position would come to an end at becoming king of the hill. But, Subaru’s objective lay outside the island. To be more precise, it was to make every single person on the Gladiator Island into his ally, and then escape with them off of the island.

That was the exact conclusion of the Gladiator Island Volume that Subaru was planning.

Cecilus: “But but it’s certainly that y’know. There’s a promising chance that Basu could possibly even pluck off that Curse Rule and run straight through, right?”

Subaru: “Ceci, you promised to keep your mouth shut.”

Cecilus: “Excuse me excuse me. It’s just that, y’know, I don’t think that Basu’s true intention is to go out of his way to make all of his esteemed allies all anxious about this thing and that, isn’t that right?”

While tapping the table with two of his fingers, Cecilus mocked their meeting in such a way.

At Cecilus’s remark and attitude, Hiain and the rest of them all looked at Subaru with unpleasant faces. Even Subaru could guess what the intention of those gazes was, but the one to clearly put it into words was Tanza.

Just like the other three, the unease she felt in what Cecilus had said emerged within her eyes, and, Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, um, are you sane to be doing this with Cecilus-sama?”

Subaru: “If you ask about my sanity rather than just if I’m serious, then at that point, I’d want to deny it no matter what you’re asking.”

Tanza: “I sincerely apologize. It was an unintentional slip of the tongue. Are you seriously doing this with Cecilus-sama?”

Tanza had wanted to ask if his strategy depended on Cecilus, and as if supporting her question, the rest of the Unit put intensity into their gazes.

While under the gazes of those four, as well as Cecilus’s self-confident gaze, Subaru breathed a sigh, and,

Subaru: “No? In my strategy to somehow deal with the Curse Rule, I’m not thinking about getting help from Ceci.”

Cecilus: “Yes yes indeed for my time on stage to finally come around here, it will be showtime for the main performer and WAIT WHAT DID YOU SAY?!”

Subaru: “I mean, what would be the point if only Ceci escaped from the Curse Rule? That wouldn’t be a solution to the problem at all, now would it?”

In the time of a single breath, Cecilus had stood up on the table, tried to put on a show, and was then taken aback. From his position, he examined Subaru’s expression, but Subaru poked his nose and caused him to back down.

Cecilus had been roaring down a mistaken highway since before they came to the dining hall, but unfortunately for him, it was impossible that Subaru, having gone as far as making Jawsrough into his ally, would set his next objective to be Cecilus.

For Cecilus in particular, he had intended on preparing the right situation, but—

Weitz: “In that case, what in the world do ya plan on doing,

Schwartz?”

Subaru: “About the Curse Rule?”

Weitz: “Yeah… As much as it annoys me, the fake warrior has a point… If you’re unable to overcome the Governor’s Curse Rule, then ya won’t…”

Subaru: “Hm?”

Weitz: “Then ya won’t be able to meet with yer father, His Excellency the Emperor…”

He had a grave expression and heavy tone, however what Weitz spoke of was quite admirable.

Subaru: “…”

In an instant, Subaru smiled at Weitz’s words, and then took a deep breath.

It was not just Weitz; both Hiain and Idra, perhaps also Cecilus, who was not particularly interested, as well as the considerable number of gladiators, all would have had this misunderstanding. — That Subaru was the illegitimate child of the Emperor that had become a popular topic of conversation all around the Empire.

The rumored existence of a black-haired Crown Prince was certainly in the process of spreading throughout the Vollachian Empire, and it had become the core of the budding rebellion; it was said that he was plotting to usurp the Imperial Throne from the current Emperor.

Moreover, the existence of Subaru, who displayed actions on this Gladiator Island unsuited to his age, was suspected by everyone to be the very person rumored as the black-haired Crown Prince.

Thus—

Subaru: “That’s right. I also wanna give my shitty old man a strong punch to the gut.”

Intentionally not clearing up that misunderstanding, Subaru utilized it as a proactive means to grasp the hearts of the people on the island.

He felt ashamed about deceiving the people of his Unit, whom he was quite close with; but initially, it was they who had started to suspect Subaru of being the black-haired Crown Prince, and so it was something quite convenient in convincing them.

For the other gladiators, too, the establishment of being the Emperor's illegitimate child was favorable for quite a few people. So, at least until they left Ginunhive, he had no intention of revealing the truth.

However—

Tanza: "…"

Silent and motionless, Tanza examined Subaru's side-profile. She was the only person who knew that Subaru was not really the illegitimate child of the Emperor, and understood Subaru's lie.

Even if most of their time in contact with each other was as members of the Unit, they had known each other from Chaosflame before coming to the island. He thought that to her, it would be difficult to pretend that he was the Emperor's illegitimate child, and above all else, leaving aside logic and efficiency, he just did not want to lie to Tanza.

After all, the chance for a second lap being granted to Subaru was thanks to the fact that in that world approaching a hopeless conclusion, Tanza had snuggled close to him until the very end of the end.

At any rate—

Hiain: "W-Well, in the end, what are we gonna do? Nobody's gonna go rioting. But we ain't givin' up in frustration either. So then, what do we do?"

Cecilus: "That's absolutely right just what do you plan on doing I wonder?! Isn't it just a little too underhanded to boast while showing everyone your dreams and having no actual plan? Basu doesn't seem to understand just how much of an injury it will be to bear on the hearts of those who will have their hopes completely betrayed!"

Subaru: "It seems like you're trying to condemn me on the same vector as Hiain, but what you're saying is an entirely different thing. First and foremost, I haven't said a single thing about including you in my plan, Ceci."

Cecilus: "Stupid Basu!"

With a hop, he jumped off the table, and while leaving behind a childish remark, Cecilus, just like the wind—with a speed that was truly just like the wind, he rushed out of the dining hall.

Seeing his back leave like a storm, Subaru sighed. Then, he turned back around to the faces of the people who were waiting to resume the conversation.

Tanza: "So then, Schwartz-sama, concerning the Curse Rule…"

Subaru: "Yep, if we don't do something about the Curse Rule, nobody will be able to leave the island. Therefore, let's make him an ally."

Weitz: "An ally…? Just who in the world…?"

Upon first listening, thinking that it meant somebody who possessed extraordinary power, Weitz's gaze searched for Cecilus's back at the entrance of the dining hall after the latter had just rushed out.

But, Subaru forced a smile, and prefacing his next words with "Ah, that's not it", he spoke.

Subaru: "I'm talking about Gustav-san."

Weitz: "…What?"

At Subaru's words, the companions of his Unit frowned, thinking that they had misheard him.

It was unavoidable that they would think that way. After all, that was the big boss of Gladiator Island's management; someone who was known by everyone for his rigid style of work, and as an embodiment of unbending loyalty towards the Empire.

Even so, if he was going to surmount the Curse Rule, this could not be avoided.

Hence, for the second time now, Subaru bluntly declared.

Subaru: "I'll do something about the Curse Rule. For that purpose, I'm gonna win Gustav-san over as our comrade."

Thus he declared.

4

—Governor of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, Gustav Morello.

A member of the Multi-Arm Tribe who possessed four burly arms, wearing a uniform that tightly wrapped around his large body of two and a half meters, he was a tough-looking gentleman who had his hair carefully combed back.

His expression and speech were strict, but he was not someone who could not be communicated with or understood, and Subaru's impression was that he was one of the exceedingly rare adults who was sensible in the Vollachian Empire.

But then again, he was very strict with rules, and Subaru had an even stronger impression that he would not allow their distance to be closed, so there was no doubt that he was going to be a formidable enemy in the sense of this conquest.

Subaru: "Even so, it's necessary that we secure Gustav-san."

Of course, the existence of the Curse Rule was a large reason for Subaru's stubborn thinking.

If they did not surmount the Curse Rule that punished those who violated the rules and robbed them of their very lives, then the gladiators cooperating with Subaru would be unable to escape annihilation, and in the end, they would arrive at the conclusion of the massacre.

Even supposing they had some sort of method to nullify the Curse Rule, Subaru did not wish for the lives of Gustav and his guards to be taken in an armed uprising by the gladiators.

Subaru did not like the Vollachian Empire, nor did he like this Gladiator Island, but he had no intention of turning an irrational abhorrence to the people carrying out their professional duties as soldiers and guards.

Subaru: “Prisoners are bullied and ridiculed by guards, that sort of development is a cliché in fiction, but so far I haven’t heard about anything like that here.”

He thought that it was likely not limited to just fiction, but such a structure of violent control born out of difference in positions was not something that had materialized on this island. These circumstances were also tightened by Gustav’s thorough enforcement of control and discipline, and the embodiment of his leadership as Governor.

Long story short, if he could secure Gustav, then he would not have to win over each guard one by one; rather, it was quite likely that they would all become his allies at once.

Subaru: “In that case, there’s no reason not to do it, right?”

Tanza: “I understand what you are saying, but…”

As Subaru presented the extent of the merits that would come with the acquisition of Gustav, Tanza made a troubled face as she covered her mouth with her hand.

Now, they had moved out of the dining hall, and were on one of the lookout platforms overlooking the island.

They were relatively free to move around the Gladiator Island when not participating in a show, but this lookout platform was quite the popular spot among the gladiators. It was difficult to see the prisoner tower from here, and by feeling even the slightest bit closer to the sky, they could get the hallucination of freedom. It was a rather popular trick.

Subaru: “The reason for the trick is way too sincere…”

Tanza: “That alone is enough to show that everybody here is starved for freedom. That is precisely why they all have such high expectations of Schwartz-sama. The black-haired Crown Prince… Although that is merely a fabrication.”

Subaru: “Don’t say that so clearly… You don’t know if anyone is listening in from behind, after all.”

Tanza: “Unlike Hiain-sama, I am quite careful.”

While nonchalantly dissing Hiain, Tanza, with a composed face, looked far out into the distance—to the opposite side of the lake, she thought nostalgically of the world beyond that shore.

From Ginunhive, completely surrounded by the lake, the outside world could not be seen. For both Subaru and Tanza, their respective concerns and interests lay beyond the far shore of the lake. Subaru understood her impatient feelings to a painful extent.

The ripples of the young girl’s emotions were hard to see, but Subaru understood just how much her heart was burning.

Tanza: “…So, what do you intend on doing?”

Subaru: “—! Will you help me confront him?”

Tanza: “Just like everybody else, I possess strong feelings to give up on this. However, after spending just a few days with you, I have come to understand that Schwartz-sama is not very good at giving up.”

At Tanza’s words, dropping her shoulders as if to say “It cannot be helped”, Subaru gave a wry smile and scratched his head.

Though what had emerged on his face had the nuance of a wry smile, he was truly happy from the bottom of his heart to have this kind of reinforcement.

After all, he had told Hiain, Weitz, and Idra about his plan to turn Gustav into an ally, but the three of them had simultaneously drooped to the conclusion that it was "impossible" and dispersed.

To be precise, they had the flavors of "Ya gotta cool yer head", "There are things you can do, and things you can't do" and "Leave it to me, I'll peel Gustav's skin off and use it to impersonate him…", but no result was yielded from having them as comrades.

Subaru: "On that point, Tanza is earnestly worried for my sake! I love it!"

Tanza: "…As expected, are you perhaps urging me to reconsider abandoning you?"

Subaru: "Wait wait wait wait wait, my bad. But, since you really are worrying, idea please."

Tanza: "aideea…"

Regurgitating that broken English, Tanza cast her large irises slightly downward, and,

Tanza: "First of all, we should plainly inform him that all of the gladiators now follow us, and use the difference in war potential as a shield in negotiations. How does that sound?"

Subaru: "I'm gonna have to say, nope. In Gustav-san's case, the moment he understands that we're conspiring and planning something, it seems like he'll use the Curse Rule to punish us."

Giving an answer to Tanza's suggestion, Subaru recalled his last lap, where faces he had not wanted to remember had visited the Gladiator Island as messengers, and from there began arguing back and forth with Gustav.

The messengers were concerned about the threat of the people of the island causing domestic trouble, and suggested that the gladiators should all be disposed of at once, but Gustav had stubbornly refused to do so. That was not because he was backing the gladiators, but because of the sense of professional duty Gustav himself possessed.

At that time, it was just that Gustav did not follow the proposal to serve punishment based on mere doubts. The moment that suspicion would turn to confidence, Subaru did not think that Gustav would hesitate in utilizing the Curse Rule.

Subaru: “If we bluntly negotiate with armed might, there’s a low chance that Gustav-san won’t use the Curse Rule. That’s why, it’s a no.”

Tanza: “I sincerely apologize. It appears that I have been unable to be of use to Schwartz-sama.”

Subaru: “You’re done already?! Why does it feel like so many of the girls in this world tend to go for the brute force approach?!”

At Tanza’s apology, as she bowed her head from which her deer horns sprouted, Subaru deplored the heavens for the abundance of such carnivorous women.

To begin with, even though deer were supposed to be herbivores, this was the way Tanza had approached things. Just why was it that each woman he met, such as Medium and the Shudraq, were all predisposed to brute force?

Subaru: “Maybe Rem and Yorna-san are the exceptions… Nah, aren’t those two also relatively inclined to using brute force?”

Even though she lacked the ability to move due to her legs, Rem was also relatively the brute force type. Yorna too, who had performed explosive axe kicks to the Castle, could ultimately be said to be inclined towards brute force.

Tanza: “If you are speaking ill of Yorna-sama, I shall not forgive you.”

Subaru: “I’m not speaking ill of her, these are just my idle grumbles… Anyway, the fact that you’re helping me out does make me really happy, Tanza.”

Tanza: "—. Yes."

With a small nod, even if Tanza could not provide advice, she had agreed to help.

To be honest, Tanza's presence was both physically and mentally dependable for the current Subaru. In addition, it was Subaru's duty to meet her expectations and her faith in him as she stayed by his side.

Tanza: "So then, in the end, what do you intend on doing? "

With that, coming full circle back around to the same question, Subaru suddenly looked up to the sky.

What would he do, the answer to Tanza's question was—

Subaru: "First and foremost, I'd like to get to know him a bit better."

Tanza: "Eh?"

Indifferent to the feelings of Subaru and everyone else present below it was the detestable blue sky, now revealed as the clouds slightly cleared up. Glaring at it as he spoke, Subaru's words caused Tanza to gaze in wonder.

And then—

???: "—Kept you waiting, Schwartz."

Hearing that stern voice fall upon his ears from a place much closer to the sky than he was, Subaru lowered his gaze down. Next to him, Tanza's small body tensed up, and unrest also began to spread throughout the other gladiators present on the lookout platform.

That was a matter of course. After all, it was a rather rare occurrence for that man to visit the lookout platform.

Governor of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, Gustav Morello; that very person.

Subaru: “Glad you could make it here, Gustav-san.”

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama!! Did you call the Governor here?!”

Subaru: “That’s right. I made an appointment, since it wouldn’t do any harm.”

Tanza raised her voice nervously, and Subaru calmly nodded as he responded to her question.

Taking dignified steps towards those two, the large figure, so tall that even if the pair of these little children got on each other’s shoulders they would not meet its eye level, approached them.

Crossing his four burly arms, Gustav unintentionally cast a shadow over Subaru and Tanza, and then,

Gustav: “As the official, I am not here on free time. To summon me here so casually is quite the inconvenience.”

Subaru: “This is far from the likes of a whim. I summoned you fully prepared for you to get angry with me. If I really was summoning you casually, I would have told you to bring a lunchbox and invited you on a picnic.”

Gustav: “Whether it be you, Tanza, or Segmunt, it is quite the strange disposition for young individuals to have such nerves of steel.”

Tanza: “…Though, I find it unpleasant to be evaluated on the same level as those two.”

While still maintaining her feelings of tension in front of Gustav, she interjected upon hearing a comment that she could not ignore.

Although, he thought that her attitude completely supported what Gustav had just said about their nerves, and Subaru also thought that unlike himself on this second lap, her nerves were a natural thing, and hence she was quite dependable.

Anyhow—

Subaru: “Even though you’re busy with work, I’m happy that you found a moment to spare.”

Gustav: “In a sense, you are currently in the position that attracts the most attention on the Gladiator Island. Even more so than Segmunt, who boasts an oppressive strength that allows none to approach him.”

Subaru: “Is that so? If I may say so myself, I think his fighting style shouldn’t be displayed in front of an uncouth audience.”

Gustav: “Naturally, he has not had as many chances as you to display that fighting style before others.”

Although his voice held neither anger nor astonishment, Gustav flatly declared thus.

As Subaru scratched his cheek, Gustav began to move his large mouth, which was made more fierce by the two fangs that protruded from it, and then,

Gustav: “Do not tell me that you intend on keeping this up? Participating in every Sparka that opens, and putting your life on the line to help fight for the survival of other gladiators.”

Indeed, the reason why Gustav had responded to Subaru’s summons; to ask a question regarding a situation which he held doubts about.

Participating in Sparka—That was, on this second lap around the Gladiator Island, the greatest contribution to Subaru making many gladiators into his allies. All of the gladiators were made to fight against a Witchbeast known as a Gladiator Beast in the name of Sparka, and they needed to risk their lives in order to be victorious.

That which was most feared on this island, but at the same time, that which was the best way to demonstrate the way of being of an Imperial Citizen; making use of those as opportunities, Subaru had gained the respect and trust of the gladiators.

However—

Gustav: “As the official, I have also learned the ways of the warrior in the past. I did not become a fully-fledged combatant, but I believe I have developed an eye for talent. Speaking from that point of view, Schwartz, the fact that you have survived all of the Sparkas that you have participated in until today was nothing more than merely treading on thin ice.”

Subaru: “…”

Gustav: “If you mess up one small thing. Or rather, if you fail to account for one small thing, your life shall be lost. In my capacity, I’ve encountered gladiators with various opinions on life and death, but your methods are devoid of all reason.”

Analyzing Subaru’s completely reckless fighting style, Gustav firmly concluded.

That judgment of Gustav’s was accurate. In reality, Subaru had participated in Sparka many times, but it was not as if Subaru’s presence had considerably lowered the danger of Sparka.

Were it Cecilus who was participating, he would instantly kill the Gladiator Beast and distort the way of Sparka, and Gustav and the rest of the management would not be able to let it go without imposing some type of penalty.

Subaru: “But, that would be unreasonable for my way of fighting. Each time, I’m fighting for my dear life, after all.”

Gustav: “It is very apparent that you are not acting. The fact that many of the gladiators are in a frenzy about your fights, is for no other reason than because they understand that you stand upon the same level ground that they do, and face battle.”

Tanza: “After all, Schwartz-sama does not allow for my participation…”

As Tanza cast her eyes down and muttered so, Subaru felt a stinging sensation pierce him. But, if he were to accept Tanza’s help, then Subaru, weak as he was, would begin to desire her help.

There would be no meaning in that. —The trust of the gladiators was something that Subaru had to win on his own.

Gustav: “Your streak of good fortune shall not last long. Shortly, perhaps even the very next time, your fortune shall be severed.”

Subaru: “Is that a declaration that Gustav-san will directly send in a super powerful Gladiator Beast?”

Gustav: “It is merely a rule of thumb. Misfortune is something that approaches under the guise of good fortune. Certainly, it is something that you should take to heart. —In my capacity, I also believe that it would be regrettable for you to die.”

Subaru was surprised at Gustav’s unexpected words, and Tanza also widened her eyes. As usual, Gustav’s scary face did not allow for his emotions to leak through, but it did not seem like what he said had been a lie. Strangely enough, in their peculiar relationship which could not be labeled as friends or foes, he had faith that Gustav would not lie.

Subaru: “Gustav-san, why are you the Governor of the island?”

Gustav: “How abrupt.”

Subaru: “Is that so? Originally, I just called Gustav here today because I wanted to talk about this and that. Or, perhaps you already have to go back?”

Gustav: “…”

Subaru: “By the way, since you’re always soldiering on and persevering, doing work at your desk, getting a suitable amount of breaks by changing pace can produce more efficient results while working. It was proven in a research study done in California.”

Gustav: “In my capacity, that is not a word that I know. Incidentally, have you been teaching those words to Segmunt recently?”

Subaru: “In Ceci’s case, it’s not that I’ve been teaching him, it’s just that he’s been absorbing them on his own.”

Clearing up those false accusations, Subaru asked “So then, how about it?” to ascertain if Gustav had any intention of continuing this conversation.

Upon hearing Subaru’s question, after a brief silence, Gustav spoke,

Gustav: “In my capacity, that reason that I accepted the occupation of Governor was none other than because I had received a direct command from His Excellency the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia.”

With that, he began to recite his story up until today, the tale of Gustav Morello.

5

Gustav: “Originally, in my capacity, I was treated as the odd one out, even in my own tribe. This was because there are many in the Multi-Arm Tribe who are predisposed towards violence, and that trait was uncharacteristic of myself, in my capacity.”

Among the wide variety of demi-human races, the special trait of the Multi-Arm Tribe was quite easy to understand at a glance.

They were born with an average of four to six arms, and since those arms were able to wield weapons and tools, there was no need to speak of just how useful they were in war. Be that as it may, it was because the activities of the Eight-Arms, born of the Multi-Arm Tribe, had been propagated that the warriors of the tribe came to be known as powerful.

The existence of the Eight-Arms, having gained fame as a warrior of the Vollachian Empire, brought hope to his fellow members of the Multi-Arm Tribe, and many of his brethren rushed toward the battlefield, and with more arms than the other races, they brandished their weapons.

Gustav: “In my capacity, I was not drunk on that same fervor. While my brethren were charmed by the valor and glory that awaited them on the battlefield, I was far more suited to enjoying books, raising livestock, and protecting our homes. In my capacity, my brethren lambasted me as a coward, but not once have I felt ashamed.”

The fervor of the Eight-Arms ran rampant within the tribe before Gustav had been born. His father and grandfather, his siblings and friends, all of them dreamt of the battlefield, but for Gustav, it had not been so.

Blood was spilled, arms were severed; instead of granting their dreams, fate had decided that their dreams would fleetingly scatter upon the battlefield—It seemed to him that becoming a warrior was nothing more than approaching a death of futility.

Gustav: “It is not that I fear death. What I fear, in my capacity, is that my death shall bring about nothing. I wanted to avoid the situation where my life would be expended, lost as a futile and meaningless death.”

His father and grandfather and siblings and friends had all expended their lives as futile and meaningless deaths, losing their lives without reaching the status of a legend like the Eight-Arms.

He did not think that his own thoughts were correct, nor did he think that those who had died were mistaken, but since Gustav had survived, those of his tribe began to treat him all the more harshly. Since everyone’s loved ones had died, but the person who was supposed to be lambasted as a coward had remained alive, they could not go without harboring hateful feelings towards him.

Gustav had accepted that as something unavoidable.

However—

Gustav: “My village, having lost many of my brethren, was attacked by bandits. They were thinking that all of the men had died on the battlefield, and only the women and children remained.”

The bandits had thought correctly; Gustav’s tribe did not have many ways to resist.

Houses were burned, belongings were plundered, women and children were killed for sport, and there was nothing they could do to stop it. The only man who had not gone to the battlefield, only

Gustav fought against the enemy; the man of the Multi-Arm Tribe who hated the battlefield, and had kept away from swinging weapons, stood no chance, and his resistance was immediately suppressed.

Then, unable to do a single thing, Gustav was about to be decapitated, but—

Gustav: "—Just before my life, in my capacity, came to an end, a gust of wind wedged its way through."

The man who had raised his axe to cut off Gustav's head, his own neck was sliced by the wind in the blink of an eye; the bodies of all the surrounding bandits were also cut down in quick succession.

Then, when the wind stopped, those who survived were only Gustav, and just a few of his fellow tribes-people. The bandits were all slain with not a single one left standing, and only a pool of their blood remained on the grassland.

Before Gustav, astonished as he was, appeared a lone man who had accompanied that wind.

Gustav: "The man, who from my perspective in my capacity, was of small build, spoke thus: "For what reason is a member of the Multi-Arm Tribe, of whom many have died upon the battlefield, currently on these lands where women and children have been killed?" And so, I answered to the best of my capacity: "I did not go to the battlefield. Because fighting and war are both things I detest.""

Judging from the bloody situation they were placed in, that had been an impudent dialogue unbefitting the scene. But, his brain numb from the overwhelming circumstances, it was not a situation in which Gustav could ascertain the proper judgment.

Therefore, that was the dialogue that had formed, and the man, receiving an answer to his question, surveyed their surroundings, and,

Gustav: "The man said this: "I am of the same opinion." Then, he said that he would grant me, in my capacity, the right to decide what would happen to the survivors and the ringleader of the bandits.”

According to the man accompanied by wind, it was a feudal lord of the surrounding area who was behind the bandit attack.

In order to ensure that the influential tribes living in his domain did not possess too much power, the feudal lord habitually dressed up his private army as bandits and carried out the act of culling; this time, the target of the culling was the Multi-Arm Tribe.

Gustav: “They had already taken the mastermind feudal lord captive. The man ordered me, in my capacity, to pass a verdict. Though he had been arrested, the feudal lord had not lost his dignity, and had preserved his vigor, but behind all that, I perceived that he harbored fear towards death. Therefore, in my capacity, I—”

Told to pass a verdict, Gustav did not kill the feudal lord.

Holding a weapon where he stood, he had been granted the opportunity for retribution by means of violence; retribution for the insult his brethren’s deaths being used, and retribution for the contemptible attack on his village. But, Gustav refused that opportunity.

Instead of death, Gustav decided to levy hard labor upon the feudal lord, and witnessing his decision, the surviving tribes-people shouted their objections. However, the man respected that Gustav did not distort his will.

Thus, he spoke.

Man: “Work under mine command, Gustav Morello. Your way of being may be seen as spineless, but I do not think that way. On these vast lands of the Empire, where strength is esteemed, your dignity shall be kept.”

Gustav: “Henceforth, in my capacity, I was given patronage. As I carried out my duties, I received opportunities to increase my court rank, and was granted the position of High Count. Then, on the day I was granted the position of High Count, the man—His Excellency the Emperor, directly ordered me to work as the Governor of the Gladiator Island."

The peaceful reign of the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, was close at hand; but then again, he was neither in a position similar to that of the Nine Divine Generals nor the Imperial Prime Minister, so it was not as though he had been able to continue watching the Emperor's capability while near him.

However, Vincent had shown Gustav a face, and told Gustav words, all of which were unknown to anybody else; so, though it was a matter of course, he had the self-confidence to accept it more deeply than anybody else possibly could.

The wisest Emperor had entrusted Gustav with a great duty, and sent him to the Gladiator Island. Thus, with recognition for his great obligation and his way of being in his heart, Gustav had no choice but to fulfill his professional duties to perfection.

Unmistakably, that very thing was—

Gustav: "—The reason why I, in my capacity as the official, carry out my professional duties on this Gladiator Island."

6

Under the blue sky on the lookout platform, the contents of the story Gustav had told them definitely did not suit the mood of the sunlight passing through the trees. Rather than a refreshing breeze passing over a lake, the wind of a bloody battlefield would be far more suited to that tale.

Gustav's attitude, his complexion, and his detached expression all remained unchanged, and Subaru breathed a long sigh, then,

Subaru: "You spoke a lot more candidly than I thought you would…"

Gustav: "Was it not you who inquired about the reason as to why I, in my capacity, assumed my professional duties, Schwartz? As the official, I intend to answer all questions as sincerely as possible."

Subaru: “I don’t doubt your sincerity. Well, I never doubted your sincerity to begin with.”

Deeds such as lying or deceit were far beyond the person known as Gustav.

After all, if there was something he could not speak about, he clearly stated that he could not speak about it. He was completely divorced from the sort of dishonesty where one would try to smooth things over with lies and falsehoods, all the while fabricating suitable details.

Nonetheless, as he had said, he did not expect Gustav to speak this candidly.

Subaru: “…Since you were rescued by His Excellency the Emperor, you pledged allegiance to him?”

Gustav: “That is not so. Strictly speaking, the one who rescued me, in my capacity, was the Blue Lightning, who was present by the Emperor’s side. If you want the reason for my debt of gratitude, perhaps it is because, as the official, my position would have been very different to what it is now.”

Tanza: “Blue Lightning…”

Making a troubled face, Tanza muttered after hearing those very words. It was an alias which Subaru had also heard of, but it had become complicated, and since the course of the conversation was changing, he decided to ignore it for the time being.

Subaru: “So then, is the reason for your loyalty because he respected your way of life?”

Gustav: “I have reluctance to declarations of emotions. Therefore, I shall refuse to give a response.”

Subaru: “…That’s exactly what I’d expect from Gustav-san.”

Gustav had expressed both the nature he had expected, and the reply he had expected.

For Subaru, there would not be anything that could surprise him from here on, but the appearance of a retainer who truly idolized the Emperor—truly idolized Abel, would make this the second person after Zikr. He really could not understand their feelings, but there was a good amount of people who had pledged their allegiance to Abel, not because they were following those around them, but because they had arrived at that conclusion on their own.

Gustav was one of those people, and that which he was ordered to do was—

Subaru: "—In preparation for an emergency, to train the gladiators in both body and mind, wasn't it?"

Gustav: "…It is not something I keep hidden, but how are you aware of that? It has not been long since you came to the island, so although there may be room for you to have a few suspicions of me, as the official…"

Subaru: "It's something like "walls have ears, and doors have eyes" and "doors can't get in the way of spreading rumors"."

He could not tell whether or not Gustav understood those expressions, so chalking it up to Gustav's inability to be dishonest, Subaru said "Leaving that aside" to change the topic through sheer force.

That which the Emperor had ordered Gustav to do, a duty that he would not yield even if he received a signed decree from the Prime Minister, that was—

Subaru: "The event of an emergency, don't you think that the current situation, where the Empire is on the verge of being plunged into tumult, would be one such event?"

Gustav: "…"

Subaru: "I've heard that Gustav-san has been doing all these preparations, and that the quality of the gladiators has risen incredibly. Old Man Null also said that ever since Gustav-san became Governor, it's a world of difference from before."

Old Man Null had a long history as a gladiator, and was a living witness to both the good and bad times on the island. Since he had provided testimony that there had never been a Governor better than Gustav, it was quite a big deal.

Gustav was admirably fulfilling the duty that the Emperor had ordered him to do.

Subaru: “But, even a shiny, valuable, excellent sword will be completely useless if kept contained in its scabbard.”

Gustav: “Schwartz, what are you trying to get me to do? If you continue to run your mouth with excessively imprudent comments, I shall have no choice but make use of my power as the official, and issue punishment.”

Subaru: “So you’ll force me to do a Sparka? But, Gustav-san, you should know that such a thing won’t really serve as a punishment for me, right?”

Gustav: “—. Merely ordering participation in Sparka, would not necessarily be the entirety of your penalty.”

After a moment’s hesitation, Gustav narrowed his eyes as he trained his gaze on Subaru. It was plain as day that the true meaning behind those words was that of the Curse Rule.

The fact that he did not want to use it if possible was communicated via the peacefulness within his eyes, which even his imposing appearance could not hide.

Gustav: “What sort of times we are currently living in, what sort of actions I shall take as the official, those are things that I, in my capacity, shall decide for myself. Schwartz, the only thing you ought to do is act in accordance with your awareness as a gladiator, and silently pass the time.”

Saying that, Gustav turned his back towards Subaru and Tanza.

If that was the final thing he wished to convey to Subaru, then he sure had spoken about far too many needless things. Whether or not Gustav himself was aware of that, he made quick strides walking along the stone paving of the lookout platform, and wanted to hastily leave from here.

So, although he felt sorry towards Gustav—

Subaru: “You gave me advice, so sorry about this, but there’s no way that I’m gonna pass the time in silence, Gustav-san.”

When the voice called out to the big bulky back, Gustav’s legs suddenly came to a halt. Gustav looked back around with only his head, and fixed his gaze upon Subaru, standing upright, and Tanza, waiting beside him.

Under that imposing gaze, Subaru slowly shook his head side to side.

Subaru: “Though I do like you Gustav-san, there are things that I gotta do. Since I have no intention of giving up on those things, I think I’m gonna be causing a racket for a little while longer.”

Gustav: “…Are you attempting to provoke me in my capacity?”

Subaru: “Nope. Just that I’ve settled my resolve, that sort of declaration of war.”

Flashing his teeth as he smiled, Subaru declared so, and witnessing that, Gustav stroked his own fangs using his two right arms. After briefly contemplating, he gave a deep sigh towards Subaru, whose smile could not be destroyed, and,

Gustav: “In that case, as the official, my side shall simply do nothing but perform our professional duties.”

Leaving only those words behind, this time Gustav actually left the lookout platform with large strides.

As his back vanished from sight, but still waiting until those audible footsteps could no longer be heard, Subaru finally released the tension he had put into his shoulders.

Subaru: “Good grief, as expected, it really is quite the strain to confront Gustav-san.”

Tanza: “This is not a matter for you to be saying “good grief”. I think it was I whose lifespan has been greatly diminished.”

As Subaru languidly took breaths, Tanza, released from her tension, hounded him with those words. Seeing her angered state, Subaru forced a smile saying “My bad, my bad”, and,

Subaru: “But, it was thanks to Tanza staying by my side that I was able to get through that without crying. Thank you.”

Tanza: “Perhaps it would have been better if you were exposed to the shame of crying, and then be made to reconsider, Schwartz-sama.”

Subaru: “Oi, oi, even if crying was on the same level as peeing my pants, I still wouldn’t back down, you know?”

Tanza: “I think in response to my foolish question, Schwartz-sama has given a foolish answer.”

That opinion was way too harsh. But, from Tanza’s perspective, it may have been natural to say that letting it get this far already was way too gracious.

After all, their opponent was the top position of the island, who could kill them in the time of a breath if he so desired, and even if they tried to run, it would be futile, since that opponent had placed a curse on them.

Tanza: “So then, without paying heed to your life, did you accomplish your objective, Schwartz-sama?”

Subaru: “Quite the thorny way of putting it… Please don’t treat me like you treat Ceci. After all, I do truly hold my own life dear.”

Tanza: “Did you accomplish your objective?”

Subaru: “That pressure is brutal! I accomplished it, I accomplished it! Rather than accomplished, it might be more natural to say that I ascertained it. —Seems like only using words won’t be enough to persuade him.”

Tanza's dark irises closing in on Subaru without hesitation was a knockout. Hearing him give that reply like he was complaining, Tanza frowned her round eyebrows.

Subaru's objective had been to ascertain just how much Gustav poured his heart into his professional duties as Governor. Then, he had wanted to figure out the foundation of the reason why he did so.

Fortunately, thanks to Gustav's doctrine of transparency, he was able to find out about those things. In exchange, he also found out about the underlying conviction for his unwavering loyalty.

Subaru: "Dammit, that masked bastard is really irritating."

Remembering the nasty and underhanded man bearing the mask of an Oni, who still got in his way despite being separated from him, Subaru pouted his lips, and then faced the sky as he reached out to it in a grand motion.

And then—

Subaru: "Tanza, can you call for Hiain and the others? I've decided on the next course of action."

At Subaru's declaration, Tanza's expression tensed up, and prompted the words that would follow through her silence.

She wore a dependable expression, which seemed like it wanted to say that no matter what his strategy was, they would certainly accomplish it; while Subaru faintly anticipated what her expression would shift to next, he continued.

Subaru: "—I'm gonna challenge Gustav-san to a Sparka."

Thus he declared.

7

—Challenging the Governor of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, Gustav Morello, to Sparka.

Having turned all of the gladiators on the island into his allies, solidifying his will to participate in the rebellion shaking the Vollachian Empire, that was Natsuki Subaru's strategy in order to complete his conquest of the Gladiator Island.

Tanza: "But, was it not you who had dismissed my proposal of armed negotiations as being the height of stupidity, Schwartz-sama?"

Subaru: "I didn't say anything like "the height of stupidity" though?! I cushioned the blow by saying it was gonna have to be a nope, didn't I? Tanza, I don't want you to hate me after all."

Tanza: "It seems that you speak in such a manner to everyone. So much so that you have even won over six hundred people."

Subaru: "Considering that your motive is worry, your words are still way too sharp…"

Her eyes and expression unchanged, Tanza closed in on Subaru with an indifferent voice as the latter became overwhelmed. The sudden change from his previous attitude of asking her to tell him anything was rather difficult to believe.

Having called Gustav down to the island's lookout platform, Subaru directly carried out a conversation with him.

There, in addition to Gustav's nature of which Subaru already knew, events unknown to him were revealed, ones that touched upon the main essence of Gustav's loyalty to the Emperor. Subaru thought that all of it was valuable information for his conquest, but now Tanza was in this sort of bad mood.

Be that as it may, it was only natural that she would be upset.

After all, Subaru's strategy to challenge him to Sparka probably did not seem all too different from her initial proposal of overpowering in negotiations by using their difference in war potential as a shield.

Tanza: "On the contrary, this would essentially be the same thing as a simultaneous uprising that both Hiain-sama and Weitz-sama spoke of, would it not?"

Subaru: “Tanza, the way you say “on the contrary” really shows your opinion of those two… But, it’s different from their idea. Of course, it’s also not the same as Tanza’s idea.”

Tanza: “…Please explain.”

Given some leeway from Tanza as she stared him down, Subaru lowered his hands, which had been raised in submission.

Tanza, with whom Subaru truly shared the same feelings of wanting to escape from the island, had been far too easy on him. The reason she was even helping Subaru was simply because she desired to reunite with Yorna as soon as possible. He reflected upon the fact that he had forgotten about that, and that he had heedlessly been relying on her.

In any case…

Subaru: “What I mean by challenging Gustav-san to a Sparka is different from the idea of seizing the island via brute force.”

Tanza: “In that case, what is your objective?”

Subaru: “I’m gonna make Gustav-san understand. —That the time for him to make a decision is coming.”

Ultimately, as if he had spoken a riddle, discontent emerged in Tanza’s eyes.

But, it was not at all as if Subaru had simply put it in a confusing way to be mean.

Subaru: “I have more trust in Tanza than she may think, but…”

Even if it were Tanza, he needed to be very careful about the information he gave her.

In the first place, with all of the island’s gladiators recruited as Subaru’s allies, the Gladiator Island was currently atop a more perilous equilibrium than it had ever been before. What had been detering the gladiators from uniting and erupting with their pent-up anger until now was the Curse Rule imposed by Gustav.

Due to the presence of the Curse Rule, the gladiators were unable to take strong measures due to fear of a one-sided slaughter. —However, Subaru was already aware of the whereabouts of the Curse Rule's cornerstone.

Subaru: "The Curse Tool is inside of Gustav-san's body…"

—In the world of the first lap, Todd and Arakiya had visited the Gladiator Island as messengers.

As a result of stubbornly disobeying the two special envoys sent from the Imperial Capital, Gustav had lost his life. Having opened up his back, Todd tore out the cornerstone of the Curse Rule from inside Gustav's body, the Curse Tool.

A black orb the size of a palm—the Curse Tool which had become a hindrance; if his goal was merely to take that away, it would be best for him to reenact that repulsive scene.

With that, the objective of Tanza and the gladiators would be complete, and everyone would probably be able to break free from the island.

However, the lives of Gustav and the guards would not be saved. —That was something which he hated.

Tanza: "—. Schwartz-sama, what kind of future are you picturing?"

Fixing her eyes on Subaru as he tried to choose his words carefully, Tanza enquired so of him.

Though she was still young, Tanza was by no means a fool. She fully understood that Subaru was not revealing all of the information he had, and that he was intentionally being secretive.

And for her, there was always the option to hear what Subaru knew via brute force at any time.

But even so…

Subaru: "…"

Intently waiting for an answer, Tanza did not resort to such measures as Subaru tried to remain sincere.

Precisely because she had confidence in that, it seemed to her that Subaru was acting not in selfishness, but rather in sincerity.

Subaru: “My ideal is that me, Tanza, everyone from our Unit, and the gladiators of the island all get along with Gustav-san and the others, joining hands as we leave the island together.”

That was why, without pranks or anything of the sort, Subaru honestly confided his true feelings to Tanza.

For a moment, irritation towards his enigmaticness flashed in Tanza’s eyes, but since she could tell that Subaru was not lying just by looking at him, it gently shifted to understanding and perplexity.

Tanza: “…No matter how you look at it, that idea is nothing but an idealistic dream.”

Subaru: “—Ngh, it’s not like that.”

Tanza admonished the unveiling of Subaru’s ideal as a rash aspiration. However, as Subaru immediately refused to fold with his quick rebuttal, an even greater amount of perplexity spread throughout Tanza’s large eyes.

It was probably a perplexity which could not comprehend just where Subaru’s confidence was coming from, but it was awfully ironic.

After all, this baseless confidence of Subaru’s was given to him by none other than Tanza herself.

Tanza: “Yes, that is correct, Schwartz-sama. Next time, without a doubt, we will not lose.”

Those were words that she had spoken to Subaru, who did not want to give up in a world that had once ended.

The magnitude of power that had bestowed upon Subaru was something which the current Tanza had no way of knowing.

Tanza: "…For the sake of that ideal, is your answer Sparka?"

Finally, as if she had succumbed to Subaru's unwavering gaze, Tanza breathed a sigh.

Perceiving that sigh, Subaru also relaxed his shoulders as he felt the slight stinging in the atmosphere calm down.

Granted, it was never as if he thought he would directly get into a jostle with Tanza.

Subaru: "Well, at worst, I was prepared to break an arm or two…"

Tanza: "If you thought I would commit such outrageous behavior, that is exceedingly unthinkable."

Subaru: "Yeah, that's right. Sorry, sorry, it's not that I doubted you Tanza, it's just that I've developed an overabundance of tension from some of my experiences."

If it was Rem, it was possible that she would fight over a difference of opinion to the extent of breaking his fingers, but that comment angered Tanza, since she would never do those sorts of things.

Even Tanza, a genuine citizen of the Empire, would be inclined to say that Rem's tendency to make snap judgements was overkill. Though, Rem's surprising honesty when it came to her emotions was one of her good aspects.

And, as Subaru's train of thought veered off-course, Tanza took a long sight as if she was astonished, and,

Tanza: "If we are truly speaking our honest feelings, I think that Schwartz-sama's plans are reckless, foolish, and too idealistic."

Subaru: "Gulp… W-Well, even if you say that, I can't help it…"

Tanza: "But…"

As Subaru's cheeks stiffened, Tanza interrupted his words with a rather strong tone. Gazing over the daunted Subaru, with a slight air of spite, Tanza: “In the beginning, when Chaosflame was first created, Yorna-sama would have likely faced similar ridicule of it being reckless, absurd, and impossible. Yet, she succeeded.”

Uttering the name of Yorna, whom she held in high regard, Tanza spoke of how she had accomplished the great feat of materializing her ideal.

Having laid eyes upon Chaosflame himself, Subaru could also imagine the reckless endeavor Yorna had attempted, along with how steep the road to materialize it would have been.

With Tanza as the first, it must have been a great help to many demi-human tribes.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, I am not trying to tell you that you are able to accomplish the same things as Yorna-sama. After all, Yorna-sama is an extraordinary person.”

Subaru: “I know. I’m not that conceited.”

Tanza: “But, were I to point and criticize someone’s ideal as being reckless, it would be tantamount to me ridiculing Yorna-sama’s ideal.”

For Tanza, who held a deep gratitude, love, and respect for Yorna, there was no way she could do such a thing.

It was not as if Subaru had been aiming for that when he spoke of his reckless ideals to her, but this little girl sorted through the feelings that were important to her, and the things that could be compromised, and chose to do so on her own.

Tanza: “However, Yorna-sama had both the power and the planning ability to materialize her grand ideal. Do you have such things, Schwartz-sama?”

Subaru: “…When compared to Yorna-san’s raw strength and intelligence, I’m at quite a disadvantage. But, in regards to planning ability, it’ll be handled through Sparka, and in regards to power—”

Tanza: “Regarding it…?”

Subaru: “I’m counting on all the gladiators, as well as Tanza, to be my power.”

Tanza: “How slick…”

Tanza finally removed her gaze from Subaru as he gave his response.

It was astonishing that he would rely on others in the end, but Subaru had stopped worrying about that. Just what could he actually accomplish by rashly exerting himself with nothing but his short limbs and small stature?

From the start, Subaru’s pride would blow away in the same way as a dandelion’s fluff.

Subaru: “And so, could you go call for Hiain and the others again? First we’ll get those three… and then, we’ll get all of the gladiators to lend their help.”

Tanza: “Understood… But, will it really be possible? To challenge the Governor of this island, Gustav-sama, to Sparka?”

Subaru: “If I were to invite him to come down to the arena, and have a man-to-man fist fight with him there, the chances that Gustav-san would accept would be pretty low.”

Tanza: “Then, what are you going to do?”

Raising her round eyebrows, Tanza asked so of Subaru.

The key to his plan was to commence a Sparka with Gustav; without that, he would not reach his objective. Her question regarding that was natural, but there was also a difference in their interpretations.

But then again, he could easily imagine Tanza’s reaction if he were to try and explain it in further detail.

The reason was…

Subaru: “This is something I heard from Ceci, but…”

Indeed, the instant Cecilus's name was uttered, just as Subaru had imagined, Tanza's expression was covered in a rare hue of suspicion.

8

Cecilus: "—Do you know the origin of the word "Sparka", Basu?"

Cecilus: "Right now it's used as a word that means gladiators fighting but originally it was used as a word that had the implication of a duel in which unyielding convictions were staked."

Cecilus: "Somewhere along the line it stopped meaning a contest of convictions and started to be recognized as a word that meant a struggle between lives… Well, situations where people were fighting to the death often involved scenes where convictions were put to the test so perhaps the essence of it hasn't shifted all too far from the truth!"

Cecilus: "Thus, to so easily accept that change in interpretation would be the thinking of a background-character. Unfortunately one's life and their convictions are obviously completely different things! In most cases it's often recommended that you bend your convictions for the sake of your life but that is a choice which can only be tolerated for background-characters, supporting-roles, and antagonists."

Cecilus: "But were it to be worthy of the leading actor as he performs in the limelight and pulls the story on the grand stage! Then there is absolutely no way he would do anything like bend his convictions whilst being reluctant to die! Convictions are one's dignity itself. If one bends their convictions to extend their life then whose life is it that then remains?"

Cecilus: "That person will lose the evidence that they are themselves the moment they bend their dignity and discard their convictions, if that is so…"

Cecilus: "An empty husk which has lost the core of the person they had been up until that point with only their life remaining, just who could they then be called?"

Cecilus: “Precisely because that is so, I shall dare to declare it! Even if everyone evaluates it as a crude and extreme logic and refuses to give their endorsement, I shall declare it in a loud voice without any concern for those things!”

Cecilus: “—Life itself is Sparka!”

Cecilus: “Battles where we must herald our convictions and dignity can befall us at any time. Likely we are endlessly continuing to fight upon battlefields of Sparka in forms unknown.”

Cecilus: “If you understand that then blades and even limbs aren’t necessary for Sparka. After all, this fighting isn’t just conducted by means of brute strength, it is a flower which supports the whole color palette by taking various forms.”

Cecilus: “Well now, Basu. —What form will your Sparka take?”

9

Subaru: “—Gustav-san, do Sparka with me.”

Gustav: “…”

Turning around in a dignified manner, Gustav glared at Subaru, who had reached his hand out, with an imposing expression.

With his tendency to regularly wear a terrifying face, there were cases where Gustav gave off the impression of glaring when he was merely looking at another person, but this did not seem to be one of those misjudgments.

Gustav Morello was glaring. —Glaring at Natsuki Subaru, who had deployed the gladiators to occupy the entirety of the area of the island’s upper stratum that belonged to the Governor, and had completely paralyzed all operations of the island.

Gustav: “What is…”

Subaru: “Hm?”

Gustav: “What is the intention of this reckless behavior, I demand your explanation, Schwartz."

Subaru: "Explanation…"

Moving his lips from which large fangs protruded, Gustav's rational demeanor would not crumble. Ruminating over the word Gustav spoke, Subaru looked back towards the entrance of the office to which his back had faced.

Previously in the first lap, Subaru had witnessed all the brutal tragedies that had taken place in this room by camouflaging with the help of Hiain. Though, thinking back upon those tragedies that had a huge impact on him, if he drove them out of his mind, then this was just a very modest and inorganic room.

Whether that modest room would reach a conclusion where it merely remained as it was, would all depend on Subaru—.

Gustav: "Schwartz, your explanation."

Of the silent Subaru, Gustav repeated himself and inquired once more.

With or without an explanation, since they had so clearly risen in revolt, from Gustav's position as Governor, the correct course of action would be to suppress them without question. Not to mention, Subaru and Gustav were the only two people in this office. To subdue him would be exceedingly easy.

Even going as far as to stop Tanza from accompanying him, Subaru had come here by himself.

Of course, that was something Subaru did because he believed that Gustav was not the kind of person to suppress them without question, but from this point he would have to proceed in a logical manner.

For the sake of the important topic that Natsuki Subaru would propose to Gustav Morello, from here on out,

Subaru: "There's nothing for me to explain, Gustav-san."

Gustav: "…"

Subaru: "As you can see, I've made all the gladiators on this island my comrades. Seems like my extremely dangerous Sparka style sparked everyone's paternal instincts."

Gustav: "As far as I know in my capacity, the vast majority of gladiators can be evaluated as being far removed from paternalism."

Subaru: "That's one way of saying my way of evoking paternal instincts was top notch."

As Subaru shrugged his shoulders and gave a response, Gustav narrowed his eyes and pondered.

With an expression akin to an oni and folding his four burly arms, Gustav once again grasped the situation outside the window—the situation of the Gladiator Island being occupied, and accepted Subaru's words as valid.

—Currently, the Gladiator Island was under the complete control of Subaru and his comrades of around six hundred gladiators.

There were also one hundred guards assigned to the island, but it was impossible for them to stop all of the gladiators from operating in such an organized and systematic manner. The thing he had been most scared of was the Gladiator Beasts being let loose, but since they had stolen the keys to the cages beforehand, they were able succeed in seizing control.

Subaru: "Thanks to that, we were able to avoid the Gladiator Beasts from going on a rampage. After all, that was the only thing I was afraid of."

Gustav: "That was the only thing, you say?"

Upon Subaru giving his impressions regarding the difficulties in seizing control of the island, Gustav reacted.

From his perspective, it was a comment which he could not just let slide. After all, the largest factor stopping a rebellion on this Gladiator Island was not the Gladiator Beasts, but rather…

Gustav: "—As the official, the jurisdiction to utilize the Curse Rule is granted to me, there is no possibility that you are not aware of it."

Subaru: "I'm aware. Since Gustav-san is binding everyone with a curse, the gladiators won't do anything rash even if they had discontent. If they disobeyed, their lives would be in danger."

Gustav: "In that case, why have you launched this kind of reckless rebellion?—Preposterous, are you thinking that the Curse Rule does not exist, and that I, in my capacity, have fabricated it as a falsehood in order to restrain the gladiators?"

Subaru: "I don't think that. Nah, I did think that at first. But now I don't think that."

As Gustav had said, there was a time when Subaru had suspected that something such as the Curse Rule did not exist, and instead was an imperfect alternative being made to appear bigger through fear and control.

However, Subaru was already well aware of the fact that the Curse Rule did exist.

Even so, the reason Subaru was not afraid of the Curse Rule was plain and simple.

Subaru: "I'm scared of the Curse Rule, but I'm not scared if the wielder is Gustav-san. After all, Gustav-san isn't gonna totally annihilate us with a curse."

Gustav: "…Are you saying it is a role which exceeds my capacity?"

As expected, there was some discontent mixed into Gustav's voice as he was told that.

In other words, it was denouncing him as a coward who abandoned his professional duties. Even he, who had told Subaru that bravery alone was not important at the lookout platform, would not want to be spoken of poorly.

If he was being slandered, he would likely want to give his retort.

Gustav unfolded one of his upper crossed arms, and gesturing to the island with that large arm,

Gustav: “Bestowed upon me, as the official, is the role of a warden that steadily administrates this Gladiator Island. Any factors which obstruct this must be eliminated, no matter what form they may take. Not to mention, the one who ordered me, in my capacity, to work as Governor was His Excellency the Emperor himself.”

Subaru: “What was it again? Something like “In preparation for the emergency, train the gladiators in both body and mind”?”

Gustav: “You are generally correct. Therefore, deeds such as rebelling against the guards and I, as the official, are undesirable. Consequently, you shall be disposed of in accordance with the jurisdiction granted to me, in an effort to prevent such things from occurring again.”

In a severe voice, Gustav sternly declared his own course of action.

If the conversation were to end there, and Subaru’s reckless deeds invoked the activation of the Curse Rule, that would be the worst possible result. However, as Subaru stared up at Gustav, he continued.

Gustav: “However, if you disperse the crowd right here and now, and never attempt the same overpowering negotiations again, the activation of the Curse Rule… the execution of the jurisdiction granted to me as the official, shall be shelved.”

Subaru: “…”

Gustav: “Schwartz?”

A concession of the greatest degree; while suggesting such a thing, the wrinkles on Gustav’s brow slightly deepened.

The reason for that was present in Subaru’s expression as they faced each other. It was because Subaru, who had been slightly tense as he awaited Gustav’s words, relaxed his expression upon hearing the proposal.

Right now, Subaru's chest was filled with the relief of that previous tension being alleviated, as well as a sense of satisfaction.

There were several reasons for that relief, but the thing which had relieved Subaru the most was…

Subaru: "As I thought, Gustav-san, you sure are lost."

Gustav: "What?"

Subaru: "Even if you do that scary face and voice, you wouldn't be able to dispose of us so easily."

Gustav: "—. In my capacity, my facial features and voice are not things I can change to my liking."

In response to Subaru pointing that out, the tone of Gustav's response was weak.

It was not that he was perplexed due to not having any idea what to do in response to that being pointed out.

Rather, it was something that ought to be referred to as the clumsily sincere wavering of a person who had far too clear of an idea of what to do.

The one who held responsibility for absolutely all of that was not Gustav, but rather the Emperor who had given him those orders.

Subaru: "It's all because of that damn Abel's vague orders."

And, remembering that abhorrent expression clad in an oni mask, Subaru cursed so.

Of course, he did not think that it was a problem caused by incompetence on Abel's part when he issued the order. Though he had been ousted from the throne, even if the fugitive Emperor, continuing to take measures to reclaim his throne, was self-righteous, he was a man far from receiving an evaluation of "incompetent".

Everybody who knew Abel was well aware of that, and Gustav was no exception.

That was why Gustav had always continued to think about it. —About the true intent of the Emperor's orders.

Subaru: "If Gustav-san's thinking has gotten stagnant because of that, it really makes me wanna tell that guy to stop messing around."

Gustav: "Insults towards His Excellency the Emperor are…"

Subaru: "Not allowed, right? But, don't you think so? In preparation for the emergency, train the gladiators in both body and mind… When is the emergency? What's the standard for the level of the gladiators trained in both body and mind? Let's say you were able to actualize that, what are you supposed to do from there?"

Gustav: "…"

Counting all the dissatisfactions regarding the cruel orders bestowed upon Gustav on his fingers, Subaru's breathing became rough.

At first, he was reproached by Gustav, abundantly loaded with anger for the unparalleled disrespect towards the Vollachian Emperor. But, Gustav did not rebuke him for the second time.

Gustav, too, felt anger towards the Emperor deep in his heart—That did not seem to be the case. But, on Gustav's silent face, Subaru felt like he could see a small, truly difficult to understand, conflict.

That conflict was anguish over whether he should continue conversing with Subaru like this, or if he should make use of the Curse Rule to forcibly put an end to their discussion.

Subaru: "I probably have an answer to what Gustav-san wants to know."

Gustav: "…An answer to what I, in my capacity, want to know?"

Subaru: "I understand that Gustav-san has quite a strong loyalty towards the Emperor. I don't really get why, but I get it… That may also be something that serves as my lifeline."

Gustav: "…"

Those last few words, which he appended in a quiet voice, was a suspicion which Subaru did not really wish to make sure of. If that suspicion turned out to be correct, it would not be very agreeable for Subaru, so he did not ascertain it.

Hiding his brief personal conflict, Subaru looked to Gustav, and spoke.

Subaru: "Frankly, Gustav-san, you're lost and worried about whether your actions are properly following the Emperor's orders. Am I wrong?"

It seemed that Gustav was probably exerting as much effort as possible to prevent his expression from shifting. However, though it was just a moment of discomposure, his stiffened cheeks were not able to bear it.

Ordered by the Emperor, the highly loyal retainer honestly tried his best to live up to those expectations.

But, far too much interpretation for this important order was entrusted to the listener, and with the wishes of the Empire's apex so distant that he even hesitated to inquire about the true intent, Gustav must have been lost, he must have wavered, and he must have been troubled.

On his own, he comprehended the true intent of the Emperor was a certain way, anguished over it, and arrived at an implementation.

And then…

Subaru: "The thing that the Emperor wanted to let Gustav-san do, I think it's probably been achieved at this point. Though, it really makes me angry."

Gustav: "…For what reason does it anger you, Schwartz? Do not repeat more impudent disrespect towards His Excellency the Emperor. First and foremost, how do you know that the current state of the Gladiator Island is in accordance with the esteemed intentions of His Excellency the Emperor?”

Subaru: “No, I don’t know that. Whether this island is in the ideal state that the Emperor had hoped for is honestly an enigma.”

Gustav: “—. It seems your viewpoint in itself is constantly changing…”

Subaru: “I’m not doing that.”

As Subaru shook his head, Gustav’s light air of perplexity deepened.

A serious and honest blue-skinned Multi-Arm Tribesman with a frightening monster-like face. Faced with such a commendable vassal who devoted such loyalty towards him, the Emperor of Vollachia—Abel, had done something cruel.

Subaru: “Probably, the Emperor’s desire wasn’t how the island would turn out, but rather, the trial and error that Gustav-san would go through in order to clear his order.”

Gustav: “…”

Subaru: “In other words, the Emperor was doing a test… he was testing you. How Gustav-san would interpret the order he was bestowed with, how he would implement it. The objective was… well, at the very least, it probably wasn’t just out of curiosity.”

As Subaru expressed his conjecture and scratched his cheek, Gustav remained silent.

But, that silence was not in order to bear anger or the violent emotions welling up inside of him; surely, it was an intellectual and composed serenity for the sake of taking in Subaru’s view, and processing it for himself.

Though it was probably in Gustav’s nature to unsparingly brush Subaru’s opinion aside, this silence was likely because he himself could understand that Subaru may have had a point.

Subaru: “If that’s true, then he’s truly a bastard with an awful personality…”

Just how would he meet the instructions granted to him? Subaru could understand the idea of trying to ascertain a subordinate’s ability and aptness via such creativity and ability to respond to instructions, but this method was absolutely that of a prideful, dictatorial leader. When doing such a thing on a national scale, the number of people involved would be extraordinary.

But, at the same time, it also felt like the aptitudes ascertained from these tests would be something unfavorable for the reign of Abel. If he wanted to continue being a dictatorial Emperor, then finding people like Gustav who had the ability to think for themselves would be rather inconvenient.

The true meaning of this test was a plain expectation for other people.

Subaru: “But, “expectation” doesn’t really sound right, so, maybe trust…? That doesn’t suit him either.”

He wanted to call it “arrogance in the form of trust in others”, as if going to such an extent was natural.

Setting aside that resistance in his heart, Subaru spoke of what he thought the true intention of the order given to Gustav was. Perhaps it could be called a litmus test of the Emperor’s expectations and trust.

Exposed to that, as a result of the struggle to meet those expectations, the Gladiator Island…

Subaru: “At first, I thought this was an outrageous place…”

In the barren room, touching the back of the sofa used for receiving visitors, Subaru turned around to the interior—No, he turned his head as to look out over the Gladiator Island Ginunhive.

Since he had unexpectedly washed ashore on the island of isolating waters, sharing in the same fate as an unfamiliar partner, Subaru had repeated Death to such an extent that would make anybody want to avert their eyes, and managed to overcome Sparka.

The circumstances were such that if one did not accomplish that, they could not become a member of the island; however, what lay beyond surmounting that first barrier was a life on an island where an air of tension constantly hung, with rigid rules bending them down.

Under Gustav's designs, it was a restrictive island that did not lean towards severity or coarseness—When Subaru became confident that that was what Ginunhive was, he had a thought.

Subaru: "This place, it's like a really strict boarding school."

Of course, he was not talking about the entry test being difficult; even if monstrous parents did not object to a system where failure to pass would result in death, the vehement protest of a legal guardian would be unavoidable.

But, if one at least ignored the imperial ways there, then it was a sound environment where a bed and meals were guaranteed, and one even had to do work that involved mental strain (Sparka).

It was just like school—though, taking the history of the gladiators into account, it might have been more appropriate to compare it to prison. Either way, both were institutions that intended to cultivate those who entered, and to rectify them.

Just why had Gustav been entrusted with such a role?

Subaru: "You told me about this back at the lookout platform. When Gustav-san first met the Emperor, all the men had gone off to war, and the only ones left in the assailed village were Gustav-san, the women, and the children."

Gustav: "…Strictly speaking, there were men present other than myself, in my capacity. However, the reason for them not going to war was because they were all either injured, sickly, or elderly."

Subaru: "What happened to them?"

Gustav: "When the village was attacked, they all strived to grab their weapons first, and they lost their lives. Including myself, in my capacity, the survivors were composed of only very few women and children. Even we who remained, if His Excellency the Emperor and his subordinate had not arrived in time, everyone—"

Subaru: "It's that."

Interrupting Gustav's answer halfway through, Subaru reeled in the reason for his unease.

The unease Subaru felt, it was something that the person it concerned, Gustav, did not understand. Even if it was clear to an onlooker, it was not an uncommon case that the person concerned would feel anything out of the ordinary.

But, supposing the Emperor had felt the same discomfort that Subaru was feeling,

Subaru: "If I remember correctly, the mastermind who targeted Gustav-san's village was a feudal lord whose objective was to reduce the number of mouths to feed. It would be dangerous for him if such dark activities were exposed, so he should have been fully prepared and should have dealt with any issues."

However, the result was that time had been bought for Gustav and the women and children, so the Emperor's subordinate was able to come rushing in and kill all the assassins; because of that, the mastermind went through the hardship of punishment since his own involvement was finally exposed.

Then, there ought to have been somebody whose great efforts caused the mastermind's plan to fail.

For instance…

Subaru: "In preparation for the village getting attacked, Gustav-san could have armed the women and children."

Gustav: "…"

Subaru: "That expression, so you really did do that?"

Gustav: “…If the men left the village, it was obvious we would be deemed as ideal prey by others. Sitting around waiting to be destroyed is a matter for fools of the past. In my capacity, I loathe strife, but I am not one so obstinate to refuse to take the sword when it means death. —Even so, most were killed.”

Subaru: “…But, Gustav-san was saved. And even if just a few people, there were other survivors.”

The amount of people, Subaru did not know if that would relieve the burden on Gustav’s heart.

Supposing the feelings of guilt Gustav had were large, Subaru could understand the feeling of worrying over the problem of zero or one hundred.

But, he could also somewhat understand the reason why the oddball Emperor, who had hastened there, had given a high evaluation of the eccentric Multi-Arm Tribesman who had resisted.

Subaru: “If Gustav-san were the type to mindlessly follow the Emperor’s orders, this island would have probably been a much more hellish environment, and if we took a rebellious stance like this, it would be weird to not immediately activate the curse… But, I guess that’s probably the reason why this island was entrusted to you.”

Gustav: “But, just earlier you guessed that it was His Excellency the Emperor’s true intention to test me in my capacity?”

Subaru: “A test is a test, but qualifications are needed to take the test. Letting a guy with no chances of passing take the test is like, only something that happens when someone takes an entrance exam for a school without caring if they pass. Besides—”

Subaru folded his arms and tilted his head, and he answered as Abel’s face came to his mind.

It was the test of a prideful man who spoke as if he knew everything and could foresee anything in this world.

Subaru: “The moment he decided to try and test you, he would have already completely deemed you acceptable. If a disappointing outcome resulted from that, he's the type to curse his own decision to let you take the exam instead of cursing the examinee."

Gustav: "…"

Subaru: "That's just what I think, personally."

Marking that as the end, Subaru restated that everything he had said until now was all his conjecture.

The contents were such that they had probably given Gustav hopes of understanding what the Emperor's true intentions were, but as they spoke, the less sure Subaru became of whether it was correct.

It would not be strange if in the blink of an eye, Abel could think up the same contents that had taken Subaru so much thinking to devise, and it was also completely possible that he had been completely off the mark.

But, this way of thinking was a perfect match for the image of Abel within Subaru.

Gustav: "Schwartz, supposing your thinking is correct…"

After taking a moment to digest everything, Gustav wrung those words out.

His voice sounding akin to one heard in a cold and gloomy cave, Gustav formed his words as he folded his four thick arms.

Gustav: "What do you think the "emergency" that His Excellency the Emperor ordered me to prepare for, as the official, is supposed to be?"

Subaru: "…Gustav-san, if you suspect that the emergency is the civil war happening right now, then you're the one who has to decide on that. That's what you had just told me back at the lookout platform."

Gustav: "Affirmative. But, bearing the shame, I request your opinion."

For him to admit his own fault, and openly request advice, was incredible.

In a savage place where admitting a mistake could cost one their life, full of people trying to take advantage of those mistakes, the very fact that he could admit his mistake like that shone like a golden radiance.

But, it was an uncharacteristic blunder on his part to ask that question of Subaru.

Subaru: "…"

After all, was it not so? "Prepare for the emergency"; Gustav had been ordered to do so.

If Subaru told him that the emergency was meant to mean what was happening right now, it would be enough justification for him to go with Subaru and the others.

The fact he had entrusted the matter to Subaru, may have been indicative of Gustav's intent, but—.

Subaru: "—I think, the "emergency" the Emperor spoke of is just about being prepared. There's no specific date or event that it's referring to, but more like it's about getting ready in case anything ever happens."

Because the word "emergency" had thoughtlessly been chosen, margin for interpretation had been created, and confusion had sprouted. He also feared that perhaps even that was a part of the test intended by the Emperor.

Gustav: "…"

Hearing Subaru's reply, a complex hue flashed in Gustav's eyes.

Subaru's reply just now was an answer that had deviated from the aforementioned justification. At a question which he could have exploited and taken advantage of, Subaru chose not to exploit, he chose not to take advantage.

And then…

Subaru: “The “emergency” that the Emperor ordered Gustav-san to prepare for isn’t right now. —But, won’t you pretend that it is right now, and come together with us to ruin the civil war?”

In such a merry tone, Subaru invited him to join a policy that betrayed the Emperor’s decree, which he only now revealed.

10

Gustav: “—This is difficult to understand.”

As Subaru held out his hand and grinned, Gustav used his two upper arms to rub his brow.

With the reality of having just caused distress for him, it was not as though Subaru did not feel responsibility, however,

Subaru: “I’m asking if Gustav-san can bend his logic just a little bit, but…”

Gustav: “In my capacity, I am aware of this. Since I am aware, I am finding it difficult to understand. In the first place, all of your speech and conduct until now has been nothing short of incomprehensible.”

With fingers still on his brow, Gustav’s eyes looked down on Subaru, as the latter feigned ignorance.

Gustav: “Throwing yourself into perilous Sparkas, winning over the island’s gladiators as your allies, and rising up in revolt against me, the official; these I can comprehend. However, I have no choice but to question an uprising performed while fully understanding the risk of the Curse Rule; moreover, our dialogue a moment ago was quite capable of pushing me, in my capacity, to take the step and utilize the Curse Rule.”

Subaru: “Just like an act of suicide?”

Gustav: “There are no other words capable of describing it. But, I do not sense that you have suicidal thoughts. I find it unthinkable for you to want to take those in your surroundings down with you. That is to say, it goes beyond my capacity for comprehension.”

Just like how Subaru had analyzed Gustav, Gustav was now analyzing Subaru’s character.

Be that as it may, Subaru did not consider himself to be a complex person, so Gustav’s diagnosis was generally correct. He had never thought that he wanted to die, or that he wished to bring those in his surroundings down with him.

For that reason, Gustav was troubled that he could not understand Subaru’s feelings, but…

Subaru: “Come to think of it, there’s a Curse Tool needed for the Curse Rule inside of Gustav’s body, right?”

Gustav: “—. Do not tell me, has it already been taken out of my body, as the official?”

Subaru: “Ah, to tell you the truth… YOU SERIOUSLY THINK THAT! No I have not! Even though it’s designed to prevent such a thing from happening, it would be worrying if we were able to steal it without being caught, wouldn’t it?!”

Gustav: “If Cecilus Segmunt is present, things that are usually impossible seem to become possible.”

Subaru: “Ahh, Ceci, right. Yes yes, Ceci, Ceci…”

Though it was an outrageous opinion, Subaru could not help but agree with the line of thought that most things could become possible when Cecilus was placed in the center.

In reality, just how did Gustav perceive Cecilus, who was given non-standard treatment?

The strength he possessed was certain, but still, Gustav did not think he was the real First, or perhaps he did?

Either way, it would not be fair if he did not clear up Gustav's misunderstanding first.

Subaru: "I'm sorry, Gustav-san, I lied to you about one thing."

Gustav: "…A lie? As expected, so you took it from my body?"

Subaru: "Not that, it's about making all the gladiators on the island my allies. Um, there's just one exception. Ceci."

Gustav: "What?"

Subaru: "Ceci's the only one I've yet to ask. Or rather, I don't intend on asking him until the very end."

Raising a single finger, Subaru displayed his attitude towards the lone expectation on this island, Cecilus.

Gustav slightly widened his eyes upon hearing that, and resumed rubbing his brow with the fingers still placed there. It was a reaction that seemed to say "This is increasingly difficult to understand."

Gustav: "This is increasingly difficult to understand…"

Subaru: "Ah, you said it."

Gustav: "A matter of course, is it not?—You had been getting along with Segmunt. Taking Segmunt's capabilities into account, he ought to have been the most suitable person to ask right after the members of your Unit."

Subaru: "Well, even if I asked him because I coveted him, I knew that he wouldn't say no."

At first he had put on airs, around mid-game he began acting nonchalant, and after reaching the latter-half, Cecilus had started to insist that he wanted to be persuaded; but, Subaru neglected him.

What Gustav had said was certain, Cecilus's capability was outstanding, and if they had him then most things would turn out all right through a brute force approach.

Gustav: “If you knew that, then why?”

Subaru: “Because I knew that, I decided not to.”

Gustav: “…Difficult to understand.”

Hearing Subaru’s immediate reply, Gustav’s misgivings only continued to deepen.

If Subaru did not demolish that mountain of doubts soon, then no matter how rational Gustav was, it was possible that he would negligently activate the Curse Rule.

Subaru: “The reason I didn’t ask Ceci, part of it was of course to annoy him, but the most important thing was the message I would be sending to Gustav-san.”

Gustav: “Mehssej…?”

Subaru: “Basically a declaration of my intentions. We don’t intend on using a brute force approach.”

As Subaru amended his words, Gustav’s doubts were not cleared up at all; in fact, they only deepened.

With his two lower arms still folded, Gustav turned his strict face, and,

Gustav: “…With the island’s guards suppressed, it seems to me that the requisites for a brute force approach have been fully met.”

Subaru: “But, Gustav-san has the trump card of the Curse Rule. Since we don’t have the trump card of Ceci, we can’t get Gustav-san to do what we say with brute force, right?”

Gustav: “—. That reasoning is sound, but everything outside of that reasoning does not hold up.”

Gustav, having been able to understand one thread of logic in the confusion, brought the two upper arms that had been massaging his brow back to his waist. Slightly puffing his chest up, with the Curse Tool stored in inside of him, Gustav’s fangs shook, and, Gustav: “Following your reasoning, I, as the official, am at an advantage due to having the last resort of the Curse Rule. Completely one-sidedly at that. In my capacity, I am unable to comprehend why you have constructed such a situation. Your objective, what is it?”

Subaru: “If that’s what you wanna know, then it’s the very thing I said right at the start. —It’s Sparka.”

Though they had taken quite the detour, Subaru’s cheeks contorted as the conversation finally returned to the main topic.

At first, when Subaru spoke the word “Sparka”, Gustav ignored it, and demanded a discussion to grasp the circumstances and comprehend Subaru’s motives.

But, the thing Subaru demanded had not deviated whatsoever from that which he said to Gustav at the very beginning.

A contest of convictions, where both Cecilus and the Curse Rule were to be considered against the rules.

Gustav: “Sparka… but Schwartz, that does not mean that you desire a duel with me in my capacity, correct?”

Subaru: “Of course, I don’t think you’d ever agree to such a thing, but I would be extremely troubled if you readily consented to it. My only chance would be if Gustav-san’s muscles were just for show, or if you were actually a little girl wearing a full-body costume.”

Gustav: “It would be impossible for a costume to control the island.”

Subaru: “Right.”

So of course, he rejected the likes of fist fights or death matches, and desired a different method.

The method for that, that which Subaru had brought with him was…

Subaru: “Gustav-san, do you know the origin of the word

"Sparka"?"

Gustav: "—. Since I took up office as Governor of the Gladiator Island, it was a necessary preliminary inquiry. Originally, it was not something that referred to the exhibition of gladiator battles, but a word indicative of duels wagered by those who refused to yield."

Subaru: "Something like that. The thing I'm challenging Gustav-san to, is that type of Sparka."

Speaking those words, Subaru tidied up the reception table, and spread out the contents of a cloth wrap that had been held in one of his hands the whole time.

The contents of the bag had been a coarsely made game board, and a pile of small pebbles painted with black and white on each of their sides.

Subaru: "It's called Reversi. We take turns placing our stones on the board, and whoever has the most pieces by the end wins. When you sandwich your opponent's pieces between your own, you get to flip them all over and make them your pieces."

Gustav: "Why are you explaining this game?"

Subaru: "Because this is the Sparka I'm proposing."

Responding so to Gustav's question, Subaru placed his hands on the table and looked up at Gustav.

There was no flashy audience, and it was not a competition of disciplined skill either. However, if Sparka was a bout where convictions were staked, then this would be enough to serve as Sparka.

Subaru: "If Gustav-san wins, I'll obediently withdraw everyone. I won't cause any more disturbances like this either. I promise."

Gustav: "If I win in my capacity, hm? Well then Schwartz, what about if you win?"

Subaru: "Renounce the Curse Rule, and let us go free. And then, you'll come with us."

Saying thus, Subaru vigorously seated himself in the reception sofa, and gesturing to the chair opposite himself with his hand, he invited Gustav.

The idealistic thought he had spoken of to Tanza, which she had said she would not ridicule; in order to materialize that reckless dream which would make anyone want to burst out laughing,

Subaru: "—To the Imperial Capital, to launch an attack on the place where His Excellency the Emperor is. Together with everyone from the island."

11

It was a proposal that he should have brushed off as nothing short of absurd.

He had been given a direct order from the Vollachian Emperor, Vincent Vollachia. Consequently, Gustav had assumed the seat of Governor of the Gladiator Island; there was no margin for him to agree to such a thing.

He ought to teach this Natsuki Schwartz, the boy who had made a proposal that was more incomprehensible than it was reckless, that his decision was wrong. Perhaps it would have been better if he firmly insisted on activating the Curse Rule.

However…

Schwartz: "Is it alright if I take black, and Gustav-san takes white? I feel like there was a rule that the colors decide who goes first and who goes second, but I've forgotten it, so you can decide whichever you please."

Gustav: "…In that case, I, as the official, shall go second."

Schwartz: "OK, then I'll make the first move. I like going first too."

Moistening his lips with his tongue, Schwartz clapped his hands together and grabbed a black pebble, casually placing it adjacent to one of the white pebbles, which was one of the four pieces initially setup on the game board. With that white pebble now sandwiched between two black ones, Schwartz flipped it over with his finger, showing the side of the pebble that had been painted black.

Gustav: "…"

Gustav pinched a pebble that was far too small for his hand, and pondered as he decided on where to put it.

Why did he not refuse Schwartz's proposal or simply take actions to put an end to this absurd uprising on the island, but instead directly engage in this game—No, in Sparka?

Schwartz: "If you happen to be worried about the safety of the guards and can't concentrate, you don't need to worry."

Gustav: "—. What is your basis for that claim?"

Schwartz: "We didn't subdue the guards with brute force, but by serving them a drug. Old Man Null made it for us, and then we laced it into the food prepared by Kashew and Codroe."

Gustav: "…It has come to light that there is a need to reevaluate the way I deal with the guards and gladiators. You have my gratitude."

While each of them placed their pieces, Gustav heaved a sigh at the information presented in a manner similar to idle chatter.

Due to having permission to give medical treatment to his fellow gladiators, the gladiator known as Old Man Null was granted appropriate freedom; but, Gustav was surprised that he could create a drug with such an effect, and that he could compound drugs in general.

He could not turn a blind eye to the fact that the guards were rendered powerless due to eating the meals prepared by gladiators. It seemed it was necessary for him to explain the importance of their professional duties on the island to the guards once more.

Beside Gustav as he contemplated tightening discipline, Schwartz continued.

Schwartz: “Old Man Null has deemed Gustav-san’s way of doing things as acceptable. Even so, he helped me out because I promised to bring him back to his hometown. He said that there’s scenery he wants to see one more time before he dies.”

Gustav: “…”

Schwartz: “Oh yeah, the duo of Kashew and Codroe originally worked as cooks. But, their shop was devastated by some hooligans hired by a rival shop, and they were arrested trying to get revenge.”

Gustav: “…”

Schwartz: “By the way, the ones who stole the keys for the Gladiator Beast cages were Hiain and his friends, Orson’s group. The way lizard-people can move by crawling on walls is really incredible. But, because of that, they get treated like thieves, even if they didn’t do anything.”

Gustav: “…”

Schwartz: “The board and pieces for Reversi were both made by Jawsrough. Did you know? The guy known as the lone-wolf, Jawsrough. Though he’s not a lone-wolf anymore, apparently he originally worked as a mason.”

Gustav: “…”

Schwartz: “Weitz did the colors for the pieces. He said I could count on him to help with anything, and he was a lot more proficient than I had thought. Idra let me use his good-luck bandana for the cloth wrap.”

Gustav: “…”

Schwartz: “You know, those kinds of guys wouldn’t have been saved if it weren’t for Gustav-san’s way of doing things. Nah, even under Gustav-san’s way of doing things, not everybody is saved.”

When the board was filled about half-way, a certain heat filled Schwartz’s voice.

Currently, it seemed like Gustav's white pieces were dominating the boardtop. But, in this "Reversi" game, a lot of pieces could be turned over all at once, so he could not afford to be careless.

The moment Gustav entered into this match of gradual demolition, it was fully possible that he had already fallen into a trap designed by the boy before him.

Schwartz: "…"

Schwartz's gaze was fixed not on the game board, but on Gustav.

In those black eyes, he did not feel cold calculations; rather, he was captured by the earnest light housed within. It was no wonder that so many gladiators had changed their minds. All the more if their reason for that was due to the topic of the Emperor's illegitimate child.

—The rumor that Schwartz was the black-haired Crown Prince that the masses were all currently discussing had naturally also reached Gustav's ears, as the Governor of the island.

The fact that Schwartz was not merely the young child that his appearance suggested could be understood by witnessing his manner of activity on this island. Thus, people sought to find a reason for that.

That was so for Gustav, too. Even if the authenticity of that matter was unknown, in the case that the rumors were true, it would mean that Gustav might be taking the life of the esteemed child of the Emperor, to whom Gustav owed a great obligation.

—He had wanted to avoid that.

Gustav: "But, that is the reasoning for my side, as the official. It would not be the reasoning for Schwartz's side. You have gone out of your way to be at a disadvantage; I don't understand the intentions behind trying to be equal to myself, in my capacity."

If Schwartz's highest priority was to leave the Gladiator Island, then the best thing he could do would be to abandon his trivial hangup and make Cecilus his ally, cut through Gustav's Curse Rule, and leave the island without any anguish.

However, Schwartz had not done those things, and instead deliberately went down a thorny path with no chance of winning in sight.

Gustav: “As expected, it is difficult to understand.”

Schwartz: “Gustav-san?”

Gustav: “Schwartz, if it is like you have calmly stated, and you have discovered talents that the gladiators have outside of fighting, then the choice to drag them into the middle of the civil war is a contradiction. Since you are aware that I, as the official, would never think of defying His Excellency the Emperor’s decree, it was also unwise to refuse to falsify the meaning of the “emergency”.”

If he did not want to let anybody die, then he should not drag the gladiators into the civil war.

If he wanted Gustav to accompany him, he should not have let the biggest opportunities pass by.

Thus, the same could be said of this game where both black and white take from the other’s position.

Gustav: “Even if you are victorious in this Sparka using this game board, you have no guarantee that I, as the official, will keep my promise. As you know, in my capacity, I am not a warrior of the Empire, nor do I take pride in battle.”

Schwartz: “I know. But, you’re mistaken about one thing, Gustav-san. —I don’t plan on having Gustav-san lose this Sparka.”

Gustav: “—What?”

With a light thud, Schwartz placed down a black piece, and flipped over some of the whites on the board.

Though he was paving the path to his own victory, Schwartz had spoken those words.

That he did not intend on having Gustav lose this match. His words and his actions, were overflowing with contradictions.

Gustav could not help but doubt such disarray, and seeing that, Schwartz made a sound as he fiddled with the pebble in his hand, making a huge grin.

Schwartz: “It may seem like I’m speaking in riddles, but I’m not. — Saying that we’re clashing with each other may seem like it means that there’s gonna be a winner and loser no matter what, but there’s another conclusion entirely detached from that.”

Gustav: “…”

Schwartz: “My ideal would be to win Sparka, then accompanied by all the gladiators and Gustav-san, launch an attack on the Emperor’s place in the Imperial Capital.”

Gustav: “In order for that, there is a need for me to lose in my capacity, no? If that is the case, your comment just earlier about not having me lose as the official is a contradiction.”

Schwartz: “That may be the case for winning or losing Reversi. But, Sparka is a bout where convictions clash. In that case, both are important and can be ways to settle the conclusion.”

Gustav placed down a white piece, and flipped over a black one. As the Multi-Arm tribesman engaged in a bout that did not make good use of his four arms, Schwartz closed one of his eyes at Gustav, who had just ended his turn.

And then, a question was posed.

Schwartz: “What’s Gustav-san’s ideal conclusion?”

Gustav: “—. In accordance with His Excellency the Emperor’s decree, to carry out my professional duties as Governor of the Gladiator Island.”

Schwartz: ““For that purpose, prepare for the emergency, training the gladiators in both body and mind”… Right?”

Gustav: “Affirmative. It is just as you have verified many times during this conversation…”

Schwartz: “—Well then, the emergency that Gustav-san has decided on, when is it gonna happen?”

Schwartz nonchalantly stacked that question on top and made a loud sound as he placed a stone on the board.

The noise struck his eardrums, and the question had struck his very heart; at that moment, Gustav understood. The comprehension he had long anguished for, he had finally reached it.

—Schwartz had firmly instilled the Emperor’s intentions into Gustav.

Entrusting Gustav with the role of Governor, was not just for him to simply follow orders, it was to test if he had the talents to find the best solutions using his mind. If that was the true intention of Vincent Vollachia’s order, then it meant that Gustav had been granted something.

The order passed down to him from the Emperor, it granted Gustav the right to make judgments and decisions at his own discretion and interpretation.

Gustav: “…”

Even if the contents of the question were the same, the respondent had been different, and thus it had been born.

In their previous discussion, Schwartz had overlooked the favorable opportunity to make Gustav his ally after gradually whittling him down. However, with offense and defense now reversed, the one who had to choose was Gustav.

Whether the emergency was now or not, the one who could decide on the Emperor’s order became Gustav.

As if to give Gustav a gentle push forward, Schwartz appended a brief comment.

That was…

Schwartz: “Gustav-san, do you have the patience to stay confined to this island at a time when your benefactor is in danger?”

Gustav: “SCHWARTZ…!!”

Schwartz: “Your face and voice sure are scary, but if you aren’t going to kill us with the curse, then it’s nothing but a threat.”

Slamming both his upper arms on the table, Gustav loomed over the game board and Schwartz as he glared at the latter.

But, the boy looking up at him from directly below was undaunted by Gustav’s threat.

An extraordinary courage, and black eyes which seemed like they peered directly into his soul—They bore a strong resemblance to the man who looked down from horseback at Gustav Morello when he was on the verge of death in those days long past.

Back then, Gustav’s existence was affirmed by the man of those black eyes, and he was deemed worthy.

To that man, he felt a sense of obligation, both for saving his village, and elevating his social status. But, that which Gustav truly harbored loyalty for, it was the salvation of that moment.

If the Emperor told Gustav to stand by until the time of the “emergency” on the Gladiator Island, where the damage from the civil war in the Imperial Capital would not reach, that was what he ought to do.

Gustav: “If the time of “emergency” is now, I must hasten to His Excellency the Emperor’s side.”

Schwartz: “Accompanied by the gladiators, trained in both body and mind, right?”

Gustav: “But, Schwartz, you are… your position is, His Excellency the Emperor’s…”

If Schwartz was the rumored illegitimate child of the Emperor, if he was the black-haired Crown Prince, then his goal would be to usurp the Imperial Throne, and it would be tantamount to Gustav sinking his fangs into the Emperor, to whom he had such a great obligation.

In that case, would it not be a mistake for Gustav to proceed in accordance with Schwartz's will?

And would it not also be the kind of mistake that could not be undone?

Schwartz: "The fact that I came here, is the answer to that."

Gustav: "…"

While Gustav silently remained in deep thought, Schwartz suddenly spoke in a quiet voice.

Schwartz was still in the shadow of Gustav's large figure, and with a sharp look in his eyes, he firmly pushed his fist against Gustav's chest, and,

Schwartz: "I can't show anything for it. I have no evidence. All I can give you are my true, unfiltered intentions."

Gustav: "What are you…"

Schwartz: "In order to protect the Vollachian Empire, accompany me to the Imperial Capital."

Gustav: "…"

Schwartz: "If you cooperate with me, I shall never let you be known as a man who betrayed the Emperor."

Truly, without presenting anything, these words merely made a straightforward appeal.

If this was the Emperor, Vincent, the margin for Gustav's choice would be shaved away, and numerous artifices would have been arranged to lead to the result of the Emperor's desire, controlling the hearts of others through a sense of defeat.

For a moment, it seemed as though he could see a glimpse of that in Schwartz, but…

Gustav: "—In my capacity, I have placed my final pebble; is it concluded?"

Schwartz: "…Yeah, with that, Reversi has concluded."

Looking down on the game board, the white pieces had reigned supreme ever since the mid-game. Without that supremacy being overturned, the final move had colored most of the board white.

Despite it being a game that he himself had planned, brimming with confidence as he brought it in, it was a complete defeat.

Gustav: "So, you brought a game that you did not expect to win?"

Schwartz: "My skill at Reversi is decent… but, to be honest, the critical moment this time was whether or not I could persuade Gustav-san, so I couldn't really concentrate on the game at all."

Gustav: "…But, Schwartz, your true match lay not on this board, hm?"

Following the rules of the game, the victor here was undoubtedly Gustav.

If the promise of the Sparka were to be fulfilled, Schwartz and his men would abandon their operation, and the Gladiator Island would return to the usual administration it had had until this morning; it would return to the state that Gustav had imposed upon it.

However…

Gustav: "—. You have made both me, as the official, and yourself, the victors of the Sparka, hm?"

If it was not a fight to the death, but rather a clash of convictions, then there was a possibility of a conclusion whether neither party would yield.

Certainly, what Schwartz had spoken of was logic that he could agree with.

Schwartz: “Gustav-san, since I lost Reversi, I’ll have everyone disperse. But, what will you do?”

Since victory or defeat upon the board was secondary to him, Schwartz’s words were that of understanding that the true outcome lay here.

Having presented victory conditions that Gustav had not realized, making him understand, and after a great amount of confusion, Schwartz had made use of all the trump cards he possessed at this final showdown.

Gustav: “…”

For a beat, he closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and the conflict that had persisted within Gustav for a long, long time, finally came to an end.

That conflict was something that had been present ever since the time he had taken up office as the Governor of the Gladiator Island; thus…

Gustav: “One thing I shall tell you, Schwartz.”

Schwartz: “Yeah?”

Gustav: “Many times now, I have let many opportunities to activate the Curse Rule pass due to conjecture about your position. But, this decision is by no means a result of any speculation regarding you. —Especially, in this time of “emergency”.”

Stating thus, Gustav retracted his two upper arms which he had placed on the table, and unfolded his two lower arms which had been crossed—With all of his four arms, he shook hands with the boy who held his arm out.

When he saw the boy’s face sulk upon hearing the sound of the word “speculation”, Gustav Morello’s conviction as a Governor was protected, and he let out an audible laugh, so very uncharacteristic of himself.

???: “—Please don’t think ill of me, Boss.”

Sitting cross-legged on the desk, chin rested in hand, the blue-haired boy gave an indifferent smile.

That smile was abhorrently the same as ever, and for that reason, Subaru clearly understood that it was not a joke or anything of the sort.

In both the boy’s smile and voice, there was no sarcasm or hostility to be found.

A matter of course. When people dressed up their words, it was more or less because they had some intentions. Thus, when they did so, it was to increase the chances of fulfilling their objective, even if only by a little.

However, if one had no such need for those kinds of petty tricks, and they could achieve one hundred percent of their object through nothing but their own power, then the thought of playing with their words was something that would not even pass through the corners of their mind.

To be precise, that was undoubtedly the laughing boy’s—Cecilus Segmunt’s, way of being.

Subaru: “Ceci…”

Cecilus: “Such a feeble voice will make your stocks plummet, y’know? I know I said, “Please don’t think ill of me,” but if thinking ill of me leads to a considerable improvement in the display of Boss’s proficiency, then please feel free to think ill of me. For me, I think it’s best to prioritize whichever one makes you shine brighter.”

“Boss”, and “Ceci”; even when calling each other by their nicknames, the atmosphere between the two did not subside.

Normally, if it was a close relationship where nicknames were used, lots more discretion would be utilized. But, he could not hope for such a thing with Cecilus. After all, rather than a gap between their hearts, what divided Subaru and Cecilus was more like a gap between their ways of living.

This gap was not something that could be filled by merely having nicknames or living alongside each other.

A tiger and a Dragon could not understand one another—no, considering the difference in strength, a tortoise and a hare might be more suitable. Anyhow, as living beings who differed by a great deal, understanding each other would be difficult.

???: “Segmunt-sama, are you sane?”

Outstretching her arms to protect Subaru, it seemed that Tanza shared the same opinion.

Harboring vigilance in her large irises, the young girl clad was in a kimono; receiving the glint in the eyes from that girl of characteristic deer antlers, Cecilus gave an “Oya” and facetiously raised his eyebrows.

Cecilus: “That’s a meaningless question, Tanza-san. You’re not able to tell on which side of the path of sanity I’ve been whimsically walking down, now are you? How do you intend to compare the world I see against what you deem to be the opposite side of sanity?”

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, somehow it seems like he is sane.”

Subaru: “Seems like it.”

As Cecilus’s spoke incessantly in a way that would make anyone want to suspect the existence of a script, bitterness was mixed into Tanza’s tone. Subaru shrugged his shoulders at that information, and he desperately made a face that did not reveal his inner feelings.

Otherwise, it would be discovered that a cold sweat was running down his back at the very unexpectedness of the situation. If that were to be exposed, he had no idea what Cecilus would do next.

Subaru: “Shit…”

Even at the best of times, Cecilus was a problem child who could not be patient and brought about situations like this.

He had intended on understanding that Cecilus was difficult to deal with, but realized that it had truly been nothing but an intention. Just what in the world should he do?

Cecilus: “Well now let’s see, I wonder if Boss’s “True Sight” will be able to overcome my whimsy?”

Just how much did he know? Flashing his white teeth, Cecilus spouted a loathsome remark.

In the truest sense, he had pierced the crux of Subaru’s Return by Death—The fact that it seemed like he was even doing that by instinct, was Cecilus’s most troublesome quality.

Gnawing his molars at that troublesomeness, Subaru shouted while knowing it was mostly pointless.

Subaru: “Why… Why did you betray me, Ceci?!!”

So he shouted.

13

—Let us rewind the clock to a few days before that troublesome confrontation.

???: “It’s no good! No matter where ya look, there ain’t nothin’ left!”

???: “The armory and food cellar are also empty! There are also ashes mixed into the water! It ain’t drinkable!”

???: “They also thoroughly killed the Brave Oxen for the beast carriages… What an impudent bunch…!”

With bittersweet emotions of confusion, lament, and indignation, they had brought back such a report.

As they had triumphantly marched into the stronghold to examine the interior, this was the result of him excitedly waiting for the report they had to give. In short, hearing that there was no gain, Subaru, at his wit's end, held his head.

Subaru: "Goddammit! That bastard, the damn nerve to do this!"

Directly on the receiving end of that targeted harassment, the face of the offender immediately came to Subaru's mind.

Without a doubt, the one who had done this was Subaru's worst enemy—Todd Fang.

Visiting the Gladiator Island as an emissary, Todd was the perpetrator behind the tragedy that massacred every person on the island. In order to prevent that horrible future, Subaru threw down the gauntlet for a second lap around the Gladiator Island.

And thus, in a display of excellence, he had gained all of the island's gladiators as his allies, and had even won over those on the side of the guards, who, by all rights should have been his enemies; hence, he had succeeded in preventing Todd from disembarking.

Having certainly achieved a perfect victory, Subaru and his gladiator comrades of around six-hundred people had become ecstatic.

Believing they were unbeatable, they finally rushed out from the island, and began their journey with their sights set on the Imperial Capital—And then, their first hurdle ended up being the lookout stronghold that was located on the shore opposite to the island.

It was a small stronghold used to operate the drawbridge connecting the island with the far shore, and it also had the objective of inspecting the beast carriages going in and out of the island; at most, there would be a limit of twenty people stationed there.

As previously mentioned, the number of gladiators that Subaru had enlisted as allies was six-hundred. It had been something that was very difficult to deal with.

Subaru: “Though, during the time when we were all a bit flustered as we left the island, I was incredibly surprised when Ceci immediately ran off to capture the stronghold and burn the flag…”

Cecilus: “Nah, I heedlessly did that because of all the pent-up frustration I had from being treated like my participation wasn’t needed. Be that as it may, capturing the stronghold isn’t really all that incredible. I guess in story-terms, it’s an activity on the level of being finished between the lines.”

Subaru: “…In reality, this isn’t an episode that can be compared with Ceci’s monstrous chronicles.”

In the corner of Subaru’s vision as he muttered that, the flag burned, and Cecilus laughed “Right?” as he shouldered the pole which no longer had anything to hoist.

That indifferent attitude seemed entirely as if it did not share in the same sense of impending crisis as Subaru and the others.

Indeed, that sense of impending crisis was—

Tanza: “Just as Hiain-sama and the rest have reported, it seems that the stronghold has been completely abandoned. Because of this, we are unable to collect any rations or water whatsoever.”

Subaru: “I guess it makes sense to burn and throw these things away if they’re going to be captured and used by the enemy. But even though they tucked tail and ran, they still had the damn nerve to do such underhanded things…!”

In front of Tanza as she summed up the report, Subaru kicked a nearby wooden box with all his strength. It hurt his toes very much. Absolutely all of this was the fault of that bandana man.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama, is this the doing of the Private First-Class of whom you spoke?”

Subaru: “No doubt about it. He’s the kinda guy who precisely does the most undesirable things. But man, no way he went as far as to throw ashes into the water.”

As Subaru placed his hand to his forehead in lamentation, Tanza was having difficulty thinking about what they should do in response.

Given their position, even Tanza, with whom Subaru was the most open about his thoughts out of all his comrades, could not share in his feelings without personally experiencing the peril and troublesomeness of Todd.

Thus, Subaru did not expect Tanza to understand to that extent either.

It would be fine if Subaru was the only one to experience the menace of such a frightening, outrageous opponent. At the very least, even she ought to have understood his troublesomeness from the skill of his withdrawal.

Subaru: “At times like these, I become keenly aware of just how useful it would be to have magic. If you can produce water and ice with magic, then something can be done about thirst and hunger…”

Tanza: “Regardless of quenching thirst using water, is ice not incapable of averting hunger?”

Subaru: “There’s the strategy of having the bloated tummy distract from an empty stomach, and there’s also the method of eating shaved ice. Magic has infinite possibilities.”

Tanza: “Though, I do not get the impression that there are infinite ways to use it…”

Whether it was because she was not very familiar with magic, or because Subaru gave a poor example, Tanza tilted her head with a face unable to comprehend the usefulness of magic.

He was just about to exhaust his words endeavoring to restore the honor of magic, but the current priority was not to elevate the status of magic, of which there were no users present, and instead was a more immediate problem.

???: “As a result of Segmunt’s efforts, our allies have suffered no damages. But, it seems we cannot merely stay with our hands raised in joy. Without the replenishment of resources, all of us shall eventually ebb away."

Subaru: "Ugu…"

???: "Even if you incite others with spirited words, appreciation shall not follow if results are not produced. Though it may be strict, the fact that you are a juvenile shall not become an excuse for errors in your judgment."

As his thoughtlessness was pointed out by a stern voice, Subaru was at a loss for words.

With a terrifying expression akin to a demon, Gustav folded his four burly arms.

Considering the situation he had been placed in, that merciless remark was a natural development.

Subaru: "I know. We can't afford to stumble and fall like this right at the start. After all the trouble we went through to have Gustav-san betray the Emperor and come with us…!"

Gustav: "—. I cannot help but say that such a perception and manner of speaking are somewhat vexing for me, in my capacity."

WIth a heavy sigh, Gustav cautioned so; however, that seemed to be a rather humane attitude.

While bearing the obligation of the Governor of the Gladiator Island, Gustav took the island's guards and aided in the prison escape of Subaru and the six-hundred gladiators. That was unmistakably a large decision capable of ruining his life's career, and if it resulted in failure, he would naturally be subjected to execution.

Since he had made Gustav believe that such a decision was worth it, and piled up steady steps to make him go all in, Subaru was responsible for Gustav's life.

—No, not just Gustav, that went for everyone who had decided to follow Subaru.

Subaru: “I gathered them all, and I will lead them all. That’s the Schwarnia Family.”

Gustav: “Generally, I have no reservations about the name, but I earnestly implore you to fulfill your duty. If you are unable to do so…”

Subaru: “If I am unable to do so?”

Gustav: “As the official, I will have no choice but to swiftly resume my original obligations as Governor.”

Since his tone of voice did not seem like he was joking, Subaru became startled that the statement was likely not a joke.

Though it was a matter of course, the original obligations of Governor referred to the duty of the Chief of the Gladiator Island.

In other words—

Subaru: “That means, forcing everyone to go back to the island?”

Gustav: “If there is no choice, thus shall it be so. However—”

???: “—Oi oi oi, ya bastard, ya sure are talkin’ a whole lot ain’t’cha?!”

Subaru: “Huh, oi!!”

As Subaru timidly asked a question, Gustav mercilessly gave the Governor’s answer. And, upon hearing that, someone poked their head out from the side, and voiced their thoughts, the vigor of which took Subaru aback.

Lashing out at Gustav with a shrill voice was one of Subaru’s comrades from his Unit, Hiain. While glaring at Gustav with his characteristically cute Lizardman eyes,

Hiain: “Even tho if it weren’t for bro, those emissaries that we repelled would’ve prolly rampaged ‘round the island, how the hell could’ya have complaints?! You ungrateful little…”

Gustav: “In my capacity, I am not declaring any dissatisfaction, Yatz. Additionally, using only Schwartz’s report in regards to the intentions of the emissaries is entirely one-sided. Whether that was the truth or not cannot be said objectively without first hearing the opinion of the other side.”

Hiain: “The fuck d’ya mean “objectively”?! Bro is our ally! His enemy is our enemy! That’s all there is to it!”

Subaru: “Wait wait wait, you’re getting way too worked up!”

As if he had been irritated by Subaru and Gustav’s previous exchange, the vigor and harshness of Hiain’s tone was not anything ordinary. Be that as it may, since the reasoning had been irrational, and he was grateful that Gustav had become his comrade, Subaru was about to stab Hiain in the back.

Subaru: “Don’t let your temper get the better of you so suddenly! Gustav-san was just giving me a little push forward telling me to get myself together.”

Gustav: “That is not a thought I can affirm, Schwartz. There are no lies in my words, as the official.”

Subaru: “Since this is getting a bit complicated, just make a scary face and glare!”

As he was about to stab Hiain in the back, Subaru himself was stabbed in the back by Gustav. His desperate appeal was silenced with a “Hmph” by Gustav; however, Hiain’s vigor did not abate.

And as he intensified his vigor with a “Look at that!”,

Hiain: “As expected, we ain’t gonna get along with the administration! Ya gotta be careful, bro!”

Subaru: “Ah, dammit, it’s all gotten too distorted.”

Hiain: “There ain’t no need to act modestly. The Curse Rule’s already been dispelled. No matter how self-important the Governor acts, our side’s got strength in numbers!”

Subaru: “What a refreshingly minor-character-level declaration!”

Despite being a scaredy-cat who was weak in scuffles, it was very much like Hiain to ride a favorable wind at full speed. Subaru greatly admired the worldly wisdom of betting on the winning horse, but Hiain had misjudged one major thing.

Subaru: “Just to let you know, Gustav is still in possession of the Curse Tool. Hence, it’s wrong to assume he will never put a curse on us again.”

Hiain: “Is that so? Fine, that’s as far as I’ll go for today!”

Subaru: “What a refreshingly minor-character-level move!”

Hiain, who possessed the ability to camouflage himself to blend into his surroundings, quite literally made a pale face and left a parting threat as he hopped to hide behind Subaru.

Gustav: “Schwartz, I do not wish to say strict things to the members of your Unit, but…”

Subaru: “I know. I’ll give Hiain some proper admonishment later.”

Gustav: “That would be preferable. In my capacity, I do not wish to stir any meaningless trouble.”

Those were certainly his true feelings, but his warning from beforehand was also probably his true feelings.

Gustav was someone who was able to separate his pragmatic duties and desires, and come to a proper judgment. His Sparka with Subaru on the Gladiator Island resulted in nothing more than a slight deviation in that judgment.

If he saw a need to come to his senses, Gustav could easily wake up from this dream at any time. To continue showing him that dream, that was Subaru’s current responsibility.

Anyhow—

Tanza: “That is enough joking around. Schwartz-sama, I am sure you have realized, but…"

Subaru: "…About the food and water supplies?"

Tanza: "—Yes."

Having spoken in a hushed voice, Tanza frowned her round eyebrows and nodded at Subaru's words.

As previously mentioned, the members of Subaru's group were a large family surpassing six-hundred people. In addition to being a number greater than the total student-base of an ordinary elementary school, practically all of them were adults. To make matters worse, since the guards had brought along the Gladiator Beasts as fighting assets, the level of lunch provisions at an elementary school would not be enough to cater to their stomachs.

Of course, when they left captivity, they brought all the contents of the island's storehouses with them, but even if they divided meals into once in the morning and once in the evening, the hard truth was that it would only last for two days.

When they had captured this stronghold, he had hoped that they could stock up even a little bit, but that had been thoroughly crushed by Todd. Abhorrent.

Tanza: "This is the western edge of the Empire, and our objective of the Imperial Capital is far to the east. We are very much lacking in food and water supplies."

Subaru: "I don't want to make everyone feel hungry."

Tanza: "That is part of it, but more simply it will become a factor for anxiety… An empty stomach famishes not only the body, but also the mind."

What was rather difficult to ignore, was the very somber tone of Tanza's voice.

That was something that just having lots of knowledge could not produce, for there was a weight housed therein that was only possible in the voices of those who have personally experienced such a thing. That was the case for Tanza.

Was that an experience of actually being so starved that her mind had withered away, or an experience of witnessing a person that famished?

Subaru: “…”

Subaru did not laugh off Tanza’s anxious feelings as an exaggeration.

Even while living on the Gladiator Island that threatened one’s life, meals and a bed were guaranteed. Paradoxically, in order to maintain order in that harsh environment, those things were absolutely indispensable.

If he could not maintain those, what awaited him was the collapse of this group.

Cecilus: “If it’s a large family, the lack of money in your pockets will swoop down on you… it’s plain and there’s no way to make it flashy, but with this it seems like you’ve crashed into a rather difficult problem.”

Subaru: “You’re saying it like it’s someone else’s problem, but Ceci also has an insanely large appetite.”

Cecilus: “Hahaha, no matter what you tell me, I won’t give in or endure the state of my stomach. I have no interest or concern in your financial or money situation. After all, it is the duty of the main actor to receive an appropriate return for the role he plays.”

While poking the flagpole into the ground, the cheerfully smiling Cecilus was quite the glutton despite having such a small build.

Even though indulging oneself was absurd for life on the Gladiator Island, Cecilus still indulged himself to the extent that he might put on weight. With his small physique, he was able to make quick work of three adult meal portions. Furthermore, while other gladiators had to bear with only two meals a day, he would eat a third and even a fourth meal.

His current declaration seemed to indicate that he felt no sense of weight on himself beyond this point.

Subaru: “Should I have Gustav-san curse Ceci as to not be able to eat three meals?”

Cecilus: “Oyaoya, Boss. Aren’t you underestimating me a little too much? Even if you curse me to die if I eat three meals, I’ll get my hands on some bread when my stomach starts to rumble. It’s important that I maintain a healthy good-looking appearance.”

Tanza: “In the first place, would the curse really work on Segmunt-sama? What if he is able to outrun the curse?”

Subaru: “He’d die. I can guarantee that.”

Cecilus: “I don’t understand how he could guarantee that but if Boss says so then I guess I’d die!”

The threat that he had no intention of following through on was meaningless, as Cecilus was utterly indifferent to the topic of his own life.

In reality, Subaru had witnessed him lose his life at the activation of the Curse Rule, but at that time too, his attitude was that of not fearing death to an unthinkable extent, so this was not an attempted bluff or anything of the sort.

Subaru: “Anyway, it would be annoying to lose to the hungry Ceci’s point. This isn’t the time for us to go along with the saying “You can’t fight on an empty stomach”. Gustav-san, where’s the closest stronghold from here?”

Gustav: “It is around half a day east. It is also a considerably larger stronghold than this one.”

Subaru: “Alright, let’s head for there!”

Relying on Gustav’s knowledge, Subaru decided on their next destination. Nobody opposed that decision of Subaru’s. That was because everyone had made up their minds that Subaru was the leader of this group.

Subaru: “I’m grateful. But, that’s a lot of pressure.”

Until now, even though Subaru had filled the top position of groups for short periods of time in this other world, he had never experienced being in charge of a group on this scale for such a long-term.

Only now that he had reached this position, could he truly feel it for the first time. —The heavy burden, of being at the apex.

Subaru: “Something like wanting to return to the position of Emperor, what a pervert.”

On the verge of being crushed with having just unified the gladiators of the island, Subaru was reminded of the annoying face of someone attempting to reign over something much, much larger than that, and he made a sulky face as he muttered so.

14

—Afterwards, Subaru’s group spent half a day heading east, and succeeded in finding the stronghold from Gustav’s knowledge without trouble.

Differing from the small stronghold that aimed to monitor the Gladiator Island, this stronghold was surrounded by stone walls, and was a splendid thing fulfilling the role of a checkpoint, so they had hopes of what was contained inside.

However—

???: “Uooooh! There ain’t nothin’ in the storehouse! Ain’t nothin’ but dust scattered ‘round!”

???: “This time, there’s even shit and piss in the water well…?”

???: “How much of a fool are they gonna make of us… stop fucking messing around…!”

As revealed by the sorrowful complaints of Hiain and the others, their hopes were betrayed yet again.

The storehouse was empty, and the well water had been made useless. The stronghold, which had taken Brave Oxen, Galewind Horses, and even ground dragons for use in beast carriages, had been abandoned before Subaru's group had invaded.

And yet, it had not merely been abandoned.

Subaru: "They even went as far as to set up a trap so that when we opened the food cellar, a magic stone would explode…"

Cecilus: "Well, if it hadn't been me who rushed ahead first we might have very well lost a considerable number of people. Fortunately I have legs that can outrun an explosion."

Subaru: "Yeah. I'm glad that Ceci is a monster who can outrun explosions."

Cecilus: "Couldn't you at least call me a monster? If you add a little bit to make it a "good-looking monster" then I think we can come to an agreement, don't you think?"

Tanza: "Still, would Segmunt-sama be able to run free from a curse?"

While fed up by Cecilus's useless declaration, Tanza gazed at the corner of the stronghold that had been blown away.

The explosion that caused the stone-built fortress to lurch had a level of power such that its explosive inferno could even be seen rising from a good distance away. In reality, if Cecilus had not been so gluttonous, everyone caught in the trap would have been erased, leaving no trace.

But, even though there were no visible injuries, the report of there being no results was something akin to an attack.

In both the abandonment of the stronghold, and the trap with the magic stone, he could feel the participation of Todd.

Subaru: "No matter how you look at it, there's no way he'd have them abandon every single stronghold…"

Since he had no idea the extent to which Todd's hands had reached, any careless course of action would be unwise.

Without even having come face-to-face, even though there was no way for him to be cognizant of his existence, Todd's manner of doing things irked Subaru in all the worst ways.

Subaru: "That there would be no results here, goes completely against my expectations."

Anticipating there to be something to be gained from the stronghold, they had taken quite the forced march for half a day to get here.

Since he had tried to mask their anxiety as they gradually approached by singing and dancing as they advanced, they had been consuming water and food more intensely than they would have normally.

At this rate, they were in danger of realizing Tanza's fears that they would collapse due to their minds withering away.

???: "Schwartz, don't be so worried…"

Then, patting the worrying Subaru's shoulder, Weitz called out to him.

Having eagerly looked around the stronghold both this time and last time, he was much more vexed than the others at the fact that they came back empty-handed. Even so, he could not just do nothing after seeing Subaru's somber expression.

As Weitz traced the skull-like tattoo on his own face,

Weitz: "Ya shouldn't feel down 'cuz of this kinda dirty trick…"

Subaru: "Weitz…"

Weitz: "It'll be fine even if ya feed that rowdy bunch with dirt… if that still ain't enough, we do have this many people… if we attack and pillage some of the towns and villages along the way…"

Subaru: “Weitz?!”

As Weitz tried to encourage him, a part that immensely bothered him came forth. Subaru’s voice unconsciously overturned, but Weitz frowned and made a confused face.

It was just as if to say that he had not said anything strange.

Weitz: “What…?”

Subaru: “No matter what, that’s a no go!”

Weitz: “—?”

Subaru: “Pillaging, stealing, and robbery, we won’t be doing any of those kinds of things! Those are absolutely prohibited!”

Weitz: “What the fuck…?”

Subaru made an “X” with his arms and raised such an appeal, and Weitz’s face showed surprise from the bottom of his heart.

Subaru understood that Weitz’s natural idea to include pillaging among their options was due to a difference in the environments they had grown up in. But, that was something not limited to just Weitz.

Hearing the current dispute between Subaru and Weitz, the other gladiators exchanged baffled looks.

Gladiator: “No pillaging… are you sane, Schwartz?”

Gladiator: “How are we gonna get food without pillaging? It ain’t something that just grows from the ground.”

Gladiator: “It probably does grow from there, but we ain’t got any idea of how to grow it!”

Subaru: “Oi oi oi oi.”

Subaru was dumbfounded by the dangerous notions being clamorously voiced by the gladiators. However, the fact that that was not some kind of gladiator dark humor, was evident from their true-to-life faces.

As expected, having become criminals in the Vollachian Empire, a land on the verge of becoming a lawless area, they were an elite group of people who lacked common sense and had been sent to the Gladiator Island. Still, since the majority of the people of the Vollachian Empire lacked common sense, the elite were the most prominent among them.

Anyhow—

Subaru: “Wait! Please wait! Everyone, listen up!”

While calling out to the obstreperous surroundings, Subaru attempted to convey his will.

But, the discussion of the heated gladiators could not really be stopped.

If the food situation truly deteriorated, they would likely heavily push for the option to pillage.

That had kept the disorder in check until now, but it collapsed with pillaging having become prohibited.

Weitz: “Ya win what ya desire with strength… that’s the way of the Empire… Both ya and the rest of us, we won our freedom through strength, didn’t we…”

Representing the disorder of the gladiators, Weitz tried to correct Subaru’s mistake. In response, Subaru shook his head saying “No, that’s wrong”.

Subaru: “It’s true that we fought. But that was all in order to gain through victory. Not in order to steal.”

Weitz: “It’s the same…!”

Subaru: “It’s entirely different!”

As Weitz strengthened his tone saying they ought to pick the rational choice, Subaru objected. Weitz's eyes widened at the volume of that voice, and Subaru stared at him as he continued.

Subaru: "Though getting something through victory and getting something through stealing may seem similar, they are different things. I am willing to fight to win things, but I don't want to fight to steal things."

Weitz: "Schwartz…"

Subaru tightly clenched his fist as he answered, and in response, the wrinkles in Weitz's brow deepened. Thereupon, in response to Subaru's intense declaration, Idra raised his hand and interjected with a "But". Compared to the other gladiators, he stared at Subaru with a somewhat calm gaze, and,

Idra: "How do you specifically differentiate between those two? Everyone in the surroundings here, myself included, do not know that method."

Subaru: "Well, it's not really that difficult. After all, all of you should know how to make that distinction."

Answering such to Idra's question, Subaru suddenly jumped on top of a nearby wooden crate.

Elevating his point of view, Subaru gazed over his surroundings, and took a deep breath. In order to ensure that his words could reach all the people who had accompanied him off the island, who had not yet heard the current conversation, he raised his voice.

Subaru: "Listen up! As we continue heading for the Imperial Capital, we will not pillage any towns or villages! That's the rule of our team… of this group!"

Everyone: "…"

Subaru: "From here on out, all our battles will be for the sake of gaining through victory! They will absolutely not be for the sake of stealing! We won't fight to steal! I want you all to keep it that way!"

As Subaru asserted so in a raised voice, a moment of silence was born, and exploded immediately after.

That it was even louder than before, was likely more so due to discomposure instead of opposition. From them, who were very accustomed to the ways of the Empire, the choice to not steal had not even been pre-installed to begin with.

Gustav: “I understand your assertion. But, as to whether it can be called a realistic view…”

Subaru: “Gustav-san…”

Even within the commotion of the gladiators, he could clearly hear the coherent voice of Gustav.

Having participated in searching the stronghold, Gustav was also aware of the uneasiness regarding the resources they had brought from the island. Narrowing his eyes, which were still at a higher elevation than Subaru’s, even with the latter standing on top of a wooden crate,

Gustav: “In my capacity, I do not endorse the act of pillaging. But, things remain exactly as I have expressed before. Supposing this campaign reaches an undesirable conclusion, in my capacity and as the official, I will carry out my professional duties.”

Hiain: “Th-That bastard, he still has the nerve to intend on betraying us…!”

Subaru: “Hiain, shut up for a sec.”

Gustav’s statement was not yet a pronouncement that he would reinvoke the Curse Rule. Silencing Hiain, who had overreacted and came to that conclusion prematurely, Subaru urged Gustav to continue.

Gustav: “You are likely aware, but in my capacity, I am accompanying you following a rather major decision. Since I have gone that far, I have no choice but to exhaust all possible measures to procure favorable results.”

Subaru: “Of course, I know. Lip service won’t fill our bellies, and our throats are still thirsty.”

Gustav: “Well then, do you happen to possess any sort of alternative plan?”

Subaru: “That’s…”

In response to Gustav’s stern question, Subaru took a moment to contemplate, given how important this answer would be.

If he failed to be careful with selecting his words here, this gladiator alliance would collapse before they even participated in battle, and everyone would be dragged back to the island once again. If that came to pass, he had something prepared within his mouth in order to “re-select” as soon as possible.

But, he did not want to relinquish the present which had been proceeding so favorably until now—

Cecilus: “—You’ve misunderstood Boss’s thinking a little, Gustav-san.”

Subaru: “…”

That instant, cutting into Subaru’s moment of silence, Cecilus carelessly shrugged his shoulders.

The boy attracted the gazes of Subaru, Gustav, and all the other people present onto himself, and loosening his lips as if he was enjoying all that attention,

Cecilus: “It’s not that Boss is grumbling that he doesn’t want to gain food and water without the exchange of any money or goods. To say that “gaining through victory” and “gaining through stealing” are different things lies within the realm of wordplay but that is what is hindering everyone from understanding. They have pretty much the same meaning so you could say it was a rather clever choice of words, but…”

Gustav: “Segmunt, I am having trouble understanding what you intend to say. Explain it in a way that even I, in my capacity, can understand.”

Cecilus: "The very fact that we are in a slump after finding the contents of the stronghold empty means that collecting the resources from the stronghold was a safe condition for Boss. In other words it's a problem regarding the level of the opponent. We can steal from wolves, we won't steal from dogs or rabbits."

Subaru: "…"

Cecilus: "That's what you mean right, Boss?"

Tilting his head, Cecilus inquired of Subaru, who was on top of the wooden crate.

Thus, this time everyone's attention gathered on Subaru, and he reluctantly nodded.

For the most part, Cecilus's point was correct.

However—

Subaru: "Even if the opponent is a wolf, it's ideal to use the phrase "Gaining through victory"."

Cecilus: "Hahaha, it's good that you have a hangup about that. Without something like that then it would just be following an absurd plot that doesn't know what point to focus on. Be that as it may…"

Subaru: "—?"

Cecilus: "There are many cases where a plot that just aims to be unconventional for that sake of it becomes a trash piece of work that's hard to watch. Just like Gustav-san, that isn't something that I desire."

Cecilus closed a single eye as he spoke those words, and they gave the impression that they were as sharp as glass. Thin and brittle, but sharp. Such an act of damage-control from Cecilus was painful to Subaru's ears.

Then, even after hearing that exchange, many of the gladiators still could not come to an understanding.

???: “Strongholds that have enemies are fine, but we can’t attack villages and towns…?”

???: “What the hell, what does Schwartz want to do?”

???: “If ya really wanna give it to His Excellency the Emperor… to yer old man, then this ain’t the time for us to be starvin’!”

Loudly raising their voices, they were trying to get closer to Subaru due to the vexing matter. Despite this, that thoughtfulness was a fatal deviation from Subaru’s desires.

With the disconnect in their sense of values as it was, he did not want to proceed with forcibly silencing their discontent.

However, would he be able to figure out what to do?

Tanza: “—Sparka.”

Subaru: “Eh…?”

Tanza: “Well, I thought if you explained Sparka, perhaps everybody would be able to understand.”

Indeed, the one who offered a ray of light to the worried Subaru was Tanza, who had been deliberating by his side this whole time.

Concerning Subaru’s claim, which had been unable to clear up the question marks from many of the gladiators, including the three from his Unit, Tanza had sympathized despite her general sensitivity, unlike Cecilus, who displayed comprehension born out of a lack of common sense.

Since he could not think of her suggestion as anything but that, Subaru became fraught with emotion.

His chest became ardent at the fact that Tanza had earnestly wracked her head to try and convey Subaru’s views.

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama?”

Subaru: “Ah, no, sorry, I just got a few tears in my eyes. —

Everyone! Tanza said it in a way that's easy to understand! Tanza did! This adorable girl did! In a way that's easy to understand!"

Tanza: "P-Please stop! We are getting off topic!"

Subaru: "Ow ow ow! Don't pinch my thigh!"

Though Subaru just wanted everyone to share in the deep emotion he was experiencing, it was Tanza herself, her face flushed red, who pinched his thigh and set him back.

Then, as Subaru's eyes became teary, this time due to the pain,

Subaru: "We're gladiators! That which we ought to do is Sparka, not stuff like one-sided pillaging! To begin with, that's what it means to do battle."

Everyone: "…"

Subaru: "I get that you have complaints. But from here on out, when I end up clashing with my father… with the Vollachian Emperor in the Imperial Capital, I won't be able to win if I'm cowardly, selfish and lame."

That was not a matter of logic, but it was rather of an emotional nature, and perhaps even regarding the intensity of his soul.

A clash with the Vollachian Emperor—At the very least, he seriously intended to throw down the gauntlet with the fake Emperor. He did not know what kind of objective the fake Emperor was aiming for when he had ousted Abel from the throne.

But, he did not think that the deeds of a mere coward who lacked conviction could have done such a thing.

In that case, what awaited him in the Imperial Capital was a battle with a powerful enemy who harbored strong convictions—In other words, it was Sparka, and there was no way that Subaru's distorted self would stand a chance.

In order to gain victory, it was necessary. —The unwavering conviction of Natsuki Subaru, was.

Subaru: “Though, conviction might not actually be such an impressive thing, but rather just being stubborn.”

If that stubbornness was what had gotten Subaru through the Gladiator Island, and all of his life in this other world up until now, then his bad temper and improficiency at giving up were things he could never let go of.

Everyone: “…”

At Subaru’s proclamation, silence was born among the gladiators once again.

There was no commotion, but there was a clear confusion left in the silence. Even when the contents were simplified and conveyed, their reactions were to say that they had yet to reach an understanding.

However, tearing through that silence, a vigorous voice was raised.

That was—

Hiain: “Hey hey hey! What is it, ya bastards are damn depressing! Bro said he’d do all that! So then he’s gonna do it! If ya can’t believe it then hurry up and go the fuck home, ya tattooed skelly!”

Weitz: “Shut up, lizard-bastard… don’t say such fucking bullshit like that I’d ever doubt Schwartz… You’re the one who oughta be cowering behind a rock…!”

Glaring at each other, swearing at each other, Hiain and Weitz stirred up an unpleasant atmosphere. Lagging one step behind those two, Idra spoke while giving a wry smile,

Idra: “Schwartz, you have no intention of changing your mind, right?”

Subaru: “Ah, yeah, for just this at least. No matter how terribly hungry I get, I absolutely won’t rethink this.”

Idra: “I know just how obstinate you are. After all, we’ve been watching over you from close by.”

The obstinacy Idra spoke of, was that perhaps about when he was running all about, making all the gladiators of the island his allies, or perhaps when he succeeded in persuading Gustav, when even Idra and the rest had thrown in the towel, thinking of it as an absolute impossibility?

Likely, he was referring to all of that, and as Idra smiled,

Idra: “You are our leader, Schwartz. We want to abide by your thoughts as much as we can. Therefore, we have a suggestion. — Let’s go somewhere, not to dogs or rabbits, but to a place of wolves.”

Subaru: “A dwelling of wolves…”

Weitz: “If we continue a full day northeast from here, there’s a town… It’s Glarasia…”

Hiain: “It’s called the City of Iron and Blood, a famous town where they make stuff like weapons and armor! It’s on the bigger side of towns within the Empire, so if we go there…”

Though it was Weitz and Hiain, who often quarreled with each other, they took turns pushing the conversation forward. While he was listening to them with widened eyes, Subaru shook his head sideways with a “Wait”.

Subaru: “If it’s a big town, there’ll probably be a lot of food and water. But, as for protecting the rule of no pillaging…”

Weitz: “The town isn’t our aim… It’s the fortress of Imperial Soldiers that protects the town…”

Subaru: “—Hk”

Idra: “Across the whole Empire, the revolt against the Imperial Capital is picking up steam. Of course, the fortresses that protect the cities in each will be at the height of rigorous vigilance in preparation for the uprisings in each region. If it’s there, the opponent will not be insufficient.”

Hiain: “The enemy is Glarasia’s Fortress of Iron and Blood! How’s that bro, ain't it a great idea?!"

Weitz: "Don't speak like this is yer achievement…!"

Idra nodded, Hiain got carried away, and Weitz clicked his tongue.

Hearing the proposal from those three, Subaru's mouth was agape in full surprise. Softly placing a small hand over Subaru's open jaw,

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama, I think their proposal deserves some consideration."

While speaking, Tanza closed Subaru's jaw with her hand. She was also impressed by the idea of the trio, but Subaru greatly surpassed merely being impressed, for he was deeply moved.

Subaru: "Even though going along with my thoughts is way out of line with the common sense of the Empire."

And yet, the trio respected Subaru's thinking, and suggested a means to bring it to fruition.

Even though persuading Subaru to do things in accordance with the ways of the Empire would have seemed to be the much easier path.

Subaru: "…"

In order to proceed with a hangup that was nothing more than Subaru's self-complacency, the three of them had come up with a target.

Fiercely sniffling and covering the tears and snot that were welling up, Subaru clapped both of his hands onto his cheeks. Then, opening his eyes, he could see the faces of his comrades from atop the wooden crate.

Hopes and understanding, confusion and tension, a single trend had yet to be fixed among them, but—

Subaru: "Let me hear all the details regarding Glarasia. —In order to keep us from falling apart."

Glarasia, the City of Iron and Blood, was a major city for the arms industry within the Vollachian Empire.

In Vollachia, where conflict never ceased, the demand for weapons was always high, and all day long from morning to night, the sound of forging steel went without pause in Glarasia.

The city made up over half of all the arms that were distributed throughout the Empire, so naturally the importance of Glarasia within the Empire was exceedingly high, and they were allocated a suitable amount of fighting strength for their defenses.

The highest extreme of their defensive capabilities was the stronghold where over a thousand soldiers were always stationed—The Fortress of Iron and Blood.

In Glarasia, where nearly all the residents of the city were involved in the arms industry in some way or another, though there were many hot-headed individuals, there were few who made a livelihood from fighting itself. Protecting those craftsmen, there was the Fortress of Iron and Blood, an important position in order to ensure the steady supply of weapons, and the commanding officer entrusted with the defense of that important city was an Imperial General Second-Class, the Steel Appraiser.

???: “—Weapons, are beautiful.”

That man, Toledo Spiegel, was dearly in love with weapons.

On the topic of just how much he admired weapons, he had gone so far as to groom the beard around his mouth into the shape of a sword, a demonstration of the love he felt for weapons.

His nimble and slim body standing upright, the man, around the age of forty, was clad in a uniform furnished with a cloak that served as proof of his position of General within the Imperial Army; he stood with his hands joined behind his back as he faced the wall.

The highest floor of the Fortress of Iron and Blood, the office of the building where a great number of Imperial Soldiers were permanently stationed; its wall was adorned with an immense amount of weapons, each and every one of them being part of Toledo's personal collection.

Toledo: “The skilled craftsmen compete to refine their technique, and forge weapons with the clear objective of taking lives. As that purpose is a simple one, these are excellent articles to express the abilities of their makers.”

Speaking in an enraptured voice filled with heat, Toledo appreciated the weapons on display.

Even in the blade of a single sword, pursuing the ideal sharpness and durability was a herculean task. A thin blade would have an increased sharpness, but the strength of the thin portion would fall. Durability would increase with thickness, but naturally the sharpness would fall proportionally, and would likely approach a blunt state.

That ultimate trial and error of ideals and reality was vividly stuffed into weapons.

That was the reason why Toledo Spiegel was enchanted by weapons, why he had accumulated so many of them, and why he was made out to be a distinguished collector within the Empire. Thus, he became known by the alias of the “Steel Appraiser”, and his discerning eye for weapons served as the reason for him being established in the position of General.

Toledo: “Though I am still imperfect, I have come to handle weapons with more ardor than the average person. Even if the highest peak is still far off, I have confidence in my eye for weapons. The strength and quality of all weapons, whether they suit their owners or not, and even that…”

In this world, there was no shortage of boorish folk who spared no expense in procuring the likes of famed and treasured swords. But, the sight of those very folk wearing unbefitting weapons on their waist was ridiculous.

The amount of times when such people would take a weapon that did not suit their stature, and were pointed out as targets for scornful laughter, were also not few in number.

However, while on one hand those gazes seemed like a disgrace, there were also times when the weapon would match the holder's stature. That was the charm of weapons, and the spiritual way of being that was demanded of Vollachia's Sword Wolves.

Toledo: "I do not allow for my subordinates to carry mediocre weapons. By taking a good weapon in hand, I believe that people shall correspond to, and perfectly suit the brilliance of that steel, and it shall enhance their very selves."

Toledo did not pridefully label himself as having an eye for people.

Instead, he had an eye for weapons. Seeing whether a person was suitable to wield a given weapon, he had acquired such a technique of seeing people through the weapon.

The Imperial Soldiers of the Fortress of Iron and Blood, each of them carried an excellent weapon based on Toledo's judgment. He could confidently assert that they were all worthy soldiers that he himself had thoroughly trained.

Henceforth—

Toledo: "Just what happened to those outstanding subordinates of mine?"

???: "—Ah, pardon me. If I remember correctly then everyone did have quite good expressions on their faces but even so it seems that they were too lacking as actors to be able to stop me."

Behind Toledo, as he posed this question while gazing at a dazzling treasured sword among the collection on the wall, a presence gave a response.

Inside of this fortress where over a thousand powerful Imperial Soldiers were stationed, he had single-handedly reached Toledo's office, which was the most tenaciously defended, a presence of such immense capability.

Toledo: “Currently, there is unprecedented peril shaking the entirety of the Vollachian Empire. Insolent people going against the glorious authority of His Excellency the Emperor are emerging everywhere, but have you decided if you are one such person?”

???: “I guess you could say so. Though it’s a little upsetting that you think of the group I’m a part of as the same as those other folk. After all, we’re special!”

Toledo: “Hm…”

Mixing in a word that he had no recollection of ever hearing, the lighthearted voice declared so.

While carefully examining that which was within his mind, Toledo reached his hand out to the treasured sword in front of him, and removed it from the wall.

The collection on the wall was varied with swords, spears, axes, hammers, and sickles, but as expected, the sword was most familiar to him. —Of course, Toledo could sufficiently master any weapon.

He did not want to become someone who just lavishly made use of his money and social status to hoard weapons that he did not even use. For that reason, by the end of his bloodied training, Toledo had been able to rise to the rank of General Second-Class.

As that very Toledo turned around, his eyes met with those of the blue-haired child standing in the entrance to the door.

As a small teenage child, he was likely younger than even Toledo’s four children. However, the moment they faced each other here, it became an impossibility that he was merely a child as suggested by his appearance.

However, Toledo was unable to accurately grasp just how strong this child was beyond the fact that he had reached the top floor.

The reason was—

Toledo: “Without taking up a weapon, you were able to arrive here empty-handed?”

Child: “Yep, I’m barehanded. I don’t know if you’ll believe me, but I don’t have any kind of concealed weapon either.”

Toledo: “I believe you. I do not sense the presence of concealed weapons coming from you.”

For himself, who had confidence in his love for weapons, it was necessary for him to also have deep knowledge of concealed weapons that were meant for assassinations and surprise attacks.

The act of carrying concealed weapons had the inherent objective of concealment, but Toledo was able to feel their unique presence on a microscopic level. To put it frankly, he could hear them.

Toledo: “The voices of concealed weapons, I hear none coming from you.”

Child: “Ho hoh ho hoh! My goodness that is quite the wonderful reply! Are you the possessor of a Divine Protection that allows you to converse with weapons, or is this perhaps simply what Boss would call a character quirk!”

Toledo: “My love is pure. There are no impurities such as Divine Protections mixed in.”

Child: “I see, so you’re someone with a character quirk!”

While Divine Protections were useful traits to have, they had no role whatsoever in Toledo’s abilities. His sense of smell developed by polishing his own love, that in itself was a source of pride for Toledo.

Hearing Toledo’s response, as the boy tapped his zori on the floor with a pitter-patter,

Child: “As far as I can see the weapons lined up are all superb articles of great renown. But I don’t know, I can’t seem to find any katanas.”

Toledo: “Katanas?”

Child: “Yeah. My preferred weapon is the katana. I was searching for an ideal katana that would suit my hand if possible but I'm not having much luck happening across an article that fits!"

Toledo: "I see. Indeed, even in my collection, there are no satisfactory katanas included."

At the words of the boy yearning for a katana, Toledo thought about his entire collection.

Even apart from the ones adorning the wall behind him, Toledo kept many weapons stored in the mansion on his territory. However, even among those, there were no famed katanas being kept.

Originating from the Kararagi City-States, the katana was a single-edged sword. —And for those, there was a collector in the Empire that exceeded even Toledo. Taking absolutely every single famed katana into his possession, was an Imperial General First-Class.

Henceforth, if the boy intended on happening across a magnificent katana within the Empire, there was likely a thorny path that awaited him.

But then again—

Toledo: "That is only if you are able to surpass the eye for beauty of this very Steel Appraiser!"

Child: "Steel Appraiser! That's nice, what a lovely alias! By the way, has your eye for beauty deemed me to be a worthy opponent to fight?"

Toledo: "Unfortunately, these eyes are only able to ascertain the quality of weapons and the diligent efforts of craftsmen."

He could tell that the strength of the boy, who had one eye closed, was preeminent from the fact that he had rushed to the highest floor of the fortress. He could not ascertain anything more than that fact.

The fact that not a single soldier of the fortress had come up yet, also substantiated the boy's strength.

But, Toledo Spiegel did not possess the means to measure those who took up no weapons.

Toledo: “Hence, I shall show you. The history of a plethora of weapons, and their power.”

Child: “—. I was about to do something very rude. I deeply apologize.”

Toledo: “…”

Child: “As expected of a talented man who has ascended to the rank of Imperial General. I was about to look down on you, who has arrived at becoming your current self by following your dignity and convictions, as being a minor character. This was an exceedingly arrogant oversight by the leading actor who drives the stage.”

While speaking, the boy lightly jumped as he stood with a hippity-hop, then bent his knees. There were no openings whatsoever in that casual action, and Toledo quietly continued to watch over the boy.

Then, in front of Toledo, the boy silently straightened his posture, and,

Child: “The soldiers of this fortress were also sufficient actors. I pay my respects to you and the subordinates you have trained. Let’s not finish this in the spaces between lines.”

Toledo: “—En Garde!”

The moment the boy narrowed his eyes, Toledo swung his treasured sword, releasing a sword flash that went beyond the office desk.

The slash was unleashed upon the boy like a wave, and Toledo leaned forward, taking a step to close the distance on his opponent. Invigorating the muscles on his slender arms, he danced in ecstasy as the silver flashes of the treasured sword piled up.

That act scorched the atmosphere of the room, proving the sharpness of a weapon that could cut even the world.

However—

Child: “Seeing that definite strength, I suppose there’s nobody who would ever treat you like a minor character.”

After those words of praise grazed his eardrums, Toledo was struck in his medulla oblongata.

Just before his consciousness was severed, Toledo thought about the meaning of the words of the boy who had not suffered even a scratch from the tempest of his slashing attacks, and he gave up.

Toledo: “I do not understand anything other than weapons.”

Having even gained a wife through the connection of both of them being weapon collectors, that was Toledo’s response.

16

The fall of the Fortress of Iron and Blood, would likely become just as much of an upcoming topic within the Empire as the abandonment of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive.

Be that as it may, the recent times in Vollachia had also seen events such as the Fortress City of Guaral being occupied by rebels and the collapse of the Demon City of Chaosflame, so this event would just be another part of that sequence.

However, Subaru thought the fact that a single boy had taken down a fortress on the scale of one-thousand people made it a bit more crazy and unthinkable than the other topics.

Subaru: “As expected, Ceci sure is absurd. I’m glad I could get him as my ally.”

Tanza: “Looking at it objectively, I believe it is appropriate to evaluate Schwartz-sama as being equally absurd for seizing control of the Gladiator Island.”

Subaru: “Me? Nah, I certainly tried my best, but Ceci’s is a natural phenomenon, and mine is more like cultivation, right?”

Tanza: “Even if you say “right”, I do not really understand…”

As Subaru tilted his head and spoke those words, Tanza slightly frowned in confusion.

Putting the Authority of Return by Death to good use, Subaru had reached his ideal after a staggering amount of trial and error. He was somewhat different to Cecilus, who could get what he desired in a single try.

And, that self-awareness was something that even Tanza could not sympathize with.

Anyhow—

Subaru: “He even fulfilled the no-killing condition that I requested; he did a magnificent job.”

As Subaru spoke and looked over the fortress, the soldiers who had been waiting in each part of the building were now totally defeated; all of them had lost consciousness and fainted, but their lives had not been taken.

It was something that Subaru had requested of Cecilus. That was not just limited to this Fortress of Iron and Blood, but it was a policy that had also been maintained for the other two strongholds they had visited after leaving the Gladiator Island.

Even if he was told that it was naive, he could not do something like taking the lives of others so easily.

Those were Subaru’s thoughts, but contrary to his expectations, Cecilus did not laugh at them.

Cecilus: “Isn’t it good to do it in the way that Boss wants it? Fortunately, the strength to accomplish that… in this case, the excellent pawn known as myself has it. If a strong person can easily kill a weak person, then choosing to not take their lives easily is the way of the Empire, right?”

Then, with such a tone he readily accepted the undertaking, and really did succeed in the conquering of the fortress.

Of course, Subaru himself had self-awareness that he had made an unreasonable request. Ignoring the value of life, it was natural that subduing the enemy without killing them was more difficult than simply taking their lives.

He had forced that difficulty, and it had been accomplished.

Subaru: “For now, everyone is helping to tie up the sleeping enemies. I understand their feelings of wanting to leap towards bread since they’re so hungry, but they need to endure for just a bit more.”

Tanza: “Yes, the Governor is giving directions. Shall we head up?”

Subaru: “Right… Ceci has been waving at us this whole time.”

Along with Tanza, he looked up at the upper stratum of the fortress, and there a small speck-like figure could be seen waving its hand. To that which was endlessly drawing attention to its presence in the upper part of his vision, Subaru waved back, and heaved a sigh.

From there, he proceeded to the office inside of the large fortress together with Tanza.

Then, as Cecilus welcomed Subaru as the latter arrived at the office —

Cecilus: “—I thought this fortress would be just right for this, so I want to test Boss on one thing.”

Subaru: “…”

Inside the room where the wall was adorned with many weapons, Cecilus was sitting his bum on top of the work desk, and as he trained his gaze on the arriving Subaru and Tanza, he smiled.

Next to Cecilus, a man with a characteristic beard stood bolt upright. Judging by his uniform furnished with a cloak, he understood that the man was a General from just a single glance.

Having understood that, a question surged within his mind. —Why was that General free?

Cecilus: “This is Toledo Spiegel-san. The Steel Appraiser of the Imperial Second-Class Generals, he’s the person who commands the Imperial Soldiers of this fortress but he himself is also quite the swordsman.”

Toledo: “No need for such flattery. My fangs… no, my blade was no match for you.”

Cecilus: “Well that can’t be helped now can it? After all, I’m special!”

At the words of the man introduced as Toledo, Cecilus gave a broad smile and answered in his usual tone. Unable to bear that usual tone of his, Tanza tightly grit her teeth and,

Tanza: “Segmunt-sama, what kind of joke is this?”

Cecilus: “Nooo, it’s not like I’m messing around. I won’t deny that since I don’t really give off a serious vibe it may seem like I’m playing but I’m basically always serious.”

Tanza: “So then! Just what are you…”

Since that was not the answer she desired, Tanza unusually raised her voice.

As Tanza’s small body shook with her complaint, Subaru cut her off with his own words.

Subaru: “You said you want to test me? Can that not wait until everyone has eaten?”

Cecilus: “I also feel sorry. That’s coming from someone who never missed a meal even while everyone was cutting back on food and enduring. It’s just that I really wanted to clarify something while we’re here.”

Subaru: “Clarify something, what’s that?”

While feeling like that gaze staring at him was roasting his forehead, Subaru concealed how overwhelmed he felt and locked eyes with Cecilus.

What he was thinking, what he was starting, he confronted the monster without knowing either of those things.

At Subaru's do-or-die gaze, Cecilus crossed his legs atop the desk, and rested his chin in his hand.

And then—

Cecilus: "Boss's specialness is whether he lets people live or kills them. —I wanted to clarify whether or not you have the resolve for that."

17

—Thus, the story returns to the beginning of Cecilus's betrayal.

Subaru: "Why… Why did you betray me, Ceci?!!"

Cecilus: "Like I said it's in order to test Boss… Ah, I guess I haven't spoken of how I intend on testing you. That was an oversight on my part. There aren't many times when I'm the one painting the picture after all!"

Slapping his knees in his cross-legged position, Cecilus declared while having a hearty laugh.

On the highest floor of the Fortress of Iron and Blood, sitting atop of the office desk, keeping the one whom he ought to have sent down by his side, the Steel Appraiser, Toledo Spiegel, Cecilus faced Subaru and Tanza directly.

Cecilus: "—You'll steal from wolves, but not from dogs or rabbits. I don't dislike that individual attitude of Boss's, rather, I quite like it. That's why I absolutely hope that you can continue to maintain that until the time you die, but…"

Subaru: "…But?"

Cecilus: "Isn't it a bit questionable to excessively avoid the deaths of wolves in order to actualize that?"

Closing a single eye, Cecilus made grand movements with his slender arms, and posed a question to Subaru while gesturing to the entire room— No, to the entire fortress.

Cecilus: "Well now didn't I capture the fortress on Boss's orders? As discussed earlier Toledo-san over here is quite skilled and while the other soldiers were minor characters but upon evaluation I think they were worthy of being in roles that get killed off."

Subaru: "But if you didn't kill them then they're not in roles that get killed off, right?"

Cecilus: "Yeah that's right, I didn't kill them. Since Boss had requested that I do it without killing."

Subaru: "…"

Next to Cecilus as he nodded, Toledo slightly narrowed his eyes, and stared in Subaru's direction.

Even though his characteristic sharp beard suited him, it was clear that his eyes harbored anger towards himself for losing as well as a wholly different hue. —Was that perhaps anger towards Subaru, who had given the order not to kill?

Much like other Imperial Soldiers, was this person the type that deeply desired to die in battle?

In that case, the resolve that Cecilus had asked of Subaru was—

Subaru: "So then, is Ceci acting like this because I requested you to not kill anyone? To say that I excessively avoid casualties…"

Cecilus: "It'd be bad if you think I'm wrong. The way we see things and our sense of values are greatly unaligned. You agree with me don't you, Tanza-san?"

Tanza: "—. I do not wish to answer."

Cecilus: "Even while trying to avoid making a statement you have still formed an answer. Truly a tasteful remark."

Cecilus was satisfied with Tanza's answer, but Subaru's lips contorted.

That he excessively avoided peoples' deaths, was a vexing evaluation. In the first place, lives were a matter of being a one or zero, so there was no being excessive or anything of the sort. It was merely whether it was avoided, or not.

Cecilus: "So then my answer to the previous question is no. It's not really like I'm doing this because you told me not to kill anyone."

Subaru: "…Huh?"

Cecilus: "I think there is merit to not killing. It's dramatically more difficult than simply taking lives so it becomes more of a climax. People who have tasted disgrace and fallen once can use that frustration to polish their skills and stand in the way once more— Such a development really gets me excited."

Toledo: "Even if such is your hope, I do not have confidence that we can satisfy the standard you desire."

Giving a sidelong glance, Toledo denied the outlook that Cecilus hoped for.

Cecilus pouted his lips at that, but it only enhanced the confusion within Subaru.

Subaru had thought that Cecilus had betrayed him because of the Imperial way, disliking the restriction of being unable to feel the sensation of killing others due to the restriction on taking lives, but he had said that was not the case.

Subaru: "So then, so then what the hell? Disliking the deaths of wolves, that's…"

Cecilus: "Hahaha, don't joke around saying you don't know. —In the world that Boss sees, are the wolves just the antagonists who block the way?"

Subaru: "…"

Cecilus: "The way I see it, even Tanza-san who is earnestly glaring at me from next to Boss looks to be a lovely wolf.”

Being told so, Subaru looked at Tanza with a surprised expression on his face.

Without facing Subaru, all the while protecting Subaru with her outstretched arm, Tanza’s lovely side-profile stiffened. But, seeing her lightly bite her lip, Subaru realized.

Faster than Subaru, Tanza had grasped the meaning of the “Wolves” Cecilus had spoken of.

Subaru: “…The wolves that Ceci is speaking of, does that mean everyone who accompanied us from the island?”

Cecilus: “Yes.”

Subaru: “But! What’s wrong with that? They’re our allies. What’s weird about avoiding doing things that would cause my allies to die? That’s not what I—”

Cecilus: “—In that case, why did you take everyone away from the island?”

A chilly blade was suddenly fastened to Subaru’s throat. —No, no such thing was fastened there. But, to the extent that he felt like there was one fastened, it was a blade of words that had made his heart skip a beat.

Catching his breath, Subaru widened his eyes. Peering directly into those black eyes of Subaru’s with his single open blue eye, Cecilus asked.

Cecilus: “Boss’s objective is in the Imperial Capital. For that purpose we stopped at this fortress searching for food and water but it was me alone who captured the fortress. Though I appreciate that you had confidence in my strength and entrusted me with this role!”

Emphasizing the end of the sentence, he posed a question.

Cecilus: “The same plan won’t work in the Imperial Capital. If you don’t want to let any of your allies die then you shouldn’t have made them your allies in the first place. A pack of wolves can't be tamed like dogs."

Subaru: "That's… hk."

Tanza: "Segmunt-sama!"

As Subaru struggled to find words, Tanza sharply called out Cecilus's name in his place.

Witnessing the glint in the young girl's dark eyes, Cecilus opened his closed eye and stuck out his tongue, then,

Cecilus: "Any more than this will anger Tanza-san so allow me to promptly convey my demands. As Boss has said, none of the fortress's soldiers have been killed. In other words, at the current point in time the fighting strength of the fortress has not fallen in the slightest. Ah, I guess it's been reduced in terms of some weapons being destroyed though."

Raising up the index fingers on both of his hands, Cecilus swayed from left to right as he spoke.

Given the flow of the conversation with how he had prefaced with "demands", that which Cecilus had just pointed out caused an unpleasant sweat to run down Subaru's back. While thinking "No way", Subaru looked down at his feet— No, at the Fortress of Iron and Blood.

At that reaction of Subaru's, Cecilus smiled as if to say "You've hit the nail on the head".

Then—

Cecilus: "Please capture this fortress once without using my strength. If you can't even accomplish that then you aren't qualified to rise to the stage anymore. —As the leading actor, I will forcefully advise you."

18

After the boy and girl left the room in an irritated manner, Toledo looked at the boy who remained.

At the boy who was aimlessly swinging his legs while atop the desk — no, at the very incarnation of the Imperial way that took the form of a boy.

Since there was a law of iron and blood that existed in the Empire that the strong would take all things into their hands, he looked at the being who, in accordance with that way, possessed the right to take all things into his hands.

In addition—

Toledo: “Cecilus Segmunt.”

Cecilus: “Yes?”

As Toledo spoke the name of a person, the friendly boy gave a response.

The boy had a face as if to say that was a matter of course since his own name had been called out, and Toledo narrowed his eyes at him.

Toledo: “Are you saying that such is your name? However, the owner of that name is…”

Cecilus: “Ah, I’ve heard I’ve heard. Somehow it seems like there’s an extremely troublesome person who not only uses the same name as me but even uses the same nickname. But even if they have the same name and same nickname, the real deal doesn’t change. Please know that I am the definite Blue Lightning, Cecilus Segmunt.”

The boy gave a bright smile and boasted with an imposing air, and for the time being Toledo acknowledged him as Cecilus.

Toledo had never been acquainted with the owner of the same name, First of the Imperial Nine Divine Generals, Cecilus Segmunt. Though they had never met, his strength and audacity were things known to everyone in the Empire.

He had single handedly defeated over a thousand Imperial Soldiers and captured the Fortress of Iron and Blood.

Such a deed was an extraordinary act that Toledo thought was impossible for anyone except the real First.

However, the Blue Lightning was not supposed to be a little boy, but—

Cecilus: “Even so, I do beg your pardon, Toledo-san. I went and decided this and that and everything all on my own.”

Toledo: “Following the way of the Empire, you have won the right to have things your way through your own strength. Above all, even if I were to try and deny you, I do not have the means to drive you away. Additionally…”

Cecilus: “—?”

Toledo: “I do not think ill of you, so I have no desire for you to voice words of apology.”

Cecilus: “Haha!”

That was a rather daring declaration, but Cecilus gave a lighthearted laugh and ignored it.

It was not as though he had fallen into desperation. Considering his exchange with Cecilus from just before, it was unlikely that he would raise his hand against Toledo here. But then again, nothing could be certain.

Toledo: “I shall say this now, but we have no intention of cutting corners. If given the chance now, this time we shall assuredly fulfill our desires alongside our weapons.”

Cecilus: “I don’t mind that. If you cut corners then it’ll spoil all the fun, and I won’t interfere even if it seems like Boss and the others are gonna be defeated.”

Toledo: “…If weapons could speak, perhaps they would give off this kind of impression.”

As Cecilus continued to indifferently speak about his own methods, Toledo harbored such a thought.

Cecilus's way of being, which had been forged with the straightforward goal of strength, was quite close to that of a weapon. The only difference would be that this weapon had rebelled against its owner by its own will.

On that point, he sympathized with the black-haired boy and the deergirl, but,

Toledo: "I have no intention of letting the black-haired Crown Prince get any further east than this fortress without doing anything."

If his objective was the head of His Excellency the Emperor that resided in the Imperial Capital, Toledo could not let that pass by any means.

Even if that happened to be a second-chance brought about by the whim of the young Blue Lightning.

Indeed, beside Toledo as he steeled his resolve, Cecilus grinned with his chin resting in his hand, and,

Cecilus: "—Come now, sear it into my eyelids once more, Boss. You, who has accomplished things that nobody could possibly accomplish, just what kind of answer will you give to my whim?"

19

Hiain: "Like I said, I never thought we could rely on such a bastard!"

Hiain clutched his head with tears in his eyes, and shrieked out in a sorrowful voice.

The location was a plain that commanded a distant view of Glarasia, the City of Iron and Blood; the group commanded by Subaru had withdrawn from the Fortress of Iron and Blood, and were now awaiting the discussion of what they should do next.

The current agenda was a matter of course; the worst possible obstacle that had abruptly appeared before them.

Hiain: “Regardless of the other guys, the reason that bro didn’t persuade that damn brat ‘til the very end was ‘cuz ya also thought that same thing, ain’t that right?! Goddammit, my bad feeling was right on the mark!”

Weitz: “Shut yer fucking mouth, lizard bastard…! Don’t always wait to see yer opponent’s move before lodging a complaint…! If ya really thought that then it woulda been way better if ya said something to Schwartz from the start…!”

Hiain: “If I had gone and done somethin’ like that, what would we’ve done if that dangerous brat went and acted violently?!”

Subaru: “Be that as it may, you could call what’s happening right now the result of him actually acting violently.”

With bitter and sullen faces, learning the details of what had gone down in the fortress, everyone had some amount of negative emotions mixed into their expressions, and were confronting the issue.

Subaru: “Everyone, I really am sorry. If I’d been able to persuade Ceci, this sort of thing wouldn’t have…”

On the whim of Cecilus who had captured the fortress by himself, Subaru could not prevent the idea that the former had spoken of; lamenting that, Subaru bowed his head.

However, at Subaru’s apology, Weitz spoke out with a “Wait…”.

Weitz: “Ya don’t need to apologize… It’s much more of a serious crime that this lizard bastard thought something like this might happen, and still kept his trap shut…”

Hiain: “That’s right, I’m much more at… Don’t fuck around! All of this is that crazy brat’s fault!”

Tanza: “There is no doubt that it is exactly as Hiain-sama says, but the problem is the fact that nobody can bend the view of Segmunt-sama.”

Tanza nodded and affirmed the point Hiain made as he raised his voice, but even if she clarified the whereabouts of the problem which were clear even before she clarified it, nothing about their situation had changed.

Gustav: “From my point of view, as the official, I believe we currently have two options.”

Then, Gustav uttered words in a deep voice that sounded as if a large rock was speaking.

Gustav had his two lower arms folded, and with the index fingers of his two upper arms raised,

Gustav: “First, we disregard Segmunt’s demand, abandon the fortress and leave Glarasia, and aim for another fortress or settlement in the vicinity. That is to say, a change in our policy. This change would include a change to Schwartz’s policy of not seizing resources from towns and villages.”

Subaru: “That’s—”

Weitz: “Not happening… I ain’t got no intention of twisting Schwartz’s desires…!”

The first of the choices presented by Gustav; opposing that even more intensely than Subaru, was Weitz.

He, who at first had no reluctance to pillaging, truly held Subaru’s thoughts in high regard. Aside from him, both Idra and Hiain, though the latter was a little hesitant, appeared to share the same view.

As if he had anticipated that reaction, Gustav continued with “Well then, it shall be the other option”,

Gustav: “This one is simple. —Accept Segmunt’s proposal, and capture the Fortress of Iron and Blood without relying on his strength.”

Idra: "I am not satisfied that we are doing exactly what Cecilus wants, but it seems there is no other choice."

Since they rejected the first suggestion, they would naturally need to go with the second— That was to say, they had no choice but to accept the absurd game that Cecilus had proposed.

No one held any objections to Idra as he summed it up. That was why, Subaru held some.

Subaru: "Wait! There can still be another option… I could go and try to persuade Ceci one more time or something…"

Gustav: "Schwartz, this may be harsh for you to hear, but… do you truly believe that Segmunt would be willing to lend an ear to your persuasion?"

Subaru: "Ugu… hk"

Being pierced where it hurt, Subaru's cheeks stiffened up.

Indeed, that was a problem. —Even if Subaru were to make use of the poison prepared in his mouth, and pile up attempts like he had done on the Gladiator Island, he could not picture being able to persuade Cecilus.

Or perhaps, if the restart point for Return by Death had not shifted from way earlier— that was, from the precise moment that he had washed ashore on the Gladiator Island, then he could probably eliminate the cause for this explosion in advance.

Subaru: "Even so…"

No matter what route he made him an ally in, he did not feel like he could avoid the explosion of the bomb known as Cecilus.

That was unmistakably the biggest reason why Subaru had feared Cecilus on the highest floor of the fortress.

It was the dreadfulness of the "whims" that Cecilus had even spoken of himself.

Against an opponent that acted on whims, Subaru's Return by Death could no longer be called invincible.

Subaru: "…"

He did not know what activated the switch in the bomb known as Cecilus. So then, would it be better if he gave up on acquiring the bomb? Choosing such an option was impossible.

Heading to the Imperial Capital without Cecilus was an act akin to putting the ground dragon before the carriage.

There was no option other than to dismantle this bomb, and make it harmless.

Subaru: "But, like I said, right here and now…"

Weitz: "Schwartz, I get that you're worried… But…"

Even if it was not the real Cecilus, Subaru could not take the plunge and attempt to tackle Cecilus's challenge. Patting him on the shoulder, Weitz furrowed his brow with a grim face.

Subaru was dubious of his grim expression, but he immediately understood the reply.

—A sound rang out. His stomach, loudly growled.

Subaru: "…"

Moreover, drawn in by that growl of Weitz's stomach, the stomachs of the surrounding gladiators began to growl in quick succession. That large chorus of growling stomachs, was something that could not be helped.

Idra: "Until now, we've been straining ourselves on one meal per day. Even so, we're out of rations. We've accumulated some water from the light drizzle that fell along the way, but we're just barely enduring…"

Hiain: "Even so, that brat had the nerve to eat three whole meals a day… bro! I'm… I'm pissed off! The whole time, that bastard was just abusin' his power!"

Subaru: "Weitz, Idra, Hiain…"

Hit with the growling stomachs and words of the trio, their frustrations pierced Subaru's very soul.

It was not just them. Everyone whose stomachs were growling— no, even all the gladiators whose stomachs were not growling, were they not all wearing expressions of those who were daring to take up the gauntlet?

Seeing all of them, Subaru's own stomach hurt as if it was tightening—

Tanza: "Please wait, everyone! Please do not lead Schwartz-sama astray."

Undaunted by the heat of the strong and rowdy bunch, Tanza raised her high-pitched voice.

WIth both hands outstretched, she wedged herself between Subaru and Weitz and the others, and gazing over the men whose enthusiasm was gradually increasing, the side-profile of her lovely face contained a hue of tragic heroism.

Tanza: "If you intend on abiding by Schwartz-sama's policy, then it is our duty to endeavor as to not rush Schwartz-sama's—"

Indeed, it happened in the midst of her spinning kind words that were carefully considerate of Subaru.

Tanza: "…"

Suddenly, Tanza's words were interrupted, and even the gladiators simultaneously widened their eyes.

The reason was that a faint noise was mixed into Tanza's do-or-die appeal— Tanza's stomach, wrapped in the obi of her kimono, made a small growl.

Promptly clutching her stomach, Tanza was flushed red from the neck up right away.

Tanza: “D-Do not be mistaken, Schwartz-sama. Just now, that was…”

Tanza’s expression was clouded as she turned around, and with her face flushed red she desperately tried to deceive him.

But, no matter how admirably Tanza tried to hide it, she could not hide the cute sound of her stomach growling.

Listening to that, Subaru bit his lip—

Subaru: “Sorry, everyone. —I want you to let me contemplate my answer for just one more hour.”

With that, he requested more time for his futile do-or-die struggle.

20

Gustav: “Based on Segmunt’s personality, it is unlikely that he shall come to obstruct us as part of the forces of the fortress. He is an obstinate person who does not waver on the things he has decided.”

Subaru: “Mm, yeah. I agree.”

Gustav: “…But, your expression is that of unwavering apprehension.”

As Gustav slightly frowned as he looked down upon him, Subaru pinched his own cheek.

An hour of weeping; while wasting that which he had requested in order to settle on a conclusion one second at a time, Subaru continued with painful reluctance as he meandered with hesitation and indecision.

Was there truly no other option? Searching for a means other than challenging the fortress, he endlessly meandered.

Gustav: “Do you regret recruiting Segmunt as an ally?”

Perceiving the innermost thoughts of Subaru's turmoil, Gustav quietly posed a question.

Subaru: "There's no way I could ever say that I don't regret it… But, we didn't have the choice not to make Ceci our companion. Those are my true thoughts."

Gustav: "It is logical. Even if you are lost on how to pull his reins, Segmunt is absolutely indispensable."

In order to demolish a large wall, one must borrow the power of a bomb. Even if there is the risk that it might explode while one is carrying it, it is necessary to accomplish the objective.

That was why there would be safety valves to reduce the risk of explosion as much as possible. Had Subaru been too negligent in that regard?

Gustav: "Schwartz, I must apologize to you for just one thing."

Subaru: "…Eh? Gustav-san needs to apologize to me?"

Suddenly spoken to in a quiet voice, Subaru's reaction was a moment late.

Though partly due to Gustav suddenly severning the flow of the conversation, Subaru was more so surprised at the word "apologize". In truth, Subaru had no idea what Gustav wanted to apologize to him for.

As Subaru widened his eyes, and Gustav inversely narrowed his own,

Gustav: "At the outset when we left the Gladiator Island, I told you something, as the official. That the fact that you are a juvenile shall not become an excuse for errors in your judgment."

Subaru: "—. Yeah, you told me. In reality, I think that's exactly how it is."

That was still before they were scraping by for resources, but those words came from a situation where such an omen could be felt.

Being told that, Subaru was cautioned that it was necessary to pull himself together. Subaru had dragged the island's gladiators and Gustav into this, and had taken them outside.

Their safety, food, and water, Subaru was responsible for guaranteeing all of that—.

Subaru: "That's why, I feel sorry about these disappointing circumstances…"

Gustav: "—That was a lack of words on my part, in my capacity. If that was the reason for you carelessly pushing yourself, then that was an error of mine, as the official."

As Subaru reflected like that, Gustav stopped him with his four hands, and deeply bowed his head.

As Gustav, who was close to being two and half meters tall, bowed his head, before the shrunken Subaru it appeared as if a mountain was collapsing. But, that was the amount of impact that could be felt.

After all, Gustav was expressing his apology to Subaru to the extent of bowing his head.

Subaru: "A lack of words…"

Gustav: "It seems that you have taken my words as me, in my capacity, pressing you for liability, but that was not my intention, as the official. What I wished to express back there, in my capacity, was an objection to the notion that you must undertake the responsibility for that group on your own."

Subaru: "—. Sorry, I don't really get it…"

Even though he rephrased it in a way that was easier to understand, Gustav's view was still abstruse.

As Subaru frowned in response, Gustav folded his four arms, and continued a little more.

Gustav: "Regarding Segmunt's reckless actions on this occasion, albeit there are some negative points, there is also one point that you ought to re-evaluate. That is, including myself in my capacity, this is a problem that everyone from the island is prepared to face."

Subaru: "…"

Gustav: "Schwartz, I understand that you are of a personality that despises the deaths of people to the utmost. From the fact that you placed a ban on pillaging, and that you even ordered the Fortress of Iron and Blood to be taken without killing… No."

Thereupon, Gustav shook his head.

Gustav: "It was clear from the very beginning, when you threw yourself into Sparka countless times in order to win the hearts of all the island's gladiators. Thereafter, you engaged me, the official, in Sparka over a game board, and compelled the guards to surrender without harming them. You have been thorough with your own desires, and have succeeded in them."

Subaru: "Isn't it natural that I'd get serious for my own selfishness?"

Gustav: "Affirmative. After all, as the official and in my capacity, I have continued to revise the Gladiator Island's rules in my own way. Since I have given such an affirmation, there is something I must now say."

Subaru: "…"

Gustav: "Schwartz, all of the gladiators who left the island with you, they want to fight for your sake. If you say that your thoughts are your own selfishness, then that is their— that is our selfishness, in our capacities."

Subaru: "—Ah."

Being directly told by Gustav that they wanted to become his power, Subaru was at a loss for words.

Gustav disclosed what he had felt in his heart this whole time until he had bowed before the much younger Subaru. And that was not just his own thoughts, but those of everybody else as well.

Gustav: “You stand in the position of the one commanding this group. However, that does not mean you must bear the burden for everything. In my capacity, myself and the others have the resolve to carry the burden alongside you. Besides…”

Saying that, Gustav, fangs protruding from his frightening face, contorted the corners of his mouth.

Subaru was a bit slow in realizing that it was Gustav’s smile.

Gustav: “If that was not so, then why do you think everybody would abide by your rules without deserting the group, to the extent that they would continue to endure their empty stomachs and parched throats?”

Subaru: “…Am I an idiot? No, I am definitely an idiot.”

Gustav, with a gaze akin to an adult looking at a child, gave a wry smile.

Though his real age was older, Subaru was currently in a state that made it easier for him to be treated like a child, but even if he was in his original form at this time, there was no doubt he would nonetheless be treated like a child.

To that extent, what Gustav was saying was natural, obvious, and exceedingly logical.

Cecilus: “—In that case, why did you take everyone away from the island?”

Subaru: “I was even told so by Ceci…”

The question that Cecilus had thrown at him at the Fortress of Iron and Blood, its true meaning was finally conveyed to Subaru.

Ultimately, pushing that realization via hearsay demonstrated just how unkind Cecilus’s conduct was, but in this case, it was Subaru’s intuition that was far too poor.

It was vexing, but Cecilus had been the one who had actually evaluated Subaru’s allies.

Subaru trying to bear the burden of taking them with him meant that he was ignoring their thoughts to an extreme extent.

He thought that by keeping them away from danger, as to not let them be hurt, as to absolutely not let them die, he was protecting them.

—A pack of wolves cannot be tamed like dogs.

However, Cecilus had perceived that to not be the case, and Gustav also plainly stated it.

Subaru: "I thought that running and hiding from battle, and taking detours instead was the best option, but I guess that was wrong."

In the first place, that strategy could only ever continue until they reached the Imperial Capital.

He did not know what kind of battle would unfold at the Imperial Capital, but there was no doubt it would be on a scale larger than anything up to this point. Strong beings such as the Nine Divine Generals would also be present.

It was not realistic for him to continue to protect them, and to keep everyone away from that danger.

He did not want to let them get hurt. He did not want to let them fight. In that case, why did he take them with him?

Subaru: "…"

Gustav: "Schwartz, it is almost time."

As Subaru closed his eyes, Gustav's voice fell upon him from above.

Gustav had raised his bowed head. Then, he probably noticed the change in Subaru's expression. Gustav's voice had returned to its usual tone, a relief to Subaru.

Subaru: "Gustav-san."

Gustav: "…"

Subaru: “Gustav-san, from now on, you’ll be this team’s military advisor. The position of my right-hand man.”

Gustav: “…Though, as far as I know in my capacity, Segmunt and Tanza are already cast for the roles of both of your arms.”

Subaru: “If that were true, then I guess I’m about to be giving my left arm a punch with my right arm.”

Smiling at the rare joke from Gustav, Subaru opened his eyes.

Looking up at Gustav, his gaze was met with a nod, and he headed back to everyone while accompanied by his military advisor.

Everyone: “…”

—Subaru and Gustav returned, and everyone’s attention was turned to them.

Until then, everyone had been noisily exchanging some words, but their mouths all closed simultaneously. Even with the etiquette of a school morning assembly, it should have taken something more than that to get everyone to quiet down before the principal would speak.

He was sorry to all the school principals around the country, but here, everyone’s attention to Subaru’s actions were due to a topic of much greater interest than any discussion at a morning assembly.

Anyhow—

Subaru: “First of all, there’s something I’d like to say to everyone.”

Everyone was listening to Subaru’s words: at the very front was Tanza, and around her was the trio of Hiain, Weitz, and Idra. There was also Old Man Null, Orson’s group, Rex, Milzac and the others, and Jawsrough was also mixed in, united with everyone.

Everyone’s faces and names were united. Feeling the heat of all those gazes, which were as if to say everyone’s hopes were being entrusted to him, Subaru opened his mouth.

And then, he spoke.

Subaru: “I’m a bit annoyed with the idea of always being called something like the group of gladiators, or the escapees from the Gladiator Island, so from here on out, this is what we’ll be calling ourselves. —The Pleiades Battalion!”

21

—The Pleiades Battalion.

That was the name of this group of ruffians, of which Subaru was the leader.

Since they were a battalion, every member was required to be a warrior. Speaking with the reasoning of the Vollachian Empire, all members were wolves, and it was impossible for them to be dogs or rabbits, let alone pigs.

They were Subaru’s reliable comrades who would devote all of their power to actualizing and abiding by the code he had touted.

Idra: “Schwartz, everyone is in position.”

As Idra’s voice called out to him, Subaru nodded.

Looking up, spread out was the night sky filled with sporadically placed stars. Originally, it was standard practice to commence battle in the early morning, but that was in the case that the opponent was not already aware of their enemy’s presence.

This time, since Cecilus had devised the battle, the intentions of Subaru’s group to attack was obvious to the soldiers of the Fortress of Iron and Blood, so the time they chose would not matter. More importantly, their stomachs would be in a far worse state come the crack of dawn.

Subaru: “At this rate, we’d end up needing to kill the Gladiator Beasts and eat them…”

Idra: “I’ve heard they are awful. Apparently the taste is something akin to eating stinky sand. Old Man Null said that in the past, he ate one when he was pressed for food, and it caused him excessive suffering."

He had heard stories of eating an entire warhorse to compensate for food shortages, but that would be terminal if it extended to eating Gladiator Beasts = Witchbeasts.

It was necessary for them to start fighting before that happened, and for them to finish fighting before that happened.

However—

Subaru: "…It's said that the attacking side needs three times the strength of the defending side."

In the past, he had a memory of discussing the same thing when planning an attack somewhere.

The difference in strength might be a little better than it was back then, but the Fortress of Iron and Blood was just under a thousand men strong. On the other hand, the Pleiades Battalion was six hundred men strong plus alpha. The plus alpha was the Gladiator Beasts, but it was unknown just how much they could be relied on due to their malnutrition.

At the very least, there was little hope that they would be able to make up for the two thousand and four hundred people they were lacking.

Tanza: "Schwartz-sama."

Indeed, Tanza, who had been waiting by his side, called out Subaru's name.

Of course, there were also strong individuals, like Tanza and Gustav, whose strength could not be simply counted as a single person's, so it was not necessarily true that this side's strength was completely unfavorable to that of the opponent.

However, since Cecilus, who was literally worth one thousand men, was not present, casualties would definitely emerge. Both on this side, and the opponent's side.

In order to decrease those as much as possible—.

Subaru: "—With an offensive approach, I'll struggle through it."

In his mouth, ascertaining the package of poison hidden behind his molar with his tongue, Subaru took a breath.

On the Gladiator Island, Subaru had made use of Return by Death to avoid battle as much as possible. Even in this situation, it might have been able to prevent Cecilus's betrayal somehow. It might have been able to change this entire outrageous situation somehow. He had racked his brain for such a course of action, but he revised it.

Victory, he decided that he would win together with everyone. —Return by Death, would be used for that purpose.

Subaru: "We'll win. Moreover, it'll be by a landslide."

When the battle began, the formations of the opponent, the tactics they would use, who would be defeated at what times, where the losses of life would occur, he would grasp it all.

In the same way as when he enlisted these six hundred people as his allies, he would save the lives of all of those six hundred people.

—No, not just six hundred people, if possible, the opposing thousand people as well.

—One thousand and six hundred people, save them all, Natsuki Subaru.

22

—When that shook the plain, the City of Iron and Blood, Glarasia, and the Fortress of Iron and Blood, Cecilus was above even the highest floor of the fortress, on the rooftop as he bathed in the night wind.

Cecilus: "Hm~ hm~ hmmm~, hm~ hm~ hm~ hmmm~"

Sitting on the edge of the night-time rooftop, he swung his zori-clad feet as he hummed a tune.

Would Schwartz's group, who had withdrawn from the fortress, run away, or fight?

Personally, Cecilus would naturally want them to choose to fight, but since it was Schawrtz, the choice to run away was also quite possible. That was not because he was a coward, but because he was wise.

However, wisdom was not always something that deserved reverence.

Cecilus: "That's especially the case in this Vollachian Empire. It can't be helped that it's quite a difficult place to live for people who maintain thinking and conduct that's similar to Boss. But…"

It was precisely because they had survived through difficulty, that the paths of such beings became "dramatic".

What would be the point in paying attention to those who were ordinary, of boundless mediocrity.

There existed nobody who was deeply invigorated by trying to find value in the fact that nothing happened.

That was why, Cecilus wanted Schwartz to fight.

He certainly possessed it. Schwartz possessed a distortion so intense that it could invigorate anyone.

For that to end without blooming, even if Schwartz might have been fine with it, Cecilus would not be. Such a thing would be an extreme tedium that would be very pitiful for the world.

Ergo—

Cecilus: "Ohh! Did you finally feel inclined to turn up!"

Seeing the gladiators deploy along the field, Cecilus's heart honestly jumped.

The initial choice had gone just as Cecilus had desired. Whether the following battle would go, whether it would go as Cecilus hoped, even Cecilus himself did not know.

It was not as though he thought it would be good for many people to die. If they did not die, that would be fine.

The issue would be if that became a plot with far too little highs and lows. An unstimulating plot would be seized by sluggishness, and would not be able to keep attracting the eyes and interest of the audience.

Cecilus: “All of you observing from the heavens, please feast your eyes. Upon the souls of the actors who brighten the stage!”

Even if they were just minor roles, if they appeared on the stage, they would catch someone’s attention. Regardless if that moment was full of soul or of inertia, the moment they were seen, that was the entirety of the relationship between actor and audience.

For that reason, one must always make up a face and mind. In order to not have regrets when they were seen at any given moment, and affixed with a “label”.

Cecilus: “Hmm? Oh-Oh, what’s that?”

Trying to evaluate the gladiators with his own pet theory, Cecilus suddenly frowned.

Far in the distance below him, there was an incomprehensible change in the movements of the gladiators on the plain. Of course, seeing that development occur next to the fortress, everyone of the Fortress of Iron and Blood, having been forewarned of the attack, responded.

That should have been reflected in the eyes of the soldiers of the fortress, and also in the eyes of their commander, the Steel Appraiser.

—The gladiators were standing in a circle. A small circle was surrounded by a larger circle, and that circle was surrounded by an even larger circle; such was the circular formation of the six hundred people, reflected in their eyes.

And then—

Schwartz: "—WE, ARE THE STRONGEST!!"

Gladiators: "STRONGEST! STRONGEST!! STRONGEST—!!!"

The loud voices forming that unbelievable war cry shook the plain, the city, and the night sky of the fortress.

7

In a circular formation, raising his voice from its center, Subaru felt everyone's spirit with his entire body.

Having completely lost their spirits after withdrawing, the roaring voices of the Pleiades Battalion were filled with a newfound competitive spirit, and they used their whole bodies to enhance what was being thrown at them.

Subaru: "—WE, ARE INVINCIBLE!!"

Pleiades: "INVINCIBLE! INVINCIBLE!! INVINCIBLE—!!!"

A big circle surrounding a circle, and an even bigger circle surrounding that one, the enormous circular formation of six hundred people gave off a fervor akin to a sports day or a rally.

They were the same in the sense that everyone was becoming one. —Except that what awaited them here was a battle on which their lives were staked.

Subaru: "—OHHHHHHHHHHH INEVITABLE FAAAAAAAATE!!"

Pleiades: "BRING IT ON! BRING IT ON!! BRING IT ONNNNNNN—!!!"

To what he thought was the biggest, most absurd enemy, Subaru thrust forth his declaration of war.

That they should use a circular formation, that they should raise their voices, nobody objected when he had made those suggestions. The enemy was already aware of their presence, and of their intention to attack.

In that case, they would absolutely not lose in terms of morale. To powerfully draw out an unyielding spirit was the policy of a battalion.

Subaru: "…"

Releasing their linked arms and shoulders, Subaru and the rest faced forward.

To the fore, the grand Fortress of Iron and Blood could be seen ahead of the plain; it appeared further away and mightier than it had been when they entrusted it to Cecilus alone, like an outrageously impregnable location.

But, their spirit to take up the gauntlet had not withered in the slightest. And, Subaru had already settled his heart.

Subaru: "I'll redo this no matter how many times it takes."

He had decided that he would make every effort with an offensive approach. Moreover, the resolve he was devoting was likely the same as when he began his second lap of the island, and he harbored an ever stronger sense of duty.

Natsuki Subaru would conquer this battle together with his comrades.

Subaru: "HERE WE GO—!!"

For that purpose, Subaru and the rest ferociously broke out into a sprint.

Kicking up clouds of dust, they swooped down upon the fortress. With rumbling and tremors, the stampede of the men seemed to shake the vast lands, and as they gradually approached the fortress, the enemy came into sight.

The elite soldiers who had been lying in wait, charged with the duty of defending the Fortress of Iron and Blood. One step, another step, they approached, before the collision with those who stood on guard with expressions resolved for death.

Once they collided, the expenditure of life would begin from then onwards. He would pay attention to that as closely as possible— as Subaru thought that, he suddenly saw a figure on the highest floor of the fortress.

—A figure that was waving its hands, as if cheering on Subaru and the others as they challenged the fortress.

Subaru: “CECILUS SEGMUNT, IS A GODDAMN IDIOT—!!”

Pleiades: “GODDAMN IDIOOOOOOOT—!!”

23

—That was a result born due to a coincidental alignment of various factors.

In order to materialize this, there truly was a miraculous overlap of requirements.

Firstly, all those present were unwavering and united in their feelings. Those united feelings were great and powerful, and so firm that they could not be swayed.

And then, there was the existence of Natsuki Subaru at their core, subconsciously invoking Cor Leonis. —The final condition could never have been fulfilled if it were anybody else.

When the condition that was impossible for anybody else to actualize was fulfilled, a miracle was invoked.

Cecilus: “No way…”

And, laying eyes upon that miracle, Cecilus subconsciously muttered to himself.

Cecilus, who was generally unmoved by most things and had a habit of choosing events for their stylishness and stage presence, could surprisingly comprehend all things with just that, but this impression ran contrary to that.

This sight was so unexpected for Cecilus that he could not help but say that.

Cecilus: “Uwaa, the soldiers of the fortress are melting, they’re melting.”

Of course, Cecilus’s muttering was just a figure of speech, but it was a fact that they had met a development so overwhelming that the result of the collision appeared to be like that.

The fight between the group of gladiators commanded by Schwartz, and the elite soldiers of the Fortress of Iron and Blood, was completely one-sided.

The fight should have been an equal struggle, with the fortress side being a little more advantageous. Such was Cecilus’s estimation, and he thought that it would have been a sight to see how the presences of Subaru and Gustav would overturn the disadvantage he had speculated.

However, Cecilus’s estimation was betrayed in an even more nonsensical way.

—Schwartz’s group was clashing with the Imperial Soldiers head on, blowing them away one after the other.

An adult and a child, a Galewind Horse and a puppy, Cecilus and Schwartz; a difference in strength akin to those— perhaps that last example was a bit inadequate, but a difference in strength to those extents was yielded between the two parties.

The mechanism behind that was clear to Cecilus’s eyes. —The Flow Method.

The technique of utilizing the mana flowing within oneself for battle, it was a secret used by so-called martial arts masters to manipulate their bodies. For some reason, everyone had suddenly become able to utilize it.

Cecilus: “No no no as expected there’s absolutely no way that everyone has been using it, right? I mean if there were this many people who could use it then the Sparkas would have been much more impressive and spectacular!”

Cecilus was no fool about the influence that feelings had on the body, but this was just stupid. Such a stupidly absurd thing should have never even happened in the first place.

Cecilus: “Man, Boss is incredible. Or instead of incredible, perhaps I should say incredible.”

The chance to praise someone with feelings of dumbfoundment like this did not come to Cecilus very often.

Schwartz, who had allowed it to come to him, had magnificently lived up to Cecilus’s expectations. —No, this had surpassed his expectations, surpassed his imagination; it was unexpected, extraordinary, and unbounded.

Cecilus: “I had thought it far too cowardly to fear the deaths of wolves and had intended to crush that notion beyond this point, but, man… To think that he would instead persist with the height of cowardice and overprotection to produce such a result, I must say bravo!!”

While the details of what had happened were unclear, Cecilus displayed that his insight was reliable enough to perceive who the origin was, and he roared in laughter with exceeding delight.

—He laughed about the fact that the Fortress of Iron and Blood was unlucky enough to fall twice in a single day.

24

When all was said and done, the result was an anticlimax. —Subaru would never have thought such a thing.

He had not the slightest idea of what they had caused to happen.

Subaru: “Don’t tell me, Ceci didn’t do something for us, did he?”

Cecilus: “Ahahahaha! No way no way there’s absolutely no way. Didn’t I say? That “I won’t interfere”. That’s an expression of my stubborn intention to neither get in your way nor help you out.”

Subaru: “I figured. I understood and didn’t have any expectations.”

At Cecilus’s unashamed answer, Subaru shrugged his shoulders and responded.

From his perspective, there was probably no reason to be ashamed. Rather, having gotten his desired outcome, his confidence that he was the world’s leading actor had probably only deepened.

Cecilus: “That’s a little incorrect, Boss. This wasn’t my desired outcome, it exceeded all my expectations.”

Subaru: “Oh…”

Cecilus: “To think that even I couldn’t see this coming. I can’t believe that in the eleventh hour, Boss and everyone else achieved an awakening and rapidly rounded up all the soldiers of the fortress!”

Spreading his arms wide in excitement, Cecilus hopped up on his feet.

The rooftop of the Fortress of Iron and Blood, on top of the fortress that was already under the occupation of Subaru and the Pleiades Battalion, they faced each other. Behind the turned-around Cecilus, the large white moon was visible.

Cecilus: “Well then what about Boss? Perhaps this was also something you were able to foresee in the scope of your “true sight”?”

Subaru: “If I had such an outrageous power, I’d be able to live much more comfortably…”

Cecilus: “Oya that’s a strange thing to say Boss. It seems like Boss is enjoying comfort in plenty, no?”

Subaru: “…Are you saying that since my movements are slow when compared to Ceci, it looks like I'm comfortable when I operate in eco-mode?"

Cecilus: "No no, you've got it all wrong. It's nothing so complicated."

When Subaru grimaced as if an outrageously false accusation had been made against him, Cecilus shook his head with a smile on his face.

Cecilus: "Boss, what do you think consumes the most energy in life?"

Subaru: "Mastering how to write Roman letters… Oh yeah, like the moment you fulfill a big objective?"

Cecilus: "This is my pet theory. —It's when things don't go the way you hope them to."

At Cecilus's quiet answer, Subaru slightly stiffened his cheeks. Seeing that reaction of Subaru's, Cecilus gave a smile, and,

Cecilus: "How is this outcome for Boss? Extremely disappointing?"

Subaru: "Don't say such ill-natured things… It's beyond ideal."

Kicking the rooftop under his feet, Subaru responded so to that question.

—The first battle of the Pleiades Battalion had concluded with a perfect victory against the Fortress of Iron and Blood. There were zero casualties; it was a literal perfect victory.

And all of that was thanks to extraordinary power that had suddenly manifested itself on the plain.

Cecilus: "Both on the Gladiator Island, and here in the Fortress of Iron and Blood, Boss magnificently fulfilled the wishes that he wanted granted and the things that he wanted to do. If we follow my pet theory from earlier…"

Subaru: "My energy consumption is lackluster."

Cecilus: “I won’t say it’s lackluster but your wishes are being granted and you are being rewarded with more than just obtaining your desired outcome. At the very least you can’t say that you’ve tasted futile efforts.”

While still feeling that they had yet to exit the realm of false accusations, Subaru thought that Cecilus’s claim was not something that had been made foolishly.

Not just on the Gladiator Island, but the majority of Subaru’s days in this other world had come to be rewarded in the end. But, it was just that therein laid the unseen expanse of countless “futile efforts” that Cecilus was unaware of.

Cecilus: “I’m not saying that you’ve simply dealt with things in eco-mode and are rejoicing all easy-peasy. I know that the path Boss walks is a thorny one and that the soles of your feet are all shredded up. On top of understanding that, I’m saying that since you’re being rewarded, you’re fully enjoying comfort.”

Subaru: “—. What exactly do you want to say, Ceci?”

Spending time with his long-winded speech, Cecilus explained his thoughts. Receiving those details, Subaru approached the true conclusion of the battle of the fortress in the moonlight.

The audience was merely the white moon. However, that was enough for Cecilus to dance.

What remained was— whether or not Subaru was deemed worthy for the stage Cecilus rose to.

Subaru: “Were your desires granted? From here on out, what are you going to do with us?”

At Subaru’s question, Cecilus fell silent.

Supposing that Cecilus was planning on going into overtime, even if the Pleiades Battalion had obtained a profoundly mysterious power, it could not be said that they had much of a chance of winning.

But, he had faith that Cecilus would not do that, and not just because Gustav had evaluated him so.

Cecilus acted on his own whims, but was also contradictory in the sense that he was not the incarnation of egotistical selfishness.

Cecilus: "—To tell you the truth there is one thing I have misgivings about."

After being silent for a while, Cecilus raised a single finger and spoke.

Cecilus: "Boss can see things that ordinary people are unable to. I've gone ahead and started calling it "true sight", but…"

Subaru: "—Hk."

Cecilus: "Ah you don't need to affirm or deny it. Either way I already have an answer regarding that within myself. It may be selfish but I don't require the words from Boss himself."

As Cecilus plainly divulged his opinion, Subaru's heart skipped a beat.

He had said it all so forthrightly, but for Subaru it was quite literally a matter of life and death.

This was nothing more than the situation ending without incident because Cecilus had not requested an answer from Subaru's mouth.

Understanding that Subaru possessed a power that laid beyond the bounds of logic, Cecilus continued.

Cecilus: "Boss has the eye to see far into the distance. I won't say that that in itself is troublesome, but… if you see too much then there's a chance that things will get somewhat less interesting."

Subaru: "See too much…?"

Cecilus: "There are certainly fine works where you can see the conclusion of the story coming, right? But I don't want that for the stage I rise to. So I want you to make me a promise, Boss."

Egotistically, Cecilus continued the conversation in a manner that centered on himself. The reason Subaru had not interjected was not because Cecilus was monstrously strong, but because his heart was drawn into what lay beyond those words.

Because the sound of him spinning words was beautiful, he would spit out words until one would become sick of hearing them.

Subaru: “A promise, of what exactly?”

Enduring the sensation of his eardrums desiring that voice even more, Subaru returned a question.

Perhaps because he did not expect an answer from Subaru, Cecilus slightly raised his eyebrows, and then just like always, closing a single eye,

Cecilus: “I’m very impressed by Boss’s resolve. I’d even say that coming this far while persisting with extreme cowardice regarding casualties is attractive. I think there’s no problem with getting so many people involved with your prideful way of being. —But, please make me an exception.”

Subaru: “…”

Cecilus: “Please, for just my life or death, don’t let it enter the vision of your “true sight”, Boss. My life, death, dancing, and brilliance, please let me handle absolutely all of that on my own.”

Cecilus placed a hand on his chest as he spoke so, and Subaru closed his eyes.

Subaru: “…Is this because you think you won’t die?”

Cecilus: “That’s wrong. While I certainly do play the part of this world’s leading actor, if struck with a sword my head would fall off. If I drink poison my heart would truly stop beating.”

Cecilus boasted so in a manner so unchanged from his demeanor that a chill ran down Subaru’s spine.

To the extent that it made Subaru’s resolve seem cute, those were the values inside Cecilus that were formed by his way of life, honed to be ready for battle at all times. In truth, Subaru had witnessed him stick to those values, a scene where he accepted his own death.

He did not fear death. Yet, he loathed the idea of others sullying his life or death.

Subaru: “Alright, Ceci. Let’s make it a promise.”

Eventually, Subaru nodded in agreement to the promise proposed by Cecilus.

It was not an atmosphere in which he could decline, and the contents were not something he would decline to begin with. If Cecilus felt like it, he could run so fast that nobody would be able to catch him, so if his wishes were not granted he would probably run far into the distance, regardless of whether the Curse Rule was still active.

Subaru: “Ceci, get your pinky out.”

Cecilus: “My pinky? What are we doing?”

Subaru: “It’s a promise ritual from my hometown. If you break it you’ll be forced to swallow a thousand needles.”

Cecilus: “Heh, your hometown is sort of like Vollachia.”

Hearing Cecilus’s nonchalant impression, Subaru thought about how he hated the Vollachian Empire, and he held out his pinky, entwining it with Cecilus’s, who had done the same.

And then—

Subaru: “About that promise just now, there’s just one more thing I have to tell you.”

Cecilus: “What is it?”

Waving their pinkies up and down, Subaru appended something on as they performed the promise ritual, to which Cecilus tilted his head.

Staring at Cecilus's face from closeby, Subaru would clearly tell him, who held no malice.

Cecilus had also said some things that were quite unreasonable, so Subaru would also—

Subaru: "—I'm a serial promise-breaker."

Their joined fingers parted, and Cecilus greatly widened his eyes at the unthinkable statement Subaru had made right after making a promise, then he immediately burst out laughing.

Once more, an alliance was formed between Subaru and Cecilus—and as a witness to that formation, the round white moon had kept watch over the dialogue under the moonlight.

25

Hiain: "Like I said! Strength surged up from the deep depths of my body like bwamm! Maybe this is the result of my trainin' on the Gladiator Island?"

Idra: "Even if you say you were training, the only thing you ever did was run away…"

Hiain: "There's also the possibility that my sense for victory and defeat was also trained!"

Weitz: "Why the fuck would yer sense of victory and defeat being trained make ya able to send yer opponents flying… Think before ya speak, lizard bastard…!"

Raising their voices in good spirits, the usual trio spoke of the fruits of the battle— no, it was not just them who were roused by that subject.

Roused were the members of the Pleiades Battalion; the manifestation of the inexplicable power that had occurred during the previous day's capture of the Fortress of Iron and Blood brought about excitement to everyone that had not subsided even after dawn had broken the night.

Gustav: “It is not as though I do not understand everyone’s excitement. In my capacity, I also felt the morale rise during that event.”

Subaru: “Gustav-san did?! You felt your spirits rising?!”

Gustav: “I suppose that I was also astonished that I, in my capacity, could feel my emotions become excited like that.”

Gripped by the excited state of his surroundings, Gustav spoke so, startling Subaru.

While that reaction of Subaru’s was upsetting, as Gustav clenched all four of his fists tightly,

Gustav: “In many cases, I had never attached importance on the presence or absence of armed might. But, to witness it actually produce such results, as the official, I have some reservations on my mind.”

Subaru: “Something like, with too much power, Gustav-san will also drown…?”

Gustav: “The fact that if you have such mighty power, the things desired by Schwartz shall be possible.”

In response to Subaru’s anxious question, Gustav shook his head.

Subaru could understand Gustav’s point. He had resolved himself to restart as many times as was necessary to eliminate the casualties he thought would emerge, but those all disappeared in the face of overwhelming power.

The strength of the Pleiades Battalion maintained absurdity, and with the complete capitulation of the Fortress of Iron and Blood, they were able to accomplish the great military achievement of replenishing their supplies without producing any victims.

However, to affirm that in the way that it was, would be tantamount to affirming the Imperial way.

Subaru: “Rather, I’m the one who has to make sure I don’t drown in the power.”

Gustav: “…Schwartz?”

Subaru: “Nothing, I have hopes for Gustav-san’s performance as a military advisor from here on out. If Gustav-san hadn’t come with us, we would’ve fallen apart in the blink of an eye.”

Gustav: “—. I shall work diligently.”

As Subaru winked with hopes for him, Gustav folded his four arms and gave a quiet reply.

Ahead of his line of sight, he could see the beast carriages carrying the supplies they had collected from the fortress, and Cecilus straddling the back of a Galewind Horse that was pulling it.

Roughly, the only ones who would lend an ear to Cecilus’s opinions were Subaru, Gustav, and occasionally Tanza, so without Gustav, the battalion seriously would have crumbled.

And, just when he thought that,

Subaru: “Huh? Speaking of which, where is Tanza…”

Tanza: “—I am here.”

As Subaru looked all around, the voice of the person he was searching for struck his back. Causing his shoulders to jump was Tanza, who had been waiting patiently behind Subaru before he spun around.

With her regular blank expression, she gazed at Subaru.

Subaru: “Oh, ohh, I’m glad you’re here.”

Tanza: “Is that so? Though Schwartz-sama would not be especially troubled even if I was not present. After all, it seemed like I would have been a hindrance to your conversation with Segmunt-sama.”

Subaru: “…No, that was because I thought that the talk with Ceci was definitely gonna get complicated.”

For the dialogue under the moon on the previous night, Subaru had ordered Tanza to not accompany him, and instead be on standby; thus she spoke sarcastically towards him.

From Tanza's point of view, Subaru's safety was just a necessary factor in order to reunite with Yorna.

Therefore, he understood that she felt apprehensive about being distanced from him.

Tanza: "That goes for dealing with the people of the fortress as well. Regardless of sparing them, is releasing them unconditionally not going too far?"

Subaru: "We confiscated their weapons, and prohibited them from chasing after us. When I told them to give us their weapons, Toledo-san went completely pale for some reason."

Tanza: "…That is enough."

Suddenly averting her gaze, Tanza displayed discontent regarding Subaru's answer.

At her reaction, Subaru wracked his brain trying to figure out how he could put her back in a good mood.

He had finally captured everyone from the Gladiator Island, Gustav, and even Cecilus, so even though the Pleiades Battalion was completed, there was no point if Tanza was not one of them.

Tanza: "In order to win over the members of the Unit, all of the gladiators, Governor Gustav, and Segmunt-sama, Schwartz-sama has gone through immense hardship, correct?"

Subaru: "Yeah, it's been a lot tougher than it looks… Don't tell me, is Tanza also going to act unreasonably towards me?"

Tanza: "Yes."

Subaru: "Tanza's revolt?!"

First was the Sparka with Gustav, which was followed by Cecilus's betrayal, and now, Subaru widened his eyes at the forewarned revolt of Tanza.

As Subaru repeatedly opened and closed his mouth, Tanza spoke, her gaze still averted.

Tanza: "…Please, say that you require my strength."

Subaru: "…"

Tanza: "If you want to put me in a good mood, please say that you require my strength."

As Tanza put on airs and made that request, Subaru's eyes widened to a greater extent than before.

Then, as he started to laugh,

Subaru: "—I need your strength, Tanza."

Tanza: "In that case, I will accompany you."

Answering so, Tanza faced Subaru, and as her lips slightly loosened, she began to smile.

Ascertaining that, "Tanza's Revolt" came to a lovely ending, and Subaru inhaled a large breath.

And once again, in a manner that the comrades who were pushing forward in the same direction as he was could hear, he made an announcement.

Subaru: "—LET'S GO, PLEIADES BATTALION!"

Pleiades: "YEAHHHHHHHHHHH—!!!"

Their sights were set on the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, and what awaited them was likely the greatest battle of the Vollachian Empire.

And, there was an extraordinary and unprecedented group that would plunge into that battle as an unforeseen joker, the Pleiades

Battalion— This has been the secret tale, of how that group came to be.

END

Short Story Collection 9

Lugunican Hustle (Translation Pending)

Lugunican Hustle Extra

1

“IIII’m bored! Mimi is leaving now! Farewell!” a small figure exclaimed as she rambunctiously ran out of the room.

“Ah! Big sis! Big siiiiis!” another small figure screamed, chasing after her. The chair the first figure had been sitting on toppled over. However, before it hit the ground, yet another small figure, who hadn’t run out of the room, prevented it from doing so.

“I’m very sorry for my big sister and big brother’s behavior, Joshua,” the cat-boy Tivey said, apologizing on behalf of his sister Mimi and his brother Hetaro for abruptly running out of the room as he supported the chair with one hand and fixed his monocle with the other.

Smiling bitterly at his apology, Joshua shook his head. “No, I had a feeling it might turn out like this. Do not worry too much about it. I did not expect Mimi to be able to sit still for a long period of time.”

“I’m sorely embarrassed as her younger brother,” Tivey said, slumping his shoulders. “However, I too had a feeling it would turn out like this. So I am in the same boat as you.”

Joshua couldn’t think of anything to say to Tivey, who was obviously feeling down.

In front of Joshua was a canvas with a painting of what would surely be a portrait of someone once completed. Mimi was supposed to be the subject, and Hetaro was the one who had requested Joshua for it. He wanted to put up the finished painting in his room. Joshua understood Hetaro’s sentiment and accepted the request. However…

“With Mimi like that, I reckon it will take forever to complete,” Tivey surmised.

“W-Well, let us continue this again when we have a chance,” Joshua replied. “I do not suppose Hetaro will be able to bring her back, will he?”

Tivey hesitated to answer for a moment. “I’m embarrassed to admit it, but no.”

Even if Hetaro managed to catch up to Mimi, being able to persuade her to come back was another story. Even I can tell the possibility of that happening is slim, Joshua thought. And if Tivey, who grew up with them, agrees with me, I can be pretty certain I am right. He decided to call it a day and pack up his painting equipment, when there was a knock on the half-open door.

“Joshua,” the person who knocked called out, peeking into the room. “I saw Mimi and Hetaro run out of the room. Is everything alright?”

“Ah, Brother,” Joshua said, noticing his brother, who had come to check what the commotion was about.

Julius looked into the room—Joshua’s art studio—then softened his expression upon noticing the paintbrush in his brother’s hand. “Seeing as how you have a brush in your hand, were you in the middle of painting? And were you accompanying him, Tivey?”

“I suppose. Although, I don’t know if ‘accompanying’ is the right word,” Tivey answered. “I was here to have a painting of my sister done by Joshua.”

“Of Mimi? I see, so that was what the whole ruckus was about.” With Tivey’s response, he quickly understood the situation.

Julius slipped his long legs through the door, entering the room, and approached his younger brother. He gestured at the canvas that had a cloth over it, as Joshua had begun cleaning up. “May I?”

“S-Sure,” Joshua replied, nodding hesitantly, “but I have only just begun working on it, and it is far from complete…”

“Let me guess, Mimi could not sit still and ran out before long, right? I can imagine,” Julius said as he flipped over the cloth, uncovering the canvas, then narrowed his eyes. Joshua stiffened, noticing the emotions that ran through his brother's bright yellow eyes. After a thorough examination, Julius nodded in deep satisfaction.

"It is indeed far from complete, and I can tell you have only just begun, but I can already feel Mimi's explosive energy through it," Julius commented. "By the way, this appa she is holding…"

"She ended up eating it all the way to the core," Joshua explained.

"I see. I wanted to say the color is striking and provides a great contrast to the overall portrait."

"Th-Thank you! I will be sure to prepare a fresh appa for next time!"

Julius smiled bitterly. "I was not trying to compliment the appa…"

Joshua fidgeted with his hands at Julius's words. He took a moment to collect himself and accept his brother's warm compliment. However, the next words from Julius would make him completely freeze up.

"Oh, by the way," Julius started, as if he had remembered something important while looking at the canvas. "You said you wanted to paint me the other day. If you are done working on this painting of Mimi for today, would you like to—"

"YYY-You, Brother?! No, I'm not ready for you yet!"

"Is…that right?" Julius asked with a dumbfounded look on his face, to which Joshua nodded vigorously.

I know my brother did not have any ill will, but that proposal is way too sudden. It is bad for the heart.

"That being said," Joshua began, "It is something that I said I will do. I have no intention of going back on my words." It is just that painting him is a huge deal for me.

Through the fake "Sleeping Miderine" incident, Joshua had the chance to be more honest with himself about art. He even decided to explore portraits, something he'd always avoided, and declared he would like to paint Julius one day. But I did not mean right away. I want to paint him when I have more confidence.

“So, I was thinking maybe in ten or twenty years,” Joshua said.

“That is way too long of a wait,” Julius lamented. “Besides, I am not sure if I will even be around in ten or twenty years.”

“No! If it is you, Brother, you will be doing fine as ever in ten, twenty, or even a hundred years,” Joshua asserted, refusing to believe anything bad would ever happen to his older brother.

“To think Julius would be doing well in a hundred years is kind of scary,” Tivey said from the sidelines.

“Joshua,” Julius said, furrowing his brows, disconcerted by his younger brother's assertion. “I am happy to know you took our promise so earnestly. But it is not like you have only one chance. You do not need to be so serious about it.”

“I have more than one chance?!”

“What are you so surprised about?” Julius said, closing one eye amusingly. “Did you think that I would be unable to sit still for a long period of time like Mimi and wouldn't be able to finish painting me?”

Joshua vigorously shook his head. He would have never insulted Julius by saying he was as impatient as Mimi. The idea of getting to paint his brother over and over again just never crossed his mind. It was a rather obvious solution to his conundrum, but that still didn't ease his mind.

“I cannot stand the idea of continuously creating an imperfect portrait of you. I would rather paint Lady Anastasia again and again instead!” Joshua fervently declared.

“Oh, Miss, what are you doing here?” Tivey said suddenly, causing Joshua to shriek. He turned around hastily, making eye contact with the girl peeking in through the half-open door.

Smiling gracefully, she answered Tivey's question with a simple hum and shook her head. “Oh, nothin'. I jus' thought I heard a party goin' on and wanted to take a peek. But it seems like ya'll are havin' an interestin' conversation.”

“Yes, great timing,” Julius responded. “Lady Anastasia, if you are not too busy, would you mind making some time for Joshua? He said he would like to paint your portrait.”

“Wha?!” Joshua exclaimed.

“Apparently, he can't get started on me without painting you first…” Julius explained to Anastasia, misconstruing Joshua's earlier excuse.

As Joshua stood stock-still as if his soul had left his body, completely lost for words, Anastasia put a finger to her lips, letting out a small hum, and faintly smiled, squinting her pale blue eyes. “Make sure to capture me beautifully, yeah?” she said, knowing full well she just led the situation down a path that was exactly the opposite of what Joshua wanted.

2

“My, it's kinda ticklin' to be stared at like that,” Anastasia said from the subject's seat.

“Have you never had your portrait painted before, Lady Anastasia?” Julius asked, standing beside her.

“No, no, never. Apparently, there were sketches of me on billboards around the royal capital after news of the royal selection went public, but that's pretty much… Oh, there was also the time with the Dragon Times.”

“Oh yeah, I remember the media artist passionately drawing you,” Julius said with a smile, to which Anastasia also smiled and agreed as she reminisced about the event.

As they continued their light-hearted chit-chat, Joshua agonized over the position he'd been put in. He'd kept his entire afternoon free to paint Mimi, so he couldn't tell them that he didn't have the time. He could’ve passed on their request by saying that, as an artist, he gets demotivated when the subject changes, but that would mean he would need to ask himself if he was fit to call himself a true artist. And he was not quite ready for that yet. As a result, he got cornered into this agonizing situation.

“D-Do your best, Joshua,” encouraged Tivey, who more or less empathized with him.

As a fellow monocle wearer and the youngest child of their respective families, Joshua considered Tivey a friend and was honestly thankful for the encouragement. However, he didn’t feel like the power of their friendship would be enough to take on the overwhelming expectations Julius and Anastasia had for him.

“No, I just need to concentrate on finishing it,” Joshua told himself. “Just keep moving my brush. Do not think about anything else. No matter how gruesome a path may seem, there is always an end…”

“Oh, I have an idea,” Julius suddenly said. “Lady Anastasia, how about we make copies of the painting once it’s done and display it in the Hoshin Company’s branches? Would it not be good for business if people were able to see you even if you weren’t around?”

“Brother?!” Joshua exclaimed.

“Hmm,” Anastasia hummed at his suggestion. “That’s a brilliant idea. In that case, I really need to be painted beautifully. But I’m sure Joshua will be able to meet our expectations.”

“Lady Anastasia?!” Joshua cried.

Julius and Anastasia’s high expectations further exhausted Joshua’s heart. What made it worse was that Julius had no ill will at all, while Anastasia knew exactly what she was doing. Even though they were saying the same things, they had different motivations. However…

“Lady Anastasia,” Joshua began. “If you are to actually take my brother’s suggestion, I recommend you hire an actual artist with the right set of skills and experience. Not me."

"But Joshua, your skills are more than…"

"No, Brother," Joshua interrupted. "I am afraid I am not skilled enough for such a task. I understand my own limitations better than anyone."

This was his honest opinion as Anastasia's supporter in her grand pursuit of queenhood. It was different from the childish tantrum he'd thrown when Julius asked for his portrait. If she truly wishes for victory, she must avoid nepotism. It would only burden her as a disadvantage.

"You're right," Anastasia responded solemnly to Joshua's earnest words. "I got a bit carried away there. My bad, my bad."

Joshua was relieved to know his words were properly heard. At the same time, however, he became anxious about whether he was out of line. The fact that he interrupted his brother also started to make him worry if he was being rather pompous.

"B-Brother, I just wanted to say…"

"No, you are absolutely right, Joshua," Julius asserted before Joshua could finish. "I have no expertise in art. And yet, I tried making a suggestion to my mistress based solely on my biased opinion. Thank you for putting an end to it." Julius bowed, apologizing for interfering in this matter despite his ignorance.

Joshua, flustered at the sight of this, searched for the right words.

"They're so serious," Anastasia remarked, watching the brothers' interaction. "They're almost identical… Don't ya think, Tivey?"

"Yes, indeed," replied Tivey. "They're so different from my brother and sister."

As siblings who weren't real brothers, being told they were identical evoked rather complicated emotions in both of them. However, it was also true that they were more similar to each other than Tivey, Mimi, and Hetaro were. So…

“Joshua and I are determined to support Lady Anastasia with all our might,” Julius affirmed, raising his head from his bowing position.

“The same goes for my sister, brother, and me.”

Julius smiled gently at Tivey’s response. “As long as you share that part, all your other differences are insignificant.”

This is my brother’s greatest weapon, Joshua thought. Despite being hailed as the ‘finest’ knight in the kingdom and possessing distinguished skills, he maintains humility and never stops working on himself.

As he reaffirmed his brother’s greatness, he felt Anastasia’s gaze resting on him.

Upon noticing that, Anastasia pointed at Julius. “You were once wonderin’ why I was so confident in myself… Would ya get it if I said I got it from him?”

“That is…” Joshua uttered.

“Not jus’ him, though,” Anastasia continued, gracefully putting her hand on her cheek. “Tivey, Mimi, and Hetaro, too. What the hell, I’ll even add Ricardo to the list… And, of course, you’re in it too, Joshua.”

Joshua was taken aback, clenching his teeth. Her confidence comes from the people she surrounds herself with—no, from her confidantes—no, that’s not it, either. She probably sees everyone around her as her own possession.

As a person who doesn’t hold back on her desires, Joshua and Julius were no exception.

“We don’t hafta distribute it elsewhere, but how about we display it around the mansion?” Anastasia suggested.

“That is a great idea,” Julius agreed. “In either case, I still want to see your portrait painted by Joshua.”

So, there is no getting out of painting Lady Anastasia, I see. Well, I suppose I brought this on myself. I just need to suck it up and do it. It will be done before I know it. I just need to keep moving my brush—but, if I am going to do it, I might as well try to make it as great as possible. Looking back now, it feels like Lady Anastasia's been constantly swinging me around like some kind of toy. It will be nice to paint something great, and see her taken aback for once.

"Do yer best, Joshua," Anastasia said. "Ya don't mind paintin' me again and again, right?" Right when he was about to get started, Anastasia reminded him of his rude remark from earlier. As his expression grew bitter, she smiled elegantly without a hint of remorse. Unable to find the right words to reply to her with, Joshua firmly grasped the brush. At least now I have an excuse to postpone painting my brother for a while.

END

Golden Siblings
(Edited Machine Translatio)

1

—It all began one day with an unexpected exchange between an older sister and a younger brother.

???: "—Garf, let us go out."

???: "Huh?"

???: "Yes, let us go out. Just me and you, Garf."

???: "…Huh?"

The younger brother Garfiel could not help his eyes from opening wide at his sister's emphatic and repeated invitation.

—Garfiel Tinzel and Frederica Baumann, two siblings who were recently reunited after many years apart.

Their reunion was a dramatic one, with the younger brother dashing in just as the older sister was about to fall into the hands of an assassin. After that, the two did not get along well enough to make up for their time apart. Rather, the superb coordination that they had achieved during that life-threatening situation did not translate to everyday life, and the awkwardness of the past ten years continued on.

It had been one month since the resolution of the issues surrounding the Sanctuary and the Roswaal mansion, bringing the residents of that closed-off place into the outside world. Garfiel, one of them, was finally getting used to waking up in the morning in a room of a large mansion instead of a familiar shabby shack.

However, there was a sense of tension in such a new environment, and the relationship between the siblings had not improved much.

???: "You're siblings, so it's okay to flirt with each other like we do.

Right, Beako?”

???: “D-Don’t be so cavalier about flirting, I suppose. However, since Betty is Subaru’s partner, it is essential to stick with you as much as possible, in fact.”

Subaru: “Ha ha ha, you little cutie. But I think I’d rather take a bath alone without being watched!”

This was part of a conversation between Subaru and Beatrice, who entered into a contractual relationship with him at the same time as the reunion of the siblings.

It was tempting to say that the two were interfering with them out of the fact that their relationship was going well, but this was surprisingly a common issue in the newly reformed Emilia Camp.

The entire group moved into a new mansion to replace the one that had burned down for various reasons. In an effort to restore the sibling relationship between Garfiel and Frederica, they had tried various meddling schemes that had ended in failure, without ever getting beyond the realm of pranks.

The relationship between the two siblings, with no signs of improvement in sight, was unexpectedly brought to a head by—

Frederica: “—Garf, let us go out.”

It was the sudden invitation from his sister at the very beginning.

???: “No need to be so cautious. Frederica is probably trying to work out how to get closer to her reunited little brother. You should go. Ram understands Frederica’s desire to be an older sister.”

When he discussed Frederica’s invitation, Ram said this curtly, in her usual tone, as she folded the laundry she had brought in.

Although it was curt, Ram brought the laundry basket into an appropriate room—where a girl who looked exactly like her was lying on the bed.

In the room of a girl with whom Garfiel and Ram had “been told” they had a close relationship, when Ram said she could understand Frederica's sisterly feelings, Garfiel had neither the wit necessary to retort back nor the ability to throw an ignorant tantrum.

Ram: "You seem dissatisfied. Don't you believe what Ram is saying?"

Garfiel: "Nah, I do. There's no one my amazin' self trusts more than ya, Ram. The only other people I trust more than Ram are… Nanna, the Captain, 'n well, there's not many others."

Ram: "—. Such a fool. But that is the kind of thing Ram likes about you, Garf."

Garfiel: "Gah…"

Taken aback, Garfiel was unsure why he was suddenly being praised.

Ram never looked at him until then, she only looked at him at times like this, and her profile was so beautiful that Garfiel was again captivated by his crush.

Anyway—

Ram: "Do your best, Garf. Frederica has always been concerned for you, Garf. She is Ram's senior. Ram won't feel good if you make the wrong choices."

It was very Ram-like to add that.

???: "You two get along so well …ah! If you're too conscious of it, it'll make things awkward. Then, don't overthink it and just reaaally have some fun!"

???: "Frederica-neesama is so beautiful! You are too good for Garf-san!"

???: "Oh, just in time before you go out, could you please buy some more ink for my quill pen? I am almost through my supply."

There was no particularly strong reason to refuse, but when he added a reason why the outing with Frederica could not be refused, it became a no-brainer on a day when she had been given a half day off.

Exaggeratedly, everyone came to see them off at the gate—Emilia, the leader of the camp, whom he was still getting acquainted with; Petra, a brusque maid whom he had only known for a short time; and Otto, whose attitude was so irritating because he did not consider this event to be of any importance and others.

Then at the end of these farewells—

Subaru: “Go enjoy the date alone, sister and brother! Just like me and Beako!”

Beatrice: “D, d, d-don’t you take this date thing so seriously, I suppose. It’s best to listen to what Subaru says half the time, not just half, but a quarter of the time, in fact.”

Subaru: “Ha ha ha, you little rascal. But you don’t have to follow me to the toilet in the middle of the night!”

After being seen off by Subaru and Beatrice, both of whom seemed eager to show how well their relationship was going, Garfiel and Frederica departed from the Roswaal mansion.

That was how Garfiel ended up going out with his sister.

2

Frederica: “—So Garf, when was the last time you went to Costuul?”

Garfiel: “Huh?”

What was intended to be casual chitchat was met with a brusque response, which Frederica thought she messed up.

Although Frederica had thought she had done a lot of mental preparation for today’s outing, her plan to open up a simple topic stumbled at the outset, and Frederica’s plan fell apart.

Immediately, words from Frederica’s grandmother come to her mind.

Ryuzu: “Fuu, this is the first time Gar-bo has lived away from us. I’m sure he’ll have a hard time because of all the new things that he’s never done before, so Fuu, make sure that you help him out.”

This was what Frederica was requested by Ryuzu, who had been assigned to live elsewhere, to unite the Sanctuary’s inhabitants and her replicants.

Of course, Frederica cared about Garfiel not because she was asked to but because he was her dear younger brother. But while she wanted to act like a big sister, Frederica was unsure how to do so.

In any case, Frederica’s blood would run cold with despair if she were to fail her grandmother’s request.

And, just when Frederica’s fangs were trembling with apprehension,

Garfiel: “I’ve never been… Today’s my first time.”

Frederica: “Huh…?”

Garfiel: “That’s why I said it was my first time. Didn’t ya just ask me yerself, Sis?”

Frederica: “Oh, yes, it is, is it not? Yes, this is the first time you have ever been here… eh?! Even though it has been twenty days since we moved in here?! This is your first time?!”

Garfiel: “You’re bein’ annoyin’! I already told ya, don’t keep repeatin’ yerself!”

Frederica’s behavior seemed too serious for Garfiel, who was willing to talk with her. Immediately after Garfiel responded warmly to Frederica’s question, the mood was broken by an unexpected remark.

However, it was really that surprising.

Frederica: “Surely you had the opportunity to accompany Ram on some shopping trips…"

Garfiel: "Ha! Ram left most of the troublesome shoppin' to that lil' kid Petra. And, my amazin' self was busy scentin' up da mansion."

Frederica: "When it comes to her, she is becoming easy going again and… Garf is also Garf. Scenting the house is such a crude thing to do."

Frederica was dismayed with Ram's apparent misconduct, and subsequently dismayed by Garfiel's conduct.

Certainly, it was understandable to feel uneasy about leaving one's hometown, with its familiar scents all over the place. But scenting territory was an eccentricity in the outside world.

Frederica: "You need to be taught some common sense in that area, too… ah, ahh, ahhhh…?!"

Garfiel: "Wh-What's wrong?! Sis, yer face suddenly turned pale?!"

Frederica: "Nothing, I just remembered that when I left the Sanctuary ten years ago, I did the same thing at first in the mansion…"

Looking back on her actions, Frederica was struck by the shock that came a decade too late.

At that time, Frederica, in order to cope with the loneliness of being away from her hometown, also went around scenting various places, things, and even people, patrolled her territory late into the night, and even established a hierarchical order with the surrounding animals, all of which would be considered eccentric behavior.

Frederica: "Well, at that time, Clind, who was the head servant, disciplined me to correct it, and… what a surprise. I had no idea that Garf and I were so much like sister and brother…"

Garfiel: "What'cha surprised about, course it's normal for my amazin' self 'n Sis to be like sister 'n brother…"

Frederica trembled, and Garfiel sighed as he patted her back. Garfiel's words startled Frederica and said "Sis?" as he tilted his head.

The person in question spoke casually, without any qualms.

Frederica: "…Yes, of course. It is only a natural thing to do."

Garfiel: "Huh?"

Gently patting her chest, Frederica smiled at Garfiel.

As Garfiel said, it was only natural that they were like siblings. Even if they had been apart for more than a decade, there was no need to be afraid to face the fact that they were sister and brother. It was okay to be natural.

To begin with, what kind of siblings required mental preparation to be a sister and brother?

Frederica: "Grandmother, I think I can manage to fulfill my role…"

Garfiel: "What? You've had that "Field Bunting is still blue" look on yer face til' now. Sis, maybe you're startin' to turn senile like Granny… gah!"

Frederica: "I went to the trouble of complimenting you, but that was a few words too many. No, it is more than a few words if you consider your abusive words to Grandmother. You should reflect on that."

Garfiel: "Y-Ya don't hafta hit me over it, ya know…"

When Garfiel received a blow to the head, Frederica hid her mouth and laughed, then took a few quick steps in front of Garfiel,

Frederica: "Come to think of it, you still have not said anything about me getting all dressed up."

Garfiel: "Huh?"

Frederica: "Do not sound so grumpy. Petra chose my outfit for today. Walking next to me is so much more refreshing than if I were in my maid uniform, right?”

Wearing a light cloak over her shoulders, Frederica was dressed for going out, not in her usual maid uniform.

Petra, who was very knowledgeable about clothing and at the same time had a very keen eye, chose the outfit, and Frederica was enjoying the refreshing feeling of wearing something other than her uniform for the first time in a long time.

—No, it should be said that she finally had the time to enjoy the experience.

Garfiel: “…I really don’t care ‘bout the clothes you’re wearin’.”

Frederica: “Would you say the same thing if Ram were here?”

Garfiel: “Guh…”

Frederica: “Subaru-sama told me that when a man or woman goes on a date, he or she does everything in their power to be considerate and have an enjoyable time with the other person.”

Although the word was unfamiliar to her, it seemed to be a common word among Subaru, Emilia, and Beatrice, while Petra was happy to say that she had a date with Subaru the other day.

It was Petra’s look that gave Frederica the courage to ask out Garfiel.

That was why—

Garfiel: “…Well, I guess it ain’t so bad, is it?”

Frederica: “For someone like you, Garf, you did your best.”

Garfiel: “Huh?!”

Garfiel, who seemed to have tried his best to figure out the unfamiliar words, raised his voice at the assessment.

Frederica enjoyed these exchanges with Garfiel, thinking that this was probably the most enjoyable part of the date that Petra and the others happily told her about.

3

The Industrial City of Costuul, one of the Five Great Cities of the Kingdom of Lugunica, was also the nearest city to the new mansion to which the Emilia Camp had just moved.

The previous mansion had only a small village nearby, which had made it inconvenient for various reasons, such as shopping. Therefore, although the sizes of the old and new mansions were not different, the present mansion was much more convenient.

Frederica: “Moreover, this mansion is the Mathers’ main mansion, meaning that we were spending all our time in an inconvenient mansion, right?”

Garfiel: “…Why did they do that?”

Frederica: “I am sure the Master had profound thoughts on the matter… but the former mansion is closer to both the Royal Capital and the Sanctuary.”

Garfiel: “That bastard flies in the air, so it really doesn’t matter…”

When Garfiel gnashed his teeth in disgust, Frederica was unable to respond.

For some time now, Frederica had always been unsure of Roswaal’s thinking, but the events just prior to their reunion had reinforced this. Frederica could not imagine what Roswaal had hoped to gain from that scheme that had backed the entire camp into a corner.

However—

Frederica: “…It is because the Master is a “magician”.”

Letting the matter drop, Frederica withdrew her negative feelings toward Roswaal to the back of her mind. What lay there were her honest and true feelings. —For Frederica, Roswaal was a magician.

Not a magician as a mere profession or skill, but a “magician” in the sense that he was a special being that could do anything.

His knowledge and skills were the solution to every problem. The main reason why Frederica left the Sanctuary when she was still young was because she saw hope in what Roswaal could do.

That had not changed even now, after all that Roswaal had done.

Garfiel: “Tsk, I don’t wanna talk ‘bout that bastard Roswaal. If I’m gonna go out with Sis with a frown, my amazin’ self’ll just… oh, oh, oh, oh, oooooh!”

Frederica: “Wh-Wh-Wh-What is it, Garf? You are yelling so loud all of a sudden!”

Garfiel: “Wh-Why, look at that, that! What is it, Sis, that huge buildin’! That wall! The city!”

Saying this, an excited Garfiel pointed to a distant view of the city in front of him.

Garfiel’s previously sour expression changed, and he was astonished to see the city—Costuul, which became visible just as the forest that had blocked the view of the road was cut off.

Would that not be natural? Most of the world Garfiel knew was a small village called the Sanctuary. Although Garfiel knew about the world, the reality of a big city was far beyond his imagination.

Garfiel: “D-Damn! I shouldn’t have been wastin’ time scentin’ up the mansion! Sis! Come on! Hurry up! A big ass thing, a big ass thing, and a big ass thing are waitin’ for my amazin’ self!”

Frederica: “Ah! Hold on, Garf! I am wearing a skirt! Do not be in such a hurry… you already are! Garf!”

With a childlike twinkle in his eye, Garfiel hurried Frederica along.

Although Frederica smiled at such a quick change of attention from the previous topic, she could not hide her anxiety toward her excited younger brother.

Garfiel was curious about his first visit to a big city, but the problem lay with Costuul. The Industrial City of Costuul was the most modest of the Five Great Cities.

Frederica: "Compared to the other Five Great Cities… the Watergate City, the Ground Dragon Capital, and the Mining City, there would be much more to see…"

There were no so-called tourist attractions in Costuul.

Although Garfiel was willing to go out on a date, Frederica was worried that she might disappoint him once again.

Frederica: "Please, Grandmother… watch over Garf and I…!"

—It had been a while since she offered a heartfelt prayer to her faraway grandmother.

Garfiel: "A-Amazin'! It's even bigger when ya look at it up close! It's as they say, "Gasock is bigger than it sounds"!"

Garfiel's emerald-green eyes widened with glee as he gazed at the building under construction.

The trip to Costuul started with a sense of anxiety, but despite Frederica's misgivings over the lack of delicious sweets and beautiful scenery, the city's inorganic nature seemed to be a good thing for Garfiel, who simply loved big, angular things. The nature of the city was a blessing in disguise.

Frederica: "Thank you, Grandmother… thanks to you, my date with Garf did not get ruined…"

If Ryuzu had heard this, she would have tilted her head in confusion for something she did not understand, but at this moment, Frederica was unconcerned.

Then, Garfiel, pulling Frederica's sleeve as he looked around, Garfiel: “Hey, Sis! What’s that? That thing looks like a big ass box!”

Frederica: “Calm down, Garf. That box is a Magicreation Tool… a unique product of the Industrial City used all over the city.”

Garfiel: “A Magicreation Tool?”

Garf’s eyes widened at the unfamiliar word, and Frederica perked up.

Magicreation Tools were the primary factor that contributed to the prosperity of the Industrial City of Costuul and made it one of the Five Great Cities. Magic stones powered Magicreation Tools and were capable of tasks that would be impossible to accomplish by human hands. These tools were used in Roswaal’s mansion to produce heat for the kitchen and boil water for the baths, and in the Royal Capital to create fountains, making them a major industry of Costuul.

Frederica: “The Magicreation Tools work faster and more accurately than manual labor, and were introduced into factories to produce and export goods to other cities… this raised Costuul’s value, leading to it being called one of the Five Great Cities. Unlike the other four cities, it is a rare example of a city that has only recently joined the Five Great Cities.”

Garfiel: “Really, that’s amazin’!”

Frederica: “Of course it is, of course, it is.”

Garfiel: “…Why is Sis so proud ‘bout this?”

After Frederica explained the origins of the city, Garfiel grew suspicious of the glee with which Frederica explained it. Frederica opened her arms and continued, “Actually,” in response to Garfiel.

Frederica: “Now, Garf has acknowledged Magicreation Tools as an amazing achievement… but what if I told you that the Master’s own Mathers family was involved in the creation of Magicreation Tools?”

Garfiel: “…”

Frederica: “Oh, my dear, what a grim face… it is not the Master’s achievement but his father’s, you know?”

Garfiel: “Don’t talk to me ‘bout anythin’ dealin’ with that bastard Roswaal.”

Having been explained plainly, Frederica’s shoulders slumped. It was a failure.

However, no matter how much Garfiel disliked Roswaal, the fact remained that the key to the city’s success lay with his predecessor, Roswaal K. Mathers. The Mathers family was instrumental in developing the Industrial City of Costuul, which had been why their main mansion was near Costuul.

Regardless—

Frederica: “Garf, the factory I talked about, how about a tour?”

Garfiel: “—! Are ya sure? No, but Magicreation Tools are that bastard’s creation… no, but it doesn’t matter!”

When confronted with a factory producing Magicreation Tools of various sizes, Garfiel overrode his hesitation. Without further ado, he tried to run into the factory at a brisk pace, but Garfiel stopped himself just before he started.

Frederica tilted her head when her brother suddenly stopped,

Garfiel: “…Sis, are ya okay with this? My amazin’ self is the only one who’s gonna be havin’ fun, ya know?”

Frederica: “—. It is okay. We will have many opportunities to come to Costuul, and a date is something that is mutually considerate… and just now, you were considerate of me.”

Garfiel: “Tsk, I dunno ‘bout that, but… well, let’s go!”

With only a moment’s hesitation, Garfiel rushed into the factory, full of energy.

Surely, he would indulge in his first visit to Costuul by asking questions of the staff with that same passion.

Seeing off her energetic brother, Frederica walked over to the fence outside the factory and pulled off her right boot while resting her weight on the fence.

She had a new pair of boots for the date, causing her foot to chafe slightly.

Frederica: “It is not as bad as I thought it would be. This is…”

???: “—Oi, oi, that’s amazing. I can’t believe such a beautiful lady is so freely exposing her bare feet.”

While feeling relieved that the wound was not as bad as she had feared, Frederica stiffened her expression. She adjusted the hem of her skirt, which she had rolled up slightly to check her foot, and looked in the direction where the voice had come from.

Thereupon was a tall, strong, wild-looking man with dark blond, slicked-back hair. He stroked his well-groomed beard around his mouth with his fingers and smiled, baring his sharp teeth.

???: “Sometimes instead of leaving it up to others, ya gotta stretch yer legs yerself. Right?”

Frederica: “You are a very ill-mannered gentleman. If you ask me to agree with you, I have nothing to say to you.”

???: “What a very elegant way to speak. Ah, I know, I know. The first thing ya do is embellish where ya can be seen and heard, a rudimentary means of disguising yerself.”

Frederica could not ignore the man’s friendly attitude as he approached her. The reason was because some of the man’s words were on point.

The first thing she learned when she left the forest was how she spoke and appeared—.

Frederica: “Just who are you?”

???: “Me? I’m Hayden Garo.”

Frederica: “…”

Hayden: “I know, I know! It’s not my name you wanna hear. Right? But then again, even if I didn’t, I’m sure yer blood does, kinsman.”

The man added so with a laugh and grin—Frederica fell silent at the last part of Hayden Garo’s words.

When Frederica was informed of the man’s identity, she knew what he was.

Frederica: “So you are Halfbeast, just like me.”

Hayden: “Quite rare, ain’t it? To run into someone else like ya outside of yer own hometown. We’re the kind of creatures who cannot even recognize each other if it weren't for something else."

Frederica: "…I dislike being lumped in with you with how you say creatures."

Unable to regain her elegant expression, Frederica only refuted Hayden's way of speaking.

Halfbeasts were beastmen with more human-like characteristics than other demi-human species. Despite their physical abilities and beastman-like characteristics, they were almost indistinguishable from the human race in their normal appearance.

Frederica and Garfiel were also indistinguishable from others, apart from their fangs. And it was the same for Hayden in front of her.

Frederica: "You have fewer distinctive features than we do."

Hayden: "Yeah, I've got sharp fangs, that's all. And the rest is the sex appeal overflowing from my entire body that attracts females."

Frederica: "In the roughly twenty years since I was born, I never knew I was not a woman."

Hayden: "You're saying that! But hey, I think I like you."

When Frederica turned her head away from Hayden's poor character, he was in a good mood for some reason. He stood in front of Frederica and pulled her shoulders up to him.

Frederica, still with one boot off, was unexpectedly held close to his chest.

Frederica: "—Hic, how rude! Let go of me!"

Hayden: "You're really tall when ya stand up. Ya got nice breasts and a shapely waist. You're a woman I'm liking more and more."

Frederica: "You…!"

Her anger peaked at the scrutinizing gaze, and Frederica's hand mercilessly slapped Hayden's cheek.

Hayden turned his head away as if his neck had been snapped, and as he slowly turned his head back,

Hayden: “I like yer strong spirit. I’ll take ya as my future queen.”

Frederica: “What are…”

Hayden: “The future queen of the country I’m building must be a strong and beautiful female.”

With that, the color of Hayden’s eyes turned bright red. Frederica felt the hairs on her body stand on end, and she almost instinctively turned into a beast.

It was not the sex appeal that Hayden spoke of, but a sense of danger in response to a threat that appealed to the instincts of all living things—

???: “—Get away from Sis, ya fuckin’ bastard!!”

Immediately afterwards, instead of the frozen Frederica, a powerful arm was unleashed on the detestable man.

It was a youthful indiscretion, a blow not tempered with the slightest restraint. Garfiel, who had no experience in the outside world, did not hesitate to deliver a blow that would have turned an ordinary man into minced meat.

Even if it was to protect Frederica, it would be a serious matter if the other person died. The date would be ruined, and Garfiel’s reluctance to go out in the outside world would accelerate.

However, that did not happen.

Hayden: “Oh, you’re a feisty brat. If it weren’t me, that would’ve been dangerous.”

Saying that, Hayden grinned through his teeth as he waved his arm. He was forced backwards from his original position, and Frederica escaped from his arms and was now in Garfiel’s arms.

At Frederica’s sudden gasp, Garfiel wrinkled his nose at his sister, Garfiel: “Sis, what’s with that grinnin’ bastard; you’ve got terrible taste in men.”

Frederica: “G-Garf, I do not want to hear that from you! …No, it is thoughtless to try to compare Ram with this person. I apologize. And, thank you.”

Garfiel: “I ain’t sure what’cha mean, but for now, let’s put that aside…”

Garfiel glared at Hayden, his eyes growing even sharper. In his wariness, Hayden clapped his hands in front of his chest, making a dry sound, and said,

Hayden: “You’re also a Halfbeast? But from what I can tell, ya have ordinary blood. Are ya really that woman’s brother?”

Garfiel: “Talkin’ ‘bout ordinary when my amazin’ self is here. Ya can’t be thinkin’ the reason why my amazin’ self and Sis are blood relatives is because of our height, can ya? If that’s the case, it’s Sis’s fault.”

Hayden: “Ha ha ha ha, no, no. It’s like I said. —Ya got ordinary blood.”

As Hayden said this, he glared at Garfiel, and suddenly his wrist gushed blood.

The ensuing hemorrhaging caused Frederica to shout “Garf!”. However, Garfiel, with a calm expression on his face, held the wound and cast his healing magic,

Garfiel: “Nothin’ to worry about, Sis. It ain’t a big deal. I just got caught on the bastard when I punched him.”

Calmly, Garfiel licked the healed wound with his tongue. However, his whole body was overflowing with a fiery fighting spirit, and his anger at Hayden for offending his sister and attacking him was enough.

Hayden seemed to sense this and shook his head, saying, “Oi, oi.”, Hayden: “Oh man, I was just saying hello. I didn’t mean to start a fight.”

Garfiel: “Don’t say somethin’ so pathetic after all that. Stay ‘n have fun with my amazin’ self til ya get yer nose smashed in. “Sundown is Dildane’s start”, isn’t it?”

Hayden: “If it’s all the same to you, I’d rather be asked out by your sister. So—”

Hayden spoke flippantly and snapped the fingers of both hands.

For a moment, Frederica and Garfiel grimaced at the fact that nothing happened, but then, just after Hayden “chuckled” at their combined reaction.

—Suddenly, there had been a roar from the factory behind them, and the screams of the staff were heard.

Garfiel: “—Hic, what the!”

Hayden: “Well, what is it? You’ll never know if ya keep staring at me.”

Hayden scoffed at Garfiel’s reaction to the unusual situation at the factory. Angered by Hayden’s behavior, Frederica yelled, “You…!”.

However, Hayden took a big leap backward, and—

Hayden: “See ya. We’ll meet again, my future Queen.”

The figure disappeared from Frederica’s sight after uttering a self-serving, hair-raising statement. The scent of self-confidence he wore also faded away. It seemed he was not lying when he retreated.

As soon as Frederica’s nose detected this, she called out “Garf!” to her brother.

Garfiel: “Oh, I got it!”

Before she could say anything, quickly, Garfiel’s howling body rushed into the factory, and Frederica hurried after her brother to see what was causing the commotion at the Magicreation Tool factory.

And then, she saw it. —One of the Magicreation Tools was running amok, covered in a sparkling light.

Frederica: “That is…”

Doubting her eyes, Frederica was surrounded by a green and yellow glow from the Magicreation Tool for pressing metal.

It was a Magicreation Tool, which was used to mold metal between two steel plates, one above and one below the material; this was a relatively common sight in Costuul, but she had never seen one that shined so brilliantly.

And even more so, the sight of it moving autonomously and trying to destroy humans and other Magicreation Tools.

Frederica: “—! This is not good!”

For a moment, Frederica was shocked, then, kicking off the ground, she saved a worker who was on the verge of being pinned under a piece of material knocked down by the rampaging Magicreation Tool, barely preventing the damage from spreading.

And then, before anyone else could get caught up in it—

Garfiel: “Quit yer actin’ up ‘n bein’ all sparkly—!”

The two arms of the howling Garfiel were driven forcefully into the structure of the Magicreation Tool, breaking and splitting it apart as they twist between the steel plates that moved up and down. The decisive sound of steel being torn to shreds echoed through the air, and as the built-in magic stone cracked and mana erupted from the impact, light surged forth from it.

It moved like a winged insect drawn to a fire, all concentrated in one place.

Garfiel: “Turn the fuck off!”

A moment later, a fist slammed into the magic stone that was attracting the light, and it shattered with a high-pitched sound.

When the magic stone, a crystal of dense mana, shattered, its fragments scattered into the air as mana dust, and the light that caused the Magicreation Tool to go haywire also disappeared with it.

There was nothing left behind, not even a trace of the light that had wrapped the Magicreation Tool.

Frederica: “Garf, you did a great job. Thanks to you, no one was injured…”

Garfiel: “Yeah, looks like it… but.”

Frederica: “—?”

After giving Garfiel a pat on the shoulder for stopping the damage, Frederica raised an eyebrow at her brother’s somewhat despondent voice.

Frederica wondered why he sounded so subdued, and he said,

Garfiel: “…It was a huge, cool Magicreation Tool, but then it got brutally destroyed.”

The big, angular thing-lover said, looking down with sadness at the broken Magicreation Tool.

4

???: “—I looked into the situation. It is consistent with the testimony of the staff. Their well-being is irreplaceable. You are not responsible for the damage to the factory’s equipment.”

Frederica: “Thank you for saying that… Um, are you sure you are not upset?”

???: “Puzzling, why have such a need for validation?”

When Frederica received a questioning look, she declined to answer, reluctantly saying, “No.”.

Although Frederica knew it was impolite to stare at someone’s face, this man’s expression did not change even once from the moment Frederica and Garfiel entered the room until the end of them telling the story of what had happened. It was a quality of a politician not to let one’s expression be read, but the Mayor of Costuul, Leno Rex, was too thorough.

—Currently, Frederica and Garfiel had interrupted their date to visit the Industrial City’s City Hall to report on the unusual events that had occurred at the Magicreation Tool factory.

She had just finished reporting the incident that took place there and explained the circumstances surrounding the destruction of the Magicreation Tool.

It was a very strange event. After all, the light that surrounded the Magicreation Tool was—

Leno: “They are called “Lightbugs” in this city.”

Garfiel: “Oh? Ya knew it had a name, Pops… ouch!”

Frederica: “Do not be disrespectful! My apologies, Mayor. My brother has only recently moved from the countryside and has difficulty speaking…”

Leno: “No matter. I value the ability to save the people of the city more than etiquette.”

Garfiel: “Oh, Pops, you’re bein’ sensible, aren’t’cha? Sis worries too much… ouch!”

Frederica sighed as she pinched the unrepentant Garfiel in the side. Then, to resume the interrupted topic, she prefaced it with a “So”,

Frederica: “You mentioned Lightbugs? What are they?”

Leno: “They are a phenomenon unique to this city, so to speak. They have had many sightings near factories that use Magicreation Tools, and it has been confirmed that they are attuned to magic stones. It is speculated that magic stones, which are used to power the Magicreation Tool and the mana residue from the magic stones, may have bonded with some kind of Micro Spirits."

Frederica: "…Indeed, that light certainly gave the impression that it might have been closer to a Micro Spirit."

Frederica nodded quietly, finding Leno's speculation convincing.

Since Emilia, a Spiritual Arts User, lived in the mansion, she routinely interacted with the Micro Spirits around her every morning and evening. Frederica had many opportunities to see this. The appearance of the Micro Spirits flying around Emilia seemed to be similar to that of the Lightbugs in the city.

But—

Garfiel: "It's a lil' dangerous for Lightbug to be doin' such mischief, isn't it?"

Leno: "—. In fact, this is a new problem that Costuul has had in recent months."

Frederica: "A new problem, is it?"

No matter the city-specific nature of the phenomenon, its dangers were just as Frederica and Garfiel had witnessed earlier. However, Leno said it was not an old problem, but one that had arisen in the last few months.

At Frederica's and Garfiel's glances, Leno tucked in his chin in a small way, and,

Leno: "As mentioned previously, the Lightbugs' presence has been confirmed in the city for some time. However, there was a consensus that they were harmless, as they were only seen alongside the Magicreation Tools. In recent months, the Magicreation Tools have been observed to be malfunctioning and behaving abnormally, and there have been reports of the Lightbugs's unusual behavior as well."

Frederica: "Then, the Lightbug was causing the Magicreation Tool to behave abnormally?”

Leno: “It was being verified. But, what you witnessed confirms it.”

When Leno replied, he shook his chiselled face with thin eyebrows gently to the side.

Leno: “While it would have been preferable if we could have dealt with the problem within the city, however, the priority of dealing with the damage is more important than determining the cause of the problem. I will be requesting assistance from Margrave Mathers as soon as possible.”

Garfiel: “Huh? Why d’ya need that bastard Roswaal’s help?”

Frederica: “Garf, this city is part of the Master’s territory as the Margrave of the West. It is only natural for a lord to address any problems that arise in his domain.”

As she explained the situation to Garfiel, Frederica was impressed by Leno’s sound judgement.

It had been the right decision for the Mayor to try to resolve the situation internally and turn to the lord immediately if he found it difficult to do so. And if the person he relied on were Roswaal, the decision would be sound.

There was no one better than Roswaal when it came to managing the affairs of a lord, as long as he was not being devious.

Frederica: “So I understand that you dislike the Master, but…”

Garfiel: “That ain’t it. My amazin’ self not likin’ the bastard ‘n what I’m sayin’ now are two different things. Surely ya know that, Sis? I’m talkin’ ‘bout the bastard who made Lightbug or whatever it was go nuts.”

Frederica: “That Lightbug was made to misbehave… oh.”

Frederica’s emerald-green eyes blinked in surprise when Garfiel frowned at her.

She was so preoccupied with reporting about the Magicreation Tool going haywire at the factory, and the Lightbug that caused it, that she missed Garfiel's point about the rude man—Hayden Garo, just prior to the incident.

Naturally, Leno, who had never heard of this before, responded with, "What do you mean.".

Leno: "Do you have an idea what caused the Lightbug to cause the Magicreation Tool to go out of control?"

Frederica: "Y-Yes. However, we are not sure of the exact method…"

Garfiel: "I know the bastard that did it. He's a big, ugly Halfbeast. As soon as the bastard snapped his fingers, it caused the commotion at the factory. He's got the Lightbugs under his control somehow. It's like "The giant rat dancing to Dokost's flute."."

Leno: "I find that difficult to believe at this point."

From Leno's point of view, he had been handed information that was beyond common sense. Frederica called out to him, "Mayor" despite the fact that he did not change his facial expression but only changed his tone of voice.

Frederica: "Earlier, you speculated that the Lightbugs are similar to Micro Spirits. If so, a Spiritual Arts User should be able to communicate with a Micro Spirit and make a contract with them to use them…"

Leno: "It would not be surprising if there were someone who could communicate with Lightbugs and manipulate their workings, yes?"

Leno was receptive to Frederica's speculation, and he arrived at the same concern.

Even though the specific nature and identity of Lightbugs were unknown, if the possibility surfaced, it could be considered by following the precedent. There was a good chance that the man Hayden had been controlling the Lightbug.

Frederica: "In addition to consulting with the Master about how to deal with the Lightbugs, I think we should also follow that man… Hayden Garo. I do not mean to be presumptuous, but my brother and I can track him down using our noses to some extent.”

Leno: “Well, the Margrave is the “Demi-Human Lover”.”

Frederica: “I would like to deny that moniker for the sake of the Master’s honor, but…”

Frederica was somewhat uncomfortable being convinced by the misguided assessment of Roswaal because she had better senses than the average person.

Regardless, it seemed that Leno had given due consideration to the abilities of Frederica and Garfiel and the possibility of Hayden Garo’s involvement in the incident.

Frederica “Let us move quickly, Garf. Unfortunately, our date today ends here…”

Garfiel: “…”

Frederica: “Garf?”

When there was no response to her call, Frederica turned to Garfiel and addressed him. However, her brother did not respond and remained still, his gaze fixed on the window of the room.

And then, when the silent Garfiel snorted weakly—

Garfiel: “—Get down!”

Immediately after, Garfiel’s outstretched arm grabbed Frederica and Leno’s clothes and pulled them down. Frederica almost screamed as she was pulled down forcefully to the ground. —No, she may have actually screamed, but no one, not even herself, heard it.

The next moment, something crashed with great force into the wall of the top floor of City Hall.

Frederica: “…”

Tossed by an impact that seemed to turn the world upside down, the room's desks, shelves, and sofa on which Frederica and the others were sitting were blown away, and collected at the far end of the room.

Among all of it, Frederica and the others had also been tossed to the far end of the room. There, they sat up, looked at the wall to see what had happened, and were stunned.

There was a large hole in the wall, through which one could see a panoramic view of the Industrial City. Moreover, in that panoramic view, a huge construction Magicreation Tool was clad in a pale light.

The Magicreation Tool, a type of beast carriage with a ladder for transporting construction materials to high places, crashed into the City Hall at a tremendous speed while carrying a large amount of building materials.

Of course, this could not be a natural phenomenon—

Garfiel: "That bastard set this up…"

When Garfiel had sensed the attack at the last minute, he howled, his fangs twitching in anger. The target of his anger would be the unseen Hayden, but the venting of his rage would have to wait.

The slowly descending Magicreation Tool for working at heights approached, accelerating once more.

There was no telling if City Hall would collapse if that thing hit it again.

Frederica: "Leno-sama! How many people are in City Hall?!"

Leno: "—. Twelve people, including family members of staff."

Leno understood the meaning of Frederica's question and answered it instantly.

In response, Frederica sharply shouted, calling "Garf!" to her brother.

Frederica: “Please break a hole in the floor! I am going out!”

Garfiel: “Don’t screw up, Sis—!”

Garfiel barked and instantly stomped the floor, and at the same time, Frederica jumped to Leno, dropped to one knee, picked him up by his large frame, and pushed him back against the window opposite the side where the Magicreation Tool was closing in.

With a high-pitched crash, Frederica smashed through the window and escaped out of the building with Leno.

Leno: “…”

Even in this predicament, Leno’s tenacity to not let out a single scream was remarkable.

City Hall was a six-story building with the Mayor’s office on the top floor. Frederica could have easily landed at this height if she were alone. However, with a person in her arms, even she could not land easily, and an ordinary person would fall to their death.

Kicking the exterior wall to kill their momentum, Frederica, while holding Leno, managed to land on the ground—just as the Magicreation Tool struck for a second time, shaking City Hall, causing the building to tilt with a roar.

Frederica: “Garf! The back of the building!!”

Frederica shouted aloud, forgetting her modesty in the moment. Her voice had to be heard by Garfiel over the thunderous roar. The results were immediate.

Windows from the fifth floor down of City Hall were shattered in a single motion, and the staff inside were thrown out one by one.

The staff, their faces turning pale, panic-stricken in mid-air, landed over the heads of Frederica and Leno into the reservoir behind the city hall behind them.

Leno: “Someone lend some assistance! I am going to rescue those who fell into the water!”

After hearing the continuous sounds of water, Leno, having left Frederica's arms, immediately gave instructions.

Immediately, people who heard the noise gathered together, rushing in, panting for breath, and began rescuing the employees who had been thrown into the reservoir. Meanwhile, the collapse of City Hall continued—

Frederica: "—The Magicreation Tool."

It had to be stopped. Frederica ran and grabbed onto the Magicreation Tool, which had lowered for the third time to get into position. Jumping onto the beast carriage with a long vertical passenger compartment, she saw the Lightbug up close, as it forced the Magicreation Tool to move, which it was not supposed to be able to.

It looked more and more like a Micro Spirit, and Frederica's fangs clicked as she destroyed the magic stone that was embedded as the power source, cracking the magic stone inside and causing the Lightbug to dissipate.

Instantly, as if it had died, the Magicreation Tool's suspicious behavior stopped.

Upon seeing this, Frederica leaned out of the Magicreation Tool and looked at City Hall—

Garfiel: "—Bha!"

City Hall collapsed even without further damage, and Garfiel burst through the plume of the rising smoke. With one person in his right hand, one in his left, one on his back, and one in his mouth.

Together with the eight staff members who were thrown into the water, this was all twelve people Leno indicated.

Frederica: "Garf, grew up strong…"

A feeling of relief spread slowly through Frederica's mind as she patted her chest in relief.

Of course, Garfiel's abilities were duly seen the night they were reunited, when he rescued Frederica from the clutches of an assassin. But that was not exactly the case.

Not only did her brother have the power to fight someone, but he also had the power to save someone.

Frederica: "Grandmother, you really did a great job raising Garf."

A sense of pride filled her heart with gratitude for how her little brother had grown up and for Ryuzu for raising him so well.

With that firmly in mind, she decided to join up with Garfiel and the others—

???: "—Oh, that's quite the accomplishment. It's amazing that ya didn't let a single inferior get killed."

Suddenly, at that whisper in her ear, Frederica's entire body swelled all at once.

The clothes Petra had chosen swelled as Frederica's arms, legs, and torso threatened to tear them from the inside out, while golden fur threatened to cover her white skin.

However, the man who appeared, Hayden Garo, was faster with his strike.

Hayden: "My future Queen, if you're going to undress, I should do it with my own hands in the bedroom."

Hayden's fist, delivered with a vicious remark, pierced Frederica's midsection. Frederica cried out in pain, and her knees went weak as the impact went through her spine and shook her insides.

Her body crumpled, then was humiliatingly supported by Hayden, as her consciousness faded away.

With that done to Frederica—

Hayden: "My plans have gone a little awry, but it can't be helped if I'm to welcome my future Queen. —Now, with yer blood and mine, we shall exterminate the inferiors and build a new nation.”

The euphoric proclamation of Hayden, was left unheard by Frederica.

However, at the edge of her fading consciousness, Frederica could only think of one thing—the strong sense of remorse she felt at being separated from Garfiel once again.

5

Leno: “Garfiel-dono, are you all right? Are you injured?”

Garfiel: “Ach, puh! Who d’ya think my amazin’ self is? Don’t worry. Well, I was afraid for a moment that I wouldn’t be able to get everyone out in time.”

Garfiel spat out the gravel in his mouth and replied to Leno, who ran up to him.

Having finally set the four who escaped with him down on the ground and thanked him for getting them out, they were taken away for medical attention, and Garfiel finally took a breath.

Leno: “My thanks to you as well. You did a fantastic job of getting everyone out.”

Garfiel: “Ha, I guess it’s only natural that my amazin’ self can handle it. It looks like Sis… also did well.”

Garfiel snorted at a grateful Leno and looked at the Magicreation Tool, which had ceased to run amok.

Beyond the debris of the collapsed building, there was a halted Magicreation Tool that had lost its light, and as Garfiel moved to save lives, Frederica must have turned off the Lightbug that was causing the problem.

—No, the real cause was not the Lightbug,

Garfiel: “It was Hayden Garo, that fuckin’ bastard…”

Leno: “That person is connected to the Lightbug’s outburst? This collapse is no coincidence, then.”

Garfiel: “After the trouble at the factory, he must’ve followed us. And when he found out we were talkin’ to ya, he wanted to keep us quiet…”

And, when Garfiel thought that much, his eyes widened slightly.

Leno asked Garfiel, “What is wrong?”, but he did not respond. With narrowed emerald eyes, Garfiel turned around and stared at the stopped Magicreation Tool.

There was no sign of Frederica anywhere around the Magicreation Tool.

Garfiel: “That… Fuckin’ bastard…!”

Instantly, he knew that Hayden Garo had kidnapped Frederica. The attack on City Hall was a diversion, and his true objective was Frederica.

As a result, he was caught up in the enemy’s schemes and was unable to protect Frederica.

Leno: “Garfiel-dono, Miss Frederica couldn’t have been…”

From Garfiel’s gaze and expression, Leno also understood what had happened to Frederica. With a “Yeah.”, Garfiel answered his question with a nod of frustration.

He painfully realized his own inadequacies, but would let himself be beaten down by them later.

Garfiel: “My first priority is to get Sis back. Everythin’ else is—”

He was about to leave the cleanup of City Hall to others, but things took a turn for the worse.

Before Garfiel could finish, a roar echoed in the distance. In a chain reaction, not once, but two and three times, each from a different direction, one after the other.

Garfiel: “…”

Garfiel’s eyes widened in shock, and he looked in the direction from which the sound had come. A plume of smoke rising upwards, perhaps fire, whatever sign of disaster it was made all the hairs on his body stand on end.

What conclusively revealed its nature was the pale light visible at the source of every sound—shimmering, dangerous lights that accompanied the Lightbug-attached Magicreation Tools.

New disasters caused by Lightbugs occurred simultaneously in various parts of the city. It seemed to be Hayden’s plan to ridicule Garfiel, now that his sister had been taken away from him.

Garfiel: “You’re kiddin’ me… Ya gotta be fuckin’ kiddin’ me, Hayden Garo—!!”

Garfiel’s vision turned red with rage, and he gathered strength in his legs. The ground cracked as he stepped on it, and the Divine Protection of Earth Spirits drew forth its energy in response to his anger.

How great would it be if all that energy could be directed toward Hayden? How great would it be if he could get his sister back right after she was taken?

With such a longing that made his heart crack, Garfiel stepped forward.

—Instead of the road that led to his sister, his fangs creaked as he turned to the now-raging Lightbugs.

6

???: “—The loss of the Demi-Human War is the primary reason why the inferiors have been allowed to prosper.”

???: “…”

???: “I find it also aggravating that people are calling it Lugunica’s civil war, as if everything outside of the Kingdom’s a sideshow. But there were countless sparks everywhere. There was room for the flames to spread so much further."

As the man continued speaking in an endless stream of words, the sound of steel rubbing against steel could be heard in his hand.

It was a harsh sound, the sound of a small file sharpening a sharp nail. —Hayden Garo, a man who meticulously filed his nails, finished filing the nails on his left five toes with a practiced hand.

Hayden raised his well-groomed hand and peered through the gaps between his fingers. His theatrical manner caused Frederica to let out a long breath, and,

Frederica: "Um, do you mind?"

Hayden: "Yeah? What is it?"

Frederica: "If this is going to take long, may I go to bed? I had a hard time sleeping last night. I was looking forward to today before this happened."

Hayden: "—. Kuku, ha ha ha ha ha!"

There was a momentary lull in Frederica's words, which was quickly filled with laughter.

Hayden laughed with his mouth wide open. Frederica winced in disgust as she heard his laughter reverberate—her chained arms raising a lifeless sound.

Hayden: "Oi oi, don't hurt yerself needlessly. Blemishes are unbefitting of a Queen."

Frederica: "You knocked me out and then brought me here, now you dare do as you please…"

Hayden: "I treated ya gently. I took care not to put a scratch on ya… although I don't deny that I had to use a strong hit if I didn't wanna make any mistakes."

Having said that, Hayden walked up, grabbed Frederica by the chin, and made her look up.

Glaring directly into Hayden's close-up face, Frederica's expression contorted in disgust. The sight of Frederica, having brought a smile to Hayden's well-groomed, bearded face,

Hayden: "You don't have to be submissive. A female who keeps her high spirits is worthy of my country."

Frederica: "Country, country, country… what exactly are you intending to do? Do not tell me you are seriously planning to establish your own country?"

Hayden: "If I said yes, would ya sneer at my dream?"

Frederica: "…"

Frederica kept quiet as Hayden asked in a slightly hushed tone of voice.

Of course, he was delusional, but if she thoughtlessly said it out loud, the hand on her chin would crush her careless mouth. She was convinced of this.

At Frederica's silence, Hayden narrowed his eyes and said, "Good girl.",

Hayden: "Beautiful, headstrong, and discerning. These are the reasons other than blood why I can't take my eyes off you."

Then, he took his hand off Frederica's chin and proceeded to run his fingers through her long blonde hair instead, kissing it as if he were truly in love with it.

Though her disgust rose at the act, Frederica only turned her face away in order to express her mind, instead turning her attention beyond Hayden and to her surroundings.

The place where Frederica was taken after being knocked out by Hayden—it was a rocky space where the air was cold, and the only light source was a weak, blue-white light. The heaviness and dampness of the air and the reverberation of sound made it clear that this was a place like the inside of a proper cave.

Frederica was chained to a cold wall of rock and restrained in a standing position, but judging from the time she had been unconscious, she was not far from Costuul—.

???: “Hayden-kun, how is the Lass doing?”

Frederica: “—Hic.”

When Frederica looked around, her shoulders jumped at the sound of a sudden voice from a third party.

Hayden’s smile deepened as he let go of Frederica’s hair, after she unconsciously reacted and made the chains clank. Then he turned around and greeted the figure slowly approaching behind him.

Hayden: “Oh, our future Queen is in good condition, Doc. No matter how good the quality of her blood is, if she is weak and ugly, no one will be willing to worship her.”

???: “I was not asking about appearance. Do you think it’s my nature to obsess over that?”

Hayden: “Oi, oi, don’t be so demeaning. Sure, you’re ugly, but the presence of ugly things highlights the presence of beautiful things. Besides, it’s much better than being an inferior.”

Hayden shrugged his shoulders, and the person with whom he exchanged words slowly came into the light.

It was a gray-haired man with a morbidly pale, scrawny, skin and bones body. His dry skin and lifeless hair gave an eerie impression of a moving corpse, but this impression was belied by his eyes that held a glistening, sinister gleam.

Both by intuition and by Frederica’s rule of thumb, people with that look in their eyes were not sane.

And sure enough, as the man stood in front of the strung-up Frederica, his eyes shone brighter and brighter,

???: “But I understand your feelings, Hayden-kun. At last, another bearer of the lovely “rare blood” has appeared before my eyes!”

Frederica: “—Rare blood.”

Frederica reflected on the man’s words, his voice betraying his excitement.

She was not reflecting on what was said, because she had absolutely no idea what was being said. —It was just the opposite.

Frederica knew of rare blood, and she had been aware that she possessed it. She also knew that the special blood that flowed within her was partly the reason she was allowed to serve outside the Sanctuary and taken in by Roswaal.

???: “Of course, you are aware of your own blood, aren’t you? That your own blood is special and different from the blood of others. Its mana content, taste, and effects are different when consumed by a blood-sucking kind. Did you know that? If you take other people’s blood, it becomes poison, but rare blood is not like that; it’s mysterious blood!”

Frederica: “…I was not aware of that. Some of that information I did not want to know.”

With no offense meant to the insistent man, she did not want to imagine the possibility of someone consuming her blood. Even if they said it tasted good and was full of power, she would not necessarily be happy about it.

Of course, Frederica was grateful for her mother, who gave birth to her as she was, and although she had mixed feelings about her father, who had made her mother suffer, she was grateful for the chance to be born.

It was also noted that Frederica’s status as a Halfbeast was an important part of her destiny that she lived with.

Ryuzu: “Fuu, don’t curse your birth. Nothing would make us happier than for young Fuu and Gar-bo not to have to live with the regrets we have lived with for so, so long.”

Frederica recalled Ryuzu's words to her when the Sanctuary was liberated and they were to live apart. To her words, Frederica replied, "Absolutely.".

Frederica: "However, I was never told that I would be courted by these gentlemen, Grandmother…"

Although she did not want to burden herself with her own birth or Ryuzu's words, she was indeed tempted to say that this situation may be too unfortunate.

???: "Good, excellent, I've longed for this. It's my long-awaited moment. You too are my, my, my, my…"

While Frederica's thoughts wandered, the man's eyes became all the more erratic. With fingers as thin as dead twigs, he pulled open the front of his cloak, exposing what was underneath.

At first, Frederica almost screamed at the unpleasant sight she imagined, but upon seeing what was actually under his cloak, her screams were subdued.

There were countless vials filled with a reddish-black liquid hanging inside.

???: "The blood samples of my soul. I am a researcher. My goal is to discover the hidden power of blood, unravel its mysteries, and thereby bring the world salvation."

Frederica: "The mysteries of blood and the salvation of the world…?"

???: "That's right! To unravel the mysteries of blood is tantamount to unravelling the secrets of life! Therefore, your blood, Lassy, will be a great help to move the world towards the future—"

The man approached Frederica, who was left speechless after having been told of his bizarre theory. At the man's approach, who was dominated by fiendish thoughts, Frederica felt an instinctive terror.

However—

Hayden: “Doc, that’s enough. I don’t want ya to intimidate my future Queen any further.”

Of all things, it was Hayden who grabbed the man’s face and saved the squirming Frederica.

Hayden grabbed the man by the mouth, and the man let out a pained yelp. However, Hayden’s expression hardened slightly as he tried to get the man to back down.

Hayden: “Tsk, Doc’s got some sticky fingers… no, they’re some sticky fangs.”

???: “Hyah, hyah, it’s wasteful! Et’s wastefel, Hayden-kun…!”

Hayden clicked his tongue and let go; blood dripped from the base of his thumb.

Apparently, the man’s teeth had hit him as he grabbed his face, which caused him to bleed. However, the man’s behavior was unusual. When Hayden’s blood dropped to the ground, the man fell onto his stomach and began to lick it up.

Again, it was an unusual behavior that made Frederica want to scream, but she could see the man’s mouth as he did so, and then it made sense to her.

Frederica: “Those fangs and that behavior of blood licking… a blood-sucking kind, you are a batperson, right?”

Frederica determined from the man’s obsession with blood that this was the man’s true identity. Then, looking at Hayden, she continued, “And.”,

Frederica: “I see that you, too, have rare blood.”

Hayden: “Ya really are a smart woman. It was worth taking the time to evaluate ya, Frederica.”

Frederica: “—Hic, my name.”

Hayden: “Of course, I know. Ya didn’t really think I was just gonna say that a woman I saw on a whim was gonna be my future Queen? That's the stuff of fairy tales and make-believe."

Frederica felt humiliated and, at the same time, understood that everything had been set up, as she was mocked by Hayden, who shrugged his shoulders, having said that today was no coincidence.

Everything from her encounter with Hayden at the factory, to the subsequent commotion and the collapse of City Hall.

Frederica: "So, all this commotion in Costuul is because of my rare blood?"

Hayden: "Oi, oi, don't talk as if yer only value is in yer blood. I'm interested in yer body, too. Well, you're right. The real reason for all the commotion was ya."

Frederica: "…How did you manage to manipulate the Lightbugs?"

Hayden: "That's the result of the research of the Blood Sample Collector, Doc Leonardo Baroness."

He licked the wound on his hand and admired the accomplishments of the man he looked down at, the man he called—Leonardo, who crawled at his feet.

Hayden: "I don't have a clue about it, but I've heard that some people in the world got a disposition that allows them to bring out the performance of magic stones better than others, and unlike a Divine Protection, the difference appears to reside in their blood… The Doc extracted that element and was able to manipulate the Lightbugs, which are born out of the used magic stones."

Leonardo: "If I am to say it, calling it a bug is a rather ignorant statement. It is an entity that serves as a deterrent for the world, so as to punish those who distort its laws…"

Hayden: "In short, they came to be because of the inferiors who created the Magicreation Tools. The people who created them in all of their hubris, getting attacked by the proof of their very sin. Delightful story, isn't it?"

Frederica: “With such a short story, there were two or three things that struck a nerve with me…”

Frederica grew angry at both Leonardo, who was licking the ground, and Hayden, who was sneering at her.

Hayden, who kept repeating “inferiors, inferiors” like a broken record, had already differed from Frederica in his ideology, calling himself a Halfbeast like Frederica and Garfiel and while apparently having some thoughts on the Demi-Human War and the Kingdom of Lugunica—

Frederica: “Us and humans are not in a competition for superiority. We are not the same, but I do not think of them as differences.”

Hayden: “…”

Frederica: “In fact, the human race made different discoveries from the demi-human races. Magic and tool-making skills, for example, even Costuul’s Magicreation Tools, are the results of their hard work…”

Hayden: “—Be quiet.”

Frederica tried to clearly state that she had a different opinion.

Hayden brought his face close to the tip of Frederica’s nose and spoke a short, clear command. The ominous energy that overflowed from his whole body immediately made Frederica’s instincts shudder.

It produced a more certain effect here than being grabbed by the chin and silenced by force.

Frederica: “…”

Holding her breath, Frederica swallowed her words. At the sight of Frederica, Hayden’s face turned serious, and after a pause, he broke his expression with, “Oi, oi”,

Hayden: “My bad. I’m just annoyed that you’re always talking outta turn. I like strong-willed women, but don’t like ill-tempered ones.”

Frederica: “What do you plan on doing to me, after all?”

Having seen that Hayden seemed to regain his composure, Frederica gave up the idea of talking to him.

Talking to someone unwilling to engage in discussion would only force a one-sided negative response. The only thing to do here was to look for an opportunity to escape while playing the role the other party wanted in this situation.

But Leonardo could not be allowed to drain all the blood out of her body before that—.

Hayden: “No need to worry. I won’t let ya get hurt. Once we’re ready to leave, we’ll go to my castle for a while.”

Frederica: “Castle…”

Hayden: “Oh, you’ll love it. —Oi, Doc! How long are ya going to keep licking the blood off the ground? I’m waiting for ya. Get this over with.”

After announcing his disheartening plan, Hayden grabbed Leonardo by the collar and made him stand up. Leonardo seemed to want to go back to the ground, but when Hayden kicked him on the butt and urged him to hurry up, he said, “All right, all right!”, and began to dismantle everything.

Once that was done, it seemed that Frederica would be welcomed into Hayden’s castle

Frederica: “…”

The strength of the chains was such that it was uncertain whether Frederica could break them even after transforming into a beast. Leaving that as a last resort, Frederica gathered her breath and waited for the opportune moment.

Frederica: “I will be certain to keep my promise to Grandmother…”

Frederica remembered the promise she had made to Ryuzu, strengthening her resolve.

Surely, Garfiel must have been struggling to find Frederica by now.

7

—And in the Industrial City, Garfiel struggled beyond Frederica's imagination.

Garfiel: "OOORAAAA—!!"

Garfiel kicked the street hard enough to leave footprints, and his body flew like an arrow into the Lightbug-clad Magicreation Tool—or rather, the Lightbug that was wielding the Magicreation Tool.

The Magicreation Tool in the factory and the one for elevated work that caused City Hall to collapse could be said to have been rendered haywire by a Lightbug, but this, however, was at a whole different level.

The Magicreation Tool, at its core, was designed to polish metal, but its function and structure were ignored by the Lightbug that clung to it, covering the entire thing and turning it into one gigantic monstrous Lightbug that rampaged about.

Garfiel's flying kick had pierced into the center of the monstrous Lightbug. There was resistance from the light for a moment, but the twist of his heel shattered it, smashing the Magicreation Tool itself.

The magic stone at the core of the Lightbug formation shattered, and the entirety of the monstrous Lightbug also dissipated.

Garfiel: "With this…"

Having just destroyed his tenth monstrous Lightbug, Garfiel was ready for a breather.

However, Garfiel was not allowed to rest on his laurels, as Magicreation Tools began to go haywire in other parts of the city in rapid succession, which spawned new monstrous Lightbugs and caused more and more damage.

Garfiel: "—Hic."

Magicreation Tools were the backbone of the manufacturing power of the Industrial City of Costuul. As such, they could be found throughout the city. Since the Magicreation Tools were triggered one after another by the Lightbugs, it was as if the sparks had been scattered throughout the city in advance.

Garfiel: “Shit, no matter how many times I smash ‘em, they keep on comin’…!”

Garfiel grit his teeth as the city guards also rushed around under Leno’s command, but they were not entirely up to the task.

Ultimately, it was a situation where Garfiel’s defenses were indispensable.

Garfiel: “Sis…”

There was a slow-burning sensation in his heart, and Garfiel’s spirit was driven to the edge.

He would like to rescue his distressed sister as soon as possible, but if Garfiel were to leave an opening , what flowed through would wash away the fates of many people.

If he devoted all his energy to prevent that, Frederica would grow further and further away.

The inescapable conflict between the two was mercilessly chipping away at Garfiel’s inexperienced soul—

Garfiel: “Bring it on, this ain’t nothing—!”

Despite the uneasiness in his heart, Garfiel’s body moved wildly.

The moment the newly emerged monstrous Lightbug poked its head out, he accurately hit only the magic stone part of the Magicreation Tool with his fist, without any unnecessary moves. Right after, as if to get back at another monstrous Lightbug which made a Magicreation Tool howl somewhere else he jumped, hitting it with a spinning kick and silencing the next enemy as well.

If he wanted to rush to his sister’s side just one second sooner, he would have to silence as many monstrous Lightbugs as possible. To do so, he went for the location of the next Lightbug—

Garfiel: "—Ah?"

Just as he was about to leap out, Garfiel felt a growing presence behind him on the nape of his neck.

However, that was impossible. It was from where the first of the two Lightbugs that had just been destroyed in succession had appeared. Garfiel's emerald-green eyes widened as he turned around to see if there were any more of them.

The monstrous Lightbug was supposed to have been defeated. However, its light surrounded two Magicreation Tools—by absorbing multiple Magicreation Tools, it had increased its critical points to two, and he had failed to defeat one of them.

One of them jerked wildly, and a part of the monstrous Lightbug's body began to glow intensely. He could see the mana concentrated at that one point, a sign that an attack was about to be unleashed beyond his reach.

Garfiel: "Wait—"

He extended his hand, and tried to jump to get in the way, but would not make it in time.

Then, before Garfiel's eyes, the monstrous Lightbug's attack was be unleashed to set the city ablaze as if to ridicule Garfiel's arrogance —

???: "—Pardon the assistance. Just a moment."

The moment he heard that voice, the body of the monstrous Lightbug that was about to release the light disappeared suddenly.

The space where the monstrous Lightbug's body used to be literally disappeared, and the mana it had accumulated and its bizarre body also disappeared. Naturally, the monstrous Lightbug's core, the Magicreation Tool, was gouged out, it could not maintain itself, and became particles of light that dissipated into thin air.

Garfiel: “Wha…”

An extreme amount of confusion struck Garfiel as he wondered what had happened.

The confusion stopped Garfiel in his tracks, and unhindered by his interference, malice was about to blossom elsewhere. But that, too, was stopped just in time.

When the Lightbug, which was about to become massive using a Magicreation Tool as a catalyst, was frozen whole.

???: “Thank goodness! It looks like we made it in time!”

A flying figure landed nimbly right on top of the now-frozen pillar that used to be the monstrous Lightbug. With long silver hair that danced in the air, it was a half-elf who patted her chest in relief—Emilia.

Garfiel’s eyes widened at her appearance as a member of her camp and its leader.

Garfiel: “E-Emilia, sama… Why’re ya here?”

Emilia: “Why? I was in the mansion when I heard a reaaally loud noise coming from the city. There seemed to be a lot of smoke, so I rushed over.”

Garfiel: “Rushed over…”

Emilia: “Yes, that’s right. I’m sure everyone else is on their way too, but the first ones to get here were me and…”

???: “—It appears there is only me. Accompaniment.”

A calm voice overtook Emilia’s words, and Garfiel turned in a panic. Then, his eyes met those of a composed-looking young man standing behind him.

A thin, wire-like impression clad in a black butler’s uniform with a monocle over his left eye—this person had taken care of them a month ago, before and after they moved into the current mansion.

Garfiel: “I think ya were at Roswaal’s relative’s, the lil’ pipsqueak’s place…”

???: “It is an honor to be remembered. As you said, I serve the young Annerose-sama. I am Clind. Re-introduction.”

Garfiel: “Why’re ya, a third party, even with Emilia-sama?”

Clind: “I was just visiting the mansion on business and happened to come across this situation. Coincidence. So, I joined Emilia-sama for support. Limited help.”

The young man politely bent at the waist and bowed—Garfiel let out a ragged breath at Clind’s words.

If it was Clind who caused the strange phenomenon that erased the monstrous Lightbug just before, his help would be more than a little help, and it would not be a coincidence, but good luck.

Then, Emilia jumped off the pillar of ice and landed beside Garfiel, looking around the city,

Emilia: “Are those strange little ones Micro Spirits…? Hmm, no, not quite. Those little ones are the ones who are doing bad things to the city, aren’t they?”

Garfiel: “Oh, yeah, apparently they’re called Lightbugs. They’re messin’ ‘round together with the Magicreation Tools in the city… but that’s not all!”

As Garfiel unconsciously answered Emilia’s question, he raised his voice. Emilia’s eyes widened in surprise at the force of the response.

However, Garfiel did not have time to apologize for surprising Emilia, Garfiel: “It’s Sis! The city’s in trouble, but Sis is in trouble, too!”

Emilia: “C-Calm down, Garfiel. What happened? You and Frederica were supposed to be on a “dayte”, weren’t you? You’re not together?”

Garfiel: “No, she isn’t. She was taken away by the bastard who started all this trouble!”

Emilia: “—. Frederica?”

Garfiel, who had been struggling to smash every one of the monstrous Lightbugs that sprung up left and right, grew increasingly impatient, and was finally able to vent his frustration to a companion.

Instantly, Clind’s eyes narrowed sharply, and Emilia’s eyes widened even more.

Clind: “Garfiel-sama, details, please. Urgency.”

Garfiel: “…While tourin’ the city with Sis, some asshole got into a dispute with her. I don’t understand how he did it, but he made the Lightbugs go berserk…”

Clind: “Frederica was taken by him. Diversion.”

Garfiel: “Yeah, that’s right. And ‘cause I got stuck here, sis…”

Garfiel clenched his fists tightly and regretted his mistake.

Just because City Hall had been destroyed was no excuse. Since he had seen Hayden’s obsession with Frederica just prior, he should have suspected that his sister would be targeted.

Emilia: “Garfiel.”

As Garfiel expressed his regrets, Emilia stepped forward. And before Garfiel could say anything—she clamped her hands tightly around his face,

Emilia: “Keep your head up! You saw what they looked like, didn’t you? If so, you’re the only one who can find the person who took Frederica, Garfiel!”

Garfiel: “…”

Emilia: “Roswaal is not at the mansion right now, so I’ll make the decision. Go search for Frederica… no, it’s Garfiel’s duty to get her back! Do your best!”

Emilia said this to Garfiel directly, putting pressure on her slender fingers.

Garfiel was taken aback for a moment, but then his voice shook as he said, “W-Wait a minute.”,

Garfiel: “If my amazin’ self leaves here, the city ‘n all the people who live here will be…”

Emilia: “We’ll take care of that! You don’t have to do everything alone! We’re all in this together!”

Garfiel: “—Ah.”

Garfiel was stunned by Emilia’s words.

It was okay not to do everything alone. —That was why Garfiel was defeated by Subaru just a month ago and why Subaru, with the help of Ram and Otto, defeated Garfiel and recruited him to their side.

However, it was an idea that Garfiel, who raged alone in the Sanctuary for so long, had never even conceived of, and so he found himself unable to breathe.

Clind: “Emilia-sama, may I also accompany Garfiel-sama? Proposition.”

Emilia: “Clind-san also?”

Garfiel aside, Emilia was surprised at Clind’s proposition.

Clind: “Yes. —Considering the cause of Frederica’s kidnapping, it is likely urgent. More to the point, if what caused this situation is who took Frederica…”

Emilia: “If that bad guy is defeated, all the dangers in the city will be solved…!”

Clind: “So, I foolishly believe. Appeal.”

Emilia’s eyes grew intense, and she pointed at Clind’s bowed head with a finger.

Emilia: “Yes! Let’s do that! I’ll deal with the city while Garfiel and Clind-san go and get Frederica back!”

Garfiel: “But if it’s just ya alone, Emilia-sama, ya don’t have much of a chance…”

Emilia: “That’s not true!”

Emilia, about to undertake the vigorous defense of the city, intensified her words at Garfiel’s concern and matched the edge of her words with her hand turned to towards the distance.

Beyond the palm of her hand, Emilia watched as the newly born monstrous Lightbug froze and became unable to move, and she turned to Garfiel and Clind with a “Right?”.

Clind: “As long as there is a long range, the environment is more favorable to magic users, and I think Garfiel-sama has his own strengths. Encouragement.”

Garfiel: “Being strong is my amazin’ self’s strong suit. My strength will help find my sister… wait a minute.”

The alternative of leaving her in charge of the city broadened Garfiel’s horizons.

Specifically, there was something that Garfiel had not noticed in the chaos of Costuul with the emergence of the monstrous Lightbugs. However, now that he had calmed down, there was something that certainly stimulated Garfiel’s sense of smell.

Garfiel: “—. This way.”

With certainty, Garfiel turned in the direction where Frederica would be.

Emilia and Clind looked at each other and nodded.

And then—

Emilia: "—Go on! Subaru once told me. It's a dayte until you get back to the mansion!"

Garfiel: "Yes! Leave it to me, Emilia-sama!"

Emilia saw him off, and Garfiel dashed off with a few words to Emilia, who remained behind.

For a moment, he almost thought he was going to leave Clind behind due to his powerful acceleration,

Clind: "No need for concern. Accompaniment."

Slightly lent forward, Clind followed at a speed comparable to his.

With that being the case, Garfiel forgot his concern for him, put the chaos of the city out of his mind, and concentrated on getting to Frederica's location.

Subaru: "A belated appearance of the real star of the show! Kept you waiting, huh, Garfiel! Now that Beako and I have rushed over, you can rest assured that everything will be safe and sound!"

Beatrice: "Let's show off Betty and Subaru's partnership to the fullest, in fact! Don't blink and miss it, I suppose!"

And at the entrance to the city, Garfiel passed a pair of voices like that, but those, too, were outside of his consciousness.

Garfiel left behind the two people exclaiming "That's not right?!" and "Is there no limit to your rudeness, in fact?!" at being ignored by him.

For the first time in a month, he ran again to save his sister, just as he had done that night, savoring the joy of running with someone's affirmation that he was not doing it all alone.

8

???: "If ya don't try to escape, I won't do anything. I want to believe ya, but what happens now?”

When asked by Hayden, his strong arms outstretched, Frederica gave a grimace and fell silent as best she could.

The question came at the point when he was finally ready to take Frederica out once he had completed his preparations for leaving.

It seems that if she did not resist, he would remove her chains in a gentlemanly manner.

Frederica: “There is nothing gentlemanly about keeping me tied up. Do what you want. But, just be prepared.”

Hayden: “Really? Prepared?”

Frederica: “If you remove these chains, be prepared to have your face ripped off by my claws.”

Hayden: “Oi, oi, when ya say it like that, I’m tempted to take them off, but I’d rather not hang out in this cave any longer.”

With that, Hayden cracked his knuckles.

Would he beat Frederica, knock her out, and carry her out, as he did when he brought her here?

At Hayden’s threat, Leonardo’s thin voice echoed, “Hayden-kun.”.

Leonardo: “Her rare blood is very precious. Do not be too rough with it.”

Hayden: “I don’t need to be told, Doc. She’s my future Queen. I wouldn’t hurt her.”

Leonardo: “Even if you have no intention of doing so, your strength of arms is beyond the reach of ordinary humans. In fact, in bringing her here, you probably wounded her. I can smell the rich scent of her blood.”

Hayden: “What?”

At Leonardo’s nervous words, the smile faded from Hayden’s face.

Seeing this reaction, Leonardo’s cheeks hardened, and he asked, “What’s wrong?”,

Leonardo: “I commended you on your strength. Your physical prowess is unparalleled…”

Hayden: “No, that’s not it. You said it smells like blood. Rare blood, that’s not mine.”

Leonardo: “Y-Yes, you’re right. I would recognize your blood immediately. It’s different, rich…”

Leonardo was momentarily overwhelmed, but soon ecstasy filled his voice. When Hayden heard his reply, he turned around and looked at Frederica with his blue eyes.

Seeing the flicker in his eyes, Frederica understood. —She had been noticed.

Hayden: “…”

Wordlessly, Hayden closed the distance between him and Frederica. Just as quickly, Frederica leaped to her feet as Hayden approached defenselessly.

Frederica: “Take this!”

Up to this point, she had never attempted to fight back, and kicked with all her saved-up strength.

It stuck into Hayden’s side of the head so as to reap the arrogant man’s consciousness—but it failed to do so. The kick was stopped by an upraised arm, and he brought her held leg in front of him.

And then—

Frederica: “Aah?!”

While holding onto her leg, Hayden forcefully tore off Frederica’s clothing with his other hand.

Frederica screamed as her shoulders and underwear were exposed, and Hayden looked at her white skin from top to bottom. Then, with a cruel expression on his face, he grabbed Frederica's face this time.

Frederica's mouth was forced open by what Leonardo had described as an "unparalleled" physical strength. Looking into Frederica's mouth, Hayden snorted.

Hayden: "That's my future Queen. You're clever, aren't ya?"

Smiling wickedly, Hayden's eyes caught the bite mark at the base of Frederica's tongue.

At the moment of her kidnapping in Costuul, Frederica gave herself a wound on her tongue, leaving a trail of her blood, dotting it until she was brought here.

Hayden: "Leonardo! Let's get outta here! Some troublesome guys will be here soon—"

???: "—Those troublesome visitors are here. Pardon."

Turning around as if he had been played, Hayden shouted to Leonardo.

However, this was interrupted by a rather patronizing voice, which made Hayden's brutish face tense up. —That was the kind of reaction one would expect, if a person suddenly appeared out of nowhere in empty space. Especially if the cave walls had been gouged out by an unknown force, creating an entrance that he did not know about.

And then, a figure jumped in through the entrance—

???: "For the second time! Get away from Sis, ya small fry—!!"

With a powerful punch to Hayden's face, he was able to do what Frederica was unable to and take revenge for the humiliation she had been put through.

The phenomenon that Clind had caused could only be described as a profound mystery.

It was already a profound mystery when he crushed the monstrous Lightbug as well as the very space it occupied, but it was also a profound mystery the way they arrived at their destination.

But the moment he confirmed that his sister was at their destination, he forgot all about that profound mystery.

The important thing was to get Frederica back. —That, was Garfiel Tinzel's role.

Garfiel: "OOORAAAA—!!"

He drove his fist into the face of the one he detested and slammed it straight into the wall behind him, sending him flying out the other side, crashing through the rock wall. The impact and plumes of smoke shook the entire cave, but it was not the strength of the cave that he was concerned about, but rather separating his sister from the enemy in front of him.

To accomplish this, Garfiel did not stop, even when he smashed through the wall. Instead, he broke through, and through, and through—into the vast room beyond.

Garfiel: "—Hic."

After a brief moment of being thrown through the air, his entire body was immersed in a vast expanse of water. After he kicked the bottom of the water and rose to the surface, he found himself in a dark lake—a place like an underground lake.

Upon reaching the disguised entrance, he knew it was not a man-made cave, but was surprised to find such a large underground lake hidden inside.

Hayden: "You don't got the luxury of looking around, unselected blood!"

Garfiel: "Tsk!"

As Garfiel emerged from the surface of that water, he took a claw strike to the shoulder, causing a spray of water to rise.

He instantly turned his body, but inside the water his movements were dulled. Unable to dodge, the man’s fingertips gouged out his shoulder, and blood spurted vigorously from the claw-shaped wound in his flesh.

It was like the first exchange of blows in Costuul, and that was despite Garfiel’s body being tough so as to not be easily ripped open, even by the claws of a beast.

Garfiel: “You’re proud of yer claws huh, ya fuckin’ bearded bastard…”

Hayden: “Yes, I am. My prized claws can even cut through steel, you see. Sinners, traitors and inferiors, these are the King’s swords to behead them.”

Garfiel: “Don’t go sayin’ shit that makes no fuckin’ sense!”

Garfiel’s fist roared as he yelled, and the surface of the lake was blown away as if an explosion had occurred.

Even if the water killed its momentum, Garfiel’s well-trained arm was like a mortar. It had the power to smash the opposition, regardless of any half-baked obstacles.

However, this was only the case when the opponent wasn’t capable of making “half-baked obstacles” non-trivial.

Hayden: “Does it feel different in the water? There’s a big difference in how you move compared to when you’re on the ground!”

Garfiel’s right arm broke through the surface of the water; Hayden dexterously handled it, laughed, and his arms flew mercilessly toward Garfiel, who gnashed his teeth.

He claimed to be able to cut through steel, and indeed, the sharpness cut through Garfiel’s skin, gouged out his flesh, and cracked his bones, causing the blood that flowed out to stain the underground lake reddish-black.

Garfiel's Divine Protection of Earth Spirits, as pointed out by Hayden, did not work underwater, and the wounds he sustained were faster than his healing magic, causing him to bleed profusely, dissolving his life force into the water.

Garfiel let out a bubbling cry of pain, and Hayden sneered at Garfiel as he sank into the blood and water.

Hayden: "I'll give ya credit for having the guts and familial love to come here! But ya still have unselected blood. Ya can't beat me no matter how hard ya try. Yer sister will serve as my country's future Queen, where the inferiors will be exterminated, so thankfully sink!"

Garfiel: "Inferiors…?"

Hayden: "They're vermin that infest the whole world, pretending to be the rulers of the land. There was once an opportunity. The Demi-Human War was just that, but its leaders were incompetent. I'll take over their roles!"

Even amid his bravado, his claws scraped away at the flesh of his body.

With blood flowing and flesh taken, Garfiel's weight may have been much lighter than before he left the mansion. Even so, it was an uncomfortable outing—or rather, date.

Ram: "Do your best, Garf. Frederica has always been concerned for you, Garf. She is Ram's senior. Ram won't feel good if you make the wrong choices."

Ram's words, spoken to him before his departure, filled his blood-starved body with vitality.

Whatever Hayden's point was, it mattered not to Garfiel.

Garfiel: "You're pissin' me the fuck off. My amazin' self is gonna beat the shit outta ya. —That's it!"

Garfiel's enthusiasm bubbled noiselessly as his face was immersed in the water.

However, his determination lay within his fist. Garfiel's lunging fist left behind a strip of blood, while Hayden calmly took his time to stop it.

Hayden should have been able to avoid the blow as before, but he was caught off guard by the slow movement of his fist. —Hayden's right arm caught the fist, and the bones from the palm to his elbow, where the fist struck him, were instantly shattered.

Hayden let out a stunned "Wha-" and his eyes widened as the other fist was thrust, this time into his lower jaw, launching the large man with slicked blond hair and sending him flying into the cave's ceiling.

Unable to stand firmly due to being underwater, and having used the impetus of his entire body to throw that strike, Garfiel exhaled a long breath. There was no way he could do it again, even if he were asked to.

Garfiel: "All the Demi-Human War this 'n selected blood or not, that, 'n other such headache-inducin' things… say 'em to Emilia-sama, not my amazin' self!!"

The relationship between humans and demi-humans, the absurdity of the world that Hayden considered wrong, and the ideals he sought to correct, were all outside Garfiel's expertise.

Those kinds of ideas were for Emilia and Subaru to worry about.

Garfiel's role was to break down the obstacles that stood in the way of pursuing those ideals.

Garfiel: "'N that, means ya!"

Hayden: "—. Are ya saying a dumbass like ya, who doesn't understand a single thing I'm saying, is gonna break my fangs?"

Floating on the surface of the water, Garfiel pointed a finger above his head at Hayden, who was impaled on the ceiling by the earlier blow. Hearing Garfiel's caustic words, Hayden's expression turned angry, and he bared his teeth. —His form, which had lost one of its sharp canine teeth, transformed and changed its shape with a tremendous sound.

It was beastification. Hayden Garo transformed into a great lion that rampaged on instinct.

Seeing this, Garfiel also strongly gnashed his fangs—

Garfiel: "—I don't care what the fuck ya hafta to say. I've gotta continue my date with Sis!"

And then, as Garfiel howled, his whole body began to enlarge with a creaking sound.

10

She was so ashamed that she wanted to chew up one of her files if she could.

In order to sharpen her endlessly growing fangs, she could not do without a file as a necessity in her life. Sometimes, when she felt really down, she chewed a file very hard as a way of venting her feelings.

And now, this was exactly the kind of moment she wanted to have a file.

Because—

???: "—You should put on this jacket. Your appearance is unsightly. Affront."

With his voice, a jacket was softly draped over Frederica, her clothing having been torn off.

His nonchalant consideration displeased her, but even more so she was displeased with herself for the relief she couldn't help but feel. Of course, that relief was largely due to Garfiel, who rushed in and punched Hayden away.

However, Frederica was not so childish as to say that his presence had nothing to do with it.

Frederica: “…This is humiliating.”

???: “First of all, one would have expected a word of thanks. Perplexing.”

He turned his head and muttered reluctantly as he repositioned the monocle over his left eye.

Clind, the versatile butler in the service of Annerose Miload, from a branch of the Mathers family and a relative of Roswaal, was always detestably cool.

Leonardo: “Ha-Hayden-kun! Hayden-kun! Guh, kuh… how did you find this place?!”

Clind: “Should I say that it was siblingly love? To be exact, Garfiel-sama picked up the clues in the blood that Frederica left behind with his sense of smell. Acuteness. Nevertheless—”

Leonardo: “Uh…?”

Clind: “From a glance, I see that you are also clad in a considerable scent of blood. Despite this, it was a failure to have not noticed her plan. Great negligence.”

Clind shook his head slowly, unable to hide his disappointment.

That gesture made Frederica shudder as she recalled his thorough education when she was an inexperienced maid. That mental anguish had also hurt Leonardo now, hurting his pride.

In his emaciated, pale face, Leonardo’s sunken eyes went bloodshot with rage, as that anger set ablaze his researcher self, in all of its bizarrerie.

Leonardo: “I won’t let go… I won’t let go! The woman of rare blood, every drop of her blood is mine!!”

Leonardo fell forward on the spot, frothing at the corners of his mouth, the insanity engulfing his eyes. Then suddenly, with a chain of high-pitched sounds, the vials of blood specimens he had hanging from his body broke all at once.

The slowly spreading blood made it seem as if Leonardo himself had been the victim of a horrific incident, if only for a brief moment.

The spilled gore seeped into Leonardo's entire body, and thus soon after he groaned, "Ohh, ohhh, ohhhh!", the Blood Sample Collector's flesh now enveloped in bubbles of blood and beginning to transform.

And then—

Clind: "It always amazes me how impure the souls of those who harbor such infatuation for you are. Dumbfounded."

Frederica: "That is something I deplore more than anyone else…!"

Frederica's voice trembled at the sound of Clind's dismay, and so she cursed her dole yet again.

It was tempting to curse him. —For in front of her eyes that man, obsessed with her blood, dissolved into a mess of it, transmorphing himself into a reddish-black liquid monster.

Leonardo: "— Glorp."

Leonardo's emaciated, slender body was transformed into an enormous mass, incomparably larger than himself, even compared to the volume of blood in the vials he had hanging from his body.

Moreover, even in such a state, Leonardo's obsession did not seem lost, as himself now turned into liquid blood began to inch toward Frederica.

With every tremor of the liquid Leonardo's massive body, bubbles of blood floated up into the cave's cold air. When it hit the pale, luminous rock wall, it absorbed that area into the blood and assimilated it. Once it hit the ground, it returned to Leonardo's body, assimilating the ground as well.

Frederica was horrified from the bottom of her heart at the sight of his gradually growing figure.

Frederica: “Ahh! Clind! Clind! Would you please do something!”

Clind: “That ever growing ambition is admirable in itself. It is a way of thinking that I do not possess. Envious.”

Frederica: “Clind!!”

Clind: “—Nevertheless.”

Clind’s eyes, which had been expressing a mysterious admiration for the approaching liquid Leonardo, sharpened. The eye behind his monocle glared at the blood clot, and Clind extended his hands in front of him.

Then he clenched his hands tightly. —Immediately after that.

Leonardo: “— Glorp?!”

The position of the head of the liquid Leonardo was unknown, yet his groans changed.

The reason became obvious: the massive body made of blood had been gouged out alongside the very space it occupied, and the impact pierced his entire body. Furthermore, it had not happened only once, as that burst ocurred every time Clind opened and closed his hands.

Clind’s attacks, which were invisible and unexplainable, struck Leonardo each time his hand was clenched.

Leonardo: “— Glorpp!”

Clind: “Oh my. Admiration.”

The liquid Leonardo’s size vanished faster than it could absorb its surroundings as he fought a defense only battle. The researcher’s delusions would not allow such helplessness, however.

The liquid Leonardo’s huge body trembled, and the next instant, a burst of sparkling light—a Lightbug rushed toward Clind and attempted to contain his outstretched arms.

As long as his hands stopped opening and closing, Clind would have no way to unleash another attack—

Clind: “I am truly sorry. —My hands, are inconsequential. Mistake.”

Leonardo’s massive body was gouged out in front of Clind, who bowed with his hands enveloped in the Lightbug.

Leonardo: “— Glor.”

As it was, Leonardo’s transformed blood-clot body had become riddled with holes like a moth-eaten piece of cloth, and one after another, the space his body had occupied was devoured and disappeared. He faded away and then, finally, vanished.

Literally, not even a drop of blood was left behind, and the Blood Sample Collector ceased to exist.

Clind: “Had it grown endlessly, it would have been a danger to the existence of the Kingdom. Addressed.”

Frederica again gasped at the unfathomability of the situation, and then spun around to look at Clind, who maintained a composed expression as he put things into perspective in a few seconds, and,

Clind: “Frederica, are you unharmed? Confirmation.”

Frederica: “Y, yes, I am fine. As long as you remove these… chains.”

As she spoke, she suddenly felt the chains binding her wrists disappear, and she was able to lower her arms. Unsure how, the chains seemed to have been erased in the same way as Leonardo was.

No longer noting the method, Frederica hid her body with his jacket,

Frederica: “Well, thank you for this… I should not say that! Garf is!”

Clind: “Please wait. While important as well, that cannot be carried out immediately. The priority is to confirm your well-being. Ill-prepared.”

Frederica: “Guh… I know, and you do not need to tell me! Roughly speaking, why are you here?”

Clind: “When I stopped by the mansion on business, I spotted the damage done to Costuul and ran to the scene with Emilia-sama. We heard that you had been kidnapped there, so we came here. Rushed.”

Frederica: “…You were worried about me?”

Clind: “Of course. Your rare blood being misused. Dilemma.”

Frederica’s fangs trembled as Clind shook his head slowly and answered.

Even though she had already been released from her restraints and Leonardo had been defeated, Frederica still felt even more humiliation and disgrace than before. She did not want to think about the reason for it.

And there was—

???: “—Yo, Monocle, are ya and Sis safe?”

Frederica: “Garf!”

Frederica heard a voice coming from the other side of the huge hole in the wall and rushed toward it. She watched as Garfiel stepped over the hole and emerged, his whole body bloodied and battered.

Frederica: “Are, are you okay? There is so much blood…”

Garfiel: “Ah? Don’t worry. It’s all my amazin’ self’s blood.”

Frederica: “That is why I am so worried! All these injuries… these, injuries?”

Frederica’s eyes widened as she wiped her brother’s bloodied body with her sleeve and checked his wounds.

The wounds that had caused the massive blood loss were already almost gone from Garfiel's body. He may have used healing magic, but that was a truly tremendous recovery power.

Garfiel: "If my feet are on the ground, there's no way my amazin' self can lose in a fistfight."

Frederica: "…You really are a child."

Frederica's shoulders relaxed when Garfiel showed his white teeth and proudly boasted of his victory.

In Frederica's eyes, Hayden Garo was an incredibly powerful man, but Garfiel was even more so. —Her little brother was much more dependable than this rare blood of hers.

Frederica: "You are more precious to me than any special blood."

Garfiel: "Oh? Oi, Monocle, somethin's wrong! Sis said somethin' weird! She's on some kinda crazy drug… ouch!"

Frederica: "I swallowed my pride to say this! Do not tease me like that!"

Garfiel: "I'm not kiddin'! I'm worried 'bout ya!"

Frederica was indignant that she had been made fun of despite building up the courage to say something so embarrassing, but Garfiel responded by saying something equally upsetting, and the siblings began to bicker with each other.

Clind: "I am pleased that you two siblings are so close, but a side note. Attention."

Frederica: "What is it? I was just telling Garf about his sister's dignity… ah."

Frederica looked back at Clind, who interrupted her, and Frederica's mouth dropped open. Garfiel also grimaced when he saw Clind's arms—both of which were enveloped by Lightbugs.

Clind: "Despite the defeat of the one pulling the strings, they still will not release. Handle.”

Garfiel: “I managed to deal with the Magicreation Tools …by smashin’ the magic stone. D’ya want me to smash yer Od or cut off yer arms?”

Clind: “Please avoid that method. Plea. —This being used to be manipulated by that researcher’s blood. In that case, Frederica.”

Frederica: “M, me?”

Her name was called and Frederica pointed to herself. Nodding his head at the gesture, Clind held out his Lightbug-covered arm,

Clind: “Free my arms with your rare blood. Salvation.”

Frederica: “…”

With a gulp, Frederica looked alternately at Clind’s arms and face.

Truthfully, Roswaal had told her from an early age about the nature of her Rare blood, but she did not remember it ever being of any use or benefit to her. If the reason Roswaal had taken an interest in her was her blood, that would be the only good thing she could count.

There were many things that she detested, big and small, including today’s events—

Frederica: “—I hope this will be the second one.”

With that, Frederica placed her finger on her fang and slid it over the tip with a flick.

Slowly, a drop of blood formed on the cut fingertip, and then it gently fell onto Clind’s Lightbug-covered arms. The drop of blood hit the pale light produced by the Lightbug.

Frederica: “I release you from the bonds of the blood that binds you. —Please, be free.”

The moment that Frederica muttered, so as to carry out her will.

The light intensified momentarily, and the Lightbugs that covered both of Clind's arms dispersed, scattered into the air, then disappearing.

Garfiel watched the scene and let out a gasp of astonishment,

Garfiel: "No way, it's gonna take a lot of Sis's blood to stop everythin' in the city, isn't it?"

Clind: "Rest assured. Frederica's rare blood has overridden the bonds the practitioner placed on them. Coercion. By now, the disturbances in Costuul should have stopped. Speculation."

Frederica: "Speculation shall not suffice! Garf, that man who was the mastermind…"

Garfiel: "He's lodged in the fuckin' wall. We've gotta drag him back to the city as soon as possible."

As he said this, Garfiel took Frederica's hand and cast healing magic on her cut fingertip, instantly healing the wound.

Her cheeks relaxed at her brother's concern, and Frederica gently stroked her finger,

Frederica: "Occasionally, this blood of mine brings me good as well."

Garfiel: "Huh? Did ya say something?"

Frederica: "No, it is nothing. Come on, we should hurry. Any more of this sweltering blood smell around me will make my nose weird… Clind?"

Frederica turned around to thank Clind, and in her gaze she saw that he checked the feeling of his arms while staring at Frederica.

Frederica, breath caught in her throat at the sharpness of his gaze, asked, "Wh-What is it?". He shook his head gently to the side and said, "Nothing".

Clind: "—Again, as I thought, seeing you grown up is a disappointment. Regret.”

Frederica: “Which part of a person do you look at when you say that?! You pervert!!”

It was an outburst that made her lose all interest in thanking him for saving her life.

11

Frederica had been successfully retrieved, Clind had destroyed the enemy collaborator, and the only thing left was to apprehend the mastermind and complete the victory—but, it was not to be.

Garfiel: “Tsk, ya stubborn bastard…!”

In Garfiel’s view, there was a large depression in the ground at the edge of the underground lake. The aftermath of the fierce battle had left marks all over the place, and the ground depression was where the battle had ended, but Hayden Garo, who was supposed to be defeated, sprawled-out on the ground was nowhere to be seen.

When they clashed against each other, Garfiel and Hayden had transformed into beasts—a great tiger and a great lion—and although bloodstains remained at the bottom of the crater, Hayden’s figure was nowhere to be seen.

Clind: “He holds a dangerous thought process. We should put out an alert in the vicinity and search for his whereabouts. Expeditious.”

Clind reassures Garfiel concerning the whereabouts of Hayden, whom he failed to subdue.

He advised that Garfiel must not feel discouraged. Of course, Garfiel also regretted his lack of strength and attention. But more than that—

Garfiel: “Next time, if he comes after Sis again, I’m gonna smash him again.”

Clind: “…”

Garfiel: “What? Yer makin’ an “overwhelmed by Wilov’s eccentricities” face.”

Clind: “No, not as much as Wilov, but I was surprised. Impressed.”

Clind smiled at Garfiel’s reply as if he knew the late Wilov himself. —That smile, so very slight.

Clind: “A fresh soul, with a promising future, like a growing young tree, is truly magnificent. Coveted.”

Garfiel: “…That, is a compliment I’m not that happy ‘bout.”

Whether it was Clind’s way of encouragement or pure praise, feeling uncomfortable about such an evaluation was all but inevitable.

While Garfiel and Clind were talking, Frederica was also waiting for them at the cave entrance, and clasping the front of the jacket Clind gave her she sighed.

Frederica was told that after her disappearance, there had been an increase in the damage caused by the Lightbugs in Costuul. Emilia, Subaru, and Beatrice had been sent out to prevent the damage.

Everything was a reflection of her own immaturity, which made things worse.

Frederica: “If only I did not say what I said today…”

???: “—And then, I just tried to do the same thing on a different day. I was after ya, ya know.”

Frederica: “—Hic.”

Shuddering, Frederica turned at the sound of the voice, flourishing her prowess.

With an air crack, the other person grabbed Frederica’s arm. The one to do it being a lionman, a barbarous smile worn by his face as he looked down on her—

Frederica: "—Hayden Garo."

Hayden: "I'm glad. Finally, I'm hearing my name come from yer lips."

Hayden spoke much, though his whole body was in tatters, and his high spirits were noticeably diminished. If one were to fight Garfiel and lose, it would only be the natural outcome.

Rather, it would be more crazy to have the guts to get back up and then try to take on Frederica again.

Hayden: "That's the big difference between us and the inferiors, the unbridgeable difference of superiority."

Frederica: "…It is a difference, not superiority. Are you still intending to try?"

Hayden: "Of course, is what I'd like to say, but this is harsh. Your brother's of poor blood, but he's quite skilled."

Still holding onto Frederica's left hand, Hayden shook his head slowly.

If he were to take Frederica away or do anything to harm her, Garfiel and the others would rush to her aid, and he would face certain defeat.

So, this was just Hayden Garo's unwillingness to admit defeat.

Hayden: "Frederica, I'm backing off for today. But ya and I will run into each other again. As long as ya continue to play with the inferiors in that joke of a Royal Selection."

Frederica: "Your right hand man was beaten. Do you intend to do this until one of us perishes?"

Hayden: "Ya don't understand. —Ya don't know how many people out there share my vision."

Bringing his face close to hers, Hayden told Frederica in a throaty, muddled voice. Instantly, Frederica reflexively swept the nails of her ungrasped right hand across Hayden’s face.

She thought he would avoid it. However, Hayden did not evade, and a claw mark was etched above his left eye.

The fragrant rare blood of the lionman stained Frederica’s fingernails.

And—

Hayden: “I’ll keep this scar as a token of my appreciation for yer remembering my name.”

Frederica: “Unfortunately, as soon as I wash the blood off my hands, you will be forgotten as a bad memory. My apologies.”

Hayden: “Haha.”

At Frederica’s best bluster, Hayden laughed a throaty laugh and removed his hand.

With that, the lionman lept dramatically backward and slipped into the forest outside the cave, disappearing both from sight and from her senses.

Frederica: “…”

A man despicable even as she let him free.

For just as he mocked, the unpleasant certainty that she would meet him again struck Frederica harshly in her heart, the source of life that pumped rare blood throughout her body.

12

Clind: “—I will go to Costuul first to report the news. I will also be in charge of the arrangements for the escaped lionman, Hayden Garo. Duty.”

Frederica: “Y-Yes, please. It is that…”

Clind: “Frederica, you are overly concerned. Unfounded fear.”

Frederica: “Huh?”

Clind: “There is no way that the people you care about would not care about you. Often, those people do not even consider their efforts for others to trouble them. Fact.”

Frederica: “…”

Clind: “It is regrettable to have been interrupted. However, it is still possible to find enjoyment. Ingenuity.”

Leaving those irritating words behind, Clind proceeded to the Industrial City.

If he was correct, the Lightbug cataclysm that Costuul had suffered should have ended when Frederica’s rare blood broke what was binding it.

It was annoying to her that he was so confident that this would actually be the case.

Garfiel: “But when that guy talks like that, it feels like he’s really in the right.”

Frederica: “—! I understand. I do. That man has always been like that. He acts like he knows everything; always effortless, and no matter how hard I try, he always has that self-effacing look on his face. It is so aggravating!”

Garfiel: “I, I didn’t say anythin’ like that…”

Garfiel held Frederica’s shoulders as she leaned forward.

Unconsciously, Frederica thought her brother to be a Clind hater as well, but seeing his reaction, she blushed and apologized, saying “I-I am sorry.”.

Anyway, Clind had left, and Frederica and Garfiel were once again alone together. —Although Frederica’s clothes had been torn off, and she was hiding her exposed skin under Clind’s jacket, with Garfiel’s upper body was also naked due to his beastification, him being in a horrific state due to the blood that had not been fully wiped away.

It was hard to believe that it had only been a few hours since they left the mansion for their date.

Frederica: “You know what?”

Garfiel: “What is it?”

She did not want the silence to continue, but as soon as she tried to string a conversation, her speech was overtaken.

Frederica and Garfiel’s eyes widened; they looked at each other for a while, then smiled softly.

It was a ridiculously difficult situation, and the whole thing was not fully resolved.

Frederica: “I am sure you and I are safe for now, Garf.”

Garfiel: “‘N the people in the city are safe, I think. I ignored ‘em, but the Captain ‘n the others were there too.”

Frederica: “That is right… Garf, perhaps you were a little bit dressed up when we left the mansion?”

Garfiel: “Gah!”

Garfiel’s cheeks hardened and he grunted at Frederica’s question as she tilted her head.

Garfiel turned his head in a motion that seemed like it would make a sound, and his reaction said it hit the mark.

Frederica: “I am glad you were well-prepared to go out with me.”

Garfiel: “S-So annoyin’. I had no choice but to do it ‘cause Ram told me to! Even though you’re the one who went to the trouble of gettin’ all dressed up, isn’t that pipsqueak maid gonna complain ‘bout it?”

Frederica: “Do not worry; Petra would not scold me. I am sure it will be you, Garf, who she will be angry with instead of me."

Garfiel: "Why's that?!"

Without overthinking, the siblings continued their conversation just like they always did.

The date to close the gap of more than ten years did not go as planned, and many people got involved, and things got very serious.

However—

Garfiel: "Well, it's that y'know, Sis."

Frederica: "I do not understand what you mean by "that". Tell me what "that" is."

Garfiel: "I got beaten up by the Captain 'n came out to help Emilia-sama with the Royal Selection. But now I see that there're also bastards like that bearded freak out there."

Frederica: "…Garf."

Venturing outside of the Sanctuary and, for the first time, having encountered someone with values completely different from his own, despite their common circumstances, Garfiel's words weighed heavily on Frederica.

However, Frederica's momentary apprehension was dispelled by Garfiel's continuing smile.

Garfiel: "My amazin' self can feel the meanin' of comin' out of the Sanctuary. I'm doin' this so that these misguided bastards don't get in the way of Emilia-sama 'n the Captain's plans!"

Frederica: "—. Hehe."

Garfiel: "Huh?"

To Garfiel who clenched his fists and gave such a simplistic answer, Frederica laughed, half in bemusement and the other half in endearment.

Garfiel raised his brow at his sister’s smile and snorted with a curious look on his face.

—As if that awkwardness was never even there, Frederica and Garfiel enjoyed their date side by side.

In the distance, they could see the Industrial City, where people were calling out to each other and cleaning up the situation that had been brought under control. In the midst of it all, Emilia, who had noticed the two of them, waved her hand in a wide gesture.

Looking at Subaru with Beatrice on his shoulders and Clind, having arrived earlier, Frederica and Garfiel also looked at each other and waved back, big and wide, the siblings getting along well with each other.

END

Golden Siblings Extra (Edited Machine Translation)

1

Subaru: “I know the other day was a disaster, but today is the day to reaffirm the bond between you two! Just like me and Beako!”

Beatrice: “Th-Th-Th, there’s no need to make a big deal about reaffirming your bonds, I suppose. You can make an ordinary outing feel rainbow-colored, in fact.”

Subaru: “Ha ha ha, you cutie. Are you always in a rainbow mood with me? It was just raining, wasn’t it!”

With encouragement from Subaru and Beatrice, who were aware of the whole story, it was decided that Garfiel and Frederica would have a second “date”—the first one had been spectacularly interrupted, so it had to be redone.

Nevertheless, the destination was the same as before, the Industrial City of Costuul, and the purpose was—

Garfiel: “You’re talkin’ like this is somethin’ special… it’s just a shoppin’ trip.”

Frederica: “Oh my. Even if it is just a shopping trip, it can be enjoyed if one has the right mindset. That is exactly what Beatrice-sama said.”

Frederica walked next to him in an elegant manner while she spoke.

Unlike the other day, Frederica was dressed in her maid uniform, which Garfiel was accustomed to seeing at the mansion. Apparently, compared to the first “date”, she was less enthusiastic.

Garfiel: “Sis, ‘bout yer outfit…”

Frederica: “—Hk! Should I have gotten dressed up after all? But I thought it would be a bother for you if I put all of my effort into it every time…”

Garfiel: “No! Just ‘cause Sis ain’t all dolled up don’t mean I have to say anythin’ ‘bout it… First of all, just ‘cause you’re wearin’ yer usual clothes doesn’t matter; ya still did up yer hair and put on perfume.”

Garfiel’s eyes and nose could clearly discern the difference between how his older sister usually was and now. Frederica raised her eyebrows at his comment and then lowered the corners of her eyes, vaguely pleased.

Somewhat embarrassed by the reaction, Garfiel turned his head away,

Garfiel: “Even if she says it’s all ‘bout mindset, I don’t think you can count on what Beatrice, sama, Bea-ko… is sayin’ when she’s havin’ such a good time with the Captain like that.”

Frederica: “What are you so confused about? Please address her as Beatrice-sama out of respect.”

Garfiel: “I getcha, but…”

Garfiel frowned as the taller Frederica scolded him from above.

As his sister said, Beatrice was apparently older than Garfiel and was also a Great Spirit; Garfiel’s position was that of a military officer in the Emilia Camp. With Subaru being Emilia’s first knight and Beatrice being his contracted Spirit, it made her Garfiel’s superior, a position that felt like it demanded his respect.

Garfiel: “But ain’t she a pipsqueak?”

Frederica: “…Garf, you should not judge someone’s talents by their physical size. Even if she looks little and so adorable that you want to hug her, Beatrice-sama is still a powerful Great Spirit.”

Garfiel: “I don’t think of her as bein’ weak. Just that…”

Frederica: “Just that, what?”

Garfiel: “When she’s with the Captain, it ain’t just how she looks that makes her small.”

Frederica: “Uh…”

Frederica was rendered speechless upon being told that by Garfiel. The fact that Frederica could not say anything back meant she had the same opinion.

The librarian of the “Forbidden Library” of the Mathers’ mansion, the Great Spirit Beatrice, wielded immense power. —Still, Garfiel’s impression of her after living with her for a month was that she wanted to be pampered, either in accordance or beyond the scope of her appearance, but she was also a little girl who was not very good at being pampered at the same time.

Garfiel: “Sis, ya know, you’re pretty much the only one who’s properly respectin’ Beatrice-sama, right?”

Frederica: “No, that is not true! Petra is a very well-mannered girl. She…”

Garfiel: “Next to the Captain, she’s the closest with Beatrice-sama.”

Unfortunately, Frederica’s rebuttal was not convincing enough if she was going to bring up Petra.

Petra was well-behaved for her age, but she was also seen playing with Beatrice in a way that was more appropriate for her age. They looked close in age, so seeing them get along with each other was equal to seeing two young children playing together.

Apart from Subaru and Petra, there was Ram and Roswaal, who both went without saying.

Frederica: “Ah! Otto-sama! There is Otto-sama as well! If it were him, surely he would look at the other person properly and adjust his attitude.”

Garfiel: “Don’t talk ‘bout him in such a sorry way… Ah, no, he probably won’t care ‘bout it.”

Garfiel clicked his fangs at Frederica, whose voice perked up at the thin string of salvation she had found.

The slim, mild-mannered man that came to mind belonged in the same camp, and Garfiel considered him as a complex person.

In the sense that he lacked physical strength but was strong-willed, the impression he gave was not so different as that of Subaru. However, while Garfiel sensed a red heat from Subaru, the heat Otto gave off was blue.

To Garfiel, who had never known the existence of this blue heat until their clash in the Sanctuary, he could not deny the impression that Otto was an unknown entity and someone challenging to deal with.

Because of this, he felt Frederica's statement was a bit crude, but he did not dispute it.

In any case—

Frederica: "…No, I have strayed from the main point. No matter what others do, we treat them with reverence and respect. That is our role."

Garfiel: "Ya just went around in a circle and came back…Aight, I'll be careful."

Frederica: "Yes, that is fine."

Frederica nodded in satisfaction, but then she added, "and also" to the end of the exchange,

Frederica: "Garf, you stopped partway through your earlier conversation. You were saying something about my clothes, were you not?"

Garfiel: "…Ya remembered?"

Frederica: "They are the words of my precious little brother. Please do not underestimate my hearing or my memory."

The older sister, proudly puffing out her chest and looking at him expectantly, urged him to continue the conversation. Garfiel scratched his head roughly, wondering if it was really a big deal.

Garfiel: “It ain’t a big deal. You’re dressed like ya were when I ran into ya, Sis, for the first time in a long time. So, in my mind, ya look like that when I think of you now.”

Frederica: “…”

Garfiel: “It’s just like “Gregorone’s identical mornin’”. It ain’t like ya have to get an answer outta me.”

With such high expectations, his response might have been a disappointment or made her feel as if he had dodged the question. As a rush of embarrassment took hold of Garfiel, his sister placed her hand over her mouth.

Then, Frederica narrowed her emerald-green eyes, the same color as those of her sibling—

Frederica: “If you could do that to Ram as well, it would be a little less heartbreaking…”

Garfiel: “Huh?! Why did Ram’s name come up there!”

And then, feeling unreasonably pitied, Garfiel’s voice cracked in a high pitch.

2

Due to the recent incident, Costuul suffered extensive damage to various parts of the city.

Although Frederica did not have the opportunity to witness it firsthand, Garfiel and Emilia reported that oversized versions of the city’s unique creatures, the “Lightbugs,” had gone on a rampage.

Even after they had been subdued, as someone who had observed the devastation of the city, she was prepared for the suffering and hardship of the people who were forced to rebuild their homes, but —

Garfiel: "—Huh, it hasn't even been a few days, but it's goin' pretty well."

Garfiel said, impressed as he held a hand to his forehead to shield his eyes. Frederica could not put her admiration on display as frankly as her brother, but she shared the same sentiment.

When Frederica and Garfiel arrived at the city, they were met with the city's main gate—which had been half-destroyed the other day but had been repaired since then and was no longer in its previously saddening state.

Naturally, during the reconstruction process, the restoration of everyday functions was prioritized, and everything else tended to take a backseat. The appearance of the city's main gate was no exception to this.

The fact that its main gate had already been repaired—.

???: "You appear surprised, Miss Frederica, Garfiel-dono."

And then, a voice called out to them as they stopped at the entrance to the city.

Slowly lowering her gaze from the distant view of the city in front of her, she saw a man with a steely expression on his face standing there.

Frederica: "Leno-sama, I did not expect the City Mayor of Costuul to go out of his way to greet us."

Leno: "The other day, your day off was ruined because of a unique feature of this city. It is my duty as the city's representative to apologize and welcome you."

Garfiel: "And that's yer idea of a welcome after all that…?"

Leno's hard-eyed face remained as still as a stone. Upon hearing Garfiel mumble out a comment regarding Leno's attitude, Frederica gave him a quiet "Garf," scolding him.

Before Leno had a chance to become suspicious of the exchange between the siblings,

Frederica: “Thank you so much for your thoughtfulness. Besides, the city is looking splendid…”

Leno: “Thanks to the hard work and encouragement of the populace. In addition, we received support from the Margrave in the form of manpower and supplies. As a city that has been granted the name of “Industrial City”, we can’t afford to fall behind.”

Frederica: “The Master?”

Garfiel: “Roswaal?”

When told of Roswaal’s contributions to the city’s rapid recovery, Frederica and Garfiel had opposite reactions.

Some aspects could not be helped, which could not prevent Garfiel from disliking Roswaal. However, presenting the discord in the camp’s relationships with outsiders was not a good idea, so Frederica would have to warn her brother about it later.

At any rate—

Leno: “Spend some time relaxing. Since that happened, the chances of seeing Lightbugs near the Magicreation Tool factories have decreased drastically. No more irregularities like the other day—”

Frederica: “—? Leno-sama?”

As Leno attempted to fulfill his duty as City Mayor, faltering in his speech while informing them of the city’s safety, Frederica frowned.

Then, beside her, Garfiel appeared startled,

Garfiel: “S-Sis! Your fat leg…That hurts!”

Frederica: “It, it is not fat! It is average, I say, just average! …Oh?”

Slapping Garfiel on the forehead for suddenly mentioning the size of her legs, Frederica then looked down at her own body, and her eyes widened.

A shimmering pale light clung to the skirt of Frederica's maid's uniform. —It was apparent that it was one of the same Lightbugs that had plunged the city into chaos the other day.

Garfiel: "Ya lil'… get away from Sis!"

Frederica: "Hold on, Garf! If you hit me with that amount of force, you will create a new problem with my legs! Also…"

Garfiel: "What?"

Frederica: "These little ones do not have any ill intentions. They are just being playful."

Frederica calmed the panicked Garfiel and shook her head. Garfiel blinked his eyes, seemingly not understanding the situation, and she couldn't help but smile awkwardly.

This was probably due to the simple fact that the Lightbugs were freed from the clutches of the "blood sample collector" the other day. Having been set free by the effects of Frederica's "rare blood", they appeared to remember the blood's owner.

Frederica: "Maybe it is… Ah, that is it."

Without thinking, Frederica reached out her hand, and Lightbugs gathered at her fingertips. Combined with the Lightbugs' characteristics, it reminded her of Emilia when she interacted with her Micro Spirits.

Frederica: "This makes me feel a little bit like a Spiritual Arts User."

Garfiel: "O-Oi, those guys ain't gonna do anythin' bad, are they?"

Frederica: "Yes, do not worry. I have assurances from Clind and the Master."

Garfiel looked rather nervous, but he wrinkled his nose at the mention of the two names.

The hostility toward Roswaal was noted earlier, and the added hostility toward Clind was something that Frederica could understand, so it was not surprising that he would make that face.

Then, Frederica looked at Leno, who had been silent with a complex look on his face,

Frederica: “I apologize for startling you. But as you can see, the Lightbugs have no ill intentions. I am sure they will not cling to anyone other than me.”

Leno: “Surprisingly, that seems to be the case.”

Frederica: “Yes. …Um, are you really surprised?”

Leno: “Yes, I’m feeling quite ashamed, and quite sweaty. Why are you asking?”

Frederica offered a stiff smile at Leno, who said he was sweating, but did not move a single muscle of his face, nor did drop a single sweat. Her reaction was not noted, and Leno put his hand on his chin, his expression unchanged, exhaling as if he were pondering something,

Leno: “The Lightbugs have been successfully rendered harmless and subordinated… According to the craftsmen of the factories, the output of Magicreation Tools that caused the Lightbugs to go out of control was more than four times greater than during normal operation…”

Frederica: “Oh, um, Leno-sama? Is something wrong? Your eyes seem a little…”

Leno: “Miss Frederica.”

Frederica straightened her back with a “Yes” as Leno unexpectedly called out her name after a bout of muttering to himself. He bowed with his hand on his chest in front of Frederica,

Leno: “I informed you that I wanted to make amends for the recent incident as the city’s representative, but would like to rectify my statement. In addition to my apology, I would like to request your cooperation.”

Garfiel: “Oi oi, cooperation, huh? What do ya think my Sis can do? All she does is nothin’ more than a bit of housework at the mansion, nothing speci …Ow!”

Frederica: “Well, if it is okay, I want to hear what you say.”

Frederica nodded to Leno while tugging on the impudent Garfiel’s ear. Leno seemed satisfied with the answer—no, nothing had changed in his expression. He just nodded back.

As it was, he indicated with his hand to the Lightbugs that clung to Frederica’s body,

Leno: “If you are capable of having the Lightbugs heed you, we would like to ask you to lend a hand to the craftsmen in the factories. There is a possibility we could discover additional methods of operation for the Magicreation Tools.”

Frederica: “You mean you want me to command these little ones?”

Leno: “Affirmative.”

Frederica inquired, puzzled, as Leno nodded.

Although the Lightbugs’ intentions could not be ascertained, Frederica would prefer to cooperate if it would lead to the development of Magicreation Tools. Having said that, today Frederica was in the middle of rearranging her “date” with Garfiel, and their contributions to Roswaal would also be significant.

Naturally, there would be pushback from Garfiel—

Garfiel: “Well, why not?”

However, Frederica’s concerns were denied by Garfiel himself.

Frederica’s eyes widened in surprise, and Garfiel scratched his ear with a finger,

Garfiel: “It’s like “Ebion would rather pick ears of wheat than gamble”. Sis, I ain’t so stupid that my amazin’ self doesn’t know what’s important.”

Frederica: “But, Garf…”

Garfiel: “Besides. —It ain’t like this is the last time.”

Shrugging his shoulders, Garfiel clicked his fangs and grinned.

Garfiel: “Ya never know when that runaway bastard’s gonna come after ya again, Sis. So lettin’ ya go to the city alone ain’t a good idea. I’m sure there’ll be lotsa chances for me to tag along.”

Frederica: “—. That is true. There are plenty of opportunities for dates.”

Frederica smiled softly in agreement with Garfiel’s answer. She then turned to Leno, who had been waiting for an answer, and readily accepted his request.

The blood that coursed through her veins, and the existence of beings such as the Lightbugs and Hayden Garo who were drawn to it. She had a hard time deciding whether these events were good or not, but—

Frederica: “But the blood that flows within me is bound to Garf.”

With a strong awareness of her certain bond with her brother, Frederica, and Garfiel set out together this time with a sense of pride, determined to see the end of their current date, which had undergone yet another interruption.

END

Brotherhood of Pleiades (I) (Translation Pending)

Brotherhood of Pleiades (II) (Translation Pending)

Volume 36

Chapters 29-Interlude

Chapter 29:
Did Not Want to Love

1

—Standing atop a hill, the man gazed out toward the distant horizon.

The sun had already long since set, and the poor village, lacking in light sources, was no match for the dead of night.

All the more so, with many of the male laborers injured and with fewer bonfires than usual, the sight of a man standing in the darkness seemed very strange to the girl's eyes.

Bandits had been raiding villages in the vicinity, and her hometown bore the brunt of the raids, having just suffered major losses such as livestock, food, and the men becoming injured.

But even so, it was a silver lining of a dark cloud that the village had not perished, and the person atop the hill could also be said to be one part of that good fortune.

When the bandits had attacked the village, the men who resisted were killed or wounded, and the women and children were captured one after another.

As the girl was facing the possibility of being sold, or of going through something even worse, appearing there were soldiers who had been dispatched from the Capital, including the man atop the hill.

They surrounded the bandits in the blink of an eye, and annihilated them with little resistance.

Afterward, they were stationed near the village to help protect and rebuild it, responding rapidly, and the village obtained a more sturdy fence than it had before it had fallen victim to the bandits.

If the injuries of the men healed, the village would be secure for the time being.

Like the grown-up women, the young girl was busy bustling about, tending to the wounded, serving food to the soldiers, and taking care of the village's children.

On her way home, after she had finished working, she spotted the man atop the hill.

Man: “□□□”

The sight of the man, silent, staring into the darkness of night, could be described as comical.

Deeds akin to staring into the darkness, where there was likely nothing to be seen, were the height of futility. The value of acts that did not lead to results was not recognized; such was the harsh way of the Empire.

However, the man did not look comical to the eyes of the young girl.

The man looked into the distance with undivided attention, as if he were trying to ascertain something that the others could not see.

And, what happened next was because she was irresistibly curious about what exactly he was trying to see.

Girl: “Would it not be more comforting to count the stars in the sky than to look out into the darkness?”

The next thing she knew, she called out to the man's back.

The man turned around with a slight surprise in his eyes, which made her somewhat proud.

—This encounter between a girl and a king would become a fairy tale that would go on to be recounted for a very, very long time.

—That reunion was something that could not have been foreseen.

Perhaps it ought to be called a cruel twist of fate, or a strange stroke of chance.

In the midst of the unprecedented peril that had befallen the Vollachian Empire, the full face of the Great Disaster had become known by almost everyone simultaneously.

The march of the undead, risen from the grave, had plunged all the living into the midst of mayhem.

However, there were those who experienced that inevitable plunge into mayhem and managed to crawl out of it.

Regardless of the physical degree of strength, they could rise as beings of immense mental and spiritual strength—In the eyes of mediocre and ordinary people, they were perceived as heroes and exceptional beings. Often, such formidable individuals were also physically strong, but their actions significantly influenced the fate of the Imperial Capital either way.

The horrid surprise attack on the living, the strike of the Great Disaster, had resulted in casualties below what was initially expected.

But, that did not mean it was the best outcome, even if it signified the valiant efforts of the living.

That was because, at the outset of the initial mayhem, individuals who should have rightfully been counted among the exceptionals were engulfed by the initial ambush much quicker than they could rise above it.

???: "—Ngh."

A faint breath escaped from the lips, and consciousness gently drifted towards awakening.

The eyelids, framed by long lashes, quivered, like the sun that fears the dawn, the eyes slowly began to reflect the world; once, twice, the blue eyes blinked—in an instant, the ephemeral dream burst, and consciousness firmly settled into reality.

???: “—Hk”

Hastily sitting up on the spot, the sight that was reflected in those eyes was an unfamiliar place.

The room had a high ceiling, and both the materials of the walls and floors, along with the craftsmanship, were top-notch. Fine furnishings adorned the luxurious room, giving it an air of nobility at a glance.

The fact that they were lying on a soft bed in this spacious room only added to their realization, and the realization itself was peculiar.

It was a fact that, when compared with the memories that immediately preceded it, this was extremely unnatural.

???: “I, should have been participating in the…”

Battle for the Imperial Capital; they reflected upon themselves that way.

Instantly, they recalled a world where both heaven and earth were painted with crimson, along with the memory of working hard together with their miraculously reunited daughter to try and comfort a weeping child.

Quite literally, it was a situation in which their hands were burning, but the attempt itself should have been successful.

However, they had found themself in such a place. It was far too incomprehensible—

???: “—My kimono…”

After thinking that far, they belatedly noticed the unfamiliar sensation of the touch of their own hand resting on their chest.

Looking down at their own body in the bed, the attire adorning their limbs was not their familiar kimono, but a blue dress made with fabric of the highest quality, which also exuded an air of luxury.

Their tied up hair was now undone, and it seemed that both their hair ornaments and earrings had been removed.

All of those items were irreplaceable to themself, and were things that they would have never parted ways with, even while unconscious—

???: “—Hast thou awoken, O Star of Mine?”

Just as they were about to leave the bed in search of their lost ornaments, they heard that voice.

???: “—Ah.”

The voice, which unexpectedly struck their eardrums, stole every bit of their brain’s activity without exaggeration.

The voice was uttered from the entrance of the room, which was adorned with elegant and dazzling furnishings that were captivating enough to seize one’s gaze. However, none of that entered their vision whatsoever.

As if their ears had been ensnared, as if their heart had been ensnared, their consciousness was drawn in that direction.

For them—For Yorna Mishigure, that was unavoidable.

Yorna: “□□□”

With eyes wide-open, Yorna, still on the bed, was fixated on the figure standing at the entrance.

There stood a petite figure. They were significantly shorter than Yorna, who was already tall for a woman, and their slender frame gave the impression of a child. However, he was a handsome man with sharp facial features.

His hair, a shade of green that neared black, reached down to his shoulders, and the unhealthy deep shades around his eyes that suggested displeasure seemed to vividly reflect his unfriendly personality.

However, Yorna knew that in reality, it was just that people feared him, and he did not try to keep people at a distance. —In fact, he had not tried to distance himself from her.

Even when facing his final moments, he had sincerely refused to distance himself.

So, right now, Yorna knew that was why she was here.

Because she knew—

Yorna: "…Your Excellency, is it?"

Man: "A strange manner of speaking. But I shall allow it. All that is concerned with thy soul, I shall allow."

Harboring a thought utterly unbelievable, Yorna posed a question, and that man of small build answered so.

Terribly blunt, cold, and pregnant with melancholic weight, for such a short declaration, that voice was packed with so much emotion that it seemed like it would burst apart.

That was the excess of obsession present within himself, and the source of that obsession was love.

The man before her eyes, was in love with Yorna Mishigure.

That was not understood because he possessed a special power as a result of being "loved" by Yorna, but rather, it was a powerful emotion so abundantly clear that it would be immediately obvious to anyone else if they were present in the room.

But then again, it was absolutely impossible for any other person to be present here.

After all, this was—

Man: "A tryst after a period of near three hundred years. None shall pose a hindrance to mineself and thee.”

Yorna: “□□□”

Man: “Show me thy face. Even if thy form is altered, I wish to behold a glimpse of thee from close by.”

As the man slowly approached her as he spoke those words, Yorna’s heart trembled.

Just what sort of emotion that was the result of, she herself could not clearly tell. Of course, there was joy in this impossible reunion, and it made her feel the urge to jump into his chest.

However, at the same time, there were three hundred years worth of reasons why she should not do such a thing. The most recent decades, for the moment, were the biggest reason why Yorna did not act so impulsively.

Hence, Yorna harbored conflicting emotions concerning the man approaching her, and her lips quivered—

Yorna: “—Your Excellency Eugard Vollachia.”

At her call, the man halted his step, and Yorna tightly shut her lips.

Since he halted his step upon being called so, then she had not mistaken him. There was no way that she could mistake him in the first place. Even if anyone else were to mistake him for another person, only for Yorna was it impossible to ever mistake him.

Only for Yorna—No, only for this soul that started out as a girl named Iris, was it utterly impossible to mistake the one known as the King of Thorns, Eugard.

—Iris and the King of Thorns.

It was a fairy tale recited in this world since long ago, and simultaneously it was an old story of historical fact.

A story known for the meeting and separation of the girl known as Iris and the Vollachian Emperor known as the King of Thorns, as well as the tragic conclusion depicted therein.

Iris's soul did not ascend to heaven, and instead it was fettered to the vast lands of the Empire, resulting in the existence of Yorna Mishigure after reincarnating many times. And, the one who fettered Iris's soul to the vast lands of the Empire, was none other than the King of Thorns, Eugard Vollachia.

In other words, this was an unwritten epilogue to the story of "Iris and the King of Thorns"—

Yorna: "That, could never be such a beautiful tale."

Slowly shaking her head, Yorna suppressed the urges she felt in her heart.

A reunion with Eugard after an undesired parting, one could say that such a thing had been Yorna's dearest wish. In that sense, one could also probably say that this was the very moment that her dearest wish was granted.

However, that would be incorrect. The reunion Yorna had envisioned did not take this form.

Yorna: "I did not wish to see you with such a face and eyes, Your Excellency."

As it seemed the malicious nature of fate was ridiculing her, Yorna looked to Eugard while bearing a sorrowful ire.

Having halted his step, Yorna's beloved Emperor received her gaze—He, with pallid skin and golden irises, had been completely altered from the form which Yorna knew.

She did not know what had exactly happened to him.

But, she was confident that Eugard's form was unusual, and that it would definitely not bestow any positive influence upon her or her beloved children.

With a completely altered form, Eugard had achieved an impossible resurrection—If by some chance this unfamiliar place she had awoken in was a room of the Crystal Palace, the worst possibility passed through her mind.

The possibility that some sort of absurd situation had occurred, and the state of the Empire had changed.

Yorna: “Your Excellency, my lord, just what in the world has happened for you to…?”

There were as many stories to be exchanged as there were tears to be shed.

Yet, Yorna tried to shake those feelings off, attempting to ask what needed to be asked.

However—

Eugard: “—O Star of Mine.”

Yorna’s intended question was silenced by Eugard’s simple gesture of raising a finger.

It was not the gesture itself that sealed Yorna’s lips. Along with it came a sharp pain that constricted her heart, compelling her silence.

Yorna: “Kah, ugh…”

The sharp pain pierced her heart, and instead of a question, a moan spilled from Yorna’s throat.

Yorna reflexively clutched at her chest, and a glance revealed a design on her dress that had not been there before—Thorns of ashen hue had been added.

These thorns spiraled around the center of her chest, slipping through her pale skin and reaching inward.

They thrust their spikes into Yorna’s heart, causing a tremendous pain that overwhelmed her entire body. Trying to touch them was futile; they would slip through Yorna’s fingers, remaining intangible.

As her thoughts were clouded with pain, what flashed through Yorna's mind was Eugard's alias—Successive Vollachian Emperors were called by various names based on their governing style and the conquests they achieved, but the title signifying Eugard was the "Emperor of the Briar".

Quite literally, Eugard had the power to bind and subjugate others with the pain of thorns.

After all, Eugard subjugated his Imperial subjects with untouchable thorns he had planted, and he was the Great Emperor who used pain and fear to expand the Empire's territories into what they currently were.

Tormented by unbearable pain, Yorna's throat quivered as she gasped for breath.

And then she remembered. —In the midst of that battle concerning the Imperial Capital, after she and Priscilla had subdued the crying and raging Arakiya, just what kind of defeat had she suffered?

It was nothing at all.

Enthralled by the sudden appearance of Eugard, Yorna was unable to avoid the binding of the thorns. And then, holding both the bound Yorna and the unconscious Arakiya, Priscilla found herself facing off against Eugard, and behind him, many beings with golden eyes—

Yorna: "—Prisca, is she safe?"

This question was posed amidst sharp, intense pain.

The fact that her lips, which previously only let out moans enduring the pain, could form a coherent question was purely because her feelings surpassed her suffering.

In truth, the pain she felt had not wavered in the slightest.

Eugard did not loosen the binding of thorns. Whether the victim was Yorna or anyone else, it mattered not. To begin with, Eugard's actions were not aimed at venting anger or chastisement.

For Eugard, planting thorns and binding others were acts as natural as breathing.

Just as people walk on two feet, Eugard bound others with thorns.

The cries and the blood that flowed from those pierced deeply by these spikes were nothing more than means for him to interact with others.

Therefore, being with him meant being together with this pain.

Recalling this through personal experience, a faint smile played on Yorna's lips as she posed her question.

Yorna: "The two who were with me at that place, are they safe?"

Eugard: "If thou were with them, they did not catch mine eye. What falls within mine sight, O Star of Mine, is naught but thee."

Yorna: "Is that so…"

Eugard's response to her repeated inquiry was not what she had desired.

But, hearing the tone of Yorna's voice worsen by this, Eugard narrowed his eyes, as if contemplating something,

Eugard: "…However, the Witch hath brought some living beings into the castle. Perhaps those of whom thou spoke are amongst them."

At Eugard's addition, Yorna drew a sharp breath.

Distinct from the indigo eyes in her memories, Eugard had a golden radiance housed within his black eyeballs, but the gentle gaze he gave Yorna and his tactless consideration seemed unchanged from his original self.

Feeling a pain, one separate from the thorns, squeezing her heart,

Yorna: "If that is the case, Your Excellency, I have a request."

Eugard: “A request?”

Yorna: “—. That, a Witch was it? The ones whom the Witch brought in, I wish to ascertain if they are my companions.”

Prisca and Arakiya, she wanted to ascertain if those two were safe.

For Yorna, who did not fully understand the current situation, the highest priority at the moment was the well-being of those two.

If that were to be granted—

Eugard: “—Wilt thou give up on death, O Star of Mine?”

The words uttered by Eugard, pierced Yorna’s chest once more with a different sort of pain.

Yorna: “□□□”

As Yorna raised her face without releasing any vocalization, Eugard looked down on her.

Hearing Eugard’s words, Yorna was unable to say anything at once. There was no way she could say something like “What nonsense”. That had unmistakably pierced Yorna’s true motives.

Her soul fettered to the vast lands of the Empire, she was resurrected with a new name in a different body each time she died. —Repeating that over and over, Yorna, Iris, harbored a desire.

Eugard Vollachia had seen right through that.

Yorna: “…Blood is something that cannot be disputed.”

And that very same thing, had also been seen through by Vincent Vollachia.

For that reason Yorna had chosen to join forces with Vincent, and to throw herself into the battle to recover the Imperial Capital from traitors. Of course, the collapse of the Demon City played an important role, but Yorna thought it dishonest of herself when she was lost on where her intent truly lay.

That was why Yorna nodded at Eugard's question.

Yorna: "If it saves the lives of those children, then my death is but a trifling matter."

Eugard: "That shall do fine. I shall grant thy request, O Star of Mine."

As Yorna smiled through the pain, Eugard nodded with no change in his expression.

Then, he resumed his halted step, came right before Yorna's eyes, and gently touched Yorna's cheek with his outstretched hand.

Contrary to that affectionate hand motion, his fingers were cold, and in proportion to the distance he had closed, the spikes of the thorns pierced her more deeply.

Eugard: "Wait for a brief moment."

In both heart and body, Yorna felt a piercing pain; letting go of her, Eugard left those words behind as he turned his back to her.

As always, he was quick to decide on his actions.

While bearing such deep emotions, Yorna issued a question to the back heading for the door of the room.

Yorna: "What happened to the kimono I was originally wearing, as well as my hair and ear ornaments?"

Eugard: "They were not to mine liking. But, they were articles which hadst adorned thee. I have set them aside."

Speaking thus, Eugard gestured to a shelf beside the bed, and concluded his reply to Yorna without wasting any more words.

Proceeding to exit the room, that candidness of Eugard was undoubtedly that of the man which Yorna knew. During his lifetime, he always lived fast and recklessly, as if he was always pressed for time.

Wanting to tell him that there was no need to rush, Iris once lined up next to him—.

Yorna: “…Just like a helpless little girl.”

Loosely shaking her head, Yorna slipped out from the bed, and reached for the shelf.

Opening the drawer, Yorna’s kimono and obi were carefully folded, and there was also a pouch that contained her hair ornaments and earrings, making her let out a sigh of relief.

Perhaps because that sense of relief was too great—

Yorna: “—ah.”

An unusually feeble sound leaked from her throat, and at the same time a heat ran through her cheeks.

Yorna: “Kuh.”

Her body bending forward, Yorna tightly clenched her teeth and choked back a sob.

She could not allow the likes of tears to flow. That was a curse that would revert the firmly constructed Flamboyant, the Mistress of the Demon City known as Yorna Mishigure, into the mere village girl, Iris.

To return to being Iris would mean to narrow her focus down to only just one person whom she loved.

In these three hundred years up until now, she had been someone’s child, someone’s parent, someone’s wife; to return to being Iris would mean to pretend that all of those days gone by had never even happened.

Yorna: “Why, Your Excellency… Why now?”

Prisca, the residents of the Demon City, many of the people living in this Empire; she wanted to remain as herself, who loved them.

The pain of the thorns asserting themselves through spikes within her heart was trying to make her forget all of that.

That nostalgic sweet pain was enough to drive her mad, and frighteningly, Yorna could not resist it.

She could not resist it.

Chapter 30:
Bad News

1

—The Fortified City of Garkla was a great city listed among the top five of the Vollachian Empire.

The neighboring countries that were the Kingdom of Lugunica and the Kararagi City-States, Garkla essentially resided alongside the national border of these two countries; with a large mountain at its back, and numerous robust forts lining the insides of its defensive walls, the city had become an important location of mighty defenses.

However, the legend of the city extolled for such sturdiness came crumbling down by hand of the Witch Cult's Sin Archbishop of Greed, who had assailed Garkla by his lonesome over a decade prior.

The damage to the Fortified City included the death of several thousands in the standing army, the death of the one who was considered to be the strongest warrior in the Vollachian Empire, Kurgan, the Eight-Arms, and finally, the annihilation of several forts, leaving it as one of the worst losses in the history of the Empire.

Since then, a deep scar had been carved into the Fortified City; coming to the present day, the restoration of the city and recovery of its functions had not been complete, and the international tension between countries remained high—.

???: "And, that was the Kingdom's understanding of the Fortified City's state of affaaairs~."

In the deepest part of the city, a large fortress had been carved out in the mountainside of the adjacent Mount Gildray. Roswaal stood by the window of the conference room, smiling as he looked over the cityscape.

The city had plenty of shelters that were amply stocked and sufficiently spacious, which now accommodated the soldiers and refugees who had barely escaped the Imperial Capital with their lives, finally allowing them to welcome the sensation of relief.

Below, several forts erected during this lifetime were used to realize that scene, but not even a single one of those buildings were under construction.

Roswaal: “This is quite different from what I had heard… Even within the Empire, the only rumor about the Fortified City was that it was in the miiiddle~ of reconstruction.”

Let alone citizens of other countries, the true state of affairs in the Fortified City was not even well known to Imperial citizens.

If any country had taken action on the information that the Fortified City was incomplete, it would have been greeted by the perfect structure imposed by the Empire.

As expected, the Empire utilized its own scandal for the sake of war; he was more impressed than he was initially surprised.

And, thereupon—

???: “If even the famous first-ranked Magician of the Kingdom was not aware, then it seems that our information control has functioned quite well.”

Roswaal: “You wouldn’t leave such visible and audible weaknesses lying around, would you? Goooodness~, I taaake~ my hat off to the Empire’s meticulousness.”

With this tone of admiration, Roswaal turned around as he shrugged his shoulders. In front of him, standing there was a gray-haired old man—The Imperial Prime Minister, Berstetz Fondalfon.

During the attack on the coupled dragon carriages, he was a person who had assisted in breaking the deadlock of that strenuous fight.

At one point, he was ejected from the coupled dragon carriages and his survival had been in danger, but just by a hair’s breadth, he was rescued by Frederica who had been chasing the dragon carriage, allowing them to rejoin forces in the Fortified City.

Nevertheless, under those circumstances, it was not an unscathed return.

Roswaal: “How are you feeling? The degree of your buuurns~ were quite extensive.”

Berstetz: “Much gratitude for your concern. Fortunately, thanks to the power of that healer girl, I have escaped death. My arms and legs are just a little impaired, but… I suppose this is already too much good fortune for myself.”

Roswaal: “—. I see.”

As Berstetz said this, he struck his cane using one of his hands, limping along with his right leg.

No matter how great the effectiveness of healing magic, it would take a miracle to create results far beyond the upper limits of an individual’s resilience.

Unfortunately, Berstetz’s miracle seemed to have ended when he narrowly escaped death. But then again, the old man appeared to consider even this event to be far too miraculous.

In any case—

???: “It is fortuitous that we were able to enter the Fortified City with minimal human casualties and without losing any significant war potential. It is regrettable that the Prime Minister’s leg is impaired, but we couldn’t have hoped for a better outcome.”

Stating this, having entered the conference room together with Roswaal, was Serena.

She sat at one of the seats of the round table in the middle of the room, and while tracing the scar on her face with her finger, she pulled out the chair beside her for Berstetz.

Towards this unbefitting consideration of hers, Berstetz bowed, and then took his seat.

Berstetz: “The words of High Countess Dracroy are lacking manners, but her gestures are considerate… I am at a loss for how to perceive you.”

Serena: “Don’t think too hard about it. Both are parts of me. If this fortress were to crumble, I’d be running around propping up the withered Prime Minister and expressing my honest opinions regarding the effort without hesitation.”

Berstetz: “I see. This is quite challenging to comprehend.”

That frankness added a layer of complexity to Serena’s charm, but Berstetz’s attitude also gave the impression of having peeled away a veneer.

The attack of the flock of undead flying dragons led by the Poison Princess. In addition, the appearance of the Three-Headed Valgren, whom Halibel, the Admirer, had personally put a halt on, was honestly the worst turn of events.

However, one could say that, including Berstetz’s survival, it all was a miraculous settlement for the battle array.

Nevertheless, there were still some controversial aspects regarding how that miracle had unfolded.

Berstetz: “By the way, are you certain about this? That Her Excellency Lamia can no longer be resurrected?”

Roswaal noticed a strange trace of warmth in Berstetz’s question as he took his place at the round table. However, unlike Serena, he refrained from making tactless inquiries.

Instead, Roswaal just simply stroked his chin,

Roswaal: “It seems that the other party has found a way to breaaak~ the technique that combines the Sacrament of the Immortal King with Restoration Magic. Princess Lamia Godwin has been cut off from her means of resurrection through that method… No, in this case…”

Serena: “Has been saved, perhaps, is a tad bit too arrogant of a way to say it.”

Serena pointed out the part that was hesitated upon without any mercy.

Regarding that point, neither did Roswaal himself have a clear answer. He could not gauge whether or not a life resurrected as an undead would welcome its own existence.

If he was to give his own personal opinion, he would not necessarily condemn the resurrection of life itself as evil. However, the state of being resurrected as an undead—

Berstetz: “—Saved. Or perhaps, “liberated” may be a more appropriate way to put it.”

Serena: “Oh? It’s quite surprising to hear you say that, Prime Minister.”

Raising an eyebrow at Berstetz’s words, Serena murmured inquisitively. With her gaze fixed upon him, Berstetz, with both of his hands on the handle of his staff, let out a deep breath.

Berstetz: “I do not believe that Her Excellency Lamia would have approved of such a state of affairs. Her Excellency must have been aware of her own defeat… That was an unwelcome opportunity.”

Serena: “In that case, you mean to say that she would have preferred to have been vanquished? Considering that, the fact that she attacked us in such numbers still doesn’t quite add up.”

Berstetz: “…Even so, I believe Her Excellency had different intentions.”

Berstetz, with his thread-like eyes cast down, held an unhidden desire in his heavy murmurs.

Roswaal had a sense that he understood Berstetz’s emotions. Unfortunately, Serena, her palms propping up her chin, did not seem to have grasped the same sentiment at all.

In any case, this was a significant part of the discussion.

Roswaal: “The enemy is formidable, and the situation is in turmoil. It’s a precarious situation that requires us all to unite. This isn’t the time for us to have internal coooonflict~. Isn’t that so, Subaru-kun.”

???: “…I know that without you having to point it out.”

With a wry smile, Roswaal called out to the entrance of the conference room.

A black-haired boy, who had just opened the door and peeked his face in, answered with a bitter look on his face.

2

Subaru: “I wasn’t able to talk more because it was an emergency, but I’d like to share the information again. This girl Spica, formerly known as Louis, was originally a Sin Archbishop of the Witch Cult.”

Spica: “Aauu!”

At the very beginning of the discussion in the conference room of the large fortress, Subaru openly revealed the true identity of Spica, who was standing next to him.

The side that was already aware of the situation from the start on the coupled dragon carriages accepted the confession quietly, of course. On the other hand, the reaction from those of the Empire, who did not know about it, was as one would expect.

Dumbfoundedness and astonishment came first, followed by a reaction whose nature would remain the same whether the confession was the truth or a joke—That was to say, it was rage.

Goz: “What, what are you saying! A Sin Archbishop?! Impossible! You say this thoughtless remark knowing that this is the Fortified City?! The city that was once felled by a Sin Archbishop!!”

Indeed, it was Goz Ralfon who yelled even louder than usual.

Goz, who had made great contributions to the defense of the coupled dragon carriages, and had hurriedly joined the meeting after receiving treatment for his wounds, his cry was probably the consensus of those who were hearing the situation for the first time.

However, this was neither a joke nor a game.

Subaru: “I’ve also heard about how that piece of shit Regulus went on a rampage in this town. I don’t know if it’s any consolation, but we took care of that bastard, so forget about him for now.”

Goz: “I care not about that abhorrent villain! What matters are the sins carried by that cursed title of Sin Archbishop! Do you understand?!”

Subaru: “—I know.”

Goz’s voice was so loud that it created an illusion of a wind that made one feel as if they were about to be blown away. But, Subaru did not take a single step back from Goz’s angry bellow and instead answered him head-on.

Even Goz widened his eyes with a “Mph” as he heard the direct response from the child Subaru.

Berstetz: “May I?”

Just when Goz’s momentum had stalled, it was Berstetz who raised his hand instead. As the Imperial Prime Minister looked upon Subaru and Spica beside him with his thread-like eyes,

Berstetz: “The fact that you went through the trouble of confiding this to us is a sign that you consider her presence and skills to be necessary for further discussions. In other words, you believe that she has something to do with liberating Her Excellency Lamia from the yoke of the undead?”

Subaru: “Yeah, that’s right. It’s helpful that you spoke up so quickly. As expected, I’d be in trouble if Berstetz-san died on his own.”

Berstetz had inferred the general situation from the flow of the discussion, and while nodding his head in affirmation, Subaru unintentionally said such a thing.

During the battle of the coupled dragon carriages, Berstetz had faced Lamia alone, and he even risked his life removing her and her additional bodies from the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion. Nonetheless, his actions were completely of his own judgment, and almost cost him his life.

Subaru: “Please, don’t let even the smart people be infected by the Empire’s customs. There’s nothing great about accomplishing something at the cost of your life.”

Berstetz: “It seems there are differing opinions on that, but… at the very least, I do not think there is much to be gained in exchange for my life. I will admit that.”

Berstetz spoke while compromising where he had to, and remaining stubborn where he could not.

Subaru thought in a similar way, so it seemed likely that they would remain on parallel paths when it came to the value of life. But then again, Subaru had no intention of letting them die in the line of duty nobly.

Serena: “So? Since you affirmed the Prime Minister’s question, there’s no doubt that the Sin Archbishop girl is immediately effective against the undead. But, what in the world did she do?”

Subaru: “It’s hard to give a specific explanation about that, but…”

Serena rested her chin in her hands atop the round table and prioritized her curiosity over her hostility toward Spica. She asked the obvious question, and Subaru glanced over at Spica.

Receiving his gaze, the girl blinked her blue eyes, and as her hand was lifted by the one holding it,

Subaru: “With the Authority of Gluttony, Spica can eat the special powers of anyone whose name she knows… is what I think. With that, she can nullify the technique of the unlimitedly reviving zombies.”

Anastasia: “What sorta weightless explanation is that? If ya don’t tell me more clearly, I’ll be left feelin’ uneasy ‘n not the least bit relieved y'know?"

Subaru: "Look, even I'd like to give a more convincing and concrete explanation!"

Anastasia, who was supposed to be his ally, mercilessly shot Subaru in the back after he made such a vague statement.

But naturally, it was logical to shoot, and the contents of the shot were fatally unavoidable. On the other hand, it was also true that Subaru could not explain it in any other way.

Beatrice: "In any case, Subaru's aim was right on target, in fact. With that girl's Authority, that troublesome zombie princess fled, I suppose. Her retreat wasn't a lie or a bluff, in fact."

Julius: "I am in agreement with Beatrice-sama. And, the Pruning Corps who held their ground in order to help buy time for their master's retreat… it is hard to believe that all of their valiant efforts were the product of some compromise."

Anastasia: "The two of ya are givin' emotional answers. But that's just circumstantial evidence… 'n if ya ain't sure of its effectiveness, ya'd know it's too dangerous of a drug to use, right?"

Subaru: "That's… of course, I think I get it."

Even with Beatrice and Julius's support, the validity of Anastasia's points remained unassailable.

The correctness of her argument was made clear by the reaction of the Imperial side, which needed to be persuaded anew. The Empire ought to be protected, but it also must be said that whether burdening themselves with a Sin Archbishop for that purpose was worth the risk involved or not, was a difficult decision to make.

That which the Stargazer Ubilk had spoken of, the two lights to oppose the Great Disaster—the survival of one of them was hopeless, and Spica was the only one who could be relied upon.

Subaru's realization of Spica's potential came after Beatrice and Roswaal's exhaustive investigation concerning the onslaught of zombies, which turned out to be utilizing the Sacrament of the Immortal King and Restoration Magic.

Using the Authority of Gluttony to interfere with the souls of the zombies—As mentioned before, the exact result that would be yielded upon Spica's Authority being exercised, was not known.

But, as for Lamia Godwin, the target of Spica's Authority, her Name was not forgotten by Subaru and his group, nor her half-brother, Abel.

And upon her departure, Lamia showed no signs of having amnesia. Therefore, her Memories had not been eaten either. —So, just what had Spica eaten?

In this current situation, there was no other choice but to put forward all kinds of wild theories such as their fates, causalities, roles, or the abnormal conditions that were cast upon them at the time.

Of course, Anastasia's point that this all was lacking in persuasion was understandable.

Emilia: "But, this girl might be able to stop the other zombees too, right? I think that's reaaally important."

Then, while Subaru struggled with that, Emilia, seated at the round table, raised her eyebrows and spoke up. Anastasia narrowed her pale turquoise eyes at Emilia's remark.

Anastasia: "I ain't sayin' that I don't understand Emilia-san's feelings. I'm also fed up with all this clamorous Great Disaster stuff, 'n I likewise wanna jump on the winnin' strategy. Even so, usin' the power of a Sin Archbishop's just…"

Emilia: "Mm-mm, that's not what I meant. Of course, it's true, but… I want to do something about the fact that people who have died are being turned into zombees."

Subaru: "You want to do something about the zombies?"

Emilia: "I don't know how to put it, but… I reaaally hate that people who are no longer here are being turned into zombees and manipulated like that. Abel for instance, I'm sure he didn't want to meet his sister like that. And, the same goes for Medium-chan."

Emilia's eyes, framed by long lashes, were downcast, and she touched on the absent Medium.

Her absence was in larger part due to her current condition rather than her being excluded from the conference. —The final undead she had encountered aboard the coupled dragon carriages was the cause.

Receiving Spica's Star Eating, Lamia had lost her ability to multiply and was about to be destroyed. Obeying her call, the undead flying dragon along with the undead flying dragon rider who commanded it had recovered her.

It seemed as though that person had had a relationship with the siblings Flop and Medium during their lifetime.

Shocked by the fact that someone close to her had turned into an undead, Medium, now that the crisis was over, was holed up in a room in the fort, and refused to show her face.

It was an event that forced the always bright and positive Medium to become like that.

Subaru, too, felt pain in his heart, but he had not been concerned about her in the same way that Emilia was. That was why, even after all this time, Subaru was surprised by Emilia's comment.

He was so focused on the threat of the zombies that he could not even stop to think about the grief that they were causing.

Otto: "…Emilia-sama may have a slightly different view, but there is no doubt that those zombies are troublesome things. To begin with, the form they have been resurrected in is unnatural. Though to say that they are completely flawless would be far too convenient."

While Subaru was feeling ashamed after hearing Emilia's opinion, it was Otto who interrupted her.

After observing the situation for a while, he looked up at the ceiling, leaning his back against the wall of the fort,

Otto: “The zombies are likely not merely resurrected beings. Until now, a great number of… though one part of that was many of that one woman showing up, ignoring that, we have seen many zombies. I do not believe that all of them had a grudge against His Excellency the Emperor during their lifetimes. Naturally.”

Subaru: “Yeah, naturally indeed.”

Beatrice: “No matter how you look at it, such a thing would naturally be impossible, I suppose.”

At Otto’s interjected doubts and advocacy, a forceful sense of trust compelled Subaru and Beatrice to nod.

No matter how much Abel might have seemed to others to be a callous and cold-blooded Emperor, there was no doubt that he was not only hated, but respected as well.

Subaru had witnessed and heard about this unbelievable fact during his travels throughout the Empire.

In other words—

Otto: “We should assume that the aggressive sentiment toward His Excellency Vincent and the Vollachian Empire was implanted or amplified in the process of being resurrected as zombies.”

Julius: “Brainwashing, is it… I think that is a valid point.”

Beatrice: “…I heard something from the soldiers fighting at the rear, in fact. It seems that there have been cases where when a soldier who was fighting with them died, that same soldier would immediately turn into a zombie and attack them, I suppose.”

Julius: “Those who were fighting as allies until just previously, attack as soon as they turn into zombies, hm? It appears that Otto-dono’s assessment is certain.”

Otto: “—. Indeed.”

Having expressed his opinion regarding the zombies, Otto gave a curt response to Julius's affirmation. Subaru furrowed his brows at that distant response, but Julius and Anastasia did not seem to bother and accepted it as a given.

Anyhow—

Roswaal: "About Otto-kun's opinion, it is something I have discussed with the Prime Minister and Countess Dracroy just before you all arrived. According to that… don't make such an unpleasant face."

Serena: "Postponing the delving into the details of Roswaal's relationship with the Internal Affairs Minister, the Prime Minister also held a similar opinion. Isn't that right?"

With the subject from Roswaal and Serena taking a stab at his interest, Berstetz nodded. He kept his hands resting on his staff, and as he surveyed the participants of the meeting with thread-like eyes that were difficult to read,

Berstetz: "Considering Her Excellency Lamia's character, she would not wish for a second life. Much less, would she ever do something akin to planning to overturn the death of her first life."

Subaru: "So as expected, they were brainwashed into attacking us in such extremely high spirits, right?"

Berstetz: "I suppose we ought to consider it as such… Of course, it is also possible that they were revived without any resistance, and deliberately cut no corners to test whether the current Empire is worth preserving."

Goz: "In that case, the Vollachian Imperial Family…!"

Beatrice: "I'd like you to drop that fervor right now, in fact…"

While prefacing that he would not have made that judgment under normal circumstances, Berstetz was strangely proud that he could not deny the possibility of making strange judgments even if some aspects of normalcy remained.

In any case, it appeared that the consensus was that the zombies' thoughts were not normal.

Subaru: "The zombies who've come back to life will be hostile to us no matter what. In that sense, just like Emilia-tan said, we need to stop the enemy zombie attack as soon as possible. For that purpose, Spica's power is necessary. In practical terms, I don't think this can be conceded."

Otto: "But with that many zombies? You want to take the time to eat them all up one-by-one? If we are speaking in practical terms, I do not think that can be ignored either."

Subaru: "If it's necessary, then I'll do it. Just munching on the yummy bits and discarding the rest, that's not the kind of resolve I grabbed this girl's hand with."

In more than just a figurative sense, Subaru tightly clutched Spica's hand, and declared to Otto.

Receiving Subaru's gaze, Otto turned to look at Spica as if peering into her heart. It was a gaze filled with unrelenting suspicion, and Spica, facing him while clutching Subaru's hand back,

Spica: "Auaaau!"

With such vigor, she growled as if to assert that she had made up her mind to tread this thorny path.

Hearing Spica's response, Otto exhaled through his nose, and,

Otto: "I will say this now, but there is no use in persuading me. After all, I do not have the authoritative power to decide whether to incorporate her into the plan or not."

Subaru: "Even if you don't have an authoritative voice in the meetings, your presence is significant among us. At least, how am I supposed to persuade anyone else if I can't even persuade the people in my own party?"

Otto: "Is that so? If that is the case then I suppose I ought to have been a bit tougher in my assessment."

Although Otto shrugged his shoulders and let out a “good grief,” it seemed that he had no intention of retracting his previous statement.

Perhaps, from his perspective during the battle of the coupled dragon carriages, when Spica used her Star Eating against Lamia, he was probably prepared to draw the same line.

It was just that Subaru did not like leaving this unfinished without ever confirming that.

Anastasia: “Seeeems~ like y’all’ve settled down, but I still ain’t adequately convinced, y’know?”

Subaru: “Ugh… On the contrary, Anastasia-san, what would it take to convince you?”

With the consensus of his companions in place, Anastasia, who had the judgment of a semi-companion, stood in the way.

Within this Empire, she at least was in the same boat as the bitter-faced Subaru, and putting her finger on her lips at his question,

Anastasia: “If I’m bein’ honest, I’d like ya to think ‘bout that on yer own as well, but it’s lots better than just poutin’ ‘n groanin’ without givin’ a response. —First of all, ascertainin’ what that girl is capable of, ‘n if possible verifyin’ the subsequent impact it has.”

Subaru: “What she’s capable of, and the subsequent impact…”

Emilia: “By what she’s capable of, you mean that she can stop the zombees from getting up again, right? But as for what happens afterwards…”

Anastasia: “Both Natsuki-kun ‘n Emilia-san should know just how horrible the Authority of Gluttony is.”

At Anastasia’s soft remark, Subaru held his breath, and Emilia widened her eyes.

That was, though an obvious matter, something that could not be left unmentioned.

The Authority of Gluttony; victims that it had brought about were present throughout the world.

In the conference room alone there was Emilia and Julius, and Rem was also present inside the fort. —Well, in the sense that everybody else also suffered the impacts, everyone could be said to be a victim of Gluttony.

Since they were intentionally making use of that Authority, it was natural to assess the risks.

Beatrice: "…So far, nobody has forgotten about the girl who multiplied herself, I suppose."

Anastasia: "That's right. But, ain't nobody thinks that she didn't eat nothin'. It may not be the Name or Memories, but once whatever she ate accumulates, what'll happen to the girl?"

Subaru: "That's…"

Anastasia: "Like Natuski-kun admirably suspected, what if she ends up goin' back to bein' the girl she once was?"

Anastasia's probing was merciless, and Subaru had no choice but to hold his tongue.

All he could do was pray with a baseless, purely emotional belief. Belief in the girl who had been granted the new name of Spica, and chose a different way of life from Louis Arneb.

Belief, in a way, that this Authority, which could be said to have been with the child since birth, would be guided in a way in which many people would deem it as just.

Julius: "Anastasia-sama, it can be said that there is no way to ascertain that. Of course, I believe we ought not to be lacking in vigilance, but…"

Anastasia: "I can't give ya proof that I ain't schemin' a business plan that I ain't got either. So that, I at least want the certainty of a reward for goin' down a dangerous path."

Julius: “So, I take it as you want the definition of the results from employing Miss Spica’s Authority?”

Julius touched the scar under his left eye, and Anastasia nodded with a quick “Yep.”

Then, as she gazed over both Subaru and Spica,

Anastasia: “There ain’t no merchants who’d go to a negotiation with treasure of unknown value. At least, without knowin’ how it’ll be useful, yer sales pitch’ll be irrelevant.”

Julius: “Without a doubt.”

Since Lamia’s attack had ceased, it was probably safe to assume that she had been crushed.

However, the only other evidence was the oracle of the Stargazer Ubilk, whose existence, words, and conduct were all dubious. Since those concerns had no way of being resolved, Anastasia was in fact more than willing to compromise.

At the very least, if they could not satisfy everyone with just the fact that Spica’s Star Eating was certainly effective on the zombies —.

???: “—Unfortunately, we do not have time to spare for such an inspection.”

The low voice that barged in there rudely stirred the inferior air around Subaru.

Everyone’s gazes were instantly directed to the black-haired lean figure that had appeared in the entrance of the conference room— Though he should have been the leading figure of the conference, Abel had arrived late.

Accompanied by Flop and, for some reason, Jamal, he calmly proceeded without halting his step and imposingly sat on an empty seat at the round table.

And then—

Vincent: “What? Your face is befuddled.”

Subaru: “I was just surprised at how overly imposing you’re acting for being late. We already started talking earlier; what were you doing?”

Vincent: “There was something I urgently needed to verify. That was the largest part of the reason why we hastened towards the Fortified City. —To ascertain the meaning of the words left behind by that enormous fool.”

As Abel responded with no shame, Subaru hesitated to question him further.

That was because Subaru could imagine that the “enormous fool” he spoke of was likely the retainer who had deceived Abel, and then allowed him to live.

But on the other hand, the reason for hastening to this Fortified City caught his attention.

Emilia: “Um, that thing Abel heard, that’s the reason why we rushed over to this town?”

Vincent: “Of course, though it is also a fact that this was the most suitable location to receive refugees.”

Anastasia: “Can ya tell us without usin’ any sluggish bloat? Whatd’ya mean when ya said we ain’t got time earlier?”

Both Emilia and Anastasia directed their questions towards Abel.

Those same questions were harbored by everybody present in the conference room. Receiving those gazes questioning the meaning of his statement, Abel shut a single eye, and tapped the round table with his finger.

A firm sound rang out, and the attention of Subaru and everybody else concentrated on his hand, whether they wanted to or not.

Vincent: “I shall put it plainly. That which I wished to ascertain in this Fortified City, was the unchanging Sanctum… confirmation of the location and status of the Empire's Great Spirit enrolled among the extraordinary Four Greats, the Stone."

Subaru: "Great Spirit among the Four Greats… you mean the Four Great Spirits?"

Vincent: "Indeed."

With the sudden appearance of unexpected information, Subaru blinked his eyes many times.

In regards to the Four Great Spirits, he had heard about them when he first came to this other world, and learned more about their existence when he contracted with Beatrice and became a Spiritual Arts User.

Spirits amongst the most powerful Spirits in this world—Though, the moment he associated with that blundering gray-colored cat who was one of them, he became dubious of their credibility.

Julius: "Then, have you discovered the whereabouts of one of the Four Greats, the one that is in the Empire, the Stone, Muspel!"

Subaru: "I-is that really something so surprising?"

Julius: "Of course. The Slasher of the City-States, the Sacred Beast of the Holy Kingdom, in each nation they are the respective targets of unwavering faith and reverence. The Stone, too, is a being that hides similar power."

Anastasia: "If ya can secure cooperative ties with a Great Spirit of the Four Greats, that'd be a matter of great importance for the state… It'd be a much bigger deal than that darn lie 'bout the Fortified City bein' in the midst of reconstruction."

As Julius and Anastasia informed him of the importance in succession, Subaru could not do anything but dart his eyes around in honest astonishment.

But, since nobody stepped in to correct them, and since Emilia and Beatrice were making proud expressions for some reason, there was no doubt that their perception was correct.

The problem was—

Julius: “If you rushed to the Fortified City to confirm the location and state of that Stone, does that mean the Great Spirit is in this land? Certainly, borrowing that power will be a major backing, but…”

Confronting enemies that arose inexhaustibly, Spica’s Star Eating alone was not enough.

Of course, until Star Eating could be detonated, it was best for them to have as much fighting strength as possible to fend off the zombie onslaught. Or, in the same way that Puck could specialize in area attacks better than the current Emilia, the promising power of the Stone could as well.

Flop: “Regrettably, that’s not how things work. Does everybody remember just before when His Excellency the Emperor-kun said we don’t have time?”

Subaru: “Flop-san?”

With a slow shake of his head, Flop restrained those positive thoughts of Subaru’s.

He, who always maintained a bright positive attitude like Medium, now had a strained expression, and uttered those words in a serious manner.

For some reason, having accompanied Abel, he appeared to be the same as the Emperor. If that was Flop’s expression after learning of the conclusion a little earlier than Subaru and the rest—

Vincent: “You cannot expect the assistance of the Stone. If anything, the existence of the Stone is being put to use by the opponent… by the Great Disaster.”

Subaru: “What, do you mean? The Great Spirit—”

Vincent: “Is in the palm of the enemy’s hand. Likely, in order for the Great Disaster to inexhaustibly give rise to the undead from the grave, it is utilizing that extraordinary amount of mana. Henceforth, they continue to appear in perpetuity.”

Everyone: “□□□”

Vincent: “And—”

Eyes widened at the horrible report, Subaru looked in disbelief at Abel as the latter still proceeded to continue. But, Subaru did not possess the ability to deter his words.

In the midst of the strained air of the conference room, Abel continued without halt.

That was—

Vincent: “I expressed it as “in perpetuity”, but that is not accurate. No matter how much mana is in the Stone’s possession, it will eventually run out. When that happens, the vast lands of the Empire will meet their demise. —After all, the Sanctum protected by the Stone, the power sustaining the vast lands of Vollachia will be forfeit, and there will be no escaping collapse.”

—Announcing the true nature of the Great Disaster destroying the Empire, it truly was bad news.

Chapter 31:
The Stone

1

—The Stone, Muspel.

Enrolled as one of the Four Great Spirits, it was an ancient Great Spirit rooted within the vast lands of the Vollachian Empire.

Unlike the Sacred Beast, Slasher, and Arbitrator of the other countries, it was a being that had not left any voluntary actions or claims in the annals of history. Though it was known to exist in Vollachia, no further information or observations of it had surfaced; one could even say it was the most Spirit-like Spirit.

That was the nature of the Stone, Muspel, considered to be an unchanging Sanctum.

Subaru: "Which is how Beako cutely explained it to me, but isn't this different?"

Since Subaru lacked knowledge of the Four Great Spirits, Beatrice had recounted an anecdote about Muspel to him. As such, Subaru listened to Beatrice's anecdote with great interest, but the contents of the anecdote clashed greatly with the actual situation.

The Great Spirit whose whereabouts and true form were unknown, such was the story of Muspel, but—

Subaru: "You being so confident that the opponent has stolen it is contradictory to you having grasped its location. But actually conversely, Muspel was here in the Fortified City. —Is that wrong?"

Subaru thrust his index finger with a question before Abel's surly face.

Abel's black eyes narrowed at Subaru's questioning, but before he could open his mouth—

???: “Oi, ya got some damn nerve to talk to His Excellency the Emperor like that.”

An unexpectedly harsh tone wedged itself between Subaru and Abel, and a wind blew out of the scene. Immediately after, the tip of Subaru’s pointed finger, the white part of the nail, was suddenly shaved off.

With a whoosh, a drawn blade sliced through the wind and his fingernail, the result of which caused Subaru to scream, “Dowhoa!”.

And then—

???: “You brat! Know your place, your place goddammit!”

Subaru: “That’s what I should be saying! You don’t suddenly cut a kid’s fingernails with a sword!”

Holding his hands over the sudden outburst, Subaru spat at the perpetrator of the heinous act—Jamal.

For some reason, Jamal, who had been allowed to accompany Abel since arriving at Garkla, suddenly cut Subaru’s fingernail using the blade he had pulled out.

Subaru looked at him in disbelief at that overly rash behavior,

Subaru: “I thought you’d gotten a little better, but as expected, I hate you!”

Jamal: “Ahh? I don’t want a brat to like me either. …And.”

When he told Katya the news of Todd’s demise, he was naive to think that he could have a rational conversation.

When Subaru protested against Jamal’s unchanged crude attitude, the latter tried to ignore the age difference and get confrontational, but that immature attitude was stopped with the raise of a hand.

It was none other than Abel, seated at the round table, who had ordered him to “Cease”.

Vincent: “Do not start unnecessary squabbles. Be aware that your value, as I recognize it, is that you are a relatively easy pawn to use. Now is not the time to fight with the Kingdom.”

Subaru: “Fight with the Kingdom… ah.”

Subaru furrowed his brow at Abel’s way of saying it, then turned around when he realized what the intent was.

When he did, those on the Kingdom’s side, witnessing the current exchange between Subaru and the others—Understandably, Emilia, Beatrice, and Spica looked at Jamal with reproachful eyes.

If this standoff continued, the girls joining the fight soon would be unavoidable.

However, not understanding the gravity of the situation, Jamal frowned and reluctantly sheathed the brunt of his outburst.

Jamal: “If His Excellency the Emperor says so… Tsk, ya escaped death, brat.”

Subaru: “It’s amazing you still have the guts to say that in this situation… I feel like we were just on the verge of our alliance breaking up and the Empire being destroyed.”

With the Emperor’s stoppage, sighing at the sight of Jamal, who was still unashamed under the gaze of Subaru’s friends, Subaru looked at Abel.

He evaluated Jamal as being easy to use, but it really did not seem like that.

Subaru: “You’re not going to do something like a careless assassination this late in the game, are you?”

Vincent: “In fact, if someone were to surrender with my head in their arms, I suppose it would not be a detriment to them. This attitude is extremely normal for an Imperial Soldier… a little too short-tempered, but not to the extent of Cecilus.”

Subaru: “It’s not fair to use Ceci in your comparison…!”

Subaru was infuriated by Abel, who said such an unfunny joke and gave such an example that could not be confirmed nor denied. Ignoring his reaction, Abel gestured for Jamal to stand down and then looked back at Subaru.

His posture, answering Subaru's pointed finger and question, showed that he was ready to disclose information about the Stone that had almost veered off into a tangent.

Vincent: "The question which you snorted out a moment ago, I shall affirm it. The Stone was indeed within this Fortified City. Measures have been taken to detain it here, turning this city into a Sanctum."

Beatrice: "…Unbelievable, I suppose."

Abel once again tapped his finger on the round table, producing a firm sound as he divulged the truth. And, it was Beatrice who involuntarily voiced a sound at Abel's response.

With her adorable profile, as she tightly pressed her lips together,

Beatrice: "What an outrageous story, in fact. Among the Four Greats, the Stone is the most challenging one to come to a mutual understanding with; that's how it was described by Mother, I suppose."

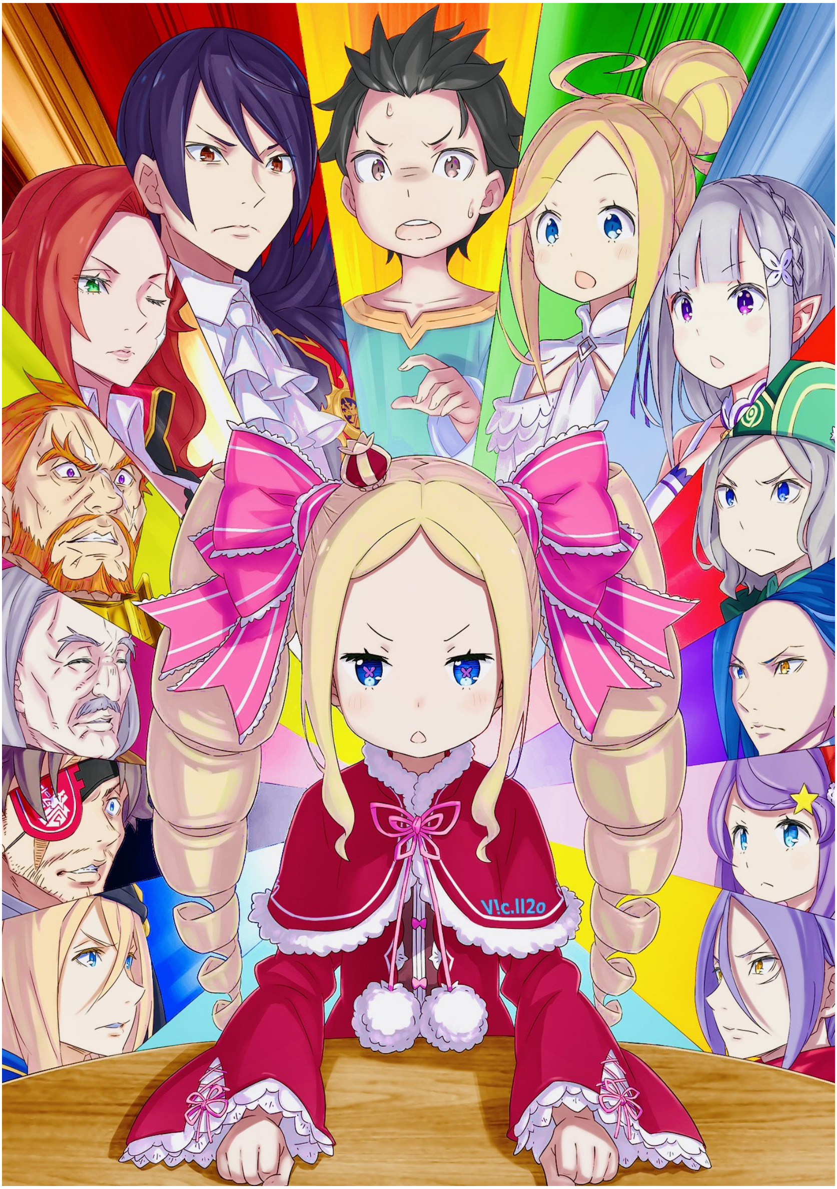
Subaru: "Among the Four Great Spirits, the most challenging…"

Beatrice: "By the way, among the Four Greats, the one which doesn't properly listen the most is the Sacred Beast, and the one which should not be talked to the most is the Slasher. The one that is most futile to talk to is the Arbitrator, in fact."

Subaru: "Aren't those all pretty much the same?! Puck, please come back!"

He could not hide his astonishment at the line up that made him increasingly yearn for Puck.

Compared with the disturbing titles of Slasher and Arbitrator, the titles of Stone and Sacred Beast oddly gave off a softer impression.



V!c.ll2o

Subaru: “If you can’t speak with the Stone, I thought the Sacred Beast at least sounded to be a little better, but…”

Beatrice: “Mother used to call the Sacred Beast a benevolent monster, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Oioi, I’m inclined to see all of the landmarks in this world, but there isn’t a single celebrity who I’d like to meet… Isn’t that actually kinda incredible?”

Having spent over a year in this world, Subaru occasionally heard the names of famous individuals, but most of them held rather disturbing titles, so he was a bit sick and tired of them.

Though, the fact that he was already acquainted with positive celebrities such as the Royal Candidates and the Sword Saint may have played a big part in that.

Nevertheless—

Otto: “This is the first time that I have heard expressions like the Sanctum and the detaining of the Stone. I think those are perhaps phrases unique to Vollachia, but what exactly do they mean?”

Vincent: “To put it plainly, the Stone is a Great Spirit that governs the Earth attribute. Therefore, the land it uses as a resting place naturally receives the protection of its special qualities. In addition to cultivating fertile soil, it also yields a positive impact on the recuperation of those who live on that land.”

Otto: “…I see. It is a much more significant role than I thought.”

Otto, who had interjected with a question, placed his hand over his mouth in wonder regarding Abel’s response.

In essence, within the scope of Muspel’s influence, agriculture flourished, and the recovery of the sick and injured was accelerated. It seemed to have benefits akin to a hot-spring consisting of nothing but good things.

If one could control the position of Muspel as they pleased, that would be—

Anastasia: “I gotta say, that’s a story that’s gotta be hidden much more than the lie that the Fortified City’s in the midst of reconstruction. That one of the pillars supportin’ the strong national power of the Empire is the Stone.”

Julius: “And he has disclosed all of this to us, the people of another country. —I shall take this as a sign of the degree of His Excellency the Emperor Vincent’s resolve.”

Anastasia: “I dunno if they’d feel too threatened if they were overly open about their secrets, but… I kinda understand the sentiment about wantin’ to avoid internal conflicts.”

Anastasia and Julius’s attitudes were natural for representatives of foreign powers.

Of course, as Anastasia had added at the end, it was not as though there was no prospect for the Empire to reveal too much unfavorable information.

Emilia: “If this was something he really wanted to keep hidden, couldn’t Abel have used various different ways of speaking to cover it up? Since he didn’t do that, it makes me think that wasn’t exactly that case.”

Subaru: “It’s as Emilia-tan says. This guy has a nasty personality and functions with twisted wisdom. He could have even deceived people like Roswaal or Anastasia-san if he wanted to. Even if it doesn’t seem like it, this is Abel’s utmost sincerity.”

Vincent: “It is still surprising that the half-elf girl does not exude any sense of insolence. You, such praise is not given lightly in this day and age.”

Even though Subaru had gone out of his way to follow up, Abel gave a reply to which following up would be of no avail, so Subaru pursed his lips.

Bringing a halt to this act of Subaru and the others, Flop clapped his hands to gather everyone's attention. He then nodded with a "It's as Husband-kun and the others say,"

Flop: "His Excellency the Emperor-kun has disclosed the truth. That alone signifies the urgency of the matter, along with the topic that cannot be avoided in order to explain the worst-case scenario."

Roswaal: "Worst-case scenario… You mean, the demise of the vast lands of the Empire that His Excellency the Emperor meeentioned~?"

Flop: "That's right!"

Nodding vigorously, Flop affirmed Roswaal's ascertainment.

The demise of the vast lands of the Empire—Utilizing the Stone, Muspel, that was the worst possible scenario of the Great Disaster assailing this Vollachian Empire.

And, before that scenario was revealed to Subaru and the others, the reason why Abel was accompanied by Flop, who was supposed to be nothing more than just a civilian—

Flop: "It was the fake Emperor-kun who entrusted me with the information about the Sanctum to deliver to His Excellency the Emperor-kun… but his intentions were not to cooperate with the Great Spirit that is the Stone, but to warn of the possibility that the Stone was being utilized in the opponent's plans."

Subaru: "I see. Flop-san, you were able to directly meet Abel's imposter, huh."

Flop: "Yeah. I don't have the qualifications to give an answer or an opinion as to why he behaved that way, but… It's in my nature to accomplish what's entrusted to me."

Flop still looked pale due to all the blood that he had lost. His answer, showing his unchanging strong sense of duty, was a relief to Subaru, who now thought of the fake Emperor.

The fake Emperor who had ousted Abel from the throne, and lost his own life in the latter's place—His true intentions could only be guessed, the same as when he had quarreled with Abel, and an answer would not be heard for the rest of eternity.

Still, the fact that the person he had entrusted with the message was Flop, was one of the best possible moves the fake Emperor had made.

Emilia: “Umm, based on what you’re saying, does the Empire perhaps have a contract with Muspel?”

Vincent: “If the contract you are thinking of is that which binds a Spirit and a Spiritual Arts User together, you would be incorrect. The Stone has no such consciousness for that. There is no way for us to offer it a contract that has our side as superior or equal.”

Subaru: “Vollachia is the one who brings up the advantageous and disadvantageous in contracts with Spirits. Take a look at me and Beako’s clean, righteous, and charming relationship.”

Beatrice: “That’s right, in fact.”

Vincent: “It looks like naught but children playing.”

Holding hands with Beatrice, the two of them made a display as they lightly took steps together, and Abel gave a comment. Ignoring Subaru who puffed his cheeks out together with Beatrice in response, Abel went on with the discussion.

Vincent: “No vows have been made with the Stone. Yet, it continued to reside within the territory of the Empire. That is why we made use of our relationship with it, but… at the same time, it continued to move into the Empire’s bowels, spreading its roots.”

Subaru: “Its roots?”

Vincent: “Think of it as the roots of a tree. A tree with thick, long branches may strengthen the ground it is affixed to, but conversely, if that tree were to be uprooted, what shall become of the land?”

Anastasia: “…It’ll get so porous ‘n fragile that it’ll crumble with just a teensy poke.”

Anastasia summarized Abel's question in a nutshell.

In exchange for continuing to enrich the vast lands of Vollachia, Muspel had tied its fate to the Empire itself.

And then—

Subaru: "Wait, so you when you say that it would be the end of the line for Vollachia if Muspel were to die, you mean it would literally be the end of Vollachia?! Isn't that insanely bad?!"

In other words, it was something akin to revealing the existence of a bomb that could blow the Empire itself to pieces.

It was a state secret that needed to be concealed, something that Vollachia would have to deal with not just for now, but forever on after this. At that fact, Subaru's surprise finally caught up with the intelligent people.

However—

Vincent: "Fool, do not be so panicked."

Subaru: "How can you not be in a panic! Hah! Don't tell me, once this is all over, you intend to silence all of us who know the secret …"

Vincent: "Do not underestimate us in that regard. If such was my intention, do you believe I would have allowed you to harbor such suspicions? Intrigue and conspiracy are not the prerogatives of the Holy Kingdom alone."

Subaru: "Wouldn't it be better if the Empire that boasts about it and the Holy Kingdom that's famous for it were destroyed?"

Due to the magnitude of the matter, topics of national scale were raised with wild abandon, and though the Empire went without saying, the Holy Kingdom did not seem to be anything decent either. Subaru also thought that he had suffered through some pretty bad things, but one should remember that the Kingdom of Lugunica was a much more pleasant place to live.

Subaru: “Well, even though it was a hell on earth, as soon as I met Emilia-tan and the others, there was no more doubt that the Kingdom of Lugunica was the most heavenly place.”

Emilia: “Sorry, I’ve got no idea what you’re talking about.”

Subaru: “That’s fine, that’s fine, I’m just talking to myself. —So, the meaning of the previous topic is for him to discuss.”

Subaru smiled at Emilia as she tilted her head, then returned to trying to catch Abel’s interest regarding the topic at hand. In response to it, Abel quietly closed an eye and crossed his arms,

Vincent: “A ruler who turns a blind eye to a ridiculous act, a blatant one to this extent, such as entrusting their heart to another, must not be in their right mind. Of course, the process of decoupling the roots of the Stone from this country had been moving forward. Your concerns are oblivious to the difficulty of discovering that and claiming lives in accordance with it, which is, simply put, nonsensical. Such is the equivalent of challenging the Dragon with a pen.”

Subaru: “If I went, “Gotcha! Glad to hear that!” then it wouldn’t match up with how we were talking about running out of time earlier. The decoupling process might’ve been moving forward, but it couldn’t be done in time, which caused this situation… Isn’t that right?”

Vincent: “□□□”

Subaru: “Don’t stay silent just because the odds are against you!”

Abel’s silence in reaction to the accurate guess was confirmation that Subaru’s suspicion had hit its mark.

Someday, Vollachia might be able to sever their shared destiny with Muspel. However, the time was not now, and it could not be cited as a clue to break through their plight.

Vincent: “In other words, the fates of the Stone and us citizens of the Empire remain intertwined. As long as those hordes of undead are in pursuit of us and we desperately continue to drive them away, the Stone's mana shall eventually be depleted, and the lands of Vollachia shall be unable to escape from its ruin. I also hear the soldiers who lost their lives in battle would undergo immediate resurrection. In short—"

Roswaal: "We're in a situation where defeating too many of our opponents and casualties on our side are both undesirable, it seeeems~."

Serena: "Seems like it. Their intentions are thrillingly illogical, and there's no end to their cruelty."

On top of being forced to respond to the opponent's initiative, even the terms of their defensive battle had been set as something terribly evil.

Subaru did not understand why Serena seemed to enjoy this, but looking closer into the enemy's relentless tactics, which did not stop at using the undead to force their way through, he could catch glimpses of their proactiveness in bringing the Empire to its definite downfall—

Emilia: "—But, I wonder why Sphinx is doing such a thing."

Subaru: "Eh?"

As Emilia voiced the doubt that surfaced in her mind, Subaru blinked at her words.

The fearsome enemy, who had resurrected many of the dead resting below the Empire's soil, and was currently taking measures to act on its demise, an event regarded as the Great Disaster. The identity and schemes of such a foe—Sphinx, the Witch, had been made quite clear in detail.

However, the Witch's motive that Emilia had expressed her doubt about was—

Subaru: "Of course, isn't that because she wants to destroy the Empire…? It's not like I don't understand how she feels, though."

Otto: "Leaving aside Natsuki-san's true feelings, that is not an adequate answer to Emilia-sama's question. Assuming the identity of the opposition's leader is the Witch that had rampaged through the Kingdom of Lugunica in the past, any grudges they hold should be pointing towards the Kingdom."

Julius: "Nonetheless, the Witch has created an uprising with the dead in the Empire. It is certainly implausible. However, there is a possibility that the Empire was where the conditions could be fulfilled."

Otto: "Conditions?"

Designating Emilia's inquiry as the beginning of their theorization, Otto and Julius made eye contact with each other.

As Otto seeked out the rest of Julius's deduction, the Knight placed his fingers on his narrow chin,

Julius: "An army of zombies with a combination of the Sacrament of the Immortal King and Restoration Magic… For it to come to fruition, the existence of the Four Greats, who all possess an extraordinary amount of mana, was essential. Therefore, the Witch had managed to actualize the spell in the Empire, and—"

There, Julius paused for a brief moment, and then took a sweeping glance at the faces of everyone in the meeting room,

Julius: "Perhaps it may be a plan to invade the Kingdom after tearing down the Empire."

Subaru: "Wha…"

Goz: "—That is ridiculous!!"

Just as Subaru fell speechless upon hearing about the likelihood of such an occurrence that Julius dreaded, Goz exploded with a roar of indignation. Balling his hand into an excessively tight fist the size of a child's head, Goz gnashed his teeth together while retaining the bare minimum of his rationality to not break the round table.

Goz: "If you are correct in your thinking! Are you suggesting that the fact that our dear homeland is on the brink of annihilation is merely a byproduct of this predicament?!”

Anastasia: “To be exact, it’s probably the first stage of the plan to strike the real target. Well, with the whereabouts of the Stone ‘n stockin’ up on the zombies ’n all, that stage has probably been movin’ on from step to step since a really long time ago.”

Goz: “Gh, grrrrruh…!!”

Anastasia probably did not intend it in the first place, but her supplementary explanation was unsuccessful in placating Goz’s anger. Rather, he was growling with frustration, and Jamal seemed to be similarly furious. No one could possibly accept it if they were told the crisis occurring in their homeland was purely incidental.

Subaru thought over their feelings with a dose of sympathy, then noticed the expression of Beatrice, who was beside him.

Subaru: “Beako?”

Beatrice: “—. Julius’s idea is understandable, I suppose. But… Roswaal.”

Roswaal: “Certainly, I recognize your concerns. —Could it be, that Sphinx truly carries human emotions with her, enough for her actions to be considered as vengeance upon the Kingdom? It’s precisely why I can’t help but think that the idea suggested by Knight Julius is only half-correct.”

Subaru: “By half of Julius’s idea, you mean…”

Roswaal: “The conditions were satisfied in the Empire. So, she did what she did. That’s all.”

Roswaal closed one eye, leaving his yellow eye open while Subaru took a sharp intake of breath at his words.

If Julius’s line of thinking was accurate, then the current occurrences in the Empire were not unrelated to the Kingdom, and therefore, the Kingdom could be facing the same crisis very soon.

However, if Beatrice and Roswaal’s theories were correct, then the situation between them and the opposition was beyond salvaging.

And then—

Berstetz: “Either way, the Witch has already taken up arms and drawn the bow against the Empire. Now that even the lives of the Imperial nobility have been disgraced, we are left with no other option but to eradicate our enemy. Is that not the case?”

Serena: “I’m receiving quite the hot-blooded impression from your statement, Prime Minister. As I thought, has the incident regarding Her Excellency Lamia birthed an anger your stomach can’t suppress?”

Berstetz: “—Yes, is there a problem?”

If Serena had meant to poke fun at him, his reaction was not quite what she had been expecting.

Although Berstetz maintained an attitude of superficial calmness, his fury towards the opposition could be clearly felt from his unexpressive, narrow-eyed face.

At his words, Serena traced the scar left behind by a sword wound on her own face,

Serena: “No? The way you are now aligns much more with my taste in men.”

Berstetz: “That is quite a frightening thing to say.”

Serena: “Hahaha! Though, I consider myself good-looking if you pretend my scar doesn’t exist.”

Appraising Berstetz, who had undergone a change of heart as such, Serena let out a guffaw.

Setting aside the exchange between the two, the truth of the matter was exactly as Berstetz had told them. They had no choice but to face the commander of the undead army, Sphinx, in a final showdown.

No matter her objective, they had to.

Subaru: “So, are you alright, Emilia-tan?”

Emilia: “—Mhm. It’s something that we don’t know, even if we try our best to think about it. It would be great if we had an opportunity to hear it directly from Sphinx, but…”

Subaru: “We only ran into her for a moment, but she didn’t seem like someone we could talk to.”

Beatrice: “Betty agrees with Subaru, in fact. Betty also thinks it’s difficult to hold a conversation with that one, I suppose.”

Utilizing her own life in the form of Escape by Death, Sphinx had targeted the coupled dragon carriages.

Within the scarce number of conversations that had been held between him and Sphinx, Subaru had felt as if she was completely devoid of any zeal, just like her tactics, which considered life as a disposable resource. She did not respond to any provocation coming from those whom her emotions remained unmoved against. She was the type of competition that was rough to deal with for Subaru.

Hence, even with Return by Death, she was a tremendously powerful opponent—.

Subaru: “In the meantime, our opponent is steadily increasing the number of her zombies, and she’s also shaving down the power that’s left in the Great Spirit Muspel. We’re just going to be at a disadvantage in a battle of endurance.”

Anastasia: “Though, gatherin’ battle-ready forces from all over the Empire ‘n launchin’ another attack on the Imperial Capital… is no good, either. Large armies clashin’ against each other is a simple war of attrition. The damage is gonna be worse.”

Otto: “A condition that we are bound by, where we cannot afford any casualties from our side and the opposition… Which means, there is practically only one option left for the plan to save the Empire from the impending Great Disaster.”

Subaru, Anastasia, and Otto spoke one after another, and spontaneously, all eyes were on Abel, who was seated at the round table. Every citizen of the Empire was involved in this incident, and as the man among them who stood on the crest, he regarded everyone's gazes as something that was to be expected, and,

Vincent: "—We shall invade the Imperial Capital with a small elite unit, and capture the Witch, who is the mastermind. Thus, the path to the Great Disaster that they had laid out so scrupulously shall be dismantled."

—Marking the start of the final phase of the battle that had begun in the Vollachian Empire, he assuredly announced their strategy to halt the Great Disaster, just like that.

2

With the conclusion of the round table meeting, they reached a stopping point.

In accordance with the policy established, from this point forward, the selection of personnel to dispatch for the blitzkrieg and the plan for the attack on the Imperial Capital would be developed.

However, before that discussion began in earnest—

Berstetz: "—I had not realized that the Stone had been stationed in Garkla."

In the conference room where only the Emperor and the Prime Minister remained, Berstetz was the one to break the ice.

It was a short time where not only the members of the allied Kingdom, but also those on the imperial side, such as Serena and Goz, were not present. Even Jamal, an escort, was kept waiting outside the room, so that it was just the leaders of the Empire in discussion—although if that were true, then there would have been one more person present.

Vincent: "In the end, you also fell completely for Chisha's scheme?"

Berstetz: "It appears so. If all went according to schedule, the Sanctum would have been near the southwestern Cloud Sea City of… Mezoreia around this time. Just what point in time had I been blindsided?”

Vincent: “Your eyes appear closed. Blindsiding you must have been easy.”

Berstetz: “They appear to be closed, but they are not. That is precisely why they are so effective in prevention… is just what a sore loser would say after they have actually been deceived.”

Shaking his head slowly, Berstetz muttered as if lamenting his blunder. However, Vincent did not consider it Berstetz’s fault.

As was often the case, Chisha simply exceeded Vincent and Berstetz’s expectations.

In addition to deceiving both the Emperor and the Prime Minister, Chisha had also made preparations to find out just what traps the forthcoming Great Disaster would set.

Berstetz: “If the Stone has not been used, we could use the Fortified City as a base and strengthen our defenses. If the Stone has been compromised, then—”

Vincent: “In other words, it is being used for the Great Disaster’s plan. It seems that enormous fool had thought of many ways to destroy the Empire and had executed them in his mind. Hence, he was right on target.”

Berstetz: “I did not know what measures to take against someone plotting an usurpation, and I did not expect someone whose goal was to wreak havoc. From now on, I shall strive to be stricter.”

Vincent: “—. Then do that.”

Vincent was slightly taken aback by Berstetz voicing his vision for the future with that “from now on.”

After this case was settled, Berstetz would resign from the Prime Minister’s position, as he thought it was not impossible that he might try to martyr himself for Lamia.

Berstetz: “Since Her Excellency Lamia has refused to do so.”

Finding the question in that momentary void, Berstetz answered it himself.

Hearing this, Vincent said nothing. Only a little snort. In response to Vincent’s reaction, Berstetz continued, “Nevertheless,”

Berstetz: “I was surprised to hear what Your Excellency said about the Stone and the Sanctum. It is hard to say that we have any hope of even separating the Stone from the land.”

Vincent: “As soon as this present matter is settled, we shall get to working on the national policy that we had put on hold. If we cannot produce results by the time the non-aggression pact with the Kingdom expires in two years’ time, there shall be no tomorrow to succeed today.”

Berstetz: “Is that so? Incidentally,”

At that, Berstetz paused a beat and opened his thread-like eyes slightly.

Berstetz: “Though I am sure you are aware, the method employed to detain the Stone is not to be revealed. Not only is it an Imperial secret, but it is also a matter of strong belief among our allies.”

Vincent: “After all, Natsuki Subaru and the half-elf Spiritual Arts User are both utterly opposed to even the appearance of injustice. —It would be troublesome if they knew that we have been using convicts sentenced to death as the Stone’s contractors, disposing of them upon their deaths.”

Berstetz: “Your Excellency.”

Do not speak carelessly; as Berstetz gave him such a warning, Vincent shrugged his shoulders.

During the conference, Emilia had asked him whether the Stone and the Empire had a contractual relationship, and Vincent answered that there was no contractual relationship of the sort she understood.

That was not a lie; it was a simple statement of fact.

The simplest way to detain the Stone was through a contract between the Spirit and a person.

However, the Stone did not have self-consciousness, and had no room or window for negotiation regarding the contract. Therefore, the cost of contracting with the Stone was consistently the burden of the enormous amount of nothingness that flowed into the contractor.

The sensation of sharing one's body around the clock with a preposterously large entity with which mutual understanding was impossible would very easily break the human mind, driving it into a state where it could no longer retain its original form.

In exchange for inescapable dehumanization, the Stone's nature was to abide by the contractor's current location.

Therefore, the Empire kept the Stone and the forcibly contracted death-row convicts in lands where the Sanctum was required, and distributed the benefits of the Sanctum to various regions. As it was a next-to-impossible task to track down the Stone once its location had been lost, the replenishment of the death-row convicts was a matter of utmost importance.

And, before the decisive battle for the Imperial Capital began, Chisha, disguised as the Emperor, moved the Stone to the Fortified City of Garkla in preparation for the Great Disaster.

But, there was no sign of the death-row convict who had contracted with the Stone in the city.

Berstetz: "If it has been moved, it would be impossible to track it down without any leads. If so, the only thing that would be gained by divulging the particulars is the distrust of our allies."

Vincent: "Though, even if I did not deliberately say it out loud, there were some who have likely guessed it."

Recalling the faces at the conference, Vincent closed one eye as a few pertinent individuals came to mind.

Berstetz was correct; they did not want to create internal discord in this situation. Surely the people who had guessed this and did not speak up had the same intention.

In any case, once it had been stolen from the Fortified City, the Stone was no longer a usable pawn, but a pending catastrophe whose whereabouts were no longer known.

If there was no better solution than to subdue the Witch, Sphinx, then even if they deliberately concerned themselves with that existence, there would be no meaning—.

Vincent: “□□□”

Berstetz: “Your Excellency?”

Suspicious of Vincent’s reaction, who had suddenly fallen silent, Berstetz called out to the Emperor.

At that call, Vincent shook his head with a “No”.

For a moment, a certain thought crossed his mind, but it was too slim of a possibility to include in his future plans.

Much less, with the one whose difficulty to handle was second only to the most difficult being in the Empire to rein in—.

Vincent: “—If there was any possibility of grasping the Stone’s whereabouts, it would be with someone akin to a hound with a keen nose for extraordinary prey, but that is too high of a hope.”

3

—At the same time, somewhere in the Imperial Capital of Lupugana.

In the darkness, lying on the damp and hard ground, it remained unmoving.

It bore the weight of wounds. The exhaustion of its mind and body also played a large part. However, the greatest reason as to why it could not move was that a wound had been suffered to a part of itself far more important than the heart—A wound to the soul, was the reason.

That which it had always continued to pray for and believe in since long ago had been denied, and felled to the ground.

From the time it was born until today, even though there was absolutely nothing that it had treasured more, it had been rejected by none other than that very treasured something.

It had lost sight of its reason, its meaning for living.

It had relinquished its own value, reason for being, and the things it could do.

But, just but, while sprawled out on the dampened ground, its chest rose and fell in respiration, and it muttered.

???: “Princess…”

To the person who had denied its meaning, as if clinging, as if praying, in a feeble voice, it muttered.

And, it merely continued to weakly mutter.

Chapter 32:
Selection of Members

—A blitzkrieg operation to prevent the destruction of the Vollachian Empire caused by the Great Disaster.

Now that it was clear that a head-on confrontation with the ever-reviving army of the undead was a risk that would only hasten their demise, a swift-strike settlement was required.

Since they could not afford to pit large armies against each other in a decisive battle between the living and the dead, it was natural that they would choose to send a small number of elite troops for a mission to assault the enemy lines.

If there was a problem, it was going to be about—

Subaru: "—Who will be raiding the enemy's base of operations?"

Arms crossed, Subaru surveyed the scene while sitting on the floor in the middle of the room.

Inside a room in the Fortified City of Garkla's great fortress, a spacious one perfect for a large group of people to assemble, Subaru's allies, excluding those affiliated with the Empire, were gathered together.

Those who had missed the earlier meeting because they had been treating the wounded were present as well—Ram and Garfiel, Petra and Frederica, and not to mention, Rem.

Of course, Anastasia and Julius were also there, as they were not affiliated with the Empire—

Subaru: "I'm glad Halibel-san is also back safe and sound."

Halibel: "Aw, it's kind of ya to worry 'bout me. Well, lil' Ana's real tough on me, so I'm honestly glad you're appreciatin' my efforts like that."

Halibel, with his back against the wall and a kiseru in his mouth, smiled as he replied to Subaru's words of encouragement.

The City-States' strongest wolf person had confronted the black dragon that appeared before the undead attacked during the battle on the coupled dragon carriages—he was credited with the victory of keeping the dragon zombie at bay.

Thanks to him keeping the dragon zombie from getting near the dragon carriages, the damage was kept to a minimum. He was an extraordinary shinobi, as evidenced by the fact that he had single-handedly slain a Dragon.

And at Halibel's comment, however, Anastasia looked dissatisfied by his teasing.

Anastasia: "What're ya on 'bout? If ya put it like that, it makes it sound like I'm a heartless employer. Didn't I tell ya that you'd be paid properly for yer work?"

Halibel: "See, that's what I'm talkin' 'bout. She's become an un-cute child, tryin' to settle everythin' by lookin' at gains 'n losses… Ricardo's permissive parentin' policy made her a wily one, don't'cha think?"

Anastasia: "Haaaliiibellll."

Halibel: "Yeah, yeah, I'll take my loss."

The exchange of Kararagi dialect between the two was settled with a lighthearted call from Anastasia.

Although they had known each other for a long time, the ease with which they communicated was reminiscent of an older man and a little girl who were relatives. Anastasia was petite and had a baby face, but her personality was the opposite of childlike, so it was unusual to get this impression from her.

V!c.ll2o

Regardless of Subaru's impression, Halibel, who had lost in the argument with Anastasia, said, "Well, that's how it is" to get the conversation back on track.

Halibel: "I've found out through fightin' with 'em that the zombies in Vollachia are a lil' different in how they work from the zombies in Kararagi. They're probably a terrible match for me."

Subaru: "The zombies are different between Vollachia and Kararagi? What do you mean? Don't tell me there's another cause for a zombie panic arising at this stage?"

Halibel: "Nah, there's no way. The impression I'm gettin' is… the zombies in the Empire are tougher. I heard that the kid who set this up is causin' mischief to the Empire's Great Spirit, so maybe it's a distance thing."

Subaru: "Distance…"

Halibel revealed his opinions as he bobbed the kiseru up and down between his teeth.

The subtle difference in nuance was not clear to Subaru, who was not familiar with the undead in Kararagi. However, since someone as competent as Halibel had felt it, there must have been a difference.

He did not want to think that zombies were truly being used for separate reasons at the same time, though.

Julius: "I get the impression that this is more a matter of being complete than of distance."

Anastasia: "What'cha mean by that, Julius?"

Julius: "Since Halibel has described them as tough, it must be true that the zombies that have appeared in the Empire are superior in terms of ability. However, the zombies in the City-States have emerged at an earlier period. So, what we can infer from this is…"

Ram: “That Kararagi’s zombies were for practice, and Vollachia’s zombies are for the actual operation. Is that what Knight Julius is trying to say?”

Ram asked this of Julius, who, when questioned by Anastasia, had expanded upon his reasoning while touching the scar under his left eye. He straightened his back at Ram’s words, then tucked his chin in with a, “Yes,”

Julius: “If my current thoughts are correct, that would explain Halibel’s impression. In addition, Halibel, may I ask why you believe that you are not a good match for the zombies of the Empire?”

Halibel: “I didn’t see it myself, but I heard that the number of zombies in the dragon carriage were multiplyin’? That black Dragon did the same thing. Ya see, the sellin’ point of my attacks is the fact that it’s a curse of death that makes it over for ya when it hits, so I ain’t compatible at all with an opponent who don’t end even after they kick the bucket.”

Subaru: “□□□”

Halibel: “Huh? What’s with the silence?”

Subaru: “No, I was just surprised when you casually said your selling point is a killing curse.”

Subaru could not believe his ears when Halibel revealed his hand so easily. However, Halibel seemed to nod his head in agreement with Subaru’s point with a, “Yeah,”

Halibel: “It ain’t like anything will happen even if ya know. ‘N even if ya knew, not many people would get by without takin’ a single hit from me, right?”

Subaru: “Yeaaah, you might seem humble, but you’re not. Same with Reinhard and Ceci, I feel like the strongest people of each country have that in common…”

Subaru was deeply impressed by Halibel’s confident, imposing statement.

Needless to say, Cecilus, the manifestation of approval addiction, and Reinhard, who embodied humility and sincerity as if they were the very clothes he wore, had absolute confidence in their own abilities.

In fact, if someone who was as strong as they were said “I’m nothing special”, it would not be very persuasive. It would be much more impressive if they said they were proud of that fact.

In any case—

Emilia: “I know that Halibel-san isn’t that good at fighting those zombees… but, what should we do about that? Who should be it to storm the Imperial Capital?”

Anastasia: “Tho’ Halibel ain’t talkin’ like the strongest in Kararagi, I can still guarantee his abilities. I’m thinkin’ he should be in the assault team so he won’t get spoiled.”

Halibel: “Well, I ain’t gonna cry ‘n make a fuss sayin’ that I don’t like it tho’, right?”

Halibel gave a wry smile to Anastasia, who was harsh even without any arguing.

In reality, even if his special assassin curse did not work on the zombies, Halibel’s ability to single-handedly confront the black dragon was undeniable. While considering that it was a certainty that he should be a part of the assault team, Subaru wanted to cut to the chase and, with a “May I say something?”, raised his hand.

Then—

Subaru: “First things first, I’m joining the assault team.”

Indeed, before anyone else came forward, Subaru asserted his position.

???: “□□□”

All eyes gathered on Subaru, who had nominated himself, and a momentary pause was created.

Taking advantage of this void, Subaru seized the opportunity to explain why he should be a part of the mission.

Subaru: “First, it should be clear to everyone that Spica’s Authority has the power to nullify their specialty… the resurrection of the zombies. However, currently, it’s necessary for me to accompany her as her guardian so she can use it. If Halibel-san has such a hard time dealing with the resurrecting enemies, then Spica is absolutely essential for the assault.”

During the attack on the coupled dragon carriages, Spica had made a significant contribution to the defeat of the formidable foe, the Poison Princess, Lamia Godwin.

If she could fully wield the Authority of Gluttony, she could cut off the endless Escape by Death of the resurrecting undead. In terms of defeating Sphinx, there seemed to be no better strategy than utilizing Spica.

Subaru: “Both Spica and I have irreplaceable roles… So inevitably, Beako will also have to come with me to the Imperial Capital.”

Beatrice: “That’s what was wished for, in fact. Betty doesn’t want to be separated from Subaru anymore, I suppose.”

Subaru: “I’m sorry, thanks for your help.”

Seating herself comfortably beside Subaru after he had raised his hand, Beatrice firmly grasped his raised hand in hers, signifying her agreement to accompany the assault team.

Feeling reassured by his partner’s response, Subaru glanced at Spica, the crucial part of the operation—and Rem, whom she was holding onto.

Spica, clinging onto Rem’s waist as she hugged her, and Rem, supporting her shoulder, received Subaru’s gaze.

Rem: “…Why are you looking at me with such anxious eyes?”

Subaru: “Well, I’ll be bringing Spica into danger again, and if that makes Rem dislike me, it’ll make my heart shatter…”

Rem: “—. Besides, it’s not like you can’t seek comfort from Emilia-san, right?”

Subaru: “Huh?”

Upon hearing Subaru’s timid response, Rem averted her gaze discontentedly, muttering under her breath.

While Subaru struggled to fully grasp the meaning behind her words, Ram, standing beside her, narrowed her light-crimson eyes and said, “Rem”,

Ram: “What are you going to do? Rip Barusu into pieces?”

Subaru: “Don’t suddenly say something so disturbing, nee–sama!”

Ram: “Just kidding. If you were to tear him to pieces now, he’d just come back to life, wouldn’t he? A Barusu increasing atop corpses… A real nightmare. Disgusting.”

Subaru: “Don’t kill me without permission and then find it disgusting when I’m multiplied!”

At Ram’s Ram-like remarks, Rem smirked as she shook her head. Then, she thanked her sister with a “Thank you very much”,

Rem: “I really appreciate your concern, nee-sama. However, as nee-sama rightly said, no matter what we do now, he will just come back to life, so let’s set that aside for the moment. More importantly…”

Spica: “U?”

Rem: “Spica-chan, do you think you can work hard with that person?”

Rem, with her smirk fading away, looked down at Spica who was clinging to her and asked. Spica widened her blue eyes at the inquiry, quickly adopting a resolute expression.

Being questioned about her role and what she should do, the girl, recognizing her duty, repeatedly nodding her head,

Spica: “Aau!”

And so, she nodded with such vigor.

Taking that as a voiceless affirmation, Rem made a mixed expression of bitterness and desolation. In order to express her true feelings, her voice trembled as she continued.

Rem: “If that’s true, then I also want to come with you… But, if the current me were to follow you, I understand that I’ll only be a burden. But…”

Emilia: “—Then, you don’t need to worry, Rem.”

Rem’s earnest plea was interrupted by a reassuring voice.

Unconsciously, Rem let out an “Eh?”, and her pale blue eyes widened as she was told this by Emilia, who thumped her own chest.

Her beautiful amethyst eyes were filled with determination as she nodded to Rem.

Emilia: “About that child, and the others who are going together with Subaru, I also reaaally understand your worries. So, I’ll protect them so that they’ll be safe no matter what!”

Rem: “Emilia, san…”

Emilia: “Leave it to me. I’m a reaaally strong person.”

Flexing her biceps, Emilia smiled at Rem.

At the words of the overly reliable Emilia, the bewildered Rem became speechless, and her eyes began to wander around.

However—

Otto: “No, no, no! What are you saying, Emilia-sama! Emilia-sama, you cannot go, and there is no way that I could approve of something like that!”

Emilia: “Eh?! Why not?!”

Otto: “What do you mean “why not”, do you need someone to explain it to you?!”

Emilia opened her eyes full of surprise, but it was Otto who was even more surprised at her.

Otto, who had seemed to be constantly frowning since joining forces with the Empire, finally revealed his typical flustered face—that, would be a laughable way of putting it.

In actuality, Otto’s opinion this time was far more appropriate than that of Emilia’s.

Otto: “No matter how much you may want to go, this is a mission to march into the most dangerous part of the Empire, right? I absolutely cannot send Emilia-sama out there.”

Garfiel: “Hol’ up there, Ottobro. If ya wanna talk about dangerous places, why didn’t’cha just say that when we first entered Vollachia?”

Otto: “That may be hard to deny, but this is a matter concerning the magnitude of the danger. Natuski-san is right, the Imperial Capital is the enemy’s core… their stronghold, the protection of a village with no strategic value cannot have a similar sturdiness. Without a doubt, the Imperial Capital is the most dangerous place.”

Garfiel: “Well, I guess ya got a good point.”

After having his legitimate question rebuked by a sound argument, Garfiel retracted his opinion.

Driven by this momentum, Otto turned his gaze towards Subaru and Beatrice,

Otto: “Truthfully speaking, I am also opposed to Natsuki-san and the others going. This is an Imperial problem, so it is absurd to risk our lives for the sake of a foreign country.”

Subaru: “What an honest guy. But, I’ve said it several times…”

Otto: “I understand. You want to say that whether it be the Kingdom or Empire, it matters not where it happens. Since the Witch’s aim reaches Lugunica, that is also my opinion. If she were to appear near my home town, however, then I would much rather that the Empire become a wasteland.”

Subaru: “You’re not hiding your blatantly strong kinship anymore, are you?”

Otto usually had a serious face, but weighing the advantages and disadvantages of getting involved in the Vollachian Empire’s affairs seemed to not balance out in his mind. That was why he was constantly in disagreement.

But, just as Otto had understood, for Subaru, this was not a matter of which land was being affected.

Even Subaru disliked the Vollachian Empire, but there were people that he had grown to love in this Empire which he despised. For their sake, he wanted to do everything he could for them.

And it was for that reason that—

Subaru: “—Not just Spica, but I also need to go to the Imperial Capital.”

Subaru’s rush to volunteer for this was, of course, to ensure that Spica’s Authority was fully realized by traveling with her as her guardian.

However, his biggest reason for going to this largest battlefield, the Imperial Capital, was—as would be expected from that place, to overturn the inevitable Death which someone might face, to paint over the tapestry of fate.

To garner the support of all of the gladiators from the Gladiator Island, Subaru had gone through a lot of trouble.

But, it was well worth it. Were there to be a promised reward, Subaru would not hesitate to take it.

Betty: “Betty also doesn’t want Subaru doing anything dangerous, in fact.”

And there, Beatrice, who had spoken on Subaru’s behalf, towards Otto, who looked at both Subaru and herself, began to express her thoughts.

With that characteristic pattern in Beatrice’s blue eyes, while making contact with Otto’s eyes that looked towards her,

Beatrice: “But, the strength of that girl will be useful in dismantling the Sacrament of the Immortal King, I suppose. And, in the unlikely event that we need to seal Sphinx, Betty’s strength will be needed, in fact.”

Subaru: “Seal, huh?”

Beatrice: “If Spica’s Authority does not work, there will be no choice but to use a method that will seal her moves and stop her rampage, I suppose. If she commits suicide in order to escape, it will be the start of a never-ending chase, in fact. In order to prevent that, it will be time for Betty’s magic to come into play, I suppose.”

With one hand holding onto Subaru’s, Beatrice stuck out her other free hand.

As he looked at the round hands of the young girl, Subaru’s mind was filled with a scene as Beatrice spoke about the “Seal”—the successful capture of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard, at the Pleiades Watchtower.

Roy’s entire body was hardened like wax by Yin Magic, and he was restrained in a state where he could not move or even think.

Subaru: “That’s right, the Witch of Envy was captured under the same seal…”

Betty: “That’s right, in fact. It’s the reliable and proven Witch seal, I suppose. If sealing Sphinx is essential to controlling this situation, sorry about you and Petra, but Betty and Subaru are indispensable, in fact.”

With Beatrice covering for him from a magical standpoint, Subaru sneaked a glance at Otto, as well as at Petra, who was standing with Frederica, opposite to him.

Petra, who had grown more reliable and promising in the time since he last saw her, was understandably unwilling to let Subaru return to the Imperial Capital in his shrunken state.

However, she was smart enough to understand the validity of Beatrice's opinion, that if the undead army was not stopped here, the damage would increase exponentially.

For the sake of that, she sighed reluctantly, and then,

Petra: "Of course, it would turn out like this."

Subaru: "Petra…"

Petra: "Just like Rem-san, I'm not in a position to come along… At least it'll be a huge help that Beatrice-chan will go as a chaperone."

Subaru's heart ached for the overly understanding girl, whose anxiety was caused by none other than himself. Beatrice nodded her head in assurance of Petra's trust.

Beatrice: "How Petra feels is certainly understandable, I suppose. As long as Betty is around, she won't allow harm near Subaru, in fact."

Petra: "Yup, thank you, Beatrice-chan."

Emilia: "That's right. Beatrice being with Subaru makes me happy and relieved. But, I would feel more at ease if the two of them and I were together…"

Otto: "Emilia-sama…"

Emilia: "Errr…"

Following the beautiful friendship between Beatrice and Petra, Emilia tried to stubbornly impose her opinion in a not-at-all-successful way, and was shot down by Otto's steely gaze.

However, as mentioned before, Subaru also believed that Otto's opinion was correct on this matter.

Subaru wanted to grant Emilia whatever she wished if he could, but granting this wish would take Emilia straight into the most dangerous place in the Empire.

On the other hand, Garfiel had a point.

In the first place, there was no doubt that the Empire was dangerous when they had arrived, and even if she were to remain in Garkla, her personal safety would not be guaranteed.

In that sense, the ideal situation would be to keep everyone Subaru knew close to himself—.

Roswaal: "—I am in favor of adding Emilia-sama to the group that is going into the Imperial Caaapital~."

Frederica: "Master?!"

But then, unexpectedly, an opinion arose that was one hundred eighty degrees different from the one that had come before.

Frederica was so startled by that opinion that she could not believe her ears as she raised her voice with a look of disbelief on her face. But, while it was only Frederica who had voiced it first, most of the people present could not hide their surprise at that opinion—Roswaal's statement.

Amidst the surprise that reigned, it was Anastasia who recovered relatively quickly. Frowning as she stroked her fox scarf,

Anastasia: "That's a surprisin' opinion. Surely, I woulda thought that y'all were unanimously against it, except for Emilia-san."

Roswaal: "Being that Emilia-sama is the representative of the camp, it's a pity that her opinion isn't being listened to… Well, juuust~ kidding. I didn't mean to be a prankster and gooo~ against the grain, either."

Otto: "…Allow us to hear it."

Roswaal shrugged his shoulders, and Otto urged him onward with his emotionless voice and expression.

Both Subaru and the person being supported, Emilia, waited with bated breath for Roswaal's thoughts. Roswaal, under the scrutiny of those around him, closed an eye, leaving only the yellow one open,

Roswaal: "It's not difficult. In this alliance with the Empire, Emilia-sama's ability is a powerful asset for us to propose. If it were Anastasia-sama who were to tell her to go ahead, we would all stop her, but Emilia-sama is nooot~ like that. In fact, we all approved of Emilia-sama's involvement in the war before the zombies even showed up."

Emilia: "Yeah, true! You know, I fought Madelyn and Mezoreia that time, too, and I made it back without a hitch!"

Otto: "This situation is different from that. What is required is a surprise attack by a small number of elites, and Emilia-sama's over-the-top… bold fighting style is not suited for that."

Roswaal: "She has more than enough to make up for that. And if Emilia-sama is there, even if the operation fails, then rebuilding can be incorporated into the operation. She could freeze half of the city, wouldn't you agree?"

This was an outrageous statement by Roswaal, who held up one finger, but it was not surprisingly over the top.

Emilia's abilities as a unit was hard to replace, she had a ridiculous amount of mana that she could provide on her own, and super long-range skills that she could make full use of.

In short, Emilia could turn the battlefield into a snowy landscape all by herself and run around in the extreme cold, all while being cute and energetic. In order to make ideal use of her overwhelming fighting ability, Subaru had devised Ice Brand Arts, which was also recognized by Roswaal.

In fact, there was no doubt that Emilia was one of the camp's strongest fighting assets.

After having thoroughly participated in the events surrounding the Pleiades Watchtower and the decisive battle at the Imperial Capital, it was not a convincing argument to keep Emilia out of harm's way.

In addition, Roswaal had a conviction only he could possess.

That was—

Roswaal: "Subaru-kun would be more motivated if Emilia-sama were with him, riiight~?"

Subaru: "You…"

Subaru could not help but bite his lip when Roswaal gave such a clearly malevolent smile.

It was obvious that the tacked-on remark was making fun of Subaru's Authority—Return by Death, which only Roswaal knew about.

Roswaal had no idea that Death was the trigger for Subaru to go back in time, but he knew that Subaru had such a secret trick up his sleeve.

For Emilia's sake, there was also the certainty that he would not let this trick go to waste.

Roswaal's calculations were correct.

Subaru would use Return by Death if something happened to anyone, but if Emilia were to come along, Subaru's eagerness and desperation would be everything that Roswaal wanted and more.

However, only people like Roswaal could be persuaded by such circumstances.

Frederica: "Master, I, like Otto-sama, am against Emilia-sama going."

Despite this, the opposition was not swayed by hearing Roswaal's viewpoint.

Even Frederica, who was among the members of the camp who tended to side with Roswaal, was opposed to Emilia joining the team, emphasizing the dangers of the situation.

However—

Frederica: “Of course, I am aware that Emilia-sama is stronger than Otto-sama and I will ever be, but still, she is way too important—”

Roswaal: “—So I will accompany them. Is that right to saaay~?”

Frederica: “Huh?”

Unable to find an agreement after all, Frederica’s eyes widened upon hearing this refutation.

Roswaal made a brief but unmistakable declaration as he waved both of his lifted hands for all to see,

Roswaal: “I will accompany Emilia-sama and the rest of the team to the Imperial Caaapital~. Fortunately, now that I no longer have to hide my true identity, I’ll be able to show off my skills, both great and small.”

Emilia: “Huh, Roswaal is coming? Umm, are you coming with us?”

Roswaal: “Are you surprised?”

Emilia: “Well, I always had the impression that you were always just relaxing in your mansion, Roswaal.”

Roswaal gave a wry smile at Emilia’s genuinely astonished reaction.

Although “relaxed” was a rather Emilia-like expression, Roswaal was usually not there to solve problems since he was often the cause of them, and because he was an unreliable ally to begin with.

However, it would make no sense for Roswaal to betray their trust under these circumstances.

Considering that there was no possibility of Roswaal plotting some dark scheme within the Empire, in a sense, they could trust Roswaal here much more than they could in the Kingdom.

Subaru: “It makes you wonder what kind of ally is more trustworthy in another country…”

Upon hearing that Roswaal would be accompanying them, it seemed to Subaru that the proposal had nothing but merits, except for the rather disgusted look on Beatrice’s face.

If one was talking about the strongest members of the camp, Roswaal was undeniably one of them.

Otto: “I, also—”

For a moment, Otto suddenly started to say something.

Yet, the words he was about to say were interrupted by grinding teeth, so Otto took a deep breath, and exhaled,

Otto: “Garfiel! Please accompany Natsuki-san and the rest!”

Garfiel: “—. Ya sure ‘bout that? On top of the Three Knights goin’, all the strong ones are gonna be there.”

Otto: “Since we made it this far, it would be folly to put in half the effort. In that respect, I do not like the fact that it is in the hands of the Margrave.”

Roswaal: “Otto-kun is always thinking too much of me, iiisn’t~ he?”

Roswaal put on a relaxed smile and Otto put his hand on his forehead. Garfiel, seeing his brother’s distress, gnashed his fangs and put his fists together in front of his chest.

With a dry thud, Garfiel stomped the floor with gusto,

Garfiel: “Aight, then. I’ll be takin’ Otto-bro’s worries, Petra’s worries, and also Sis’s worries all together with my amazin’ self.”

Ram: “Garf, Ram’s worries are missing.”

Garfiel: “I don’t wanna bring your concern for Roswaal with me!”

Ram: “Idiot. There’s no need to worry about Roswaal-sama. Ram is worried for you.”

Although Garfiel had made his choice readily and determinedly, the singular jab he received from Ram had caused his momentum to shrivel up with a “Rawr…”

After displaying her sinful tendency to lead Garfiel on, Ram then glanced at Roswaal, who had volunteered to be a part of the invading force,

Ram: “Please, to your heart’s content. Kindly put on a show for the Empire with your powers.”

Roswaal: “Sure thing. The Empire has too little respect for magic, after aaall~.”

In response to his smile, Ram lifted the skirt of her traveling outfit to perform a curtsy.

Staring at the interaction in which a certain amount of trust, neither excessive nor insufficient, had been exchanged, Emilia blinked her eyes, having been left behind by the flow of the conversation.

Emilia: “Erm, so, Roswaal and Garfiel are coming with us, and I’m also going to invade the Imperial Capital with Subaru’s group… Is that right?”

Subaru: “Yeah, that should be alright. We put together the strongest team, just as Otto said.”

They would be bringing along Emilia, Garfiel, and Roswaal, the three most powerful people within the Emilia Camp, so it could be said that they would be performing at their highest potential as an allied faction.

Subaru was worried about the prospect that the trio of him, Beatrice, and Spica would become a burden to them.

Subaru: “And then Halibel-san also joins the team, huh. All that’s left is—”

Julius: “—Subaru.”

Just as Subaru was about to declare the team as one undoubtedly made up of their strongest members, he turned around upon hearing someone calling for him.

The one who had called for him was a man who had not been included among the names that were mentioned. Moreover, if only the strongest were to be gathered, then he was unmistakably someone that Subaru wanted in such a team.

However, the man in his traditional Japanese clothing, with his handsome face, had made an affirmation with a look of dignity in his eyes.

Julius: “I will stay by Anastasia-sama’s side. Drawing the enemy’s eyes towards the Fortified City will assist your break-in, will it not?”

Subaru: “□□□”

Julius: “Of course, those whom His Excellency the Emperor places his trust in will bear the responsibility of defending the city, but I plan to be of assistance as well. Most of all…”

There, he—Julius cut off his words for a moment, and cast a glance at Anastasia, who was beside him.

In order to search for the missing Subaru and company, Anastasia had pushed herself to come running all the way to Vollachia. Along with Subaru’s feelings of gratitude towards her, it was necessary for her to return safely without question.

Therefore, Julius made an unequivocal statement.

Julius: “I am Anastasia-sama’s one and only Knight, after all.”

Subaru silently took in a breath at those self-assured words, cloudless and invigorated to the point that it was spectacular.

It was because Subaru understood. That was a statement Julius had made to indicate where he stood, and at the same time, it was to light a fire under Subaru, who was also in the same position as him.

—A shove in the back to protect Emilia, just as Julius would protect Anastasia.

Subaru: “I’m telling you, just because you stay here doesn’t mean you can take it easy. If you let your guard down, you’re gonna get humbled like you did with Reid.”

Julius: “How daunting. Even now, I tremble in fear whenever I gaze at the wound on my face in the mirror.”

Subaru: “The hell are you saying!”

Laughing off Julius’s banter in that manner, Subaru practically jumped to his feet on the spot.

Like that, he surveyed the entire group with his eyes, and went on to reconfirm.

Subaru: “Me, Beako, and Spica are going. Emilia-tan, Garfiel, and Roswaal will be there, and Halibel-san’s also gonna be a member of the team, too.”

Emilia: “Mhm, let’s do our best. Since Ram’s group and Anastasia-san’s group are staying behind, please be very careful of the zombees.”

Anastasia: “Y’all are the ones breakin’ into the core of the castle, so I’m gonna lose face if ya told me that. But, dependin’ on how much we can be flashy with attractin’ our customers, the difficulty of yer mission will change. It’s our time to shine, ain’t it?”

As if her merchant’s spirit had been stirred, Anastasia responded with an evil grin.

Feeling reassured by that, Subaru clenched his fists at the imminent battle that would be decisive for the Empire.

No matter what, they would dedicate their best effort to prevent the Great Disaster.

For that reason, they had to hurry towards the Imperial Capital.

If he were to be asked why, it was because—

Subaru: "—If Ceci, any time now, carelessly decided to slay a thousand, or even ten thousand people at where he was left behind, and the Great Spirit's mana runs out and the Empire gets destroyed because of it… That's gonna be absolutely terrible."

In that case, it would be impossible to tell whether it was Subaru's fault for taking Cecilus along with him, or a price the Empire had to pay for leaving that guy unattended up until now.

Chapter 33:
Verdict on Love

1

—Governor of the Gladiator Island Ginunhive, Gustav Morello.

There was an immense significance in receiving that position from the almighty Emperor of the Sacred Vollachian Empire.

In Vollachia, where the teaching that “The people of the Empire must be strong” was lived and breathed, the role of the shows held on the island, utilizing the gladiators, was exceedingly important in these times of peace.

Those were not simply for the purpose of amusement, but so that in the reign of the current Emperor, who extinguished even the smallest fires of the live coals known as internal strife, the human nature of the Imperial peoples would not be overly distanced from “combat”, so that their fangs would not be dulled.

It was not as though the Emperor had so plainly declared that, but when Gustav was appointed as Governor by the Emperor Vincent Vollachia, he grasped that such were the professional duties he must fulfill.

In reality, following that through, Gustav had come to fulfill that better than any of his predecessors in the long line of Governors of the island. —Until today.

Gustav: “—I, Gustav Morello, accompanied by the gladiators of Ginunhive, have successfully converged.”

Before the Emperor who cast his gaze down upon him, before Vincent Vollachia, Gustav placed all four of his arms as a Multi-Arm Tribesman on the ground, and spoke as he kneeled.

—The great civil war that shook the entire Empire; its premise had completely collapsed with the interference of the dead.

In order to escape the hosts of savage undead, the citizens of the Imperial Capital and the surrounding areas were simultaneously evacuated, and without distinction, the warriors of the regular army and rebel army were forced to cooperate in order to oppose the ruin.

The evacuation of the excess refugees was still proceeding, but even so, the Fortified City of Garkla was accommodating more than half of the total refugees. As a part of that large number of evacuees, right after they had entered Garkla, Gustav was granted an audience with Vincent.

Gustav: “□□□”

In a room of the large fortress, next to the kneeling Gustav, Idra Missanga wore a puzzled expression.

The group of outlaws that was the gladiator gang had changed their name to the Pleiades Battalion, and with Natsuki Schwartz as their boss, Gustav had served the role of military advisor. And in that role of military advisor, Gustav had chosen Idra to assist him in jobs other than rampaging.

Among the gladiators whom Schwartz had an especially close relationship with, Idra happened to have a suitable amount of prudence and composure, and was an exceedingly useful treasure in the group of ruffians.

Be that as it may, when abruptly brought before His Excellency the Emperor, that composure could not be demonstrated.

Vincent: “In regards to your activities, I have received a report from Zikr Osman. That person… Natsuki Schwartz, was also chirpily boasting about your achievements.”

Idra: “Chirpily… ah”

Perhaps because he was overly tense, Idra subconsciously voiced that, and his face went pale.

Narrowing his sable eyes, Vincent was famous for the fierce nature on the other side of his handsome, delicate appearance. For the Imperial Citizens who only knew of the Emperor through rumors, it was understandable that they would be prepared to die with just his gaze being turned to them.

However, as Gustav looked up to Vincent while still kneeling,

Gustav: “Your Excellency the Emperor, this is Idra Missanga. He is a gladiator, but he assists myself, as the official, with work that others are incapable of. Please, depending on if the current conflict is resolved, your pardon would be—”

Vincent: “You are unusually talkative, Gustav Morello. But…”

Idra: “—uh.”

Vincent: “If he says you are valuable, then it must be so. Endeavor to the utmost. If you are going to speak about what comes after the war, leave behind achievements and a life that can be discussed after the war.”

Idra: “U-Understood! I am grateful and delighted!”

With so much excess momentum that his forehead slammed against the floor, Idra resolutely prostrated himself on the spot.

Idra was so deeply moved by the feeling of narrowly escaping death that he could not see his surroundings, but as a mere son of a miller, he did not realize just how extraordinary the words Vincent had spoken to him were.

Of course, Gustav thought that he had contributed enough to be deserving of that, but at the same time, he noticed a change in Vincent—That was, the tolerance he showed towards others.

From the very start, Vincent was the Wise Emperor, perhaps even too wise an Emperor.

Therefore, when faced with someone who could not share in the exceptionally perceptive sight of the Emperor, Vincent was rather cold-hearted. For that reason, the people around him were urged to stake their lives on the line in the endeavor to try and understand what the Emperor saw.

The Emperor had deemed that acceptable; however it seemed as if he had lost just that.

Vincent: “However, you have made quite the bold move, have you not?”

Suddenly, as if to sever Gustav’s contemplation, Vincent spoke.

At the Emperor’s sentence, Gustav, still kneeling, closed his mouth with his fangs still sticking out, and awaited Vincent’s next words.

V!c.ll2o

As Vincent narrowed his sable eyes at Gustav's silence,

Vincent: "My order to you ought to have been the duty of the Gladiator Island's Governor. To think that you have abandoned that duty during this emergency, spearheading the island's gladiators to advance far east to the Imperial Capital… How dare such a person bring their one and only head before the Emperor, where it is natural to tremble?"

Sitting in a large chair, Vincent spoke these words with his chin resting in his hand atop the armrest; to the side, Idra could be heard making a noise with his throat.

It was a situation in which the height of disrespect had been directed toward the Emperor, in which any Imperial Citizen would be pessimistic that their life had been lost.

Gustav: "—. May I have the privilege of clarifying a few things?"

Vincent: "I shall allow it. However, choose your words carefully. Even if you lose two arms, you would still be able to continue working as an ordinary person, correct?"

But, Gustav did not succumb to such pessimism, and instead discourteously responded to the Emperor. With a gaze that could be described as sadistic or inflammatory, Vincent allowed it.

Before him, Gustav was astonished with how calm he was. Being inclined to act this way was likely the influence of the courageous boy who was more fearless than anybody else.

Gustav: "Your Excellency the Emperor, you have stated that, in my capacity, I have abandoned the duty of Governor, but in reality that is not the case. And in addition, the one spearheading the gladiators is not me, as the official, but—"

Vincent: "It is not you?"

Gustav: "—It is the honorable son of Your Excellency the Emperor."

Vincent’s reaction at that moment was likely something that Gustav would never forget for the rest of his life.

Vincent: “□□□”

In an instant, Vincent’s sable eyes widened, and he made a wretchedly uncouth expression.

That reaction could not be accurately described with any other words than “being attacked in an unguarded moment”. It was evidence that for Vincent, both the speaker and the content spoken went far beyond his expectations.

Vincent placed his hand over his mouth and erased that rare expression, then,

Vincent: “I had evaluated your devotion to your professional duties as having no leeway.”

Gustav: “In my capacity, I am in agreement. But, if things had proceeded in line with the thoughts of Your Excellency the Emperor and myself, as the official, I would be doing nothing but watching over this major crisis of the Empire from the far reaches of the west.”

Perhaps, if Schwartz had not outrageously seized control of the Gladiator Island, Gustav would still be remaining on the island during this major crisis of the Empire, fully immersed in his duty of managing the gladiators.

Even if something had happened to Vincent in the Imperial Capital, he would have obediently performed the professional duties appointed to him; perhaps, he would have even thought of producing results that nobody would appraise as some sort of farewell gift.

That such a thing had not come to pass, that such a version of himself had not been left behind, relieved him from the bottom of his heart.

Instigated by Schwartz, he had interpreted the Emperor’s order in a rather self-centered way—That he could decide for himself whether this was the “emergency”, even if it was the result of perverting it to the fullest extent in order to hasten to the Imperial Capital, that was the case.

Vincent: “—The Emperor would have perished along with the Imperial Capital, and he would have likely put you lot to good use.”

Gustav: “Your Excellency the Emperor?”

Contrary to Gustav, who thought he could affirm his own judgment regardless of whether it was correct or not, Vincent’s spoken words sounded pregnant with some other speculation.

But, Vincent did not try to touch upon the speculation that had shown itself.

Instead, Vincent shook his head, and,

Vincent: “That shall do fine, I shall go along with what you say. In the midst of this situation contending for the survival of the Empire, magnificently exert yourself to win pardon for the gladiators, and to keep your own position. —Stand down.”

Gustav: “Yessir. As much as my arms allow, in my capacity, I shall work myself until my body is ruined.”

Between Gustav and Vincent, there was a mutual understanding that they were treating this as the “emergency”.

Whether Gustav had deviated from the professional duties of Governor of the Gladiator Island or not would be proved by the work done by Gustav himself and the Pleiades Battalion from here on out.

He did not have the confidence that they could definitely accomplish that. But, at this moment, Gustav thought that he would at least finish things without regretting what Schwartz had instigated.

Indeed, it was at the moment that Gustav slightly contorted the ends of his mouth, and was about to excuse himself from before the Emperor.

Idra: “W-with all due respect, Your Excellency the Emperor, there’s a question I’d like to… hk”

With his forehead rubbing against the floor, Idra suddenly began to speak, causing Gustav to reflexively gasp.

With a quivering voice, Idra discourtesy spoke so to Vincent, skillfully tilting his head upwards in his prostrated position, and directed his eyes, still on the verge of tears, to the Emperor.

Idra, who had displayed his willpower in the Sparka of the island, possessed admirable courage, but refusing to yield after being ordered to stand down by the Emperor was, as expected, an exceedingly outrageous action that did not value his own life.

However—

Vincent: “—What is it?”

At Vincent’s unthinkable response, Gustav was utterly flabbergasted once more.

At that great opportunity, Idra extended his arms without hesitation, and he did not miss his chance. Like a gladiator, making full use of their instincts during a critical moment on which their life was staked, Idra moved his parched lips, and released the prompted question.

That was—

Idra: “Your Excellency, after this battle, what do you intend to do to your honorable son… to Prince Schwartz?”

Gustav: “Missanga?!”

It was an inappropriate and ill-timed question that nobody except the bravest person in the whole Empire would be able to ask.

The rumor of the black-haired Crown Prince that had arisen all across the lands was inseparable from the great civil war that would be left in the history of the Empire, at least before the circumstances were painted over with the battle between the living and the dead.

Originally, the details behind the start of the Pleiades Battalion were that Schwartz had expressed his determination to clash with Vincent, so that was the overall objective of the battalion.

Therefore, it was natural for Idra to desire that answer from Vincent.

The problem was, that was an ultimate disrespect that posed a very real threat to his life, but Idra was so overwhelmed by tension that he was unable to recognize that.

Gustav: “□□□”

During the moment of silence that was yielded, Gustav became aware of the rare discomposure within himself.

Thinking back on it, all of his discomposure in recent memory had been due to either Schwartz or Cecilus; for Idra to be added to that list was an event that made the world seem bleak.

Unconsciously, even Gustav tried to escape from the reality unfolding before his eyes—

Vincent: “—Idra Missanga.”

Vincent’s lips called out Idra’s name.

Receiving that, not just Idra, but Gustav also gazed in wonder, and they both gulped down their saliva. Before the two of them, the Emperor rearranged his crossed legs, and continued.

Vincent: “It is not my place to be concerned with the validity of his actions.”

Vincent’s answer could not be said to have a comprehensible meaning.

The notion that Vincent, who stood at the apex of this Empire, did not have the right to make a decision regarding Schwartz’s position; there was nobody who could be satisfied upon being told that.

But, more than that, Idra could not be permitted to continue persisting.

Vincent: “Stand down while your head is still attached to your torso. —Any more than this shall be disrespect.”

Having overlooked everything until now, the Emperor now explicitly drew a clear line; with that as a start, Gustav hurriedly hoisted up Idra with two of his arms, and used his other two arms to close his mouth.

With Idra, who was likely the luckiest man in this Fortified City, or perhaps even in this Empire tonight, being carried in his arms, Gustav gave a very deep bow to Vincent.

And then—

Gustav: “I sincerely beg for your honorable mercy on Prince Schwartz’s honorable position.”

Sharing in Idra’s good luck, Gustav used it to his advantage and left behind that final comment, and the curtain was closed on the act of explaining their departure from the Gladiator Island.

2

Vincent: “So, he was even able to cause Gustav Morello to speak in such a manner. That man is someone I am incapable of fully reading.”

Gustav had carried Idra like a criminal, and departed while adding a comment that would have been fine if left unsaid. Seeing off that back, Vincent quietly sighed.

Not only had he been unexpectedly sent to the Gladiator Island, but he had twisted the thoughts of all the gladiators there, and of Gustav, who was honestly devoted to his professional duties; that fact deserved praise.

To be honest, no matter how much the person in question may deny it, his actions were to the extent that him not being a Stargazer seemed not to make any logical sense.

Anyhow—

Vincent: “Even if they are included in the city’s defenses, it shall be far from stable. We must not cut corners in selecting the offense against the Imperial Capital, but…”

Vincent had many thoughts on how they ought to be handled.

The personnel from the Kingdom’s side were being selected by their own intelligent individuals, and in an alliance with them, this side also needed to turn over a suitable hand. Berstetz and Serena would remain in the Fortress City, and regarding tactics, Goz’s presence would function more than well enough.

In the sense of plain fighting strength, the shortage of the personnel joining the strike force would hurt, but—

Vincent: “The personnel who triumph in large-scale tactics are irreplaceable. That point likely has more value than if ten Ceciluses were left behind… There being ten of him would be nothing short of a nightmare, but I suppose the reason why he has still yet to converge is that something in the Imperial Capital has piqued his curiosity. Him causing the destruction of our country is something I would like to avoid.”

Everyone who was aware of the level of danger posed by the Stone and Cecilus’s nature harbored the same fear; that Cecilus would massacre the undead, sucking the mana of the Great Spirit dry.

Similar to how Halibel had suppressed the black dragon at the coupled dragon carriages, he did not think Cecilus would lag behind the undead even if his limbs were shorter, but the very fact that he would not lag behind was the very problem.

Vincent: “Supposing that causes the ruination of the country, I suppose it would be that damn Chisha’s responsibility for picking him up that day. The very notion of his predictions being off the mark is a nice feeling, but…”

He was not enough of a madman to laugh in delight because of that, and it was unclear if there was even enough time to be laughing in delight.

Indeed, right as Vincent reaffirmed within himself the reason for hastening—

???: "—Oi, hold on! I told ya that I can't let ya in, Most Honorable Empress Consort!"

???: "Like! I! Said! I still haven't said that I'm okay with that!"

Hearing a sudden loud voice from beyond the door, an odd flavor was mixed into Vincent's contemplation.

A hoarse, clamorous voice and an angry, shrill voice sounded, and as Vincent lifted his face, before him was the door being vigorously thrown open from the other side.

???: "Abel-chin! Gimme a minute!"

Vincent: "I shall not."

Having kicked open the door and marched in, it was a tall woman with fluttering, long blonde hair. Stepping forth before the Emperor with two barbarian swords fastened to her waist, it was Medium O'Connell who brazenly performed that outrageous action which seemed to be devoid of sanity.

Behind Medium, Jamal Aurélie, who had been positioned in front of the door, wore a deplorable expression, and Vincent pierced him with a chilly gaze.

Vincent: "I ordered you to only let through the ones which I said to let through, did I not?"

Jamal: "Y-yes, that's true, but… When the person is the Most Honorable Empress Consort, a low ranking soldier like me ain't got a clue on what to do… hk"

Vincent: "In that case, if a General of higher rank were to appear with a rebellious spirit, you would be powerless?"

Jamal: "Yes! No! Since between Your Excellency and a General, I think Your Excellency is definitely higher. But, I don't really understand the position of Most Honorable Empress Consort… that's all!"

While his vulgarity was always on display, Jamal showed that he was carefully selecting his words. At his response, Vincent decided to give up on it for now, and looked at Medium, who stood in an imposing way.

Medium, who had marched in with heavy breathing, gave a very different impression to what he had heard.

Vincent: "I had heard that you had confined yourself in a room, and were whimpering to yourself."

Medium: "Who said that I was whimpering! That's not like me at all! Though, just a little… I may have cried just a little…!"

Vincent: "It was your brother, Flop O'Connell."

Medium: "Big bro! Big bro! Why did you say such a thing~?!"

Flop: "That is quite simple, dear sister. Of course, facing the forthcoming conflict between honorable consorts, it is so that His Excellency the Emperor-kun will have a strong concern and desire to protect Medium!"

Medium vigorously turned around, and prompted by her, Flop ungrudgingly confessed his plan with a foolish look on his face.

Vincent no longer said anything to Jamal, who had just let Flop pass freely, but he did not have the time to go along with the sibling quarrel that was beginning here.

Medium: "I said it to Jamal-chin as well but, I haven't agreed to that! It's not that I hate Abel-chin, but I don't know what I would do as the Most Honorable Empress Consort!"

Flop: "I see, I see. But, dear sister. You're my little sister, but did you become my sister while knowing what a sister ought to do? Or did you become my sister without knowing anything in particular… Am I wrong?"

Medium: “Huh? Eh, now that you mention it…”

Flop: “In that case, it isn’t important whether you know how to become something or not. What matters is the feelings of trying to become that thing, and the surrounding environment. You could even say that the foundations of a little sister and the Most Honorable Empress Consort are the same thing!”

Medium: “Ohh~! I get it, you’re incredible, big bro… You aren’t deceiving me, right, big bro?!”

After being tricked for just a moment, Medium furiously lashed out, and Flop said “I guess there’s no helping it~” as he placed his hand on the forehead of his sodden face.

Though, it did not seem like a sudden occurrence of a quarrel between siblings.

Vincent: “Come not before me with matters that you have not even settled amongst yourselves. I am busy. Jamal, take them away.”

Medium: “Ah, wait, wait! Right now it doesn’t matter whether I’m the Most Honorable Empress Consort or not! Wanting Abel-chin to give me a minute wasn’t about that…”

Vincent: “What is it?”

Medium: “I also want to go to the Imperial Capital!”

With a firm sound, Medium struck her hand against her chest, and clearly stated her request.

Hearing that request, Vincent furrowed his brow. Then, next to Medium, who wore a brave expression, Flop raised a finger and said “May I?”,

Flop: “You might be surprised by such a sudden thing, but this isn’t just an idea that my sister came up with. Right before we arrived at this town, the final one we saw in that dragon carriage.”

Vincent: “—Balleroy Temeglyph, was it?”

Flop: “Yeah, that’s right.”

As Flop nodded without surprise, Vincent recalled the final conflict on the coupled dragon carriages.

Subaru had made the girl whom he had started to call Spica do something, and as a result, the resurrection of the undead Lamia became defective, and Vincent stabbed her with his own hands.

Then, controlling a deceased flying dragon, the one who had taken away Vincent’s sister who was dying once again was the Magical Sharpshooter, Balleroy Temeglyph.

Having laid eyes upon Balleroy there, Medium had certainly said something.

Medium: “Ballebro…”

In a weak, feeble voice, Medium muttered so.

Her voice quavering, she called that out to the fleeing Balleroy many times over.

Flop: “Medium and I have an old fellowship with Balleroy. In the past, he helped us out a lot at High Countess Dracroy’s place. For Balleroy to be there… there’s no way we could have ever expected to reunite with him in such a way.”

Vincent: “To call that a reunion, would be perhaps a bit too ironic.”

In response to Vincent’s words, Flop spoke “Yeah” in a voice that was unusually somber for him.

Medium and Flop, the two of them harbored complex feelings regarding the undead Balleroy; if someone they were very close with had appeared in a form completely different to when they were alive, the heartache incurred was something Vincent could understand.

But—

Vincent: “□□□”

Vincent would never disclose that he could sympathize with those emotions, no matter what.

At the very least, he had given his resurrected sister her last rites by his own hand.

Vincent: “So, how does the relationship between you siblings and Balleroy connect to your previous request?”

Medium: “Abel-chin is smart, so you should know what I’m trying to say, right? But the way you just said that had a really unpleasant feeling, so it’d be better if you stopped with that.”

Vincent: “□□□”

Medium: “I want to meet Ballebro and talk to him. Even if I have no clue what he’s thinking, having become like that, I want to talk to him. After all…”

At first she was vigorous, however, gradually faltering, she chose words to try and accurately convey the feelings in her heart; as Medium did so, her words came to a pause.

The most important words, in order to choose them in the most accurate way possible, she earnestly contemplated, and,

Medium: “After all, I wanted to become Ballebro’s bride.”

Vincent: “—. So it is naught but an emotional argument.”

Responding so to the teary-eyed Medium’s appeal, Vincent looked towards Flop.

Flop was the one who had endorsed Medium, who was still on the verge of bursting out crying, to become one of his consorts. Rather than ambition, the true motivation was likely more strongly concerned for Medium’s well-being.

Vincent: “Is it agreeable with you to not stop your sister from heading towards such a deadly place?”

Flop: “Oyaoya, Your Excellency the Emperor-kun, it seems you don’t understand just how much my sister and I treasure our everyday conversations. Of course, before coming here I did all I could to try and stop her, but she shook me off through sheer force, and I just finished reapplying all of my bandages!”

Vincent: “In other words, she overcame you through brute force, hm? It is unexpected that she is able to disregard her brother’s recommendations.”

Medium: “I love big bro, and what big bro says is generally always correct. But, me and big bro are different people, so there are times when we want to do different things. Now is one of those times.”

As if she could not be stopped by force or by words, Medium regained the springiness in her voice.

Witnessing her forceful appeal, Vincent pondered for a while.

In the sense of plain strength, Medium’s capabilities were just a little better than a rank and file Imperial Soldier.

Jamal, who could not even follow simple commands, likely had a higher level of sword ability. It was difficult to imagine she would make dramatic contributions to the progress of the battle, were she to be brought along.

However, on the contrary, that would mean her presence would not influence the war situation.

Vincent: “—Do as you please.”

Medium: “—! Really? Abel-chin…”

Vincent: “Do not be doubtful that your request has been accepted. Whether you are present or not shall not impact the war situation. But, that is exactly why you shall need to take that responsibility upon yourself.”

Medium: “That means…”

Medium was astonished by his initial response, but Vincent’s following words made her blink her eyes. Seeing Medium in such a state, Flop interjected with “In other words”,

Flop: “You will need to defend yourself. They don’t have the strength to spare in order to protect Medium, that’s what he means.”

Vincent: “Indeed. Without that resolve, throwing yourself into the maelstrom of battle would be…”

Medium: “What, in that case it’ll be okay! Needing to defend myself is something that I’ve been doing all along when I was traveling with big bro.”

Vincent: “□□□”

As he tried to convey that she was mistaken if she intended to receive protection because she was an Empress Consort Candidate, Vincent’s expectations were swiftly betrayed by Medium herself.

Medium had been anxious about what she was being told, but she patted her chest in relief as if she had just been given a trivial condition.

Medium: “Jeez~, I was so nervous about what exactly you were telling me~. But, I’m glad that Abel-chin isn’t as ill-natured as I had feared.”

Being told something roughly in line with his expectations, Vincent contorted his lips into a slightly dejected expression.

At any rate, that was Medium’s declaration after having spoken her request, and comprehending the danger that would come in that situation.

If that was the case, Vincent had nothing else to add.

Vincent: “Tomorrow morning.”

Medium: “Eh?”

Vincent: “Tomorrow morning, the selected personnel shall head for the Imperial Capital. Make your preparations.”

Informing her curtly, Vincent then looked towards Flop.

Vincent: “You are not going to say that even you shall come along, are you? I shall say this now, but I have no intention of discussing whether it is right or wrong for someone who is unable to protect themself to volunteer for suicide in such a manner.”

Flop: “Thanks for your concern. As one would expect, I don’t intend to willingly go to my death. I don’t want to be an impediment to my sister either… The matter of Balleroy, I’m entrusting it to Medium.”

Medium: “Big bro…”

Vincent: “—. Though, there is no way to be confident that they shall meet.”

Without commenting on Flop’s determination, Vincent touched on the possibility that their desire might not be fulfilled.

However, at Vincent’s words, Flop gave a smile.

Flop: “Don’t worry, they’ll definitely meet.”

Vincent: “For what reason do you think so?”

Flop: “I have faith in fate. It may be ill-natured, but it shouldn’t be so tactless.”

That baseless appeal had the same persuasiveness as Medium’s earlier emotional argument.

But, Vincent avoided referring to this and that for now. If he said something, these siblings would each reply to Vincent with twice the amount he had spoken.

Besides, they would probably understand without him needing to tell them.

Medium: “Well then, Abel-chin, see you tomorrow! I’ll get bags under my eyes if I don’t get a good night’s sleep!”

With a big wave of her hand, Medium gallantly turned around.

In her bolt-upright back, there was not a single trace of the fact that she had tears in her eyes just moments before. If those were not fake tears, he could only feel that she was a girl of hectic emotions.

Then Flop, who ought to have been following Medium out, suddenly halted his step, and,

Flop: “Your Excellency the Emperor-kun, thank you.”

Vincent: “This gratitude is in regards to what, exactly?”

Flop: “For taking Medium’s… no, for taking both of our feelings into consideration. Also, for not rebuking Medium, even though she liked Balleroy. You know, since she’s a candidate to be your honorable consort.”

With a pleased look on his face, Flop touched his forehead.

For that reason, Vincent responded by snorting his nose, as if to question what Flop was saying.

Medium’s feelings of wanting to meet Balleroy; the very notion of gratitude for having not rebuked such a thing.

Vincent: “To punish love? Anyone who performs such a boorish deed must be miserable.

Giving an awfully delighted smile at that reply, Flop was an eyesore to Vincent.

Chapter 34:
Won’t Forgive You Until You Explain

1

—The morning of departure for the Imperial Capital of Lupugana had arrived.

At the entrance to the Fortified City of Garkla, refugees from the Imperial Capital and surrounding areas continued to arrive in droves throughout the morning, swelling to a number that even the cities which could accommodate the greatest numbers of people could not hold.

Everyone was busy dealing with and responding to the situation, but unfortunately, it was not a matter that anyone unaffiliated with the Empire could do or say anything about.

That was why the tasks entrusted to them needed to be accomplished properly.

If they were not done properly—

???: “Though it really, really pains me… I cannot really be of any help to you.”

The pink-haired boy’s small shoulders scrunched up in frustration, and as if feeling the same pain he was, Emilia clenched her fists.

Emilia understood all too well the pain of not being able to do what one desired to do because one was not strong enough.

Moreover, this boy—Schult, was a young child. Emilia, too, had been unable to be there for her loved ones when she was a child.

So, she was painfully aware of Schult’s feelings.

Schult: “Emily-sama, I entreat you. Please, I’d like you to save Priscilla-sama, Al-sama, and Heinkel-sama.”

With round eyes filled with tears, Schult begged Emilia for help.

It took a lot of courage for such a small child to hold back his tears and beg someone to help the people he loved.

It was something Emilia could not have done. So, she respected Schult's bravery.

That was why Emilia would bring home to Schult a different ending than her's back then.

Emilia: "Yeah, leave it to me. I appreciate you asking me to do this."

Schult: "Emily-sama…"

Emilia: "Because with this, no matter what Priscilla says to try to keep me away, I can say back to her that you asked with a please properly!"

With a thump on her own chest, Emilia reassured Schult with those words.

As Schult heard this, his round eyes widened even more, and his expression quickly brightened,

Schult: "Yes ma'am! Priscilla-sama is not being honest with herself, so I hope you will talk back to her!"

Schult's voice regained some of its energy, even if it was a bit hollow, and Emilia, trying to match Schult's words, nodded back firmly with a "Yes!"

???: "Em is reliable. But it's dangerous. It's better if Bae watches over you."

???: "…You don't need to say anything, since that was already the intention, I suppose."

As Emilia and Schult spoke, two little girls exchanged words with each other.

Beatrice, Emilia’s escort, and Utakata, Schult’s escort, watched Emilia and Schult’s exchange with satisfaction, then exchanged glances with each other,

Beatrice: “It’s probably not completely safe here, either, in fact. It would be a good idea to stay hidden here with your head in your hands, along with that Schult boy, so you won’t be seen, I suppose.”

Utakata: “When push comes to shove, Uu will protect Shuu and fight, and Bae will also do her best with Suu and the others.”

Beatrice: “…Good grief, what an encouraging thing to say, in fact.”

Despite their outward physical appearances, as the two girls had a difference in age on the inside, they pledged to fight well and exchanged their resolve for the battle that would foretell the fate of the Vollachian Empire.

2

And then, somewhere a little further away—

Medium: “—Well, I’m off now, big bro! Big Sis Serena!”

Declaring in a lively and loud voice, Medium veered a courageous smile to the two people seeing her off.

Medium was included in the group storming the Imperial Capital, and seeing her off was her brother Flop, of course, along with the nostalgic person to whom she was greatly indebted, Serena Dracroy, whom she had reunited with on this battlefront.

Flop and Medium had been under Serena’s care for a long time since they were children, and with the white scar on her face included among her beautiful features, she was bidding Medium farewell as the latter headed for the warfront.

That was just like when the siblings of Flop and Medium had left her hands, and had departed on a journey all by themselves over five years ago.

Serena: “To think that not only did Medium surpass me in height, but even in position. If you settle into the position of His Excellency's consort with no issues, remember that you are indebted to me in plenty."

Medium: "Jeez~, I'm trying not to think about that right now! From here on out, I'm going to meet Ballebro, so I don't need to be doing things like thinking about Abel-chin."

Serena: "Yeah. You aren't that clever of a girl. That's exactly why…"

Stepping up to Medium, Serena gently caressed the former's cheek.

Serena was quite tall for a woman, but Medium was even taller than that. However, when Medium was before Serena being touched like this, she felt like she had returned to when she was still a little girl.

In the past, on their day of departure, Serena had also brushed Medium's face like this. Touching the same place as where her own white scar was located, she gently traced it with her finger.

Serena: "I envy you, being able to so unwaveringly desire a dialogue with him."

Medium: "Big Sis Serena…"

Serena: "With both Balleroy and Miles, I was unable to exchange any final words. On this occasion, too, it seems like I won't be granted the opportunity to speak with Balleroy… Whether that's painful, or if that's a relief, I myself don't know. Though, there is nothing to be afraid of."

Fearless, was the impression Medium had of Serena.

When she had usurped the household from her father, even when he was screaming out complaints and carved a lifelong wound into her face, Serena did not even change her expression; or so Medium had heard.

Serena: "That is a lie. It was painful, as were my father's words. I simply shed blood instead of tears."

Flop: “Umm? I wonder about that. In times that are really painful, aren’t tears something that are shed even when blood is also being shed? With that in mind, there’s no way that Countess Dracroy didn’t…”

Serena: “Be quiet, shut up.”

Silencing Flop with a chilly voice as he wracked his brain, Serena, still touching Medium’s face, narrowed her eyes and looked at the latter in a loving way.

Serena: “The scar on my face was something I needed to gain in order to be born anew. I don’t wish for you to similarly bear a wound, but I do wish for you to gain something.”

Medium: “…Yes. Big Sis Serena, is there something you want to tell Ballebro? I’ll definitely deliver the message.”

Serena: “—. Yeah.”

At Medium’s determination, Serena had the resolve to give a message, and pausing for a moment, she deliberated. But, being quite a wise woman, she immediately returned an answer to Medium’s question.

That which she wished to tell Balleroy, that would be—

Serena: “—Hurry up and sleep. Miles is complaining that it’s getting boring without you.”

In a manner truly characteristic of Serena, stern but with certain love, it was a message filled with heartfelt emotion towards someone who could neither be called her subordinate nor her sworn younger brother.

3

Idra: “—Schwartz, in the worst case scenario, I won’t blame you if you don’t come back.”

Subaru: “Oi, oi.”

Idra said that with a serious face, and Subaru reflexively opened his eyes wide.

He quickly tried to retort with, “I can’t believe you’re making jokes at a time like this,” but Idra’s serious expression did not collapse, so he ended up missing the chance.

In place of Subaru, it was Hiain who said with his voice raised, “Don’t be saying stupid shit!”

The lizardman glared at Idra, and blinking his round eyes in surprise,

Hiain: “Tell me, bastard, the fuck d’ya think you’re saying! What d’ya mean it’s okay if he doesn’t come back! Don’t tell me you’re telling bro to go die, are you!”

Idra: “Don’t get me wrong, but yeah.”

Hiain: “Huh?! I didn’t get nothing wrong! You’re a traitor! There’s a traitor among us! Bro, what the hell, this is real bad!”

Subaru: “Wait wait wait, calm down, Hiain. Isn’t it strange for Idra to say such a thing suddenly? There’s no way.”

Idra’s face fell as Hiain lunged at him. Although he was in a very serious mood, Subaru was not so dim-witted as to take his words at face value.

Rather, his relationship with Idra was not something of that sort.

Subaru: “So, why did you say something like that? Come on, tell me why.”

Idra: “…Together with Governor Gustav, I had an audience with His Excellency the Emperor. During it, I asked something. I asked His Excellency the Emperor what he was planning to do to you, Schwartz.”

Idra clenched his fist tightly and said this bitterly, to which Subaru responded with an “Ohh.”

He had heard that Gustav was going to talk to Abel the night before, but not that Idra was also present there, and that he had dropped quite the bombshell.

However, if Idra was indeed there, then that was a natural question to ask.

Originally, the members of the Pleaides Battalion were a group centered around Subaru, created with the objective of him delivering a wallop to the face of the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia.

It was because of the zombie panic that the situation had remained unsettled; but, once that issue was resolved, there would once again be a need to give a conclusion to the civil war.

That said, it took a lot of courage to directly question Abel about the matter.

Hiain: "R-really… then, did the Emperor say what he's gonna do with bro?"

Idra: "His Excellency the Emperor said, whether Schwartz lives or dies depends on his own performance…"

Hiain: "H-he's got the damn nerve to fucking mess around…! Ain't that just mean it depends on how the Emperor feels?"

Upon hearing the information Idra had brought back, Hiain's voice trembled with anger.

In Subaru's mind, he could see Abel saying that and roughly guess his intention, but to them, who did not know Abel's personality, it would sound like an excuse to provide a reason to get rid of Subaru after the war.

Subaru: "So, is that why you told me to die?"

Hiain: "Ahh? So, you're betraying bro and joining the Emperor…"

Subaru: "That's not it, he did that to tell me to run away, right?"

Subaru interrupted Hiain, who was over extrapolating, and Idra nodded at his words.

And as Idra cast down his eyes in frustration,

Idra: “It was His Excellency the Emperor who brought the Imperial citizens together amidst the chaos that was spreading as the dead were being revived in droves. The seeds of discontent that led to the civil war will be uprooted once this situation is under control… If he survives, Emperor Vincent’s throne will be secured.”

Hiain: “Wh-What if bro achieves something huge?! Like, taking down the enemy’s boss with one punch…”

Idra: “Even then, it’s tricky. He will be recognized by His Excellency the Emperor for his deeds, kept for a while, and then once the dust settles, he might be assassinated somewhere.”

Subaru: “Once again, the Vollachian Empire is too cruel…”

The fact that this was not overthinking for Idra and Hiain showed that this was a national custom in the Empire.

At the very least, he hoped that Abel would mellow out once his position was restored, but at this present moment it would be hard to completely change Idra and the others’ opinion.

But, he felt sorry for Idra and Hiain, who were worrying and trying to find a way to overcome this.

Subaru: “I won’t pretend to be dead. Of course, I won’t actually die either. I’ll be sure to return. When I do, there’s something I need to tell everyone.”

Idra: “Schwartz…”

Subaru: “Don’t make such a grave expression. The result of all of this… I don’t know if it’ll be resolved peacefully, but I think that the worst case scenario can be avoided.”

In any case, the “Struggle for the Imperial Throne” that both of them were most concerned about would crumble at the initial premise.

He was worried about what would become of his relationship with his comrades in the battalion, but Subaru would have no other option but to convey his sincere and heartfelt apology to them.

Subaru: “I’ll definitely come back. —That’s why, you can stop stowing away on the dragon carriage, Weitz.”

???: “Guh…”

Subaru called that out, and a muffled voice could be heard.

As Idra and Hiain looked all around, wondering where it had come from, Subaru sighed and crouched down.

Behind where Subaru and the others were conversing, there was a dragon carriage scheduled to depart with the assault team on board.

Beneath the carriage, clinging to the shaft of the running wheels, was the figure of a tattooed man. The image of a skull etched onto his body, Weitz reluctantly emerged from there.

Subaru: “No matter how much the shaking is stopped by the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion, if you cling there for a whole day, you’d naturally just fall to your death.”

Weitz: “I’ve entrusted my life to ya… If I died for yer sake, I’d be satisfied…”

Subaru: “If you fell to your death quietly without anyone knowing, that wouldn’t be dying for my sake!”

Weitz, whose sense of camaraderie was directed in the wrong way, fell silent with a “Ngh…” upon Subaru’s remark.

Then, as both Hiain and Idra stepped forward,

Hiain: “Listen here, didn’t ya fucking promise to obediently protect this place until bro returned! This ain’t the time for ya to try and rush ahead, traitorous bastard!”

Weitz: “Shut up, don’t lump me together with that disgusting bearded fucker over there…!”

Idra: “Stop treating me as a traitor! You should know by now that it’s not like that!”

Subaru: “Heyyy, calm down! Stop making a fuss! Get along!”

Seeing the three start their usual banter, Subaru intervened and placed a hand on his hip.

Indeed, these were members whom he had become so familiar with that he could sense that this was their usual behavior. But, they had to remain in the Fortified City, preparing for the forthcoming battle against the horde of zombies.

With their strength and resilience, the group whose resistance to death was now the best in the Empire—In the battle against the zombies that would not die even if killed, there was not a force as reliable as the Pleiades Battalion.

Subaru: “I’m counting on everyone here. A lot of my precious allies are staying here. Unlike you guys, these allies can’t fight… er, relatively they can’t fight.”

Hiain: “Be precise with yer words!”

Rem, Ram, and the others remaining in the city flashed in his mind; it would be a lie to say that they were completely unable to fight, yet he could also not confidently say that he had no worries about those members joining the battle, leading Subaru’s answer to be quite ambiguous.

Hearing Hiain raise his voice significantly, Subaru made a wry smile.

Subaru: “Yeah, it’s not about whether they can fight or not, it’s that I don’t want to let all those people fight. That’s where you guys differ. Fight to your heart’s content!”

Idra: “…That’s genuine trust, and we can take it as such, correct?”

Subaru: “That’s right. Weitz, please understand that too.”

Weitz: “□□□”

He looked at Hiain and Idra, then finally at Weitz, and spoke to them. Weitz crossed his arms, closing his intense, intimidating eyes that were accented by the skull-like tattoo.

After a moment of contemplation, Weitz slowly uncrossed his arms, and,

Weitz: “Und… und-und… und…er…”

Subaru: “Please understand that too!”

Weitz: “Understood… hk”

With an overwhelming sense of a bitter decision, Weitz agreed to Subaru’s plan.

Weitz then slowly extended his hand towards Subaru and placed it on his shoulder. And in an unusual, gentle voice,

Weitz: “Now that I’ve said it, make sure ya come back, bro…”

Subaru: “Ah.”

He was slightly taken aback, however Subaru quickly returned a smile, and as he nodded,

Subaru: “Got it, bro.”

With this, he felt compelled not only to respond to the outstretched hand, but to live up to their trust as well.

Upon hearing that, Weitz smiled with satisfaction. However—

Hiain: “Oi oi oi oi, don’t fucking copy my way of calling people, ya thieving bastard!”

Weitz: “Ya just call him that on yer own… Schwartz actually called it back to me…”

Idra: “Don’t get into a pointless argument! I thought we were all on the same page?!”

Subaru: “Hey, stop it! Bros!!”

Once again, diffusing the bickering that began for different reasons, Subaru regretted the coming parting with these troublesome brothers.

4

???: “You ought to be aware of the role you must play. Do not neglect to remember that whether or not your life shall outlast the war depends on your work.”

???: “Auau.”

As the girl nodded with an obedient look on her face, presumably with the intention of doing so, Vincent closed a single eye.

The very power possessed by the girl carried around by Natsuki Subaru, outrageously professed as a Sin Archbishop, was a silver bullet against the undead arising one after the other.

Even if that were true, operating a plan which incorporated the cooperation of a Sin Archbishop would be an impossibility for the Vollachian Empire, which was said to be eccentric by other nations.

To begin with, it would be an impossible prerequisite to have a situation in which a Sin Archbishop’s cooperation could be obtained.

???: “Your Excellency! The preparations for the dragon carriage are complete! If everything proceeds without a hitch, it will not be long before you reach the Imperial Capital, even if it is not with the coupled dragon carriages!”

Goz’s voice reached Vincent, who was facing the girl—Spica, with a voice that could have been heard from over the mountain. Of course, since he was beside Vincent and not on the other side of the mountain, the volume of his voice was excessive.

At any rate—

Vincent: “If the Stone had already run out of energy by the time we arrive, there will be no discussion. You have strict orders, too. Do not kill the undead needlessly.”

Goz: “A war without death or killing is something so unfamiliar, but I will endeavor to ensure that all officers and men receive your venerable orders! But…”

Goz paused and clenched his fist, which was as big as a child’s head. Even without looking at his profile, one could see that he was contorting the sword scars on his face in frustration.

And sure enough, Goz’s stern, earth-shaking voice, trembling with frustration,

Goz: “Please, would I be able to accompany you!!”

Spica: “Au.”

Goz’s appeal was too vigorous and forceful to be contained, and Spica recoiled as if she felt the wind in her face; Vincent even felt the sound quaver on his skin.

Not only could he rampage with his favored mace, but even without it, Goz’s vocal volume made the world quake.

Vincent: “But, no matter how much you lament, the decision shall not be overturned.”

Goz: “Your Excellency!”

Vincent: “Aside from you, the only two who can serve as commanders are High Countess Dracroy and General Second-Class Zikr Osman. Even if both of them can be entrusted with a battlefield, a whole war is a separate matter.”

Goz: “That is…”

Vincent: “Now with that damned Chisha gone, I cannot entrust the entire army to anyone but you. You must understand the significance of that.”

Goz’s eyes widened, and his entire body stiffened at Vincent’s statement.

Berstetz was a civil officer, and Serena was competent as a High

Countess but not as military personnel. Zikr had no experience commanding such a large army, so there was no personel but Goz who could take overall command. That was Vincent's evaluation, devoid of conjecture.

Vincent: "I entrust you with all of my officers and men. Consider that the very survival of the Empire rests upon your strong shoulders."

Such was Vincent's comment, looking directly at Goz.

In response, Goz closed his eyes tightly and shook off his hesitation with that one act of meditation.

With a ferocity in his eyes worthy of being called the Lion Knight, Goz clasped his fists and palms together in front of his chest and vowed to Vincent.

Goz: "—. I, Goz Ralfon, will obey the venerable instruction of His Excellency!"

Vincent: "It is a great service."

Goz: "YES SIR!!"

With a brief statement, Goz bowed deeply to Vincent, who tucked his chin back.

He would have loved to accompany Vincent and serve as his guard, using his own strong arms to carry out the difficult task. However, Goz held his feelings in check, and instead—.

Goz: "I am counting on you, General Third-Class Aurélie! Honorably ensure the protection of His Excellency!"

Jamal: "Yeah, leave it to me, General First-Class Ralfon! Since I was specially selected, I'll fulfill my duty without fail!"

So Goz entrusted Jamal with this task, and the latter pounded his chest with vigor.

Designated by Vincent for the role of his guard, and even entrusted with that duty by Goz, he made a vulgar smile as his breathing grew heavy.

For one thing, the Aurélie household was a family of Low Counts, but they had none of the trappings of nobility.

But—

Goz: “Well stated! Precisely what one would expect from a soldier of the Vollachian Empire!!”

As Goz proudly threw out his strong chest and saw him off, this attitude was absolutely the way of Vollachia.

Considering that, Subaru and the people of the Kingdom, who were still difficult to handle, would have to be considered inappropriate personnel to use, even though they could understand and sympathize with each other.

Vincent: “Once again, do not become a useless tool in the eleventh hour.”

Spica: “Uu, au.”

With Goz and Jamal exchanging loudly, Vincent looked at Spica, who was covering her ears, and told her so.

At Vincent’s words, Spica’s lips pouted in a frown.

For some reason, Vincent felt like it coincided with the look on Medium’s face last night when she had been cautious about Vincent’s words and conduct, and he sighed.

And then—

5

—The three dragon carriages departed, a far cry from the number of people who arrived at Fortified City by beast carriage or on foot.

But it was undeniably a glimmer of hope sent out to prevent the Great Disaster that had struck the Vollachian Empire—or rather, the Great Disaster that was about to destroy it.

Each of them, with their strong resolve and many hopes on their shoulders, would return to the Imperial Capital, now turned into a city of the undead, and there they would strike their leader, the Witch known as Sphinx.

That was why—

???: “…It’s unbelievable that Nii-san is joining them.”

Katya mumbled as she wheeled her wheelchair to the window and gazed at the scene below. Hearing this, Rem stood by her side, the corners of her eyes lowering.

Katya’s brother, Jamal, was one of the people heading to the Imperial Capital as Abel’s escort.

Rem did not have fond memories of her encounters with him, but as Katya’s older brother, she could not be overly antagonistic, as he was a difficult person to deal with.

However, it seemed that Abel trusted him enough to choose him as an escort in this last phase.

Katya: “Nii-san is simple, easy to handle and easy to discard; so that’s why.”

Rem: “No matter how Abel-san may be, I don’t think he’s that callous…”

Katya: “I don’t know. At least, Nii-san seems to want to come across that way… y-you heard what he said yesterday, didn’t you?”

Rem: “Uh, about that… yes.”

Katya looked at Rem with an upward glance, and as Rem could not excuse herself, she nodded her head.

When Jamal visited Katya last night, he reported that he had been chosen to accompany Abel to Imperial Capital, and then laughingly told Katya, Jamal: “Don’t worry, Katya. I’m going to die in style serving His Excellency, and then ya won’t need to suffer for the rest of your life because of the reward, even if that bastard Todd isn’t around!”

Rem: “It didn’t seem as if there was any malice in it.”

Katya: “S-some things can be bad even without any malice to them… Why is it that both Nii-san and Todd behave like that, even though it’s their lives? It’s really selfish…”

Perhaps, in his own way, Jamal was concerned about his sister Katya’s life as her brother, but Rem sincerely hoped that he would be more considerate of Katya’s feelings than her livelihood.

With the loss of Todd, her fiancé, if she were to lose her brother, Jamal, Katya would truly be all alone.

That was not a void able to be filled even if Rem were by her side as a friend.

Rem: “I felt so, too, when… When I was reunited with Nee-sama.”

Since she had no Memories, it was a new experience for Rem to meet Ram again.

However, even though Rem had no Memories of Ram, her “soul” remembered her, and her presence made her realize that she was not alone in this world.

For Katya, Jamal must also be like that.

And yet, that Jamal thought otherwise was a failure of Imperial culture.

Rem: “No matter what kind of Emperor Abel-san is, I don’t like the Empire very much…”

Katya: “…What a coincidence. I don’t have a favorite country or place, either.”

Rem: “At this point, I would agree.”

According to Subaru and Ram, Rem's home was a place called the Kingdom of Lugunica, a neighboring country.

Since Subaru so often criticized the Empire, the Kingdom must have been a more comfortable place to live compared to the Empire.

Nevertheless—

Rem: "—When this battle is over…"

Will I go to the Kingdom?

It would be hard to leave Ram, and she did not doubt that the Kingdom was her hometown. However, Rem now knew more things and people in the Empire than in the Kingdom.

She could not adequately imagine herself in an unfamiliar Kingdom.

Katya: "…Rem, it looks like they're leaving."

Suddenly, Katya called out to Rem, who was lost in thought.

When called, she looked out the window as well and saw three dragon carriages about to depart for the Imperial Capital.

Spica, Abel, and Subaru were all on board.

Katya: "Did you see him off properly?"

Rem: "We spoke at breakfast. You too Katya-san, did you talk to your brother…?"

Katya: "I said all I had to say. There was no point in getting angry, but I did get angry."

Katya turned her face away and made a bitter expression as she recalled the argument she had exchanged with Jamal.

But, in her own way, the words she had said to her brother, who was heading off to a dangerous place, were probably meant to convey her deepest feelings. That was why, Katya turned her gaze back toward Rem, Katya: “Did you say what you wanted to say?”

Rem: “…What I wanted to say, huh?”

Katya: “You seem to be kind of bummed out.”

Rem blinked with surprise at this very unexpected assessment.

“Bummed out” gave the impression of a child sulking. First of all, Rem was not sulking, as Katya was insinuating.

Rem: “There’s not even a reason to sulk…”

Katya: “If that’s true, then that’s fine I guess.”

Rem: “□□□”

When poked and prodded, Rem closed her lips at Katya’s words.

When she put it that way, it sounded like Rem was lying. Rem was not sulking, and there was no need for Rem to devote any more words to it.

Subaru was accompanied by both Emilia and Beatrice.

Spica and Abel were also accompanying him, as was Halibel, that very strong wolf man. Surrounded by such reliable people, he must have felt completely at ease.

That was why—

Katya: “I-I…”

Rem: “□□□”

Katya: “I regret it.”

With her face turned away, directing only her gaze to Rem, Katya hesitantly moved her lips.

There was no need to ask what it meant or what thoughts it would lead to.

Closing her eyes tightly, Rem, together with Katya, reached for the window where they had been watching the scene down below, and opened it as wide as they could.

Immediately after, a cool morning breeze flowed into the room of the fortress, caressing Rem's blue hair.

Mixed in with that breeze was a smell that could hardly be described as refreshing. The dragon carriages were on their way back to the place where this all began—

Rem: "—You better explain yourself when you get back!"

With a shout, Rem cast her wish toward the dragon carriages that were growing distant.

She could not say that she wished him a safe return. Nor that she wished them good luck. But, Katya had pushed her on, and she could not choose to not say anything.

As it was, this was the voice of the troubled Rem's heart.

Who the heck was Natsuki Subaru to Rem?

He was so desperate for Rem, and yet he already had Emilia and Beatrice. He risked his life for the Empire, and he watched over Spica for everyone's sake, but who was he?

Rem: "Until you tell me, I won't forgive you."

It was not because of his sinister, nose-curling stench.

A Rem without Memories; she wanted an answer as to how to think of him, who was around every corner in her newly created Memories.

Rem's loud voice was swallowed by the wind, and she was not sure if it had reached.

However, there was a small hand, a child's small hand, waving back at her through the open window at the tail end of the three departing dragon carriages.

Katya: “You look foolish. With that happy look on your face.”

—As Rem saw that, she thought she could hear Katya sigh those words.

Chapter 35:
Life-Threatening Work

1

???: “Huh? What did you say?”

???: “I shall not repeat myself three times. —As far as I can ascertain since I took the seat of the Emperor, I can match the faces and names of all of the Imperial citizens.”

???: “Are you an idiot?!”

With folded arms and a mysterious look, Abel’s absurd answer caused Subaru’s voice to flip.

The setting took place within a dragon carriage, en route from the Fortified City of Garkla towards the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, now turned into the stronghold of the undead.

There were three dragon carriages consisting of the Kingdom affiliates, Empire affiliates, necessary provisions, etc. This was the division of the assault team called the “Rescue the Vollachian Empire from destruction squad”. At present, Subaru had purposefully boarded the dragon carriage designated for the Empire affiliates.

His reason for doing so was not an act of betrayal towards the Kingdom but rather was driven by his desire to know—the reason the Emperor, Abel, had joined the assault team.

Naturally, considering the important fight for the survival of Vollachia, it was only natural for Abel to take a prominent position on the battlefield. However, having experienced numerous unfavorable situations alongside Abel, it could be said that while he had wisdom, he lacked combat prowess.

There was no compelling reason for him to accompany them when only pure military power would be called upon in the future.

Subaru never would have thought that even Abel would be under Vollachia's influence, so if he was going along with them, there must have been a reason to overturn that. However, there was a possibility that he did not want to disclose the reason in front of the Kingdom's people, so Subaru had taken the initiative to board this carriage.

Without beating around the bush, Subaru asked, "What will your role be?"—

Subaru: "Matching the faces and names of all of the citizens…"

Subaru's mouth was left wide open at such an absurd and aberrant statement. Seeing how outrageously surprised Subaru was, Abel furrowed his brows in displeasure.

Vincent: "Do not misunderstand me, I do not mean every single citizen of the Empire. Just like the People of Shudraq who continue to dwell in the forest, the identities of those who remain discreet and unexposed are impossible to grasp. As such, it is futile to try to fully grasp all of the citizens in the Empire."

Subaru: "What are you angry at, that's already dumb enough?! Because essentially, that means you remember all your subordinates, the Imperial Soldiers, right?"

Vincent: "It is necessary."

He put it concisely, but it was not the typical way an ordinary person would think.

Of course, one would not consider Abel to be an ordinary person, and the fact that he could match the faces and names of all the Imperial citizens was meaningful in the current situation.

Because—

Vincent: "For that girl to remove the yoke of the undead, their names are required."

With Abel's indifferent words, Subaru became concerned for Spica, who was seated at the edge of the dragon carriage.

Due to her situation, Spica could not be left unattended, hence why she, like Subaru, had boarded this dragon carriage. At the moment, she was sitting quietly, being comforted by both Medium as well as Beatrice, who steadfastly stayed by Subaru's side.

In order to fully utilize Spica's Authority, Abel's abnormality—his remarkable memory came in handy.

—Star Eating had too many unclear aspects regarding its manifestation.

When she had succeeded in using her Star Eating on Lamia Godwin, a royal family descendant, it seemed Spica did not eat her Name, as no one had forgotten her. Nevertheless, the alignment of face and Name appeared to be the key to that Authority.

Therefore, they had no choice but to rely on the method that had worked once.

Subaru: "Still, it pisses me off that your excessively foolish memory is useful for that purpose…"

???: "Schwartz-sama, that is a false accusation, is it not? Even if the person you are dealing with is the ruthless Emperor, who often treats Yorna-sama coldly."

Subaru: "Is that your advice for this guy? Or your dissatisfaction towards my facade?"

???: "Of course, my advice to Schwartz-sama, is it not?"

Tanza, the girl clad in a kimono, answered calmly and turned her face away from Abel's gaze.

She was part of the assault team, and it appeared that she had some thoughts regarding Abel that revolved around Yorna, the main reason for her involvement in this battle.

From what he had heard, Abel had been persistently rejecting Yorna's proposals of marriage. Hence, Tanza had no reason to have any favorable opinions regarding Abel, but rather negative ones, considering his cold treatment towards the Demon City.

Vincent: “I shall tell you this, what Yorna Mishigure desired was not me, but instead the former Emperor.”

Subaru: “Oh, is that so? Like your father or something?”

Vincent: “Farther back than that. If you wish to know more, you should question that person directly. The opportunity for that is still available, at least for now. Am I not correct, girl?”

Tanza: “—Yes. Even now, I can still feel the presence of Yorna-sama.”

Upon Abel’s words, Tanza gently placed her hand over her own eye and quietly replied.

Her words were not wishful thinking, but rather a clear conviction derived from the benefit of Yorna’s power, which she had been entrusted with. As long as that power was present, Yorna’s survival was assured.

However, the uncertainty of the situation in the Imperial Capital made it frustrating.

Not only about Yorna, but also regarding Priscilla, whose whereabouts were unknown, and Al, who had stayed behind to help her, along with the concerns about Cecilus, who had wandered off on his own.

Subaru: “Even so, thinking about it that way… doesn’t it show an excessive imbalance in strength?”

Struggling to contain his overflowing feelings, Subaru voiced what he had been concerned about, once again recalling the composition of the “rescue from destruction squad”.

Abel closed an eye at what he said, and Tanza tilted her head to the side instead.

Tanza: “An imbalance in fighting strength?”

Subaru: “Yeah, because we have myself, Beako, Emilia-tan, Spica and Roswaal, and also our up-and-coming Garfiel, don’t we?”

Beatrice: “Did you just brag about Betty, I suppose?”

Subaru: “Yep, I did. Love you, lovely Beako.”

Beatrice: “Betty loves you too, in fact.”

After confirming their love for one another with Beatrice, who had chipped in to the conversation, Subaru raised a finger.

Outside of this dragon carriage, the carriage running behind them had Emilia and the others boarded on it.

Subaru: “Halibel-san over there is also the secret weapon that Anastasia-san sent with us. This is supposed to be a battle for the Empire, but the room’s full of external collaborators.”

Obviously, it was not as if the assault team was formed without any of the Empire’s people.

However, on the head of the list was Abel, who had made it clear in detail that his smartassery transcended the limits of any human, and then Medium, who came along as a companion after negotiating with him. Adding on, there was also Jamal, triumphantly taking on the job of the driver, who had been promoted to a General for some reason, as well as selected to be a bodyguard. The citizens from the Empire on the team consisted of these three.

The two of Medium and Jamal were unmistakably categorized as those with a high power level even among the people of the Empire, but it could not be said that they were stronger than Garfiel.

Subaru: “Tanza’s also mine, so it’s like she’s basically on our side, right?”

Tanza: “□□□”

Subaru: “Huh? I thought you were gonna get mad and hit me right away, but this is a letdown… The time lag!”

Tanza: “Please do not say such self-centered things.”

Subaru shouted as he paid the price for the joke he uttered, having been slapped with a force that exceeded his preparedness in accepting the outcome. He instinctively squatted down with teary eyes, but Tanza simply looked down on him with a cold stare.

He knew he went too far, but she seemed way too angry, even for that.

???: “Kakakakka! They’re tellin’ ya, Your Excellency. That they can’t see how serious the Empire is ‘bout it. If they put it that way, it can’t really be helped, can it?”

Subaru: “Yeah, yeah, it can’t be helped even if we… Ubyaaaah?!”

Beatrice: “Subaru?! What’s wrong, I suppose?!”

Just as he was about to nod to the unexpected raspy voice, a scream ripped itself out of Subaru’s throat.

As Beatrice rushed to his side in a hurry, Subaru jumped back in a tumble and clung onto her. Within the sights of Beatrice and Subaru, wrapped up in each other’s embrace, stood a small shadow that was hunched over.

Appearing out of nowhere was the elusive Vicious Old Man, Olbart Dunkelkenn—

Beatrice: “Subaru, calm down, in fact. It’s just a tiny elderly man that suddenly appeared, I suppose.”

Subaru: “If a tiny elderly man suddenly appeared, that’s either Olbart-san or a Japanese horror movie! Things they have in common are that they’re both scary! Dangerous! And crazy!”

Olbart: “Whoa, you’re yappin’ quite the stuff there, boy. Seems like you’re lil’ as always, but how’ve ya been?”

Subaru: “Whose fault do you think it is that I’m little! I’m doing great! How about you?!”

Olbart: “I’m just peachy, too. Kinda lost my right hand, though.”

Olbart said, waving his right arm as the folded part of his sleeve flapped about. Having been shown his fluttering sleeve, Subaru fell silent, feeling as if he would not be able to say anything without making the situation awkward.

What a devious trick it was, coming from this insane old man, trying to garner sympathy by showing his injury.

Subaru: “But, I fell into his trap, just like that…!”

Vincent: “Stow away your inner conflict for another time. —So, you have heard the details, Olbart Dunkelkenn.”

Ignoring Subaru, who had Beatrice caressing his head that he gripped in his hands while he agonized over his thoughts, Abel called for Olbart. The fiendish elder gave a nod to the call with a “Well,”

Olbart: “The spellcaster that’s controllin’ ‘em dead folks is in the Imperial Capital, so we’re gonna go n’ kill ‘em, right? I can imagine that Goz cryin’ like a lil’ kid after being left behind by Your Excellency. Ain’t he a poor guy?”

Vincent: “There is a role that only one is able to fulfill. Of course, that is equally true for you.”

Olbart: “I’m an old geezer who’s over ninety, ya know? Workin’ me ta tha bone even with all that… Ya don’t have enough kindness.”

Vincent: “If you wish for a discussion regarding your retirement, you may request for one after this emergency has been expedited. Furthermore, I shall tell you this, but…”

Olbart’s easygoing attitude did not waver even in the face of Abel, the Emperor. Overlooking the eerie elder’s terrifically irreverent behavior, Abel added on one more thing to the end of his sentence.

As Olbart raised his brows with a, “Hm?” at the prefatory note,

Vincent: “I do not expect we shall see any more of your bad habits for the rest of your life.”

Olbart: “□□□”

Vincent: “Therefore, I command you. Do your duty without pretense, Olbart Dunkelkenn.”

Olbart’s lips pursed in response to Abel’s brief but clearly intended words.

Rather, it was a reference to Subaru’s considerable concerns about Olbart and a preemptive gamble to check them.

If Olbart were to become agitated here, there was no one in their dragon carriage who could stop him.

However, Olbart went silent for a moment, then tapping his lower back with his remaining left hand,

Olbart: “Good grief, I don’t like young’uns ‘cause they have a lot of growth potential. I can’t believe the world is not kind to old folks, including His Excellency.”

Vincent: “I am very magnanimous.”

Olbart: “Kakakakka!”

Olbart laughed as if he had just heard the biggest joke of the century.

Subaru’s shoulders finally relaxed as he sensed that this was the end of the quiet contest between Abel and Olbart.

Regardless of the humor of Abel’s joke, they avoided a confrontation between the two.

Tanza: “Then… will Olbart-sama be joining us at the Imperial Capital?”

Tanza was apparently experiencing the same nervousness as Subaru. Her voice hardened slightly, and as Olbart’s eyes narrowed under his bushy eyebrows in response to her question,

Olbart: “It’s a request from His Excellency, and I don’t like tha idea of bein’ told what ta do by a kid. A country that doesn’t play its cards right when it’s in danger is no laughin’ matter. Besides…”

Tanza: “Besides?”

Olbart: “Those other guys are still in the Empire, too. At least Moguro and that bastard Ceci are.”

Tanza: “…Yorna-sama, too.”

The temporary partnership in the Demon City—Although he did not know the finer details, it was between Olbart, who had infantilized him and some of the others, and Tanza, who were working together out of a mutual interest.

The two had a complicated relationship, but they put their differences aside for the time being.

Of those named, the being called Moguro and Subaru were not acquainted with each other, but at least Yorna was someone who could be trusted in terms of ability and personality, and Cecilus was competent enough to make up for his personality. If Olbart joined them, the Empire’s capabilities would certainly be enhanced.

Subaru: “But we also have Halibel-san here, so even with Ceci and the others, we have a slight advantage… or rather, Ceci is also one of my comrades.”

Vincent: “You think you can put a collar on that thing? If so, your understanding of him is limited.”

Olbart: “Oh, that Halibel guy’s here. He’s tha only shinobi in tha world stronger than me, and I seriously hate him.”

They each respectively had something they wanted to say about the two strongest people, who were held as cards in their arsenal.

In any case, Abel’s reasons for coming along and his stance, as well as the Imperial side’s military strength, were settled with Olbart joining the group; Subaru’s doubts were also resolved for the time being—Although there were still some topics to be explored, such as the matter of Medium’s nomination as a candidate for Empress Consort.

Subaru: “I’ll leave the subject of Medium-san for when I get back. Also, what Rem said—”

As Subaru felt Beatrice’s soft hand in his, he remembered Rem’s parting words to him from inside the fortress as they were about to depart.

Her statement could be taken, in the most positive way possible, as a wish for Subaru’s safe return.

Subaru: “I’ll probably get really chastised when I get back, but until that happens, I’ll take it as a positive that Rem is worried about me.”

Beatrice: “B-Betty thinks she has shown worry for you without the need for such a debasing mentality, has she not, in fact?”

Tanza: “I, also, took it that way…”

Subaru: “Oi oi, it can’t be helped, but you two don’t know Rem. Well, there’s a little bit of that to it because Rem is kind, but the majority of it is anger at me… No, no, stay positive, positive…!”

Subaru almost inadvertently undid the suggestion he placed on himself and had to reassert the positive thought spell he had cast on himself.

Beatrice and Tanza looked at Subaru with apparent pity, but the expression of their gazes had no effect on Subaru, as he had reapplied his magic. Bam, he bounced back.

Jamal: “—Your Excellency, we are almost at the relay point, and the dragon carriage will stop for a while.”

Just as Subaru was mentally regrouping, the small window of the dragon carriage opened, and Jamal’s report came in as he peeked inside the car from the driver’s bench.

Jamal, who was on watch around the moving dragon carriage, was startled to see Olbart, who was not supposed to be there, beside

Abel, who was nodding in agreement with the report. Olbart waved his hand back pleasantly in response, in the worst way possible.

Anyway, once he arrived at the reported relay point, Subaru, having his doubts resolved, would return to the dragon carriage with Emilia and the others on the Kingdom side. But first, Subaru decided to call out “Oi” to Jamal through the small window.

Subaru: “I just happened to hear about it, but you said you’re gonna die for Katya-san?”

Jamal: “Huh? What about it, brat?”

Subaru: “No, I’m just saying it makes no sense. Katya-san’s been really sad after her fiancé had gone. Can’t you imagine how she’s gonna feel if her family also dies?”

Hearing that Jamal had confidently told Katya he would “go and die a courageous, splendid death”, it made Subaru question his sanity, and he also felt lightheaded from the severe problem that was the Vollachian way of thinking.

It was why he wanted to make Jamal retract his announcement, and he also planned to make him swear and reaffirm that he would return alive to Katya’s side.

However, Jamal blew out a disgruntled snort at Subaru’s words,

Jamal: “Look here, brat. Quit talking rubbish.”

Subaru: “Rubbish? What’s so “rubbish” about it?”

Jamal: “Katya crying because of my death? I don’t care about that. What’s important is how useful I am to His Excellency and the country when I die, and whether there’ll be a reward for it.”

Subaru: “See, you guys disregard your lives because of honor and all that stuff…”

Jamal: “What a thick-headed brat! She can’t even stand up or bear any children! If that guy, Todd, ain’t here, then there’s no man that would take her as a wife! Katya needs the money to live!”

As Subaru attempted to stand his ground, Jamal spat at him with a raised voice.

Just like that, Jamal’s gaze skipped over Subaru and was aimed towards Abel, who was behind him,

Jamal: “Right now, I’m a General Third-Class. If I can be of use to His Excellency in this, then I can look forward to being treated as a General Second-Class when I die. That way, Katya can live in peace. I’m able to do my job as her big brother if I’m dead, more than if I stay alive!”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

Subaru’s breath involuntarily caught in his throat at the intensity of Jamal’s line of thought.

Medium: “Subaru-chin…”

Medium lowered the corners of her eyebrows out of worry, glancing at the silent Subaru. However, her actions ended there, and she did not object to Jamal’s logic. Such a thing did not only extend to Medium. It was the same for Abel and Olbart.

Jamal’s opinion made sense. From the viewpoint of the people of the Empire, it was a shared belief.

It was only Beatrice who had the consideration to stand shoulder to shoulder with him, moving half a step to cuddle up with him.

Spica: “Uau.”

—No, Spica had also gently placed her hand on his back, making an effort to support him.

Subaru: “□□□”

Subaru’s words were ignorant of the Empire’s realities, making up an emotionally charged argument against Jamal’s logic.

But, the things that Jamal had said, and the fact that Abel and the others would not say anything, was wrong. If a reward would be granted for his death and it would ensure Katya's livelihood, Jamal could instead live, live, survive, achieve a successful career, and then guarantee Katya's livelihood with his pay.

Subaru: "It's possible, if the salary Abel pays to his Generals isn't itty-bitty peanuts. —I've decided, Jamal."

Jamal: "What? Ya got anything else to…"

Subaru: "That future plan of yours… I'm definitely going to stop it from happening. —You won't die, ever."

Biting down hard on his molars, Subaru made a declaration in that manner, as if he was also stating a challenge.

The moment Subaru's surroundings heard his words, Abel let out a brief sniff, and Olbart bared a gleeful grin along with a snickering laugh. Tanza hugged her own arms around herself, and Medium widened her eyes before nodding.

And then, Beatrice and Spica lined up next to Subaru, gazing at Jamal.

As the line of three kids stared at him, Jamal narrowed his left eye that was not under his eyepatch,

Jamal: "Y'know, you're one freaky brat."

Subaru: "Your friend also told me that. —I won't quit, though."

One last interaction was exchanged between them before the small window was closed, and Jamal returned to his role of staying vigilant of his surroundings in order to stop the dragon carriage at the way-point.

Subaru shut his eyes after seeing him out, then came to an honest face-to-face with his own heart.

He understood that Jamal had his own ideas. And, that it was one way of thinking considered to be correct in the Empire.

Bearing that in mind, such a mindset can go and eat shit, was what Subaru thought.

Subaru: “Trying to save something else by dying… That’s just—”

Nothing more than a heart-wrenching method, one that even Abel could not endure.

That was why Natsuki Subaru had to continue rejecting such a method, no matter what.

Contrary to the speed of the hurried dragon carriage, the Imperial Capital in question was far away, and it was terribly frustrating. The more he thought about what was transpiring over there, the more he felt a burning need to arrive there as soon as possible.

Hurry up hurry up, Subaru continued to yearn, his patience smoldering away.

2

—The scene abruptly shifted to an unsettling situation under the same sky.

Dark clouds loomed, almost like the weather was foreshadowing the Empire’s impending demise.

Because of the vast amount of water gushing from the destroyed retaining wall, the inside of its star-shaped defense barriers was flooded and forced the inhabitants to flee, turning the Imperial Capital of Lupugana truly into a city of the undead.

With the resurrected dead roaming around, the survivors continued to struggle trying to hide their breath in fear of being found—Among them were not only those who hid and cowered, but also fierce individuals who sought to secure their lives by fighting.

However, many who wielded weapons would soon regret their careless decisions.

Once the battle began, it meant an unending competition against the endless resurrecting undead, comparing their dwindling life force to those who had already exhausted theirs, so they should not have any prospect of winning.

Ironically, the bravest would end up losing their lives, joining the ranks of the undead in search of the next living being.

The Imperial Capital had now become a spiraling city of the dead, where the undead beckoned more of the undead, and turned into a manifestation of hell, where the despair of this world reached an impasse.

However—

???: "—As rare as this situation is to behold, it is not so much interesting but rather troublesome once you get used to the sight. If only there was a bit more competition to return to the stage once more! Then perhaps one could anticipate a few more highlights."

While saying that, the boy's tied-back blue hair swayed in the moist breeze steeped in a foul smell.

The boy with a distinctive appearance in his traditional Japanese outfit and zori looked around, and made such remarks while shading the tops of his eyes with his hands.

His lively complexion and blue eyes were those of the living, deviating notably from the most evident features of the undead.

However, his perspective, taking in the chaos of the drastically changed Imperial Capital, was, in some ways, an opinion that was more detached from the living than the typical undead.

Depending on the person, a true transcendent being might be defined as being allowed to have the selfishness to render the distinction between the living and the dead meaningless.

In any case, the boy's eyes gleamed with a certain brightness that seemed cheerful and yet insane—Not insanity born from a complete lack of fear regarding the current situation.

Rather, because he had never experienced fear once since his birth, he harbored a gleam that could be described as insane.

Boy: “Well, repainting the battlefield by single-handedly and systematically cutting down any visible enemies all by myself seems like a legendary display of supremacy only I could achieve, but…”

With a gaze that would instill fear in others, the young man lowered his hand, stopped gazing into the distance, and twisted his head.

Boy: “I wonder why? It doesn’t feel like it would lead to a very favorable outcome!”

Throwing his hands up, extending them to the sky, the boy openly admitted his feelings.

With his abilities, the boy could single-handedly cut down the majority of the undead infesting the Imperial Capital, without exaggeration. Yet, the boy refrained from doing so. And so he was agonizing over his inability to put the reason why this decision eluded him into words.

To the multitude of people suffering in the Imperial Capital, it was a concern that veered far off course, a luxury so off-course that might lead to exasperation. A concern that only the boy could comprehend, one that held no meaning to anyone else, yet carried significant weight for him.

Groaning in acknowledgment of this, the boy, then sighing in a troubled manner,

Boy: “I can’t seem to explain it well. What do you think about that?”

???: “Well, I don’t quite understand, but…”

Boy: “Eh?”

???: “Is this really a conversation we should be having before you drag me up…?”

The boy squatted down, peering below.

Within his sight was a man in an iron helmet holding onto the edge of a tall rooftop building he had chosen as his perch, trying desperately not to fall off.

He supported his entire body weight with one hand, but there was no other option. He was one-armed, rendering it impossible for him to support himself with both hands.

Nevertheless, looking down at the man in such a perilous situation, the boy—Cecilus smiled.

Cecilus: "That is no good, Al-san. Since I have no clue who or what you are, I can't decide whether or not I should let you be a part of my future history!"

Beneath the smiling Cecilus, the dangling man—Al let out a strained sound from his throat.

The Imperial Capital had now become a spiraling city of the dead, where the undead beckoned more of the undead, and turned into a manifestation of hell—

Al: "Oh, dammit, this is seriously the worst…"

At the very least, in this moment, this singular scene had devolved into a situation where the living without any need for conflict questioned the whereabouts of life.

Chapter 36:
Undead Capital Lupugana

1

—The Imperial Capital of Lupugana was occupied by the undead.

In Lupugana, a city that was now best described as the Undead Capital rather than the Imperial Capital, Al was searching and struggling alone for Priscilla, who had gone missing.

Nevertheless, it could not be said that the search for his master was going well.

The basic method of searching for people was to ask for eyewitness testimony. However, there was no one here to ask, not for conclusive testimony or even for useless gossip.

The only people who were around were either undead, who approached the living with a sinister purpose; or survivors who had survived by keeping their heads down, holding their breath, and not taking any action.

Either way, they were useless for Al's purposes.

Although—

???: "The absurdity of the world is that just because you meet a living person, it doesn't mean that your objective is going forward, right, Al-San?"

The very absurdity of the world itself, Cecilus, exclaimed such.

While he was in complete agreement with that assessment, there was no room for Al now to quibble with this and that, as it were. —Al was hanging over the edge of the roof of a five-story building.

Al: "—Shit."

Swearing inside his iron helmet, Al turned his gaze away from

Cecilus's smirking face.

It would be useless to say anything to Cecilus in this situation. In the first place, the reason why Al was hanging like this was because he had been kicked off the rooftop by none other than Cecilus. Moreover, he had kicked Al from behind after calling him over to the edge of the rooftop and making him think that there was something in the distance.

And if that was not a sign of malicious intent, then what was?

Cecilus: "Whether you call it a test or a check, the objective is ascertainment. Your reaction seems to be better than Boss's, as you didn't fall head first."

Al: "Um, yeah. I have no idea what you mean."

Cecilus: "It's fine if you don't understand! For I know what I think and what I want. Also, I'll go ahead and tell you that I will not be helping in pulling you up, Al-san."

Giving an undesired reply to Al's question, Cecilus nonchalantly clapped his hands.

Al did not know the reason for the murderous behavior until Cecilus spoke; actually, he still had no idea what the reason was, even after hearing the answer. Even if he would talk about hostility or murderous intent, Al had not had much of a conversation with Cecilus before this in the first place.

After being rescued from a powerful undead enemy, they briefly introduced themselves to each other. Al talked about his movements up to this point and his future goals, and then he was kicked off the rooftop.

Although it might have seemed like a stroke of bad luck running into him, his answer was not particularly discouraging to Al.

Because—

Al: "—I've heard that plenty of times, so I don't expect you to."

With that, Al released his grip from the edge and let himself enter into a free fall.

Cecilus: “Oyo.”

Cecilus’s voice sounded surprised and distant, and Al began to think amidst the floating sensation.

The distance to the ground was about fifteen meters, a height that superhumans could have landed easily, but Al was an ordinary person and could die normally. The crushed tomato would be complete.

The approaching ground was wet cobblestone, there was not enough water to soften the impact of the fall, and the muddy soil offered no cushioning, making this an overly harsh method.

Therefore, in order to save himself, an action other than falling was needed here.

Al: “Oaaah!”

With a guttural sound from the back of his throat, Al extended his bent knees and kicked the wall as hard as he could.

Al’s body, which should have fallen straight down, was propelled diagonally instead, shortening the distance to the opposite building, which was the same height as the one he’d been holding onto. The timing of the kick was between one and two seconds after the start of the fall, and if it was early or late he would hit the wall, and becoming a crushed tomato with a sore neck would be unavoidable.

But if the timing was right—a moment later, Al’s body smashed through the window of the building.

Al: “Guoh!”

Al rolled on his back into a deserted room, with a broken window as collateral damage. His shoulder and back were cut by the glass as he struck the floor and received some serious damage.

Al: “But, I survived…”

After rolling backward into the room he had flown into, Al jumped up and confirmed that he was alive. Next, he checked for fatal wounds and broken limbs, and only after passing this check was he allowed to declare himself a survivor.

Any injuries that were unrecoverable at this point needed to be recovered.

Al: “Woah, my left hand is gone?! I mean, that’s been like that for almost twenty years now…”

After a pause with some small senility, Al immediately hid beside the door facing the corridor and quickly drew the Blue Dragon Sword from behind his waist.

He had escaped falling to his death. However, his escape did cause him to jump into the building with a loud crash.

Naturally, the sound drew the attention of everyone in the surrounding area—

???: “Around here!”

???: “Yeah!!”

Together with a flurry of rushing footsteps, the undead broke down the door and stormed into the room.

The undead vigorously charged towards him, but as their pale visage passed in front of him, Al swung his Blue Dragon Sword and decapitated them.

The foremost attacker was killed instantly, and using the headless body as a shield, he ascertained the number of enemies that had rushed over here. There were two behind the broken door and the sound of one set of footsteps coming up the stairs, for a total of three—beyond the dead body of the first, the second, recovering from their state of astonishment, thrust the short spear they held in their hands forward.

They were quick to recover. It made him sick.

While thinking that, Al forced the headless corpse into the trajectory of his opponent's spear—

Al: "I messed up."

As the body of the undead received a fatal blow, it instantly shattered like pottery that had lost its will.

Therefore, the familiar tactic of using a dead body as a shield would not work; Al realized this as he tasted the enemy's short spear fatally digging into his chest.

× × ×

???: "Around here!"

???: "Yeah!!"

Together with a flurry of rushing footsteps, the undead who kicked down the door was decapitated.

Kicking the hindering headless corpse to the side, Al leapt out of the way to the back of the room. Chasing him down, the second enemy rushed in with a thrust of the short spear in its hand.

Al: "Dona!"

The tip of the short spear was engulfed by the earthen wall that rose up from the floor, forcibly capturing it.

As soon as Al saw that it had caught his opponent's attention, he placed the sole of his foot on the earthen wall and,

Al: "Dona! Dona! Dona!"

A pillar of earth flew out sideways from the earthen wall against which he had placed his foot, striking the undead on the other side squarely in the face and blowing them backward.

The pillar of earth pushed back both the second attacker, and the third attacker who was trying to follow behind; from the tip of the pillar, he launched another pillar of earth, and yet another one from that tip, stamping the two undead together with the vigor of a multistage rocket, and crushing them to death against the wall of the corridor.

Al: “One left…!”

Hearing the large sound of pottery shattering between the pillar and the wall, Al thought on how he had taken out three enemies in a single breath, and remained on guard for the enemy’s movement with his foot still on the earthen wall.

He had defeated the first attacker with a surprise attack, and the second and third attackers with a delicate technique. Only the fourth or final attacker remained, so Al would be safe if he could exchange his bad prospects for good ones, but—

Al: “Well, things aren’t gonna work out so smoothly!!”

The entire wall of earthen pillars blocking the entrance was pulverized, and the final undead invaded the room by forceful means.

Wielding a massive battle axe, it was an undead of the Cyclops Tribe with a giant eye of golden hue in the center of its face. Upon seeing that, and judging that they were far more dangerously powerful than the other three up until then, Al turned his back to them and intently focused all his energy to getting to the window of the room—

Al: “Can I make it!!”

Just when he was about to make it in time, his shouting back was struck by the destructive force of the battle axe, utterly mowing him down, and leaving the interior of the building to be grotesquely redecorated with Al’s scattered entrails.

× × ×

???: “Around here!”

???: “Yeah!!”

Together with a flurry of rushing footsteps, the first undead attacker who kicked down the door was decapitated.

Next, he knew that there were two in the corridor, and the most horrible enemy coming up the stairs. Then, Al took a big leap backwards—

Al: “Dona!”

Dealing with the second and third attackers in front of him, he had no choice but to open up a strategic avenue of escape from the final monster.

2

Cecilus: “Woah, amazing amazing! When that Cyclops Tribe guy came flying in at the end I thought there would be no way Al-san would win, but you really did it.”

Al: “What a turbo piece of shit…”

Cecilus: “Oyaoya, I’m sure he was an extremely formidable opponent, but I wouldn’t say that’s a likable attitude to have towards a foe with whom you have fought so hard. Of course, foul language and abusive insults tend to make an impression, but I’m not fond of the idea that notoriety is better than anonymity!”

Al: “I was talking about you…”

His entire body covered by innumerable wounds, Al was greeted upon exiting the building, and as he breathed deeply, he lethargically slumped his back against the wall and sat down.

Then, Cecilus opened his eyes wide as he was simultaneously greeted by and rebuked by Al.

Al: “Huh, I seriously don’t understand how you can be so surprised being spoken to like that. You almost killed me, and that’s in two senses. Even a psychopath bastard would at least have a memory of being resented…”

Cecilus: “Oh, as expected, I didn’t learn all of Boss’s words in a short period of time so there are still some words that I don't know. By the way, what does "psychopath" mean?"

Al: "It's kinda like being a deranged person. They go around killing people but still have the nerve to be calm about it."

Cecilus: "Is that so? But in that case I don't think I'm a psychopath. —I mean, Al-san doesn't die for some reason, right?"

Foolishly laughing, Cecilus then vocalized a twisted self-defense.

At Cecilus's answer, Al crouched in place and concentrated on regulating his breathing. While Al remained silent, Cecilus held up one finger and continued.

Cecilus: "The Cyclops Tribe guy from earlier was quite skilled. Unfortunately, he's far from reaching me, but if it were Al-san up against him, you'd lose a hundred times out of a hundred. That's the truth that I saw with my own eyes!"

Al: "…But, I'm alive, aren't I? Or, are you saying I'm dead?"

Cecilus: "No no, I'm sure you're alive. I had a suspicion that perhaps you were an undead posing as the living, but that doesn't seem to be the case. In that case there is only one thing that I can think of. —Al-san drew the hundred-and-first possibility."

With one finger raised on one hand, and another finger raised on the opposite one, Cecilus displayed two fingers.

Counting those two fingers would not result in anything more than two, and if one was being generous it could be seen as eleven, but instead of focusing on the gesture that did not really reflect his intentions, Al gulped down a breath at his words.

Cecilus: "I'm not particular over the number one-hundred-and-one. One-hundred-and-two, one-hundred-and-three, or even two-hundred would be fine! Al would lose a hundred times out of a hundred to that Cyclops Tribe guy. But what if you did it a thousand times, ten thousand times, or a hundred thousand times? Quite literally, you might draw a one in ten-thousand chance. You drew that right at the start. Am I wrong?"

Al: "—Hk."

The deception that he was remaining silent as he focused on catching his breath, had reached its limit.

Within Al's steel helmet, the expression that Cecilus could not see had warped; he feared Cecilus from the bottom of his heart. That insight, speech, and conduct, even Al could not comprehend what in the world they were.

By the way Cecilus was speaking, he had mostly correctly guessed the Authority that Al possessed. And that was not through logic, but rather an understanding through guesswork, so to speak.

The boy who called himself Cecilus Segmunt not only shared the same name as the Blue Lightning, the strongest in the Vollachian Empire, but was clearly an extraordinary being of the world.

Al: "His height, maybe it's because of the same reason as me and bro…"

Just like how Al and Subaru had been infantilized by Olbart's technique, it was quite possible that Cecilus had also been shrunken.

The person in question did not regard himself as the First of the Nine Divine Generals, but when Al's infantilization had gotten more severe, he had felt his consciousness being pulled back to match his outward appearance. The same was likely to be true for Cecilus.

In Al's case, he was forced to optimize his mind, but that drastic measure could only be done by himself and Subaru. Therefore, Cecilus could be considered to have shrunken in mind.

If that was what had turned Cecilus into such a juvenile monster, the repercussions of Olbart's actions were grave.

Cecilus: "Is your lack of an answer because you're unable to answer or because you don't want to answer… which one is it?"

At Cecilus's quiet question, Al sat up, relying upon the wall he was leaning against.

Within that silence, Cecilus harbored a tint of danger, and that was a sign that a pendulum was swinging within him. It was a pendulum that would determine whether Al was his enemy or his ally.

Utterly unconcerned with the unprecedented disaster assailing this Undead Capital, it was a fixation over a trifling matter.

Cecilus: "I wonder. I wonder, y'know. Let's suppose that Al-san has something that can draw a one in ten-thousand possibility on the first shot… I wonder if you'd be able to draw that possibility with me as an opponent."

In that case, rather than one in ten-thousand, there would be a one in a billion, no, quite possibly a one in a trillion chance of that happening.

However, if it was not zero.

Al: "I'll say this now, but… that's as far as you should go with digging into my allure. Otherwise, you'll have an unwanted party keeping an eye on you, and you're really gonna regret it."

Cecilus: "Unbelievable! To speak to me in such a manner. I don't dislike it, rather, I quite like it."

Al sighed at Cecilus's reaction, who seemed to be becoming increasingly amused.

He wanted to find the words to dampen Cecilus's fascination, but by the looks of things, he did not have the time. He had finally survived the rush of undead that had come after his plunge to the death.

The burden was heavy, but he needed to advance to the next stage.

Al: "—Release territory, subsequent re-expansion, re-initiate thought experiment."

Before Cecilus could make any unnecessary movements, Al redefined the matrix he had once established.

The recoil was far too great due to the frequency and scope, but at the very least, Al had decided to continue ignoring the consequences until he made it out of the Vollachian Empire. —Recovering Priscilla was his top priority.

Al: “If it’s for that purpose, then no matter how many times it takes, I’ll—Dwaa?!”

It was at the very moment that he was about to utter his resolute declaration.

Quicker than he could finish, the figure of Cecilus in front of him blurred, and immediately afterward, Al was flipped sideways, taking a hit from a zori to his flank.

In response to such outrageous conduct, Al screamed while sliding across the ground.

Al: “What, the hell! After all that talk about making a grand impression on a stage, you attack someone while they’re in the middle of talking!”

Cecilus: “No, no, no, you’ve got it all wrong! It’s utterly unthinkable for me to commit such rudeness! That would be an offense warranting kappuku. So it’s not that, but rather, take a look.”

Al: “Look at what…”

As Al finished sliding and began to rise to his feet, Cecilus gestured towards the wall to justify himself. There, at chest height of where Al had been standing just moments before, was a fist-sized hole.

It had not been there a moment ago. However, the hole had suddenly appeared.

That meant—

Al: “Sniper… Gyahh!!”

Cecilus: “Forgive my rudeness for a moment!”

In that instant his eyes widened, Cecilus’s form blurred once more, and immediately after, Al felt g-forces of acceleration throughout his body as he was thrust straight backwards.

Cecilus, running furiously, had hooked his hand around Al's waist and was dragging him along in a swift sprint. And, hot on their heels as they became one with the wind—

Al: "Hey, hey, hey, hey, hey, what the hell, what the hell, what in the actual hell?!"

Amidst the illusion of being flung backward, Al's vision was filled with city streets and building walls being pierced one after the other, as something tremendous pursued them with reckless abandon.

If his initial impression was correct, it was sniper fire. A sniper was chasing after Al and Cecilus.

Al: "Though if we're being sniped, it's an ironclad rule that snipers are supposed to stay put!"

They were supposed to patiently lie in wait, take aim once their target was in their sights, and strike with a fatal shot.

Those were the fundamentals of sniping, and ought to have been the ironclad rule. Yet, this sniper was defying all that, accurately pursuing the fleeing pair, and was even anticipating their moves to find cover, and firing accordingly.

It was as if they were surrounded by a hundred snipers, or being targeted by a single sniper with the complete freedom to move around at rapid speeds.

Cecilus: "Whoa! Woah there! Whoopsie!"

Al: "Bwah! Oof! Bit my tongue!"

While being targeted by this terrifyingly precise and agile sniper, Cecilus, while carrying Al, moved his body right, left, up, and down, all the while continuously evading the assault.

However, he did not seem to be looking at his surroundings at all.

Then, Al realized. —It was guesswork. Cecilus was dodging this top-class sniping by sheer guesswork alone.

Cecilus: “It’s not quite to that extent. But don’t you just feel a certain thrill during moments the opponent deems critical? That’s it.”

Al: “You can ignore my suspicions! More importantly, focus on what you’re doing!”

Cecilus: “Very well. But our opponent is of remarkable ability. —I’ve encountered them a few times before, but they’ve never allowed me to close in on them.”

The ground erupted with an explosive sound that seemed impossible to be caused by a kick from his zori, and as he gained propulsive force, Cecilus began to accelerate. Feeling the proximity of the unseen sharpshooter pursuing them with sniper fire, Al received a two-fold shock from Cecilus’s statement.

The first shock was that Cecilus had already encountered this enemy several times before, and still continued to survive.

The second shock was that even Cecilus had been unable to defeat this enemy, which meant they were an abnormally formidable adversary.

Cecilus: “I believe they’re flying, but for some reason other than their speed, they can’t be seen.”

Al: “An enemy, who can’t be seen… hk.”

Upon the words of Cecilus, who seemed to lack a proper sense of danger, Al gained the keyword of “invisible enemy”.

If only they could unravel the mechanism behind this invisibility, or at least find some way to counteract it.

Cecilus: “Woah there, my my…”

Once more, Cecilus spoke without a sense of danger, and a tremendous crashing sound followed, prompting Al to look back—that is, toward the direction they were heading.

Then, within Al's field of vision, three buildings along their path came crashing down.

From the front of the street and on each side, buildings began to descend upon them. Each had its foundation targeted and hollowed out by the sniper, causing them to tilt and collapse inwards.

If they collided with that, there would be no escaping from being crushed to death. Upon grasping that, Al clenched his molars, and,

Al: "Territory, redefinition—!!"

Cecilus: "I'm rushing straight ahead!"

Immediately after resetting the territory in time, Cecilus, kicking off the ground while holding Al, broke through the window of the frontmost collapsing building and plunged inside.

As they slanted, and he heard the gentle cascade of shattering window glass in conjunction with the flexing of the walls, Cecilus kicked the floor of the collapsing building, smashed through the ceiling, and sprinted upwards, forcibly creating a direct route from the lower floor to the upper floor.

Cecilus: "Go go go go go go go go!"

Given how the building was collapsing, it was a fact it would be crushed by contact with the street at the lower floors first.

On the other hand, the outrageous feat of escaping from being crushed in such a manner could not have been said to be a sane course of action. It should not be said.

However, thanks to that eccentric judgment, Al and Cecilus managed to kick through the ceiling of the top floor and escape to the outside, faster than the building could fully collapse—

Al: "—No, this won't work out."

Bursting through the ceiling, Al and Cecilus soared into the sky.

Below them, they witnessed the three collapsing buildings collide with one another, their colossal mass causing a tremendous earthquake as they crumbled. One of the fallen buildings seemed to have contained flammable liquor, or perhaps stored magic stones, as an inferno was extending across the street.

However—

Cecilus: “Now this is a formidable enemy!”

Both Cecilus’s cheerful exclamation and Al’s body shaking from the impact happened simultaneously.

But, Al was not the one who was directly affected by the impact. Having leaped into the sky alongside Al, it was Cecilus—Struck by the sniper fire, the impact had blown off one of his legs.

The young boy’s small left leg was blown off from the knee down, scattering blood into the air as he gnashed his teeth. Having experienced similar situations, Al understood what it was like. That the pain would come immediately, causing the throat to scream—

Cecilus: “—Over there!”

Instead of screaming, Cecilus shouted that out, likely having pinpointed the enemy beyond the sky.

He then placed his remaining leg against Al’s body, which he was still holding, using it as leverage to propel himself towards something that he had spotted.

Being propelled by just one leg, his momentum was fierce, seemingly sufficient to catch the enemy.

V!.cll2o

All of that while in a state of having lost one leg—.

Al: "—This won't do."

Even with one leg missing, Cecilus was still probably a hundred times stronger than Al.

But, that was no good. It was necessary for him to be in perfect condition. Thus, Al drew his Blue Dragon Sword and pressed it against his own neck.

Then, without hesitation, he forcefully exerted the blade—.

× × ×

Cecilus: "I'm rushing stra—"

Al: "No, the building on the right!!"

As the buildings were collapsing from three different directions, the moment Cecilus was preparing to rush inside of the frontmost one, Al shouted in a voice that would not lose out to the volume of the collapsing structures, and issued a change in their path.

The instant he heard Al's appeal, Cecilus laughed, and the fact that he licked his lips was already known.

In that instant, Cecilus forcefully altered their direction, and while carrying Al, he lunged towards the collapsing building on the right.

Hearing the cascade of shattering window glass, Al pointed towards the interior of the room they jumped into,

Al: "The room over there! Secure the box inside!"

Cecilus: "Aye-aye sir!"

At Al's confident directions, Cecilus did not ask any questions whatsoever.

Forcefully smashing through the wall into the adjacent room, there was an iron chest—a part of the fortune kept by the owner of the building, intended for emergency situations.

Unfortunately, it seemed like the owner was unprepared and was unable to take it out with him, but thanks to that, Al and Cecilus were able to secure it.

Al: “Upwards!”

Immediately after securing the box, the escape from the slanted building reverted the route to one that employed Cecilus’s extraordinary leg strength and innovative thinking.

Carrying Al, who carried the box, Cecilus’s sprint pierced through the ceiling of the lower floor and the floor of the upper one, and repeating that in quick succession, they dashed all the way up to the top floor in one go.

Then, the moment Cecilus kicked open the ceiling of the top floor and they flew out, Al was faced with a scenery that he had already seen countless times, and dropped the box from his hands.

And, just before the sniper could blow off any of Cecilus’s limbs from afar—

Al: “—Dona.”

Inside the box that was dropped, Al’s shoddy magic sparked a fire that ignited a high-purity magic stone belonging to an individual within the Empire, and then at once, the blast swelled up and flames engulfed them from directly below.

Al: “□□□”

While savoring the sensation of the scorching heat roasting their skin, the created curtain of flames also concealed Al and Cecilus from their surroundings. However, even if the flames hid them only for this moment, if there truly was a sniper, he would shoot through them—No, he would shoot through Cecilus without losing sight of him.

Therefore, the aim was not to disrupt the sniper’s eyes.

Cecilus: “—Over there.”

Cecilus muttered this while smiling with bared teeth.

Blood was spouting from Cecilus’s cheek, and his long blue hair bursted and spread apart as his hair clip was snatched by the sniper. However, all of Cecilus’s limbs were unscathed.

The flame curtain was not to hide Cecilus from the enemy, but to allow him to spot the bullets approaching him before they reached him.

Before reaching Cecilus, the bullet had to pass through the flame curtain.

As foolish as it sounded, but he believed enough to bet on Cecilus of all people to not miss the momentaneous change in the flames before the bullet would reach him. He won that bet.

—Hence, across the flame curtain, Cecilus’s and the sniper’s gazes intersected.

Cecilus: “□□□”

In an instant, the pupils of Cecilus’s eyes narrowed and the soles of his zori sandals were placed against Al’s hip.

As before, Cecilus intended to leap down to the shooter’s location. The difference was that all of Cecilus’s limbs were stuck to his small torso.

All that was left from now was—

Al: “—Don’t you let your guard down.”

Muttering that, Al established preparations for the next re-expansion of his territory.

Each time it happened, he felt a sense of loss in his head, as if something was shredded into pieces, but Cecilus was right. One could say a once in a lifetime opportunity was a chance one could not afford to pass by once it happened.

If somebody wanted to obtain it twice, then they could not afford to compromise.

That was why, Al was going to reset the next matrix—.

???: "—Cloud-cutting."

Just before that, a remarkable change flashed into Al's vision.

It was behind the flame curtain, in the direction Cecilus surmised the sniper to be, in the sky where Al still could not see the enemy; there was an unusual change in his vision.

Simply put, the clouds had been severed.

The thick black clouds that covered the sky of the Undead Capital of Lupugana were unexpectedly cut open. The cumulus clouds received not one, but two to three cuts in succession.

It was as if they were chasing an invisible enemy in the sky—No, not as if.

The slashes were chasing the enemy and the aftermath was tearing through the black clouds.

Cecilus: "Aaah!! They're getting away, they're getting away! They're escaping!!"

The screeching voice belonged to Cecilus, who kept his foot on Al's back.

His eyes widened, and the reason for his scream was probably in response to the sniper running away from the slash that tore through the clouds—abandoning the battle and disengaging.

From Al's point of view, this could only be described as a favorable turn of events, but not for Cecilus. He stared at the view below with eyes brimming with frustration.

And there—

???: "Ha ha ha ha! Run, run in fear of my swordsmanship!"

Al and Cecilus jumped out, away from the three collapsing buildings; a lone figure could be seen on the roof of the building.

It was a figure with a sword in his hand, seeing off the enemy in the distance, and pointing his blade that had sliced the clouds towards the heavens as he smiled broadly.

Al frowned, wondering who or what this stranger was.

Behind Al, Cecilus said “Huh” as he looked at the sudden intruder,

Cecilus: “Looks like you’ve grown old in the while I haven’t seen you, Dad.”

Al: “Your old man?”

Al was stunned by Cecilus uttering this with completely feigned ignorance.

Meeting up with this person in the distance Cecilus called his father would probably be a good thing, but the problem was—

Al: “…You ain’t gonna die after this, are you?”

After the formidable sniper was gone, Al, while looking directly down at the three buildings that were still vehemently collapsing, muttered to Cecilus about what was ahead, feeling a floating kind of sensation.

Chapter 37:
Time for Foreshadowing

1

With a sword in one hand and carrying baggage under his other arm, he slowly opened the door in front of him.

He would never foolishly kick open a door, nor cut it down. Thoughtlessly making noise and provoking the undead that could be potentially lurking around was something he wanted to avoid. The same applied to attracting attention from his surroundings.

It would still be manageable if it were only a bunch of ordinary Imperial Soldiers that had been transformed into undead fighters, but he preferred to not find himself in a fight against skilled opponents. His reluctance was amplified by the fact that he was carrying something that he could not simply throw out.

???: “□□□”

He took a whiff of the air around him with a sniff, then grimaced at the stench of rusty iron wafting from the inside of the room.

It was the smell of blood. Once one becomes used to it, distinguishing its freshness becomes more or less easier. The aforementioned odor was induced by recently spilt blood, and it did not come from just one person at that.

As expected, upon investigating the furthermost room, there were two bodies piled up atop of each other.

Left behind in the single house facing the main street, there were the corpses of an old woman and a man.

The perpetrator must have been the undead that he had chopped down in front of the house right before this. It was none other than because these corpses were freshly made that the sword in its hand had been drenched in blood.

The victims were presumably parent and child. Unfortunately, their expressions during their last moments could not be described as serene, so he was not able to compare their facial features. The old woman was lying on the bed, and the man seemed to have fallen on top of her as if he were placing himself over her, a broken sword lying beside him.

???: “They couldn’t escape in time… No, it’s something else.”

The composition of the scene was not two people who failed to escape in time, but a son who had stayed behind to protect his mother because she was unable to run.

To intuitively perceive the display as such was far too ironic for it to have occurred in the Imperial Capital, which stood at the heart of the Vollachian Empire, a place where it was only natural for the weak to be trampled upon.

Nevertheless, he could not laugh at the irony. If only he had arrived a few minutes earlier…

???: “□□□”

Placing his drawn sword back into its sheath, he silently gazed upon the corpse of the man who had decided how he would use his own life in the midst of a visit from an inevitable tragedy.

If he had been placed in the same situation, would he have been able to fight until his life was depleted like this man, with his back to the bed where his dearest family laid upon?

???: “It’s pointless, the answer’s obvious.”

He spat irritatedly, ridding himself of the bitter glob of saliva with a lingering revulsion that did not disappear.

Yes, it was a question for himself with an obvious answer. It was self-evident that he would turn tail and run off, regardless. —The moment he ridiculed himself in that manner.

????: “Heeey, redhead! Where are ya?! I got my business done!”

Suddenly, he heard a tremendously loud voice coming from outside of the building, and his head shot up to look at the window.

The ruddy face that he had gone separate ways with surfaced in his memory, and he felt himself sober up as the blood drained from his face at the recklessness of raising one's voice in this undead-infested city.

His head clobbered by the weight of reality, which he was not able to brush off with the drunkenness he had inflicted upon himself by drinking and drinking, on and on, he clicked his tongue as he peered out of the window he had approached.

Just then, at the bottom of his line of sight, on the street there was a single blue-haired man in a wasou outfit searching for him while waving his hand—no, next to him was a small silhouette in similar clothing.

?????: “Where might you be, Dad's companion! This area isn't suitable for having a nice and long talk, so why don't we move somewhere else where it's easier to do so! That is, only if what Dad told me about having a companion isn't a drunken illusion or a joke of the sort, of course!”

????: “Whoa now, how could ya say that? Saying those sorts of things after grabbing yer parent with ya… My child has grown into an ungrateful son. I wonder, I wonder! What went wrong with my parenting…!”

?????: “Nonono, it's not your fault, Dad! You hardly ever raised me, after all!”

With those two noisy fellows bunched together, describing the ruckus as twice as loud would be a massive understatement.

Although there was a difference between being drunk on alcohol or drunk on oneself, upon hearing the voice that he knew belonged to an equally drunken man, the companion whom the two were on the search for—Heinkel, held his head in his free hand.

As the throbbing headache from his hangover kicked up a fuss about a pain caused by something other than the influence of alcohol, he adjusted his grip on the emergency food—the hyena human, who had stirred in his grasp, and then let loose a deep sigh that reeked of liquor.

2

The two idiots continued to make a racket on the main street, unmindful of the fact they were out in public.

If he left them behind and they were consumed by the surging crowd of undead as a result, it could be chalked up as them reaping the consequences of their actions. However, since Heinkel did not want to be dragged into that process, he called out for them right away.

As the two were invited into the house in that fashion, an unexpected plus-one had come along with them.

???: “I didn’t expect you to be staying in the Imperial Capital, Heinkel-san. I thought you’d have already ran away, or if not, then…”

Heinkel: “Died, were you about to say? I’m going to say the same exact thing back to you, Aldebaran.”

Al: “Al, please.”

Al, the man in the steel helmet, responded upon their unanticipated reunion, while using a finger to fiddle with the metallic parts of his helmet.

During the all-out battle that had encompassed the Imperial Capital between the regular army and the revolutionaries, Heinkel, as a part of the rebel faction, had been deployed to a separate battlefield from Priscilla and Al, so he was not aware of the outcome of the battle, nor their well-being.

An answer he had no means of knowing even if he wanted to. By chance, it had been brought to him.

In addition to it—

Heinkel: “So Miss Priscilla’s been captured, huh. It’s a bit hard to believe.”

Al: “Well, charging headfirst into unexpected developments is a part of Princess’s troublesome charm, but this time, even I feel like I shouldn’t leave her on her own. So, I ended up staying in the Imperial Capital, but…”

Heinkel: “Then, you came across that bunch.”

Al nodded at Heinkel’s words with a, “Yeah.”

He was covered with his steel helmet, rendering both his expression and facial complexion unknown, but Heinkel could infer the extent of the hardship that Al had been wrung through from the tiredness in his tone and his overall mood.

Al was someone who could get along with Priscilla, the living embodiment of outrageous and haphazard behavior. If he was reduced to such a state, then Heinkel could easily guess the dreadfulness of who he had been dealing with.

Regardless, meeting the person who had made Al utterly exhausted was also a strange turn of fate.

???: “Well, well, I didn’t expect to have a reunion with you in a place like this, Dad. I thought I hadn’t seen you around for a while, but could it possibly be you who threw me into the Gladiator Island and plotted for me to play a role in a story about the legend of the island or something like that?”

Chattering away and lining up one sentence after another at breakneck speed, the boy who munched down on the dried meat he had arbitrarily brought out from the house’s storage cabinet—or Cecilus, as he called himself—was the son of Rowan, who had been tagging along with Heinkel, much to his astonishment.

On top of that, it might as well be some sort of joke, but Cecilus’s full name, including his family name was—

Heinkel: “—Cecilus Segmunt. The Blue Lightning of Vollachia.”

The Vollachian Empire’s strongest swordsman, and the immovable First of the Imperial Nine Divine Generals.

No matter how far he had fallen, Heinkel was still the Deputy Commander of the Kingdom of Lugunica’s Royal Guards. He at least knew the names of famous figures from their insidious neighboring country.

Peerless even within the blood-soaked history of the Empire, he was the individual who had taken the most lives in this world, and was also said to be someone so powerful he was a rival to the Kingdom’s Sword Saint.

Heinkel: “□□□”

Heinkel narrowed his eyes at Cecilus, who looked roughly around eleven or twelve years old, and scorned himself for even thinking about making light of his capabilities just because of his youth.

For the truly powerful beings, topics such as their appearance and age were simply nonsensical and would leave one with nothing but misery.

When Heinkel had first lost to his son, Reinhard, with the sword, it was before he had turned six years old. —In this world, those kinds of entities existed.

If anything, Heinkel had to admit that someone like Rowan was a rarity for him.

Similarly to Heinkel, if he was also the father of someone proclaimed to be the strongest, then having his own reservations regarding the sword skills and fame of his son, Cecilus, would be—

Rowan: “Hahaha, yer making me laugh. The battles to the death on the Gladiator Island are just exhibitions in the end, so ya won’t learn anything for yer sword or technique no matter who or how many people ya cut down in that place. Dumping ya in that kinda place’d be nothing more than a detour in yer path to reaching the Heavenly Sword.”

Indifferent to the thoughts rearing their ugly head within Heinkel, the ruddy-faced Rowan shrugged his shoulders as he brought the booze-filled gourd to his mouth, seemingly in high spirits as he conversed with his son.

Cecilus replied with an, “Oh, I see then,” not appearing the slightest bit worked up by it, tilting his head as he bit off a piece of the dried meat.

Cecilus: “Well, I did suspect that wasn’t the case because the direction of that sort of method wasn’t clear at all for someone like you. But then, it becomes more of a strange, strange mystery because I don’t understand why I was on the island at all.”

Rowan: “Now, that’s gotta be another odd, bizarre, and unusual way to put it. Anyway, it wasn’t arranged by me… Hmm?”

Rowan took a pause in the middle of his sentence, then gave Cecilus a long stare from head to toe.

Noticing his father’s gaze, Cecilus caused the sleeves of his wasou outfit to sway back and forth, performing a twirl that made his long, untied blue hair spread out.

Cecilus: “What’s the matter? Even if it’s been a long time, I would think it’s difficult to forget the brilliance of the leading actor that I am.”

Rowan: “Apart from that, wait a minute, Son! Where’d ya put Murasame and Masayume? Such fine swords aren’t meant to be removed so carelessly from yer waist.”

Cecilus: ““Fine swords”? Do you mean katana by that? What are you saying? There’s an unspoken agreement between you and me where I won’t hold a katana, and also that you won’t let me hold one either until I obtain a blade worthy of me. Woefully, my waist remains light because I still haven’t come across an exceptional katana I’ve been looking for. Shaky, shake!”

Rowan: “Hmmmmm?”

Rowan’s eyes became increasingly cloudy with suspicion as Cecilus continued shaking his weaponless hips. Eventually, his eyes widened with an, “Ah,” as if he had made sense out of the situation.

And then—

Rowan: “Upon giving ya a careful look ‘cause of this feeling of strangeness, whaddya have here? Cecilus, ya shrunk down in height!”

Al: “You realize that now?!”

Al raised his voice at the surprised Rowan, having been hit with a feeling of bewilderment that went beyond his surprise.

Next to him, the Cecilus in question echoed, “Shrunk?” with a clueless expression. Needless to say, Heinkel also had no idea of what was going on.

In his place, Al, who looked like he had an idea, closed the distance between himself and Rowan with brisk steps,

Al: “I want to make this clear, so you’re Cecilus’s dad, and the Cecilus you know was really an adult. That’s correct, right?”

Cecilus: “Please wait, Al-san, I’m not sure about that. In the first place, I wonder when and at what kind of timing are humans able to say that they became an adult? For example, if someone cut down another person for the first time, and if you don’t consider them as full-fledged, then it would make it so that the person who had been cut down was killed by someone who is only half-baked, so I feel as if this is a meaningless discussion…”

Al: “You shut up for now! So, what about it, old man?”

Rowan: “Ya don’t hafta press me that hard, helmeted sir. Firstly, from the eyes of a parent, even if their kid’s grown somewhat taller, they’ll always stay in the kid category, ya know. Besides, when it comes to Cecilus, that one’s words and actions never matured a bit from when he was a kid, no matter how much time passed…”

Al: “I’ve heard enough of the fact that you two are parent and child…!”

Bombarded with responses comparable to an avalanche by Rowan, who he had drawn closer to, and Cecilus, who was next to him, Al stomped the ground as if he was venting out his pent-up anger.

Heinkel felt sorry for him, scratching his own red hair roughly,

Heinkel: “So, Aldebaran. Is this what you want to say? Cecilus Segmunt over there shrunk down and became a child for some reason.”

Al: “It’s Al… Well, I know everything about how it happened and how to undo it, but yeah.”

Heinkel: “You know how to undo it, too…?”

It sounded absurd to just nod with a, “I see,” upon being told that a person had shrunk in size, but thinking back to the scene akin to the veriest hell he had seen during the decisive battle at the Imperial Capital, he could accept that most things he saw were not entirely out of the question.

If they could expect Cecilus to turn back, then it probably was not too much of a setback.

Heinkel: “Well, why don’t we start talking after turning him back?”

Al: “As much as I wanna do that, we need a certain old Shinobi to return him to normal. So for now, we need to go on while he stays at that size… Hey, why didn’t you notice that your son’s become tiny the moment you saw him?”

Al slowly shook his head sideways, then pointed the subject of the matter towards Rowan.

However, Rowan traced his noticeably stubbly chin with a finger at Al’s query,

Rowan: “Of course, whether my son’s big or small ain’t important to me.”

Al: “Hey hey, is this a contest to decide who’s the shittiest dad? Are the dads of the strongest in each country all something like this?”

Heinkel: "—. How about you? Do you know you've shrunk?"

Al let out an exasperated grumble at Rowan's answer, given abashedly by someone who was far from an exemplary father. Reluctant to react to Al's grumbling, Heinkel brought up the subject with Cecilus.

At his words, Cecilus, who was starting on his third piece of dried meat, laughed out, "Well,"

Cecilus: "If you're asking me whether I'm aware or not, then I'm not! Shrinking or growing, I've already gone on stage as myself!"

Heinkel: "Alright…"

Cecilus: "However! Howeeever! The things said by Boss, Gustav-san, the others on the island, and the rest of the side characters are falling into place! I believe the foreshadowing has come together!"

Cecilus hit the surface of a desk that was close at hand, his voice bubbling with enthusiasm.

The look on his face said that something about it had made sense to him, but it all sounded like gibberish to Heinkel, having only followed after the words spoken during their conversation. A shrinking body should be a grave matter, but all Heinkel knew was that neither father nor child took it too seriously.

Rowan: "Though, it all adds up now. No wonder I thought he was so calm even when he faced me. Ya see, we had quite the parting."

Cecilus: "Oh? I don't recall anything about it, but I'm curious as to how we part—"

Cecilus tipped his head sideways at Rowan's revelation, keenly stroking his chin.

A parting with a father which the son had forgotten. For all that, taking their interactions thus far into account, Heinkel imagined that it could not be anything but awful.

At that moment—

???: "—The fucker over there is the motherfucker that planned a fucking assassination of His Excellency and got sliced up for it."

A sharp voice cut in, capturing Heinkel and the others' gazes in its direction.

And there was the petite hyena human that had been fast asleep until now, picking himself up from the floor he had been left aside on. Sitting up in a cross-legged position, he glared at Rowan with a sour look on his face,

???: "I'm also real fucking surprised to see this shithead alive when he should be dead. Especially because I can't imagine that even the fucking dumbass Cecilus would fuck it up."

Cecilus: "Oh, you're awake, Doggy. Woof, woof! I'm glad you're looking very well."

???: "You're being fucking stupid as always, you piece of shit!"

Cecilus pouted with a sulky expression at the shouting hyena human.

Judging from his reaction, the hyena human seemed to be acquainted with Cecilus. However, it must be said that it was Cecilus who did not remember such a fact. —No, from the current flow of the conversation, perhaps saying that he had forgotten about what happened before he shrunk would be the correct way to phrase it.

It was a ridiculous story, but it could be because he did not recall anything from his adulthood that he, Rowan, and the hyena human were all on different pages, talking past each other.

Al: "By the way, who's this guy that was knocked out earlier? He seems pretty energetic…"

Rowan: "Ah, Mister Furball over here is General First-Class Groovy. He's one of the Empire's Nine Divine Generals, and Cecilus's colleague."

Al: "By Groovy… Oh, you mean Groovy Gumlet!"

Al’s voice rose a pitch higher, perplexed by the unpredicted identity of the stranger, but Heinkel was just as surprised as him.

After all, Rowan had only told him that the person was someone important without giving him any further information, so he had been carrying him along as a lump of baggage.

Depending on the situation, he might have treated the luggage that was the hyena human as a shield against the undead’s attacks.

Al: “Which means, even though one of them’s shrunken down, there’s two General First-Classes here. I want to say it’s giving me some unexpected hope, but…”

Rowan: “—? What could it be?”

Al: “Didn’t Mister General First-Class just say something crazy? Planned the Emperor’s assassination?”

Once Al brought the topic back on track, Rowan was once again at the center of attention.

For a moment, the hyena human’s—Groovy’s—awakening and his exchange with Cecilus had stolen Heinkel’s focus, but he did certainly say that.

Faced with everyone’s distrustful looks, Rowan placed a hand on his forehead with an, “Oopsie,” Rowan: “That’s a misunderstanding, ya see. I haven’t planned an assassination of His Excellency the Great Emperor. I only tried to have my son do it.”

Heinkel: “…That’s no excuse. So, as parent and child, you guys are both guilty of an attempted assassination of the Emperor?”

Heinkel stared at the blue-haired parent and child, stunned by the explanation that failed to serve its purpose as one.

He had never heard of the Emperor being killed, so it was probably just handled as an attempt, but that was quite an egregious rumor to have floating around.

However, Groovy shook his head with a, “You’re wrong,” to Heinkel’s question,

Groovy: “This fucker told His Excellency that his shitty dad was planning it. After that, the story goes that he went to put an end to the nasty fucking plot along with his shitty dad.”

Al: “But isn’t he alive because Cecilus didn’t put an end to it?”

Groovy: “I dunno about it either, fucking hell! OI, CECILUS, YOU FUCKER! The hell were you thinking, letting your shit-for-a-father live?!”

Cecilus: “Who knows? Even if you told me it was something I did, between the me of yesterday, the me of today, and the me of tomorrow, the quotes and exceptional directions of the sort that flash across my mind during the moment will also change. However, it’s hard to imagine that I failed to do it, so perhaps it could be that I purposefully didn’t do it?”

Groovy shot up to his feet, edging in on Cecilus, but the boy with a similar stature waved his hand with an unapologetic look, as if he were saying that the answer was lost with his missing height.

In reality, asking Cecilus about this when he presumably cannot recall his own reasons would be fruitless. Instead of clinging on to an unknown answer—

Heinkel: “Blue hair, why did you plot the Emperor’s assassination? Is your goal to overthrow the government?”

Rowan: “Hahaha, ya say such silly, silly things, redhead. My goal’s mighty simple. If my son were to do away with His Excellency the Emperor, the whole of the Empire’d become his enemy.”

Heinkel: “That’s pretty… Obvious, though?”

Rowan: “That’s my goal. A situation where those Imperial soldiers are gonna keep on attacking without sparing any time to eat or sleep… There’s no better environment than that to polish his sword skills between life and death!”

Heinkel: “□□□”

Acting as if he had come up with a wonderful idea, Rowan gave a good-humored, resounding slap to his knee.

Heinkel could only widen his eyes while frozen in place, unable to comprehend the logic he was voicing out. On the other hand, Cecilus spoke up, chiming in, “Ah, ah, ah!” after hearing those words,

Cecilus: “I see, I see, so that’s why! I have no recollection of it, but if it’s Dad, then he would make me do something like that. He would stop at nothing to reach the Heavenly Sword!”

Rowan: “Yer talent with the sword’s the real deal… But, when it comes to ya, ya hit the ceiling right in front of the Heavenly Sword. If that’s the case, I thought, why not use a somewhat heavy-handed method to let ya break outta yer shell… Out of parental love.”

Cecilus: “Hahhahha, parental love? That’s really unlike you! If you had human emotions like that left in you, Dad, then you wouldn’t have killed five or six of your own children until the talented me was born.”

Rowan: “Oh dear! There’s no room to argue ‘gainst that!”

Their biggest doubts having been dispelled, the eccentric laughter from the giggling father and son reverberated loudly.

While Groovy regarded their words with a scowl and Al listened to them with a hand to his neck, Heinkel’s vision began to sway in a bout of dizziness, and he bumped his shoulder against the wall.

Their parent-child relationship was unfathomable.

He struggled to understand what was driving him to go that far. Suddenly, the faint hope he had harbored towards Rowan until just a moment ago, a type of shared feeling he had for the person who stood on the same foot—the father of someone considered as the strongest, had faded away rapidly before vanishing completely.

He’d plotted the assassination of the Vollachian Emperor, been betrayed by his own child and fell short of his goal in addition, was considered long dead, and in a position where he would be well known for his appalling notoriety.

With all that in mind, Heinkel could not comprehend why he was able to laugh so nonchalantly.

Heinkel was in a similar position in his home country. Even so, it was terribly suffocating.

Even if he were only suspected of a crime he had no memory of committing, such as being involved with the kidnapping of the Lugunican royalty, it was still unbearably suffocating—

Al: "—Right, I got the idea that each of us have our own circumstances."

Al spoke out quietly, ignoring Heinkel, who was in the midst of a dizzy spell.

He, too, might have his own thoughts concerning the previous conversation between the father and son, as well as Groovy's status, in his mind. However, he gulped down the entirety of those emotions and placed a lid over them.

That was because Al had already decided what to prioritize in this place, over the doubts laying about in front of him.

Al: "We're all members that have something we're looking for, or have some objective at the Imperial Capital. The lineup might be full of talented people who don't really need anyone to lend a hand to them, but they have no reason to go out of their way to reject willing collaborators. Isn't that right?"

He asked, surveying the roster in the room with a glance.

Groovy crossed his short arms, puffing out his chest at Al's question,

Groovy: "I just woke up, so I only know the Imperial Capital's got this shitty ass earthy smell to it. Plus I don't wanna be left behind with this fucking dumbass and the fucking dumbass's dad. —I dunno whats His Fucking Clever Excellency's planning, either."

Al: “The primary goal is to fight off the undead, regardless of whether we’re enemies or allies… At least, I can believe that you’ve got the same idea as us, right?”

Groovy: “You don’t have to be worried for shit, it’s the same for me.”

Groovy asserted with a bullish tone, showing his agreement with Al’s opinion rather aggressively. Subsequently, after receiving his response, Al looked over to Cecilus,

Al: “I understand that you and your dad’ve got a unique parent-child relationship. I dunno why you’re able to get along and laugh together considering what happened, but the topic of parents is also a touchy subject for me. I won’t elaborate. But, instead of—”

Cecilus: “There’s no need to worry, Al-san. You don’t have to choose your words so anxiously. There were a few occasions where your decisions saved me during the previous battle with the archer. So! For now, I believe it’s unnecessary to have a clash in our objectives just for us to part ways.”

Al: “That’s great. That’s great, but also please don’t try to kill me on a whim. I can’t deal with it no matter how many lives I have.”

Cecilus: “Hahaha, no matter how many lives you have! Nice joke!”

Al: “It’s not a joke, though…”

Al breathed a sigh as Cecilus let out a cheerful cackle while making a thumbs-up.

Finally, he gathered both Heinkel and Rowan within his field of view,

Al: “How ‘bout you, old man? Whatcha gonna do?”

Rowan: “Whoaaa, helmeted sir! Compared to my son and Mister Furball, the way ya talk when ya invite us is as if yer being forced to speak… That wounds me, ya know.”

Al: “I mean, I kinda have the worst impression of you right now.”

Shrugging his one-armed shoulders, Al let Rowan know about his impression of him in a blunt manner, and then craned his neck in Heinkel's direction,

Al: "You might've had nothing to show for during the all-out battle, but you can make up for it if you go and rescue Princess. Without her, your wish won't come true. Right, Heinkel-san?"

Heinkel: "I…"

Upon being told that by Al, Heinkel clenched the back of his teeth together as he dropped his gaze.

Just as Al said, Heinkel was a part of the Priscilla Camp because there was something he wanted, a reward that he could obtain should she win her way through the Royal Selection.

Essentially, no expectations were placed on the contributions and capabilities of Heinkel himself. The only thing he was expected to do was to act as a constraint against Reinhard, who was allied with another candidate.

If he thought about it in this way, no matter how much he was able to contribute to Priscilla in this situation, he would only be achieving results that deviated from his original role.

Adding on to that—

Heinkel: "□□□"

Heinkel had already fallen to his knees once on the battlefield, giving up on fighting back.

When he had witnessed the sight that appeared otherworldly, as if the world had been flipped upside down on its head, he had lost heart. —Heinkel had tried to give up.

That was why he left the battlefield, drowned himself in liquor as Rowan dragged him away, and closed the lid on top of everything.

And yet, he thought,

Heinkel: "…Louanna."

Within his heart, where he had been told that he had an opportunity to redeem himself, a certain regret showed its shameful face.

If Priscilla had not seen him when he had run away, nor his state of mind when he had given up… If he could pretend everything was going well, he wanted to turn a blind eye to the fear that had once gripped his throat, and continue reaching out a hand.

Heinkel: "—. But, what can we do? Even if we band together, we're just five people. Are you saying we can save an Empire on the brink of destruction with this group of five?"

Cecilus: "That's certainly one upsetting, offensive opinion. Of course, we seem like a group of five people if you only look at the numbers, but the strength that lies within me alone is over and above the equivalent of a hundred others so you'd opt to reword it as a million and four peop—mrghmrghmrgh…"

Groovy: "Shut your fucking trap."

Locked in a battle with his inner worries, Heinkel sought for their chances of succeeding and outlooks on what awaited them.

As one would expect, General First-Class Groovy used his own hand to cover the mouth of Cecilus's meaningless banter aimed at Heinkel's words. Keeping Cecilus's mouth covered, he glanced at Al with a, "Though,"

Groovy: "It's just as the red old fart fucking said. Even though we have me and this fucking dumbass, it's not easy to kill the shit out of those motherfuckers outside."

Cecilus: "Byyy the way, I think we shouldn't do that. Why? Because of a hunch felt by the leading actor!"

Groovy: "Shut your fucking trap!"

Leaving aside the two, who began squabbling over whether they should cover Cecilus's mouth or not, Heinkel's doubts remained suspended in the air, unresolved.

Truthfully, Heinkel had already made up his mind to an extent. If he could settle it without giving in, then he could not afford to give in. All that was left was the reason he was seeking.

Al flicked the metal fittings on his helmet with a finger at Heinkel, who continued to look for the reason he sought,

Al: “Just as Heinkel-san said, we’re being way too ambitious if we think we can turn around the situation with just us five. That said, what we need to do isn’t something as grand as saving the Empire. —We gotta pave the road.”

Rowan: “The road, ya said?”

Rowan licked up the alcohol in his gourd, then wiped his mouth with a sleeve. Al nodded at his query with a, “Yeah.”

He turned his head, gazing ahead at the closed window; the Imperial Capital could be seen behind it, reduced to a city of corpses.

And then—

Al: “Saving the Empire is a job for the hero. We’re gonna create a starting point for it. As many points as we can, and anywhere we can get our hands on, because there’s no knowing what’s gonna come in handy.”

Heinkel blinked his eyes at Al’s words, which gave him the impression of sounding oddly confident.

It was as if he were implying that he had an idea of someone who could pull it off, but Heinkel had no idea of who that someone was, nor did Rowan or Groovy.

However, as the unbounded one regarded those words with gleaming eyes,

Cecilus: “—In other words, it’s foreshadowing!!”

In high spirits and highly enthusiastic, the young Blue Lightning declared as such, welcoming Al’s aim with open arms.

In terms of the power dynamic in this place, it did not take long for it to be expressed as the collective opinion of the five people taking part in this meeting.

Chapter 38:
Rowan Segmunt

1

—Rowan Segmunt was a Stargazer.

Stargazer, in a sense different to the official position of the Vollachian Empire, to which Ubilk, who was one among them, had been appointed by Vincent Vollachia for the first time; he was a Stargazer in the original sense of the expression.

Bestowed with a commandment that ought to be prioritized more than anything else in their lives, a being that would relinquish anything and everything in order to fulfill their grand purpose; that was a Stargazer.

One could surmise that Vincent's act of deliberately conferring the title of Stargazer upon the official position held by Ubilk held not only the purpose of bestowing meaning unto the aforementioned post, but even possessed the intention to reduce the very existence of Stargazers to a formality. The Wise Emperor's true motives may be ignored for the time being, however.

What was important, was the fact that Rowan Segmunt was one of those people bestowed with a commandment.

The compulsive force that acted on a person vested in a commandment, thus becoming a Stargazer, was quite strong.

It was endowed with power to interfere with human life such that it could provide a mere male prostitute the influential voice to frequent the palace as to provide the Emperor with his opinion, that it could cause a frail mother to forget the love she felt for the daughter to whom she had given birth while on the verge of death, that it could easily make someone abandon the objective they had devoted their entire life to.

Upon receiving their commandment, many Stargazers would have the lives they had been leading till that point distorted, coerced, forced to alter the principles of their way of life. And, they did not consider that as a tragedy.

Rather, having been granted a great ambition, one they needed to accomplish even if it took them their entire lifetime, doubtlessly believing that fulfilling it was the purpose of their very birth, they even felt great happiness.

No matter how abnormal, how pitiful it might seem to those around them, that was how it was.

But, in regards to that tragedy shared by the Stargazers, the position Rowan had been placed in was an exception when compared to his fellow Stargazers.

After all, the commandment bestowed upon Rowan Segmunt was to reach the Heavenly Sword.

—And that was none other than the great ambition Rowan himself had harbored even before the commandment had been bestowed upon him.

2

Rowan: “To master the way of the swordsman, many months and years spent with steel in hand—”

Rocking his head from left to right, his face flushed red with a scent of liquor, Rowan sang in good humor.

There was no particular melody to it, but since he was in such high spirits, he could not help but sing. Happily staggering back and forth, his footwork would appear to be that of a dance.

A while prior, slightly before the uproar of the black-haired Crown Prince had begun, the nostalgic fragrance of blood had hung in the air across the entire Empire.

An omen of war it had been; as the reign of Vincent had been so ridiculously docile, Rowan had had a hunch that its backlash would cause an extremely large disturbance in the world.

That hunch of his had been right on the mark. The Empire was now facing a moment of disaster, one in which even the boundary between the living and the dead was unclear.

Rowan: “Ahh, really, this is the kinda world I like.”

The world was estranged from peace, and the more chaotic the state of the world got, the more the way of steel would be refined.

He did not mean that more diligent efforts ought to be applied in that case, just that there should be more enemies who were worth slaying. But generally, it was quite difficult for astonishingly powerful beings to come into being during the midst of peace.

Even if souls did know where they would arrive, their frame of mind seemed to be harmonized with their vessels of flesh before inhabiting them.

Those born into turbulent times would come into being bestowed with the aptitude to live in those turbulent times.

Therefore, expecting those same souls to be dwelling within people born outside of turbulent times was a bet with really poor odds. Rowan had lost that gamble many a time, and was only blessed with Cecilus after killing eight of his own children with his own hands.

Upon seeing a drawn blade during their first bath after being born, Cecilus had been the only one to laugh at it as something he would come to love for his entire life.

Rowan: “To think that Cecilus has also hit his ceiling, and yet the Heavenly Sword is still far off. Ahh, ahh, really, really… I really was born in the wrong era.”

Using his palm against his forehead as a visor, Rowan grumbled out his lamentations many times.

The more chaotic the world got, the more into ruin that peace fell, the more the era would demand the overwhelming might of the strong. With the path to reach the Heavenly Sword having become so distant and steep, he wondered just how good it would have been to live in the era of four-hundred years ago, when all living things feared the Witch.

Had he been born in that epoch, there would be no fear of the path to reach the Heavenly Sword being cut short.

Much less, would Rowan have Cecilus—

???: "—Oi, do you intend on doing this seriously, you."

Rowan: "Hmm?"

A voice called out to his tottering back from behind him, and Rowan turned around inquisitively.

With both legs firmly planted on the stone pavement, the glinting eyes glaring at him from above belonged to a red-haired swordsman of tall stature—to a person bearing the name of Heinkel.

That man had ought to have been binge-drinking together with Rowan til a moment prior, yet he now wore a completely sober expression in stark contrast. Though expectations were that he would don a tidier appearance compared to the time Rowan had initially found him on a plain, he looked even more haggard than before, strangely so.

Rowan: "Yer spirits still kinda down? C'mon, redhead, let's just drink. The town's a lil' lackin, but fortunately those undead folk are leaving the food and booze untouched."

Heinkel: "Fortunately… Hk."

Rowan: "Ohhh, looks like that rubbed ya the wrong way."

As Rowan raised his alcohol-filled gourd up high, Heinkel grinded his teeth, his cheeks stiffening.

Since that response indicated refusal, Rowan reluctantly allowed that destinationless alcohol to pass through his own gullet.

As he had informed Heinkel, without paying much attention to the noticeable restaurants and residences, the undead were prowling around in search of the living, but their objective was neither food nor alcohol, it was blood.

That was to say, they were free to satisfy their hunger and drunkenness as much as they pleased.

Rowan: “What’s not to like about that? If stuff’s just gonna spoil if we leave it be, the rational thing for us to do’d be to have our fill.”

Heinkel: “Food and alcohol and whatnot, those things don’t matter in the slightest! I have no hopes for your sense of duty… for the sense of duty of both you and your kid. More importantly, answer me, do you intend on doing this seriously?”

Rowan: “□□□”

As Heinkel raised his voice, Rowan closed a single eye at those words, and kept silent.

The red-haired swordsman seemed to have grown irritated simply because he was unable to wait for those few seconds; unable to guess what his problem was, Rowan went without knowing what the answer to that question was in earnest.

Guessing the thoughts and feelings of others was something Rowan was not very good at.

That same defect seemed to have been inherited by Cecilus, but he would overcome that problem by force, making use of a different point of view. Rowan could not do the same thing.

In any case—

Rowan: “Redhead, are ya worried ‘bout whether or not I’m gonna take part in that helmeted gentleman’s plan?”

Heinkel: “That’s right. The flow of events brought me back here, but as Aldebaran said, this is a chance for redemption. I won’t screw this up.”

With a nod, Heinkel pointed over yonder—No, far beyond that, he indicated the sturdy ramparts that forbade one from seeing the outside of the Imperial Capital from within.

To the star-shaped ramparts used to protect the citizens from the rebel army in the decisive battle for the Imperial Capital, and thus —

Heinkel: “It’s one of the five bastions we’ve got to capture.”

His voice leaden and tense, Heinkel spoke of the target of their tactics.

The man in the steel helmet, the person known as Al had spoken of the “path” they ought to pave—foreshadowing for the sake of the “hero” who would come after Rowan and the others who were currently in the Imperial Capital.

Presently, the only living people at this place were Rowan and Heinkel, and luckily, they had not come across a single dead person. Cecilus, Groovy, and Al had gone off in a separate group.

All of them were taking action to open holes in the strong bulwark that safeguarded the Imperial Capital.

The method that Rowan, Heinkel, and Groovy had employed to enter the Imperial Capital had been quite illogical, so it would likely be difficult for others to replicate. In that case, the notion that they had to create passages was a proposal that made sense.

Then, after parting ways with his son, who was boisterous even after being shrunken, the middle-aged duo began a carefree journey —preventing them from doing so was the heat Heinkel was filled with. Wondering what to do, Rowan scratched his cheek.

Ignoring Rowan’s sentiment, Heinkel clicked his tongue, and,

Heinkel: “To be honest, I don’t get what your son meant by “foreshadowing”, but…”

Rowan: “Well, ya really shouldn’t worry too much about the way he speaks. Anyhow, there ain’t no doubt about the fact that things won’t be able to proceed as long as those ramparts are in use.”

Heinkel: “If you understand that…!”

Rowan: “—Why would I choose not to take part?”

As Heinkel bared his teeth and shouted, Rowan interrupted the words of the former and shrugged his shoulders.

His daunted face was actually hilarious, and Rowan wished to say that it would be delicious to drink alcohol while gazing at it, but going too hard on the booze would be a mistake. It would be a hassle to procure alcohol at this place, and there was no guarantee that the man in front of him would not carelessly draw his sword.

Rowan: “Nah, redhead here ain’t drawing his sword against me.”

Heinkel: “—Hk.”

Rowan: “Ahh, ahh, ya really don’t need to feel any shame. At the very least, I’m the type who doesn’t think it’s very brave to draw yer blade on anyone and everyone without distinction… since I don’t get the difference between what’s scary or not in the slightest.”

Tapping the side of his head with his finger, he touched upon a shortcoming unrelated to his intoxication.

Seeing Heinkel widen his eyes upon hearing that, Rowan looked towards the ramparts,

Rowan: “The reason why I’m not going along with the helmeted gentleman’s offer’s exceedingly simple… His objective’s to retake the Imperial Capital from the dead people, right? That ain’t something I really desire.”

Therefore, he had no reason to cooperate with the plan to get rid of the Imperial Capital’s defenses.

Those were Rowan’s honest feelings, but Heinkel still darted his eyes about in bewilderment. Rowan believed himself to have given a relatively clear answer, so he titled his head in confusion.

Heinkel: “So, in other words, you’re taking the side of those undead guys?”

Rowan: “Why’d ya think that? That’s an entirely different thing, innit. For me, the country’s falling to ruin courtesy of the undead rampaging about. It’s just that a situation of this sort’s convenient, I ain’t taking the side of the undead.”

Heinkel: “…It’s no use, I don’t understand what you’re thinking in the slightest. To begin with…”

Rowan: “Hm?”

Heinkel: “Even if you don’t feel like doing it, your son… the Blue Lightning is eager to. Are you just going to overlook that, knowingly?”

Putting his hand over his mouth, Heinkel tried to chew through the information it had been forcibly stuffed with. However, the next thing he spoke was also irrelevant to Rowan.

While it was true that Cecilus was eager to go along with Al’s plan.

Rowan: “I’m me, and my son’s my son, that’s all there is to it. Besides…”

Heinkel: “Besides?”

Rowan: “For Cecilus in his current state, the summit of the Heavenly Sword’s become distant once again. By being shrunken, his skill with the sword’s been dulled. With how he is, he won’t be able to fulfill the promise we made when he slayed me.”

Heinkel: “□□□”

With a light stroke of his chest, Rowan reflected on the slash that had been engraved there.

Groovy had loathsomely spoken of the case of the attempted assassination on the Emperor. Rowan’s involvement in it was in trying to get Cecilus to do it, so he could be considered as having instigated an assassination. Either way, after that attempt of his ended in failure, he experienced the stroke of a sword as punishment, and even now he did not forget the scorching heat of that instant.

Then, upon thinking that much, Rowan suddenly cocked his head.

Rowan: “However, redhead, ya seem to be awfully hung up on the matter of me and my son. Thinking back on it, yer reaction was the most intense, redhead. —Anything wrong ‘bout it?”

At the fact that the shrunken Cecilus was Cecilus, and that Rowan was Cecilus’s father no matter if he was big or small, Heinkel’s reaction had been weighty and thickheaded.

Upon being inquired of the true meaning behind that by Rowan, Heinkel returned an unexpected answer.

That was—

Heinkel: “…I’m Heinkel Astrea.”

Rowan: “Astrea… Astrea, Astrea, Astrea… Oh, OHHHHHHHHH!”

Putting on more than enough airs, Heinkel gave his name, and Rowan gazed at him in wonder.

At first, placing the sound he had heard on his tongue, the conviction did not sink into his brain until he had ruminated on it a few times. However, the very moment it clearly sunk in, his blood boiled at its significance.

Rowan: “So that means, redhead! You, you belong to the Sword Saint’s lineage!”

The Astrea Family of the Kingdom of Lugunica; that was the title of the being said to be the strongest within the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, or perhaps, the strongest across the entirety of the lands of the Four Great Countries, not just the Kingdom.

A special mention went to the Sword Saint of the current generation, Reinhard van Astrea, whose existence he had heard to be exceptional across all the generations of the Astrea Family until now.

Rowan: “No way, no way, redhead! Ya didn’t pretend yer name was Heinkel while actually being this generation’s Sword Saint, did ya? So that means, yer a blood relative… No, is it yer son?! Yer son’s Reinhard! The father of the Sword Saint! Now this is quite the unexpected coincidence! What a bizarre turn of fate!”

He had heard that Reinhard was of the same age as Cecilus—the same age that Cecilus was originally.

If that was the case, Rowan could fathom a rough guess of the relationship between Reinhard and Heinkel, as the latter resembled himself in age. At the same time, Heinkel, having finished processing his bitter hangups, wore an expression of reaching comprehension.

Rowan and Heinkel were the fathers of the Blue Lightning and the Sword Saint—.

Rowan: “More importantly, this means that yer a descendant of an ancestor who reached the Heavenly Sword, right?”

Heinkel: “…ah?”

Rowan: “The reputation of the first generation Sword Saint, Reid Astrea, is true to the memory and the ears! In that case, as a fellow swordsman, I hold respect for those who’ve arrived at the summit that we all ought to aim for.”

The title of Sword Saint was proof of the extraordinary nature of the Astrea Family, and the first generation was considered to be the first to have reached the concept of the Heavenly Sword, a transcendent being who stood at the apex of all swordsmen.

The instant he thought that, it seemed as though his attitude towards Heinkel until now had been rude; hence, a wish to apologize began to rise. Just how rude had he been to a descendant of someone who had reached the Heavenly Sword?

Rowan: “Sorry, redhead. I apologize for all my impoliteness until now. I’d never even thought that a family member of Reid Astrea, who reached the Heavenly Sword, would’ve fallen so low.”

Heinkel: “□□□”

Rowan: “Redhead?”

There was no response from Heinkel as Rowan placed his hand on the katana on his waist, and deeply bowed.

Suspicious of that, Rowan looked with an upward glance, and saw Heinkel covering his face with his palm, shaking his head. Then, as he let out a long, frustrated breath,

Heinkel: “…Got it. I finally got it. Down to our very roots, I’m completely different to you.”

Rowan: “No matter what’s up, don’t let it get ya down too much. I’m me, and my son’s my son. And so, you’re you, redhead. Regardless, ya won’t be able to cut deep unless ya persist with steel.”

Heinkel: “—I have you to thank, for not letting me die back there. For that alone, I’m grateful.”

As if refusing to entertain the back and forth any further, Heinkel turned his back to Rowan.

For a moment, Rowan raised his head with the desire to cut deep into that upright back, but Heinkel was not the type to draw his weapon were his life to be in danger, so he decided to refrain himself from killing in futility.

Killing without any gain would merely dull the steel.

Then, Heinkel headed for the bastion he had pointed to, and would likely work hard to sabotage it.

If there happened to be a skillful individual there, it was unclear whether Heinkel had factored the possibility that he might become unable to do anything into his calculations, but if he intended on depending on Rowan in that possibility, Rowan was sorry.

But, Rowan had his own objective, and his relationship with Heinkel did not take priority over that in the slightest.

So, though he felt a bit lonely to be parting with his drinking buddy, they would just be briefly separating here—

Heinkel: “What do you want to do by neglecting your son, oi?”

Before running off, Heinkel called out with his back still turned, to which Rowan raised a wry smile.

This also went for his face and expression, but Heinkel really did not betray the impression that he was an unmanly personage. Anyhow, Rowan had no hesitation at that question, and while patting the sword wound on his chest,

Rowan: “Of course, it’s for the sake of my own dearest wish. —Redhead, I’m the same as ya.”

If he was referring to the matter of neglecting his son, then, they were the same in that regard.

Without any interest whatsoever in how Heinkel would respond to that, Rowan headed for his own objective, and broke into a light sprint through the Imperial Capital, where no living people remained.

3

—Well then, Rowan Segmunt was a Stargazer.

Vowing on his honor, Rowan also had a personality, desires, and a life before becoming a Stargazer, before becoming fully absorbed in fulfilling the commandment granted to him.

Of course, just like the majority of Stargazers, Rowan was bestowed with a commandment, and was compelled to change the way he lived upon becoming a Stargazer. But, to those around him, there was no noticeable change that could be perceived from Rowan.

That was because before he had even been bestowed with a commandment, Rowan Segmunt’s dearest wish was to reach the Heavenly Sword, and he was obsessed with doing everything that could possibly further that purpose.

Strong individuals who strived to master their techniques just like Rowan, fearsome Witchbeasts that attacked villages, people of the villages destroyed by those Witchbeasts, scoundrels who tyrannized others, saints who donated to others; he had systematically slain everything that could be useful for tempering his steel with reckless abandon, but he had not produced many results.

In various schools, he had studied, acquired techniques, then went on to cut down the heads of the schools; he had tried to unify the many techniques he had absorbed, but when he understood that it only led to the equilibrium of his own skills crumbling, he abandoned that as well.

Quite literally, he had continued to walk and walk and walk a path of blood, but the path to the Heavenly Sword was still unreachable; craving that from the bottom of his heart, he had even considered ending his own life—and it was at that moment.

That was when Rowan was bestowed with a commandment, and became a Stargazer.

The Heavenly Sword must be reached no matter what, such had become Rowan's destiny; that did not mean that he himself was to reach the Heavenly Sword, but that he was to pursue trial and error in order to produce a being qualified to reach the Heavenly Sword.

But, he did not know the correct interpretation. Fundamentally, Rowan's methods always remained the same.

At first, he could do nothing else but try and do everything systemically. He immediately gave up on the path of finding those who had talent, and fostering them to reach it.

He could always perform more skillfully when he did things himself. If they could not perform more skillfully than him, then the Heavenly Sword was just a dream within a dream, so it was better for him to cut down and discard that ephemeral hope.

While he was doing that, he realized it.

There ought to have been meaning in the fact that he had expected himself to be the one who should reach the Heavenly Sword.

Thinking that, he tried to aim for the Heavenly Sword on his own once again, but when it remained an unreachable path even after recklessly endeavoring, and recklessly slaying people, he relinquished it.

That was not it. For Rowan himself, it was not meant to be. — Rowan's lineage, ought to reach it instead.

Thus, through Rowan Segmunt's diligent efforts, a vessel to reach the Heavenly Sword, Cecilus Segmunt, was born, and Rowan's duty was fulfilled.

Seeing his child soaking in his first bath, giggling as he gazed upon the drawn blade pressed against his neck, Rowan was released from the binds that had tied him down for a long, long time.

When a Stargazer ascertained that their commandment was fulfilled, they were liberated from the role bestowed upon them.

Afterwards, what would overcome the mind was a loss of understanding for the sense of values that they had calmly obeyed until then for no reason at all, even distorting their beliefs and convictions.

Of course, the same thing happened to Rowan.

In order to fulfill his commandment, he had been desperate to create a child with the talent to reach the Heavenly Sword; upon seeing the child born at the end of all of it, the moment he realized he had accomplished it, it did not matter to him anymore.

As a result, what remained was his son who was recognized for his potential to reach the Heavenly Sword, and his very self, who had lost sight of his goal to reach the Heavenly Sword, and had squandered the prime years of his life for the sake of others.

Faced with that immensely unbearable truth, this time, Rowan headed towards the decision to end his own life, which he had been unable to carry out in the past.

But—

Cecilus: “Aaah.”

Laughing at the drawn blade which threatened his life, the son, having been promised to tread the path to reach the Heavenly Sword from birth, clutched the finger of the despairing Rowan, and those thoughts vanished without a trace.

For Rowan, who had cut down so many lives and basked in enough blood to form an entire lake, the shock that this feeble life brought him was unfathomable.

He had realized it.

At this moment, a being so weak that it could not hold even a single chopstick would acquire ability with the sword worthy of eventually reaching the Heavenly Sword. In that case, where was the reason to assume that his future prospects would only decline after passing his prime?

If a baby could reach the Heavenly Sword, then a path still remained for an old swordsman.

Ergo, Rowan forgot about his sorrow over the path being closed, and vowed once again to strive towards his own desire.

Bestowed with a commandment, fulfilling his commandment, having a child capable of reaching the Heavenly Sword born into this world, Rowan Segmunt was released from his duty as a Stargazer.

—Even now, he did not give up on the path to reach the Heavenly Sword, and continued to move forward.

4

Having separated from Heinkel, Rowan sprinted towards the north side of the Imperial Capital with vigilance.

Ahead of his route was the building that stood out the most within the Imperial Capital, the Crystal Palace, and there was no room to doubt that it had currently been transformed into the base of the undead.

Likely, the ringleader who was resurrecting the dead, with whom Groovy and Al were having issues with, was also present in the palace, but that was no reason for Rowan to halt his legs.

Storming the palace, and beheading the ringleader of the enemy faster than anyone else—Let it be known that he was not heading for the Crystal Palace in order to bring the situation under his control.
That which he had told Heinkel was no lie, it really did not matter to Rowan in the slightest whether the Empire was saved or not. His perception was that it was better for chaos and disaster to be widespread.

There was a reason why Rowan was possessed of a single-minded focus on hastening to the Crystal Palace.

That reason was of course, his biological son, Cecilus Segmunt. However, even if the reason were stated to be Cecilus, it was not due to any parental love or affection.

Rowan: “That damn dullard, it’s absolutely outrageous that he parted ways with the Dream Sword and Fiend Sword.”

In Rowan’s mind as he gnawed his teeth, two katanas that concealed tremendous power were pictured—Though there were many magic and holy swords in the world, only ten were swords of absolute power.

Two among them were Cecilus’s beloved katanas which he had parted with after being shrunken, the Dream Sword Masayume and the Fiend Sword Murasame.

Even if things were to take a turn for the worst, it would be troubling if those two katanas were to be lost.

It went without saying that, to reach the Heavenly Sword, the person in question was required to possess masterful swordsmanship and talent. But in order to prove to the world that they were the real deal, they must not yield in the aspect of using worthy steel.

And undoubtedly, Masayume and Murasame were two worthy blades.

Rowan: "I dunno when he'll return to normal, but without his katanas, he ain't gonna be able to fully take form."

When the shrunken Cecilus returned to his original size, him being without his swords was out of the question.

It was possible that, during a moment of this exceedingly massive disaster, Cecilus would reach the Heavenly Sword. If Cecilus were to not possess his katanas when that came to pass, it would be absolutely outrageous.

—Even if Cecilus were to reach the Heavenly Sword, were he to go without wielding his perfect katanas at the moment Rowan cut him down, then the latter would have no proof that he himself had reached the Heavenly Sword.

In order to secure that proof, he had no choice but to recover Cecilus's swords.

Rowan: "That bastard, what an imbecile to shrink and forget the promise he made with his father."

In the past, Rowan and Cecilus had made a promise as parent and child.

When Rowan attempted to quickly make the entirety of the Empire into an enemy, so that he could have Cecilus reach the Heavenly Sword, Cecilus refused it because "That's typical of a crude villain" of all things, taking Vincent's side as he tried to slay Rowan.

Then, in order to have Cecilus turn a blind eye, Rowan had made a promise.

That eventually, once Cecilus reached the Heavenly Sword, Rowan would definitely come to kill him.

Accepting that, Cecilus dropped a gravely-injured Rowan into a river, allowing him to escape. Having survived through the verge of death, Rowan continued to improve his skills as he awaited the promised time.

And now, that moment was imminent, constantly drawing closer.

Rowan: “If the location hasn’t changed—”

While vested with the seat of First, Cecilus had spent nearly all of his earnings on swords.

Therefore, he did not have a mansion befitting a General First-Class, instead living his life in a small hut constructed in the field north of the Crystal Palace. If that had not changed, there was a high chance that both the Dream Sword and the Fiend Sword were being stored in that small hut.

In order to retrieve those and deliver them to Cecilus, Rowan headed for the hinterland of the Crystal—

Rowan: “—Hk.”

He evaded the eyes of the undead, he passed by the Crystal Palace, and when he tried to proceed to the base of the destroyed reservoir wall, Rowan took a great leap sideways due to a sudden presence.

And, that had been the right thing to do.

—A tremendous impact crashed down from overhead, its vehement, destructive force generating a circular crater in the main street.

The walls surrounding the Crystal Palace that faced the street warped and crumbled, and as a plume of smoke akin to an explosion filled his vision, Rowan clicked his tongue and unsheathed his blade.

Utilizing the cloud-cutting technique he released a strike to sever the eruption of smoke, he was then able to lay eyes on the being present beyond it, on the culprit that had produced the impact.

Standing there was a lone woman, of tall, slender stature.

With long flowing white hair, the woman was adorned in a blue dress and stood with an elegant posture. Though Rowan was completely ignorant in concepts of beauty and ugliness, his values would evaluate her graceful physique as quite beautiful.

Her long-slitted blue eyes were pregnant with a hue of sorrow, which brought suspicion to Rowan.

Unlike the undead, she did not possess black eyeballs of golden irises. Blood coursed through her white skin, so the woman fixing her gaze on him was likely a living person.

However, this was the palace of the dead, the capital of the undead, that conduct should be that of an enemy to the living.

Rowan: “Over there, ya’d be—”

Woman: “—Iris.”

Rowan: “…Didn’t think ya’d introduce yerself so suddenly.”

His katana poised by his waist, Rowan moistened his lips, and narrowed his eyes.

She was a woman, but that was no reason to underestimate her. More than anything else, she was clad in the air of an unbelievably powerful individual. She did not seem to have a positive expression about wielding that power, but that was a matter trivial for Rowan.

With an expression that seemed to be extremely concerned over that trivial matter, as the fox ears hidden within her white hair trembled, the woman who called herself Iris,

Iris: “Return to where you came from. There is no need for anyone to die within the reach of my eyes.”

Rowan: “My goodness, awfully sorry about this.”

Closing a single eye before the woman who was earnestly appealing to him—before Iris, Rowan adjusted his grip on his katana.

No matter what his opponent’s intentions may be, if they were obstructing his way, there was no helping it. And above all else, to move aside when faced with this powerful of an individual was something impossible for a swordsman.

That was to say—

Rowan: “—The path to the Heavenly Sword is still steep. I’m gonna cut ya down, then further down the path I shall proceed.”

V!c.II2o

Chapter 39:
Laughter of the One Unbounded

1

—Cecilus Segmunt was a Stargazer.

Stargazer, in a sense different to the official position of the Vollachian Empire, to which Ubilk, who was one among them, had been appointed by Vincent Vollachia for the first time; he was a Stargazer in the original sense of the expression—Bestowed with a commandment, they were beings that would relinquish anything and everything in order to fulfill their grand purpose.

The compulsive force that acted on a person vested in a commandment, thus becoming a Stargazer, was quite strong.

It was endowed with power to interfere with human life such that it could provide a mere male prostitute the influential voice to frequent the palace as to provide the Emperor with his opinion, that it could cause a frail mother to forget the love she felt for the daughter to whom she had given birth while on the verge of death, that it could easily make someone abandon the objective they had devoted their entire life to, to the point of even contemplating suicide for that purpose.

Upon receiving their commandment, many Stargazers would have the lives they had been leading til that point distorted, coerced, forced to alter the principles of their way of life. And, they did not consider that as a tragedy.

No matter how abnormal, how pitiful it might seem to those around them, that was how it was.

Amidst those Stargazers, Rowan Segmunt stood as the sole exception.

After all, the commandment bestowed upon him overlapped with the great ambition he had aimed for originally, henceforth, it did not seem to those around him that his way of life had been distorted; only the person in question held that impression.

How the wish he held dearest and the commandment he had been bestowed came to a compromise, and how his current faith had been established have already been delved into, thus, they shall be omitted.

What shall be discussed here is the being who had been born into this world as the end result of the commandment bestowed upon Rowan Segmunt, Cecilus Segmunt, the fact that he too was a Stargazer, and—

—The reality that, among the Stargazers, Cecilus Segmunt was the sole one unbounded.

2

Cecilus, with the hem of his hakama fluttering in the blowing wind, rested his hand on his forehead to make a visor as he gazed out into the scenery of the distance.

Al had proposed a strategy to bring down the five bastions of star-shaped ramparts that enclosed the Imperial Capital.

In order to draw in reinforcements from the outside, they would open holes in the solid defenses of the undead. Cecilus would warmly welcome more actors who shine onstage and audience members who would bear witness to his flourishing activities.

If this could be called foreshadowing for later exciting developments, then it would not be a bad idea to work diligently at a modest job.

Cecilus: “Nonetheless! Don’t forget that it’s only because I’ve promised a reward hereafter!”

In theater, in war, and in everything else, there was something known as the right person in the right place.

No matter where one was in the world, they were always on the stage—that philosophy of Cecilus’s would take a long time to explain, but different people were suited to different things, and if whether small work and steady accumulation were strong points of Cecilus or not had to be said, they would have to be major miscastings.

From the standpoint of the stage direction, it would really be putting the ground dragon before the carriage to have the leading actor, the center of the stage who captivates the audience's eyes, work under the cover of a stagehand's dark clothes.

Cecilus: "Wouldn't everyone in the audience agree with that point?"

Tilting his head to look up at the sky, Cecilus addressed his words to an unseen party.

Of course, under normal circumstances, if one were to perform such an action, the sky overcast with black clouds would never return an answer to those on the ground. —Indeed, under normal circumstances.

However, Cecilus was not normal, he was the leading actor of this world.

—Inaudible to others, voices from the audience were returned only to Cecilus.

In loud voices that seemed to whisper, in manners as dignified as they were imprudent, and in divine tones seemingly incognizant of the very concept of etiquette, the voices spoke to Cecilus.

Moreover—

???: "■■■■." / "■●■●■●■." / "—■■." / "●●●●●!!" / "■■■■●●■■." / "●●■■●■■●●." / "■■!!" / "●●●■■■." / "■■■●■●●■■●●." / "●●■●■●●●■■●—" / "●●…■." / "●■●■●■●■."

With excessive force and quantity, they poured down upon Cecilus.

Wildly enthusiastic that they had been addressed by the leading actor, Cecilus, the audience eagerly gave him their answers—no, that was incorrect. These were not answers that had been arranged in response to what Cecilus had asked just now.

These were the voices that poured down upon Cecilus's every move, every single action that he took.

They were something that Cecilus had been hearing ceaselessly ever since he became aware of his surroundings, things that was trying to force all of Cecilus's conduct to do this, or do that—

Cecilus: "Hahaha, it seems like you're enjoying yourselves in awfully good moods today as well! I know, I know. After all, I can't help but captivate people with my every action! You won't be able to take your eyes off of my activities for even a second in the future, so stay tuned for those unfolding developments!"

For Cecilus, who had never listened to a single word he was told, those were just enthusiastic cheers from his fans.

—As previously mentioned, Cecilus Segmunt was a Stargazer.

And, for the majority of Stargazers—no, even for Rowan Segmunt, who stood as an exception, their ways of life were distorted in order to fulfill the commandment bestowed upon them.

Such was the extent of a commandment's coercive power, and the lives of Stargazers were dominated by it.

That was, save for Cecilus Segmunt, the sole unbounded Stargazer.

Cecilus: "Thank you, thank you, thank you for all of your cheers. As usual, I have not the slightest understanding of what you're saying at all, nor do I have the ears to listen, but don't worry! I will betray your predictions! I will live up to expectations! For that is the way I live my life as the leading actor!"

???: "—Oh, you fucking shitforbrains. Stop making a racket; it'll be a fucking pain in the ass if they find us."

Cecilus: "Whoopsie."

Taking just the enthusiasm of the audience and ignoring the rest of it as usual, Cecilus turned around at the call of the hyena-man—of Groovy, who was approaching him from behind.

With a hand placed on his hip, Groovy had a vigilant gaze, and Cecilus admired that.

This beastman warrior, Groovy, who was no taller than himself, was very good.

First of all, there was charm and beauty in his appearance. He was also likely strong enough to be entered amongst the top five most skilled fighters Cecilus had seen since he exited the island. Cecilus had hopes that he would have an interesting fighting style that could not simply be measured by sword ability.

Cecilus: “Regrettably, there is a bit of a problem with your use of words. If you use so many foul words in rapid succession, your dignity will deteriorate! Once it deteriorates, you won’t even be able to maintain your status as a skilled personage. If you go down the path of fighting to the death with me, I would at least expect my opponent to have an appropriate status!”

Groovy: “Don’t be a such a fucking goddamn idiot saying all these fucking illogical things! First of all, who in the fuck is going to fight you to the death asshole?! That Chisha prick had the nerve to do such a fucking unnecessary thing…”

Cecilus: “Oyaoya, that’s a name I’ve heard in passing. Your unfriendly reply is worrisome, but what does this person, whose name has been brought up here, have to do with me, exactly?”

Groovy: “He’s got plenty to do with you, with how you’ve shrunk and lost your memory. —The one who shrunk you is Chisha, the guy with a head that’s way too fucking big.”

Hearing Groovy’s response, Cecilus made a “Mmmm” sound with his throat.

He was often told that he had shrunk, but as usual, that did not really click with Cecilus. Whether Cecilus had shrunk or not, as far as he was concerned, his self currently present here like this was his entirety.

Of course, the fact that Rowan had grown old in the small time since their last encounter, and that the alias of Blue Lightning, a name that was sure to shake the world in the years to come, was already known far and wide, was not without its persuasive power.

Cecilus: “It’s quite the dubious tale that this Chisha person made me small, isn’t it?”

Groovy: “Ahh? Are you going to give me some fucking shit about how it’s impossible for people to shrink, asshole?”

Cecilus: “No, no, you’ve got it all wrong. There are no limits as to what people can imagine, and what they envision can certainly come true. This kind of fairness is one of the reasons why I like the stage that is this world so much, so there’s always gonna be mysteries of stuff like people shrinking. The part I’m having difficulty believing is quite simple. —Who could ever perform such a surprise attack on me?”

Groovy: “□□□”

In response to Cecilus’s question, with his hands clasped behind his head, Groovy made a solemn face.

Even his wrinkled expression had a charm to it, making one think that every stage needed a lively character like Groovy. Yet, even for him, Cecilus’s question seemed to have an impact.

Cecilus himself did not think he was invincible or immortal.

If his heart were gouged out, his slender neck severed, or nearly half of his blood drained, he would die, like any other person.

But who, for that matter, would be capable of such a deed?

In this regard, Groovy realized the contradiction in his own thoughts. No matter who the adversary was, no one could diminish Cecilus—.

Groovy: “—Did that bastard Chisha twist your brain, or were you just fucking careless, asshole?”

Cecilus: "Huh?! Are you saying that while looking at me?!"

Groovy: "I am. I'm saying it for fuck's sake."

Cecilus: "Is that really such a natural thing? Ahaha, that's a low blow, but you got me!"

Laughing and clapping his hands in response to Groovy's words, Cecilus shook his head, as if to say, "Wait a minute".

It was an evaluation that made one want to cover their face in embarrassment. Although, Cecilus understood his own abilities, and even someone as strong as Groovy could not completely dispel such doubts.

Cecilus: "In the end, someone as big as me isn't anything special! I will never become someone who receives such evaluations given my current sorry state! Please wait and see in ten years!"

Groovy: "Who's gonna stick around for your growth for a whole ten years! Quit talking fucking shit and get back to your original size already!"

Cecilus: "But even if you tell me to return to my original size right away, I don't particularly want to… And do you, Groovy-san, know how to revert back?"

Groovy: "I don't know, but that bastard Chisha who set this up probably does. These shinobi tricks have some fucking time or condition-based restrictions. Chisha would likely have some conditions."

Cecilus: "Hoho, so this Chisha person is a shinobi? Are they an acquaintance or friend or blood relative of that energetic old man?"

Groovy: "I don't know, and Chisha isn't a shinobi. It's just his method that's shinobi-like… Ah, this is fucking annoying."

Groovy scratched his head vigorously, complaining like a know-it-all.

Cecilus had a hunch that Groovy seemed knowledgeable about various things, but what was more important than the true identity of this Chisha person was probably clearing the conditions he had set.

If he were to ask that, Groovy would probably get angry and say, “There’s no way I would know!”.

Cecilus: “So what do you think the conditions are for me to revert?”

Groovy: “I have no damn clue!”

Cecilus: “See?”

Cecilus chuckled, just as he had anticipated, while Groovy grumbled unhappily with an “Ah?”.

Just then, as the two were conversing—

???: “Sorry to interrupt your fun conversation, friends, but can we put an end to this amusement time for now?”

Cecilus: “Oya, it’s Al-san.”

The owner of the weary, exasperated voice was Al, who had arrived on the rooftop where Cecilus and Groovy were standing.

He appeared from the stairs on the top floor and tapped his foot on the steps.

Al: “I’m serious, please. It’s tough when you casually hop up to the rooftop, leaving me to use the stairs. Groovy, you too.”

Groovy: “Fuck, sorry. I got carried away with this fucking idiot’s chatter.”

Groovy, with a frown, sincerely apologized to Al, who had been left waiting downstairs.

Cecilus had gone up to the building for a quick lookout, as Groovy had expressed concern about something across the street, but he had gotten a bit too distracted.

In any case—

Cecilus: “Well, well, Al-san, don’t be so angry. Groovy-san seems to be reflecting with his ears drooping like this, so you must be feeling forgiving by now, right?”

Al: “I’m not surprised by your relentless ‘do-it-my-way’ attitude anymore. But more importantly, did you notice anything while you were observing?”

Cecilus: “That’s right. —As expected, the defenses at numbers three, four and five look strong. It seems like a natural strategy considering the direction Boss’s group likely retreated.”

Al: “Those three spots…”

With his one-armed right hand, Al touched the fittings of the helmet, and Cecilus pondered Al’s response.

The numbers Cecilus mentioned were names for the bastions of the star-shaped city walls surrounding the Imperial Capital.

With a palace located in its northmost extreme, the entrances to this Capital□□ The southernmost bastion was number one, the southeast was number two, the southwest was number three, and following that, the northeast was number four and the northwest was number five; such was how the bastions were numbered.

The northern and western sides, the defenses of the three points corresponding to those were strong enough to be said to be impenetrable. On the other hand, the two other locations could be their opportunity, but—

Groovy: “Purposely leaving such easily identifiable holes smells fishy.”

Cecilus: “Can Groovy-san’s nose also detect the smell of such sinister designs?”

Groovy: “There’s no way it’s built that fucking weirdly! This is just my judgment as a General! Don’t try to use your shrinkage as an excuse, either… ah nevermind, there’s no point.”

Al: “What is it? Doesn’t it bother you when someone stops talking midway through their sentence?”

Groovy: “From the start, this fucking dickhead didn’t do his job of General even before he shrank.”

Upon the words of Groovy, who had made a bitter face, Cecilus and Al gave an “Ahh” in comprehension.

From Cecilus’s perspective, he did not get the impression that he was being made fun of, but that it was simply a fact. Supposing Cecilus really did shrink as a result of carelessness, it was unthinkable that he would have guided or gotten close to anyone before he shrunk.

So he had no particular objection to Groovy’s point.

Cecilus: “But to be rather candid about it I do agree with you. However if that’s the case then you know what that means, right? Surprisingly, or rather, beyond expectations, Al-san is quite the tactician.”

Al: “…What do you mean?”

Cecilus: “After all number one and two look easy to conquer but they’re actually a trap luring you in… That’s where you sent my dad and his friend, so you’re a tactician.”

Al: “□□□”

As they talked about the two people who were not present and were working separately, Rowan and Heinkel, Cecilus smiled in Al’s direction, the latter having suggested splitting up the group.

In front of the smiling Cecilus, Al held his breath and fell silent.

Currently, the group of five members were divided into teams of three and two respectively, and each were on a mission to capture the five bastions.

And, the one who had instructed Rowan and Heinkel to attack the south and southeast, the first and second bastions, was Al, and his intentions were clear.

Cecilus: “If there are relationships or war assets that aren’t painful to lose, they’ll be used as sacrificial pawns to attract the enemy’s attention. Al-san might be modest, but you’re still a tactician!”

Al: “…Do you have a problem with the way I used your old man?”

Cecilus: “No? As a performer, I welcome this as opposed to having the spotlight scattered all over the place with five people clumped together, and in terms of tactics, it’s a very practical way of thinking. It’s not really my place to say this, but it’s completely futile to expect my Dad to be cooperative!”

Al: “True, that’s an issue you mentioned.”

When it came to cooperation, one could only assume that the parent-child Segmunt duo were born with a fault.

In any case, Al had racked his brain over how to make the best use of his limited war potential. If one’s head for thinking or tactical intuition were working, one might be able to imagine what role would be required.

Groovy: “There’s no way we can leisurely take our fucking time to capture them one by one with a five man group. If those red and blue old farts can’t realize that, there’s no choice but to have ‘em do their fucking jobs as sacrificial pawns.”

Al: “Yeah. We can’t cause a big uproar in one place and gather all our resources there.”

Cecilus: “Hence the distributed attack… but it was a bit surprising. You see, Al-san was talking to Heinkel-san like you guys were comrades.”

Al: “I’m no hero. My priorities are in order.”

Spoken in a somewhat self-mocking way, that seemed to not be about the utility of Heinkel, but rather to be concerned with how he used himself; such was how it felt to Cecilus.

That response did not really change his impression of Al, but—

Cecilus: “—I see. You sure are different from Boss.”

Al: “□□□”

For some reason, Al turned to face Cecilus, who had said what he was thinking aloud.

Al’s expression was hidden by his iron helmet, however, sometimes the sharpness and heat of one’s gaze spoke more eloquently about what they felt on the inside than words or expressions could.

Cecilus: “Well, just because it’s true at times doesn’t mean it’s true right now.”

Al: “…I don’t know what you’re talking about, but fine. You’re right that I’m not like bro.”

Cecilus: “Hmm? It’s natural for things to be different, so it doesn’t really matter, right? Though, I think Al-san is tougher than Boss.”

Getting the nuance that Al thought of himself as inferior for some reason, Cecilus tilted his head in that manner.

Strong and weak, beautiful and dirty, like and dislike, those were all like the shifting phases of the same moon. Even if there was value in swinging from joy and sorrow, they do not have the weight to tip the scales of life.

Even right and wrong were not absolutes.

Cecilus: “Boss is the one who struggles against death in a crude manner yet still chooses the method that allows him to beautifully shine on the stage. Al-san, on the other hand, is different. On top of struggling against death in a crude manner, you pick the dirty method that makes everyone want to avert their eyes from you. I’m not saying one is superior to the other. That’s just the difference between you and Boss.”

Al: “□□□”

Cecilus: “Oh, putting aside the talk that wasn’t about superiority or inferiority, the matter of how you would like to be is a different story altogether. How you want to be reflected in the eyes of others is up to each individual to figure out… Defecation may be dirty, but I want to make even defecation beautiful and attractive!”

Al: “Dude, I was trying to do a little rethinking just now…!”

Cecilus: “Sorry, Groovy-san’s favorite word was still stuck in my ears.”

But then again, even though the direction that the conversation turned might have been due to Groovy’s influence, that statement itself was not a lie.

Cecilus’s pet theory was that the leading actor must provide a reason for people to keep their eyes on them, even when performing deeds that seemed dirty, unsightly, and would make people want to avert their eyes.

Groovy: “So? Are you done fucking wasting time with your nonsensical ramblings? Life counselling is fucking bullshit. After this is all over, I’m just gonna hold a fucking postmortem review at your graves.”

Al: “…When he says it this much, no wonder it sticks in your ears.”

Cecilus: “Right?”

As Al’s shoulders slumped at Groovy’s incessant swearing, Cecilus laughed.

Although Cecilus had made a lot of ill-suited arguments, he had no objection to Al’s plan and did not mind if Rowan and Heinkel encountered difficulties, just as planned.

There was just one thing that Cecilus thought might be a problem in Al’s plan.

Cecilus: “I wonder if my transcendently selfish Dad will follow what Al-san says?”

Unusually, Cecilus did not blurt out what he had thought because, also unusually, Cecilus had completely given up on the nature of his father, Rowan.

Rowan would not do what he did not want to do, and he would absolutely do whatever he wanted to do.

It was a disposition that Cecilus had inherited as well, but Rowan and Cecilus were not the same. This was the same thing he had told Al just a moment ago, and also previously to his boss, Schwartz.

It was not a question of right or wrong. It was a matter of the way one lived, and the way one died.

Groovy: “So, where do you intend to attack from, you helmet fuck?”

Al: “—. I want to avoid number three, since that’s the area where the sniper from earlier was. So it’ll be the number four or number five on the northern side… If even the slimmest possibility is a condition, it’ll be the north-eastern number four.”

Cecilus: “Eeh! But I want my revenge!”

Groovy: “Don’t say such fucking bullshit when there’s no leeway! Who do you think you’re dealing with—”

Cecilus: “Tsk, I understand.”

Groovy snapped at him, and Cecilus retracted his comment with a pout of his lips. Groovy, who had raised his fist into the air, widened his eyes at Cecilus’s reaction.

Seeing this, Cecilus responded, “What is it?”, and as Groovy lowered his raised arm,

Groovy: “You’re listening too easily. Bastard, you’re even more of a fucking bell end than you were before you got shrunk.”

Cecilus: “Hoho, doesn’t it feel like I’m being complimented?”

Groovy: “Shut the fuck up! We’re running out of fucking time. Let’s hurry up and go.”

Jerking his chin, Groovy turned his head toward the fourth bastion. Cecilus was about to follow with a “Yes, yes” when Al, the one who had proposed the idea, uttered, “Is that fine?”

Al: “I gave an answer because you asked me, but compared to me, you guys are… no, you’re more knowledgeable about the Imperial Capital.”

Groovy: “Not even I would agree to a plan that seems like fuckpiss. I don’t got a problem with your plan… I also don’t wanna throw down against that fucking dumbass Balleroy.”

Al: “…A former colleague of yours?”

Groovy: “That’s part of it, but it’s because he’s fucking strong. If you’re gonna have someone fight that bastard, it’d be Moguro. There’s absolutely no way that he’d lose.”

Groovy asserted that the sniper’s ability was strong.

Cecilus has also encountered this opponent many times in the Imperial Capital, but he had yet to even see him properly. There was no doubt that he was strong. Perhaps it really was a mistake to nod his head just now. Even if he began to complain about it now, would they approve of a change in the plan? Would they not?

Cecilus: “Let’s go in and get it done lickety-split. The goal isn’t to preserve the holes that we open, so there’s no point in putting it off.”

Groovy: “Be careful. This fucking dumbass is gonna wraps things up real quick and then go look for Balleroy.”

Al: “…Once the real star performer makes his entrance, by all means, do that.”

Cecilus: “How arrogant of you to call anyone other than me the star performer!”

As Al slowly shook his head and grumbled in resignation, Cecilus exclaimed in chagrin.

3

The journey to the fourth bastion was an anticlimactic and smooth one.

It was not as though they had not seen any undead searching for survivors along the way. But, they were nothing more than extras that passed by, or if they obstructed the way, then they would simply be eliminated.

Was there any actor who would go out of their way to give the spotlight to a minor role in order to liven up the stage?

Cecilus: “Unfortunately, an audience’s interest is finite after all. I’m not saying that there aren’t minor roles who give great performances that elevate the overall quality of the stage, but whether they’re actively sought out or not is a different matter… Nevertheless.”

Though he was enjoying the peaceful journey, Cecilus furrowed his brow.

Of course, Cecilus was all for eliminating unnecessary hassles, and he did not think it desirable that a performance would involve time and effort spent dealing with rank and file soldiers.

Still, the way Cecilus and his group looked now was unfashionable, was it not?

After all, Cecilus was on Al’s back, and Groovy was clinging to his abdomen—in other words, Cecilus and Groovy were making an Al sandwich.

If one were to question why they had come to be in such a situation, it was because otherwise, Cecilus and the Groovy would protrude from the coverage of the cloak that Al was wearing over his head.

Cecilus: “But this is unstylish! This isn’t how I market myself, Groovy-san!”

Groovy: “Put a fucking sock in it! Our presence may be hidden, but our sounds and smells aren't! If the nearby fucknuggets notice and surround us, we'll be in some deep fucking shit!"

Al: "Both of you are too loud…! And don't wiggle, or I'll fall…!"

Complaining and shaking Al's shoulders, the two of them wrapped in the same cloak were reprimanded.

The fur cloak that Groovy had prepared was quite the impressive piece of work. Apparently, it was an exceptional item that could be used to prevent the wearer from attracting the attention of others. Rowan, Heinkel, and Groovy had used this fur cloak to slip past the enemy's radar, and enter the Imperial Capital.

In fact, though they had chosen an inconspicuous road, the fur cloak likely played the largest role in the fact that they had not been found once by the undead.

Cecilus: "Even though it's so swelteringly hot with just our different physiques, I can't imagine how you and my father managed to get into the Imperial Capital with three people. But still, where did you purchase such a bizarre cloak?"

Groovy: "I didn't buy it. I made it. You're too fucking stupid to remember, but I also melted down your Fiend Sword and reforged it into a katana."

Cecilus: "Ho ho, Fiend Sword! What a cool name! I'd love to see it, learn about it, and worship it!"

Groovy: "Like I already fucking told you, it's your fucking katana, dickhead!"

Groovy performed the feat of yelling in a muted voice.

Putting aside the dispute of whether he had shrunk or not, it was quite interesting to hear Groovy describe the background of Cecilus, of which he did not know himself. In particular, he loved the topic of katanas.

Cecilus: "However it's interesting that you reforged it as a katana. Are you perhaps a swordsmith, Groovy-san? You must be very busy being a General and a blacksmith."

Groovy: "It's not like I specialize in swords. I make swords, weave garments, and also tinker with magical tools."

Cecilus: "So, this mysterious cloak is also some kind of magical tool."

Groovy: "No, this one is just werewolf skin."

Cecilus expressed an impressed "Ho" at Groovy's response, and Al's shoulders shook in astonishment. As Cecilus closely inspected the fur cloak,

Cecilus: "Werewolves are quite rare. I know they exist, but I've never met one before."

Groovy: "It's because they're fucking hard to find in the first place. The whole race is under a Divine Protection, just like ground dragons or the Uruha people of the Holy Kingdom. If you skin them alive, the Divine Protection remains on their pelt. It's an effective use of those sneaky fuckers."

Al: "The Divine Protection of the Concealing Cloud…?"

Groovy: "Ahh? So you know about that fucking old-fashioned name for it. "The Divine Protection of Ambush" is more common… although the topic of fucking werewolves isn't too common to begin with."

Hearing Al's mumbled comment, Groovy showcased his knowledge.

Regardless, werewolves were loathed in the Empire, and it stemmed from an old, old story. But then again, since the tale was based in historical fact, it was also deeply linked to reality.

Cecilus himself had no particular hostility toward werewolves or wolfpeople, but—

Cecilus: "Isn't it awfully ironic that the pelt of a werewolf is helping us, considering the way werewolves are treated in the Empire. Even if it's just their skin."

Groovy and Al: “□□□”

Cecilus: “Huh? Ignoring me? Are you ignoring me? I thought I said something rather clever—”

Just then, after Cecilus had thought that Al and Groovy both had given a dismissive response to his comment regarding the fur cloak—that such was not the case, Cecilus had also surmised.

???: “—■■■■■■.”

And it was not because the onlooker had been lively, as they usually were.

Al’s entire body grew tense as Cecilus clung onto him, and Cecilus felt the reason for that tension slipping into himself as well.

That was, putting aside the issue of whether or not he was shrunken, something that seized the inside of Cecilus’s thin chest.

—Gray thorns were swirling around in Cecilus’s chest.

Cecilus: “By any chance, is this appearing on the both of you as well?”

Al: “…Yeah. Oi, Groovy-san. With this cloak, I thought we shouldn’t be able to be detected…”

Groovy: “FUCK…hk! You gotta be fucking kidding me…!”

Al and Groovy seemed to be in the same situation as Cecilus, and Groovy’s discomposure, or rather, his anger was especially quite immense.

V!c.II20

Maybe it was because someone saw through the effects of the fur cloak that he was so confident in? —No, that was not quite right.

If the other party had located Cecilus and the others, they would not leave the three of them in the state of being a sandwich for so long. Of course, one could also say that these thorns were a warning.

Al: “Doesn’t seem like it. What do you think?”

Groovy: “—It’s an indiscriminate ranged attack. What kind of fucking wanker does that?! Who in the fuck is spilling out such braindead cursecraft…?!”

Groovy’s throat shook with rage, and he cursed the irrationality of the yet-to-be-seen master of the thorns.

A moment later, the thorns around each of the three’s chests slowly began to writhe, and the sharp spikes, slipping right through their hands, tried to exert the full effect of their curse.

And then—

Cecilus: “—As expected, it seems the world doesn’t approve of me sneaking around. Now, for this newly arrived hardship! Let’s flourishingly overcome it with a ta-dah!”

So spilled out the excited laughter of the one unbounded, just before a sharp pain seized his heart.

Chapter 40:
An Inconsequential Threat

1

—Heinkel Astrea was not even a Stargazer.

As was known, neither was he the Sword Saint, nor had he received the sword name of “van” that was granted to those who had made distinguished accomplishments through their own swordsmanship; his position as Deputy Commander of the Kingdom of Lugunica’s Royal Guard was also just a decoration.

Generally, he was a man who had not been chosen for a single thing that could only be obtained via being chosen; that was the person known as Heinkel, and that was not something that would change even when coming to the Vollachian Empire.

While being swept along, he participated in the battle, and he had his heart fractured by sights utterly unthinkable for this world; he had barely escaped death upon getting away, and being swept along again, he found himself returned to the same place, clinging to a feeble hope.

That hope, too, was just a signpost for escape presented by someone who expected Heinkel to play the role of a sacrificial pawn, and after abandoning all thought, he was too stupid to even realize that such was the intention.

—Therefore, unlike Rowan Segmunt, who had opposed the plan of attack due to his own insane reasons, he himself got the short end of the worst possible stick, trying to play his role in an honest manner.

Heinkel: “Fucking hell…”

Of the five bastions of the ramparts which served as the keystone of the Imperial Capital’s defenses, the southern and southeastern points that were supposed to have been divided between himself and Rowan were both now the responsibility of Heinkel alone; he thought that he ought to capture the first bastion, which had originally served as the city gates which allowed entry and exit to the Capital, so he headed south.

To put it simply, that was a reasonable decision, and an appropriate choice that had nothing to do with eccentricity.

Thus, Heinkel finally encountered the result of his reasonable and appropriate choice.

???: “—I, am Mezoreia. In accordance with the voice of mine dear child, I shalt become the wind from the heavenly skies.”

That majestic figure of the white Dragon spread its wings as if safeguarding the first bastion, and then—.

2

The room was cluttered with heaps of jewelry.

Craftsmanship abundant in the use of gold and silver, hair ornaments and clothing adorned with gems, various fine articles were all lined up, scattered about, and left lying around in the room with splendor that was clamorous to the eyes.

Right in the middle of the dazzling room, Madelyn Eschart awakened.

Madelyn: “□□□”

Blinking her sweet, golden eyes several times as they hazily overlapped with reality, the two black horns that grew from her sky-blue hair swayed from side-to-side, and her petite body stood up. In an instant, she collided with and fell down into the surrounding jewelry, but Madelyn was unconcerned with it being violently scattered across the floor.

Jewelry and treasures of gold and silver, she rather liked such dazzling things.

She did not like that humans were so noisy in spite of how weak and fragile they were, but their craftsmanship utilizing gems and gold had an irreplaceable charm.

It was not a bad idea to fulfill the tasks assigned to her by humans, so she could receive such things as a reward.

Heaping those up in her den, cramming them in, and surrounding herself with them as she slept took an important role in Madelyn's quality of sleep. —However, neither gems nor gold could fill the hole in her heart.

Madelyn: "□□□"

Swinging her upraised head around, Madelyn pushed the door of the den open.

This was different to the den that Madelyn had been living in for a while after having become a Divine General, and instead was a new den that had been hastily made for this occasion.

Her own scent was lacking, and the treasures were things that had been gathered from inside the palace, so while she was far from feeling satisfied, it was better than nothing.

Above all, there was enough reason here to abandon the den she had grown accustomed to living in, and relocate.

That was—

Madelyn: "—Carillon."

Exiting the burrow and crossing through the passage, coming out to the balcony where a tepid wind blew, the figure of a flying dragon resting its wings was present.

Carillon: "□□□"

Its name having been called, the flying dragon turned its head towards her—the scales across its entire body had painful looking cracks running through them, and golden irises loomed within its dusky eyes; a clear indication of the state of this vessel, which had lost its life.

Similar to the humans being resurrected one after the other, there was no small number of flying dragons being brought back from the beyond.

Only, she could not communicate with the ones who were wild when they were alive, but instead, she could establish understanding with the ones like the flying dragon before her—the ones like Carillon, who had been tamed.

In fact, having responded to Madelyn's call, Carillon quietly lowered its head on the spot.

Even if the other deceased flying dragons—the undead flying dragons, came into contact with Madelyn, they would regard her as someone who had life, and would relentlessly begin attacking her.

Of course, she had no mercy to spare for those who did not know their place, and did not hesitate in shattering them to pieces.

Madelyn: "I, the dragon, am friggin' sorry for shattering you."

Caressing the neck of Carillon's lowered head, the corners of Madelyn's mouth stiffened upon feeling how cold it was.

By nature, flying dragons did not have superfluous body fat in order to soar into the air, so their body temperature was low. Be that as it may, the temperature transferred to her fingertips was about as cold as touching decorative jewels.

Unlike jewels, however, she did not feel any splendor or beauty.

Even so, for Carillon to be present before her and moving around like this was of irreplaceable value.

—For Madelyn, Carillon was the flying dragon who had been tamed by the first human she had ever laid eyes upon.

As the final dragonkin in existence, Madelyn had lived without coming into contact with anything outside of the Cloud Sea where she was born, partly due to the nature of Mezoreia, who was a dragonhusk.

Excluding Mezoreia, the only beings that Madelyn had opportunities to come into contact with were the wild flying dragons that lived in the surroundings of the Cloud Sea, but even so, they were nothing more than beings that obeyed the dragonkin.

There was a difference between lifeforms; a separation between herself, a dragonkin, and the flying dragons.

That was something rooted in instinct, something that left no room to think about the reason or the purpose. No room was left for pessimism or doubt to be yielded regarding the divide that was only natural in their existence.

Someone who had never bore witness to the beauty of gold would never desire a golden crown.

However, Madelyn's satisfied days of not knowing about what was beyond the Cloud Sea, abruptly came to an end.

Bringing about that end was none other than this Carillon, and, soothing his beloved dragon who was reluctant to ascend due to the presence of the Cloud Dragon, Mezoreia, the straggler who had plunged right into the middle of the Cloud Sea—.

Madelyn: "—Where the frig' is this dragon's darling, Balleroy?"

While tickling the back of its neck, Madelyn posed a question to Carillon.

The vocalized name was one exceedingly familiar for Carillon, and placing that sound upon her tongue, it seeped into Madelyn's chest like a delayed poison.

This pain, akin to a poison eating into her very soul, was the very reason why Madelyn had run away from the Cloud Sea, and descended to the surface where the humans lived.

But, right now, the pain of this poison was on the verge of becoming something different to what it had been until then.

Carillon: "□□□"

Madelyn felt the pain of the poison within her heart. Next to her, Carillon slowly raised its head as it was still being caressed, and made a soft sound with its throat.

Realizing that the gesture and cry were indicating behind her, Madelyn turned around.

Then, the figure of a person stepped out from the passage connected to the balcony. That figure gave a wave of its hand, and assumed an easygoing attitude when faced with a dragonkin.

Madelyn: "…Such insolence, if it wasn't you, this dragon woulda friggin' chewed you to pieces with her fangs."

???: "Well, if it wasn't me, there ain't nobody who'd take this kinda attitude when faced with an exalted dragonkin. That's what I'd like to say, but contrary to what one would expect, there are actually tons of rude individuals among the Generals."

Madelyn: "That's friggin' right. Humans really are so tedious."

???: "Tahaha, there's nothing I can say to that."

As the person shrugged their shoulders with a strained laugh, Madelyn exhaled through her nose in an exasperated manner.

But, feeling that she had let the emotions that were difficult to hide slip into that sigh, she admonished her restless heart, and brushed off her mouth as if to conceal her impassioned breath.

The emotions that were difficult to hide—that was her ceaselessly overflowing passion for the person before her eyes.

Even if their complexion and eyes appeared to be completely different, her emotions would not lie.

The amount that she treasured Carillon, who had become an undead flying dragon, was something that she felt even more strongly towards him.

Madelyn: "Balleroy, where the frig' were you just now?"

Taking half a step closer to him, who had already come right before her, Madelyn enquired so.

He was by Madelyn's side when she had fallen asleep in the treasure-filled den. If possible, she would have wanted him to stay by her side the whole time until she woke up.

Madelyn's question left those things unsaid, and as if he sensed her unspoken feelings, Balleroy touched his head and said "Sorry",

Balleroy: "Somehow, it seemed like there were some rats scampering about in the Imperial Capital. His Excellency Palladio was making a fuss when they caught his eye, so I just went to do a bit of recon and report back."

Madelyn: "Rats… did you friggin' kill 'em properly?"

Balleroy: "Nah, these were some tenacious rats. When I said that I had let 'em slip, His Excellency Palladio furiously scolded me, I'm talking real darn furiously."

Loosely shaking his head, Balleroy's words caused the pupils of Madelyn's eyes to narrow.

The Palladio he spoke of was, if she remembered correctly, a resurrected member of the Vollachian Imperial Family. He was a man of the Evil Eye Tribe who, during the Vollachian custom of siblings killing each other, had lost to Vincent, the one who came out on top and became the Emperor, and he was resurrected thereafter—.

Madelyn: "If he is causing trouble for this dragon's darling, this dragon will tear him apart with her own hands."

Balleroy: "Don't say such frightening things. Even if he died once, he's still a member of the Vollachian Imperial Family… among those who got revived, the ones unconditionally obeying him ain't few in number. You'd be making those guys your enemy as well."

Madelyn: "—Hk, are you friggin' saying that I, the dragon, and Balleroy would lose to those dead people?!"

If he was, he would be greatly mistaken.

There was no way that the undead could win against Madelyn and Balleroy, who had previously cooperated with them. If anyone were to get in their way, they would utterly crush those people and put an end to them.

Madelyn's breathing grew heavy; however, as Balleroy gently held her slender shoulders,

Balleroy: "That's wrong. It was never a question of whether we'd win or lose, now was it?"

Madelyn: "What are you…"

Balleroy: "You oughta understand. After all, the freedom of us corpses is clutched in the hands of that Witch."

Madelyn: "—Hk."

At Balleroy's seemingly chiding statement, Madelyn forcefully bit down on her molars and fell silent.

The Witch was the person responsible for filling this Imperial Capital with undead, the being who had created the reason why Balleroy and Carillon were standing in front of Madelyn like this right now.

The Witch, who had constructed an unnatural body which resembled the dragonhusk of Mezoreia, was involved with secrets of Od Lagna that even Madelyn, a dragonkin, was unaware of.

For that reason, she was able to call back this many souls, and reconstruct them in their living state.

But on the other hand, if the Witch were to interrupt that miracle on a whim—

Balleroy: "As you said, Madelyn, if we were to fight, we'd win against almost all those guys. But, we're just two people and a single flying dragon, while His Excellency Palladio can command several hundreds and thousands of people. I ain't got a clue which one the Witch would find more useful.”

Madelyn: “Instead of us dragons, she would pick the humans?”

Balleroy: “I dunno. After all, nobody knows what the Witch’s extravagant desire is.”

Though it was nothing but vexing, Balleroy’s answer had a point or two.

The Witch, whose thoughts were utterly incomprehensible, was occupying the Crystal Palace, and had positioned Madelyn there on the condition that the latter would cooperate with her. It was aggravating to be put to work in such an arrogant manner, but she had already swallowed that disgrace when she had initially accepted Berstetz’s proposal and descended to the surface.

What was hard to swallow, was the fact that she did not understand the other party’s motives.

Madelyn: “□□□”

As Balleroy had said, as long as they did not know the Witch’s objective, the situation was tantamount to Madelyn constantly having the tip of a blade piercing her reverse scale.

If not for that, Balleroy would not have resigned himself to this situation, and he surely would have escaped to beyond the Cloud Sea together with Madelyn, vowing upon their promised wedding ceremony.

Indeed, their unfulfilled promise would finally—.

Madelyn: “Finally, we meet again like this.”

Balleroy: “…Madelyn.”

As impulse overcame her, Madelyn hugged Balleroy’s body, which was right in front of her.

Balleroy was far taller than Madelyn’s small build, and as Madelyn leaned her body against him, her black horns seemed like they would pierce through his neck. Nimbly evading them, Balleroy patted Madelyn’s back.

Upon that gesture, Madelyn recalled how, one time, when she was overcome with emotion and had hugged him, her horns had pierced him with full strength, causing a catastrophic accident in which Balleroy lost a lot of blood, and tears began to well in her eyes.

The embrace of his body was cold, and the skin she made contact with was not soft whatsoever.

His eyes, which used to be the same color as Madelyn’s blue hair, had become black eyeballs with golden irises that gave no sense of warmth, so his emotions were easily obscured by his outward appearance.

SETOWI

Nevertheless, they shared memories. Nevertheless, he knew of her wishes.

Losing his life, being parted by death, and now once again making contact with her, neither blood nor heat flowed in his body. So, what did that matter?

Madelyn: “Balleroy is here with me… This dragon, does not desire anything more than that.”

It had nothing to do with life or death.

The dead did not necessarily need to be under the soil. If, by some chance, the dead overflowed above the soil, and a treasured person happened to be present among them, who had the right to deny that repulsive miracle, and judge it as an error?

In front of this dragonkin, Madelyn Eschart, what kind of person would say that?

Madelyn: “—They’ve come.”

Burying her face in the chest of her beloved person, Madelyn, who had been enjoying the cold rendezvous, groaned in a low voice.

Guessing what the tone of her voice was indicating, Balleroy, who had been gently patting her on the back, stopped his hand, and turned his gaze to outside the balcony—far in the distance, to the south of the Imperial Capital.

Something had been caught. By Madelyn’s senses—no, by the senses of the dragonhusk, Mezoreia.

No matter what came, Madelyn had been ordered to safeguard that place.

This shall be repeated once more. There was indeed resentment. But, Madelyn would not hesitate. The thing she wished for, was right here.

Madelyn: “I’m friggin’ going now. Balleroy, this time—”

Balleroy: “I gotcha. As long as I’m not called upon, I’ll be by your side.”

Madelyn: “—Just as expected of this dragon’s darling.”

Things like “I’ll definitely never leave you”, or “I’ll always be by your side”; he would not say things that he could not do.

In an easygoing manner, Balleroy understood exactly what was within his reach, so without any needless expectations or disappointment, Madelyn could love him just the way he was.

She ascertained that once again—Suddenly, Madelyn’s body lost its strength.

Madelyn: “□□□”

Her limbs growing languid, Madelyn collapsed on the spot. Promptly drawing her body towards himself, Balleroy firmly supported the unimaginable weight of her small stature.

Then, in his arms, he picked up Madelyn, who had lost consciousness—No, she had regained consciousness.

Carillon: “□□□”

Balleroy: “I gotcha. I’ll be sure to carry her gently.”

Softly groaning, his beloved dragon was worried about the limp Madelyn.

Nodding at Carillon’s cry, as Balleroy turned his eyes to the state of the Imperial Capital once more,

Balleroy: “Even if she dies, we’ll meet again. I don’t desire anything more than that. I’m the same as you, Madelyn. —As long as we meet again.”

—The battle started one-sidedly, and it ended one-sidedly.

To begin with, a battle was a clash between those who had fighting spirit, and they would clash with all their soul until their will to fight was exhausted.

Following that definition, if one of the parties lost all their will to fight in a single moment, then that would not be a battle.

Mezoreia: “□□□”

That, was a person so weak that they could not even be called a threat.

With that said, there was no other suitable term to call those who turned up whilst still harboring hostility and malice. Thus, “an inconsequential threat”, would be the most fitting expression.

In reality, the inconsequential threat was blown away by the swing of a tail, akin to how leaves would be swept away by a broom, and was buried in the dust of the surrounding buildings that were also caught in the strike.

It was a rather unsatisfying result. But, it was not something that needed to be especially lamented or pitied.

As living beings, that was the unparalleled gap between a Dragon and a human.

Facing off against a Dragon, who differed from them in their very nature of existence, humans would easily turn to dust, quite literally.

There was no choice but to recognize that for some reason, in extremely rare cases, there were people to whom such would not be the case, but those were a mutation that emerged within the human species, and were, to put it frankly, some other entities that were not human.

Whatever those other things may be, as living beings, they were ultimately no match for a Dragon.

That fact would eventually need to be proven in a trustworthy manner, so once the inconsequential threat was moved out of the way, it would be acknowledged once again in a stronger manner, with the notion that this was how things ought to be.

In that sense, there was value in the existence of this inconsequential threat.

It yielded the result of the mightiness of the Cloud Dragon, Mezoreia, being made known to the Witch once more, and granted the Dragon itself the opportunity to reexamine the value of its own existence—.

???: “…Fucking, hell.”

Suddenly, upon hearing a voice that seemed to curse this very world, the movement of the Cloud Dragon ceased.

The Dragon had flapped its wings, had turned its back on the mowed down street, and had been moving to return to the ramparts. That was in order to demonstrate that no matter what kind of malice may approach, it would be unable to break through this location.

Those movements had ceased. Because a voice that should not have been, was heard.

Mezoreia: “□□□”

The Dragon slowly turned back around, and with a clattering sound, the mountain of rubble collapsed.

The street that had been destroyed by a strike of its tail, and the wreckage of buildings that were heaped up into spire; crawling out from within in a battered state, was a filthy human of red hair and blue eyes.

The human who had been judged as an inconsequential threat, and had turned out as such in reality.

Following the definition of a “battle”, if they had crawled out, and had drawn the sword from their waist once more and faced this direction, then the battle that was thought to have ended had still yet to reach its curtain's close.

However, there was no fighting spirit or drive whatsoever within the body of the human who had crawled out.

Human: "It's always, like this…"

Perhaps because dust had entered their lungs, the human muttered that out whilst violently coughing.

Once again, that was a voice that seemed to only curse. And it was not the Dragon, but the world that was being cursed. The foundation beneath them, the atmosphere enveloping them, anything and everything surrounding them, and above all else, their very self at the center of all of it; that entirety was being cursed by their voice.

Human: "At the most crucial moments, I'm completely abandoned by luck—"

Listening to those resentful complaints was deeply unpleasant, so this time it would drive its tail into them vertically.

Previously, the street had gotten caught up and was swept away, but this time, the Cloud Dragon drove its tail into the feeble figure that stood totteringly, scooping it up.

The tail did a single backwards revolution, and suffering that direct blow, the human's body was blown away like a pebble that had been kicked; boring holes through walls and buildings, they went through three or four blocks.

If one were to look down from the sky, the townscape of the Imperial Capital was laid out in a very satisfying manner.

The blown away body of the human was chaotically destroying that; since their way of being, their way of flying, and even their way of dying were all so unshapely and unsightly, the Dragon's nerves were thoroughly irritated.

The fact that beautiful things were being spoiled for such a person, was immensely infuriating.

And at the end of all that—

Human: “—ugh.”

Far away, after crashing through many blocks, a groan could be heard.

No matter how great the damage they had received, no matter if it was the strained breath of somebody who was on death’s door, such a thing should have never been heard in the first place.

Having suffered a strike from a Dragon’s tail, a being whose life did not burst apart, should not exist.

Human: “…I, am.”

It should not, exist.

Mezoreia: “ALL OF YOU, FRIGGIN’ DISAPPEEEEAR—!!!!”

Surging up, letting the uncontrollable impulse fill its breath, the white destruction was fired from the mouth of the Cloud Dragon, from the mouth of Madelyn Eschart, clad in the dragonhusk, and rained down upon the human who was supposed to be an inconsequential threat.

This was not a battle.

It was the beginning of a one-sided, or at least what was supposed to be a one-sided, slaughter.

Chapter 41:
Where Hell Resides

1

—Groovy Gumlet had no interest in Stargazers.

It was not a sense of aversion born out of disgust or hostility, but rather a genuine indifference in the truest sense.

In the first place, it was rare for an ordinary person to come into contact with those who spouted such kinds of nonsense as Stargazers did. In his position as a General, he would occasionally encounter Ubilk, who was allowed entry into the castle, but he rarely spoke with anyone other than those he had business with.

Groovy, also, could not recall ever speaking to him with the exception of shutting him up for constantly interrupting meetings.

Given such an impression, it was difficult to comprehend why Vincent, the Emperor, and Chisha, his trusted confidant, were unusually attentive to the movements of the Stargazer. The stance of the Prime Minister Berstetz concerning the Stargazer was unclear, but from what Groovy could smell, his loyalty to the Empire was genuine, and the complex resentment he harbored toward Vincent did not influence his judgment.

Therefore, with the leaders of the Empire having already determined their respective attitudes, Groovy, who had no opportunity to be involved, had no reason to take an interest in the Stargazer.

Precisely for that reason, if it were revealed that the clash with the Great Disaster, a threat to the survival of the Empire, had been known to the Stargazer in advance, his mouth would likely have overflowed with his habitual curses.

However, at least in this instance, the reason behind the familiar curses coming out from Groovy’s mouth was not anger directed at the Stargazers or anyone related to them.

Groovy: "—Fuck!"

Gray thorns emerged just above the left side of his chest, and the moment his fingers, trying to pluck them, passed straight through, the sharp thorns pierced his heart, causing an intense pain that made Groovy's fur stand on end.

The sensation of having a sharp object thrust into the innermost parts of one's body, especially a vital spot directly linked to life, was a pain so intense that even a seasoned warrior would not be able to help but writhe.

Infuriatingly, the thorns had no tangible form. It made it impossible to shake them off.

Gritting his teeth against the unilateral onslaught of pain, Groovy glanced to his side—at the iron-helmeted man whom he was clinging to around the waist.

Naturally, suffering the same curse as Groovy, he too was writhing in pain—

Groovy: "Fucking hell, get down! The fucking situation's about to get even shittier!"

Al: "Get down… Guh!"

Reacting to his unresponsive companion, Groovy punched Al's abdomen, forcing his body to move backwards.

As he groaned and fell backward onto the street, Groovy grabbed him and quickly pulled him into the shadow of a building just off to the side.

It was an indiscriminate ranged attack. Taking cover in the street like this was nothing but a temporary respite.

Cecilus: "Even so, we don't want to be seen making a ruckus and end up attracting the horde of undead from all over the place."

Groovy: “…Haven’t you gotten the fucking thorns?”

Cecilus: “No? I’ve received them. I think it would have been quite literally a floral gift if they had given us not just the vines, but flowers as well.”

Descending onto the same street as Groovy and the gang, Cecilus tapped the left side of his chest as he spoke.

Similar to Groovy, thorns were visible through his chest, and the pain should have been just as intense. And yet, he was grinning in the face of the pain that even furrowed Groovy’s brow—

Cecilus: “The conduct of a leading actor is always the center of the audience’s attention. If one twists their expression in agony after losing someone they love or a dear friend, it can be emotionally moving. But if one distorts their face just because they’re in pain, it will only diminish their acting caliber.”

Groovy: “So, no matter how fucking painful or fucking difficult it is, you don’t show it on your face. That’s your fucking dumbass mindset.”

Cecilus: “Huh? Have I already talked about this before?”

Groovy: “You did, but fuck it.”

Despite not wanting to hear any of it, he had been made to listen to the convictions of Cecilus, who tilted his neck, to the point they were revolting to him.

While many did not pay any attention to Cecilus’s whimsical remarks, Groovy, who could not let things slide when his feelings were captured, often became entangled with him. It was because of this that he had become familiar with said convictions.

However, now that he had even forgotten about sharing it, it became apparent that Cecilus had been living by this logic since before his limbs were fully grown, and this went from being impressive to being simply foolish.

And, as Groovy and Cecilus bantered with each other, Al: “Ghagh… Huh, the pain from the thorns is gone?”

Rising to his feet after having been dragged into an alley, Al muttered as he looked down at the thorns on his chest. Instead, he rubbed his stomach where he had been punched, and directing a resentful aura towards Groovy,

Al: “My stomach hurts even more from being punched… What the hell is going on?”

Groovy: “It’s your own damn fault for not backing the fuck off! … Those thorns, they’re probably affected by distance.”

Cecilus: “Oh, so you mean the distance between the thorn user and us? Certainly it would make sense if the pain disappeared as soon as we stepped back! It’s even easier to understand because we were clinging to each other. First there was Groovy-san at the belly, then the sandwiched Al-san, and then finally me at the back, and even though it was less than a second, there was still a difference.”

Al: “…But, the thorns aren’t gone.”

As he cleanly cut his finger on the untouchable thorns, Al muttered bitterly.

He was right, the pain had faded, but crucially the thorns had not disappeared. It was worrisome that, even though the obvious challenge of the pain had subsided, the thorns themselves did not. In most cases, this kind of residual spell had the effect of sensing the target’s whereabouts.

As long as those thorns remained, there was a high possibility that their whereabouts would be known to the other party.

Cecilus: “If that’s the case, even if we go to the trouble of hiding, they may suddenly send their forces against us. —I don’t think it’s such a good idea to kill too many enemies.”

Al: “You said that earlier. The reason being.”

Cecilus: “As I said earlier, it’s a hunch.”

Groovy: “…Your fucking hunches, huh.”

As Cecilus did not hesitate to state the insight behind his reasoning, Groovy was unable to laugh at such a stupid joke.

While this was not a laughable situation, he had a track record that could not be dismissed as nonsense. Cecilus and Arakiya were the completely intuitive types of the Generals First-Class, but they were intuitive in different ways.

Groovy, also, did not think that their opponent who had caused a disaster of this magnitude would make a dull move of attacking with just brute force.

Rather, if the opponent only used brute force, then they would be no match for Vincent nor Chisha—.

Groovy: “□□□”

For a moment, he glanced over at Cecilus’s profile, and then Groovy remained silent.

There were many thoughts going through his mind, but he knew that if their opponent had chosen to go with all-out force from the beginning, it would be a poor choice to clash with an Empire that contained the likes of Cecilus and Arakiya.

An opponent making such a presumptuous mistake could never be an enemy of the Vollachian Empire.

Of course, it would have been a different story if Cecilus’ shrunken state was actually part of the opponent’s plan, but regarding that, Groovy’s own sense of smell negated that theory.

It was Chisha that had shrunk Cecilus. That he was certain of due to the residual Mana.

And, there was no way that Chisha would be complicit in the destruction of the Empire. In the end, however, it was hard for Groovy to figure out what Chisha’s intentions truly were.

Al: “If our whereabouts are known, we don’t have time to think long and hard. What are we gonna do? Should we all go after them and confront the person who's putting this curse on us?"

Cecilus: "Yup. That's the fastest solution! But Groovy-san's theory was that the curse's potency is related to distance. That means that if we move away from the person, the pain will go away, if we close in however…"

Al: "This time we ain't getting off with a lil ache, huh."

Cecilus: "Looks like it."

While Cecilus put forth a guess, the mortified Al stared at the thorns in his chest.

Groovy agreed with Cecilus. Therein resided the horror of their enemy who was randomly scattering around a thorn curse on any target within range.

The closer one would get to the user, the stronger the curse of the thorns would act. Most people would probably be incapacitated by the pain before they could ever reach the user.

Groovy: "And if that happens, no matter how fucking stupid they are, they wouldn't be able to move."

Cecilus: "So, judging from that look in my direction, you must take me for a fool who rushes in without thinking, right? But as you can imagine, I won't rush in without thinking either. If I can settle the problem by cutting down the opponent while enduring the pain that would be amusing, but—"

And, Cecilus, after a clap, clasped his hands together strongly in front of his chest, making a sound. As he was, he interlaced the fingers of both hands together and, alternatingly looked at Groovy and Al through the gap between his fingers,

Cecilus: "That's not the case, is it? If it were a matter of cutting off the other person's head, Groovy-san would have sent me out and made me do it by now."

Groovy: "…That's what's so fucking nasty about this curse shit."

Cecilus smiled wickedly, and Groovy couldn't help but sigh.

If this were magic, killing the caster would usually cause it to cease functioning. Magic is invoked by the caster using mana to interfere with the world, so if the caster disappeared, that would be the end of it.

However, curses are specialized for causing damage that results in the death of the target.

For this reason, many of them activate in combination with the target's Od, and most of them do not lose their efficacy as long as the target continues to live, even if the caster is dead. For example, these thorns are clearly more dependent on the target's Od than the caster's and are a perfect example.

The only way to break this type of curse is to have the caster break it or use a secret trick.

Groovy: "There's a fucking sword, Murasame. Go get it."

Groovy jerked his chin as he gave his instructions, to which Cecilus and Al simply stared in puzzlement.

Groovy didn't mind Al since he'd never known about it, but he hated Cecilus, who had known but had forgotten. Groovy grabbed Cecilus by the collar and bared his teeth.

Groovy: "It's the Fiend Sword Murasame! That fucking sword is the fastest way to cut through curses, contracts, and other things that don't have any form! Go find it!"

Cecilus: "Huh?! Even if you say so, it's still a sword I don't know of! If you don't know where it is, do you want me to go look for it… or would Groovy-san know where it is by the smell?"

Groovy: "It's no use. That fucking sword cuts off the smell, so I can't track it with my nose. Even if it was in a pool of blood all year long, I can't follow the smell, fuck."

Even if it were not for that, Murasame hated Groovy, who had melted the sword and reforged it into a katana, and would not even allow him to hold it in his hand.

Groovy’s nose could not locate the Fiend Sword, which was as difficult to deal with as its owner, Cecilus.

Al: “—But with it, you can do something about these thorns, right?”

As Groovy and Cecilus exchanged a few words, Al stood up and confirmed the situation in a low voice.

At his serious tone, Groovy released Cecilus and nodded.

Groovy: “Yes. If it’s to be somewhere, it’s either at this fucking idiot’s house or in a secret vault, but I don’t think the fucking idiot can keep a secret secret, so he probably doesn’t have something like that.”

Al: “I agree. Where is the house?”

Groovy: “It’s in the Crystal Palace’s garden. He lives with Arakiya in a stupid fucking shack.”

Cecilus: “Wait, wait! Groovy-san’s always talking about a “fucking idiot”, and I think he’s talking about me, but there’s a name I don’t recognize, who is it!”

Al: “Arakiya, that girl, is she doing all right in the castle garden? What a small world…”

Groovy: “Nah, she’s probably not all right.”

Groovy wrinkled his nose as he replied to Al’s reasonable mutterings.

The relationship between Cecilus and Arakiya was unclear even to Groovy, who could only observe from the outside. They apparently had known each other for nearly a decade, but it remained a mystery how Cecilus felt about her. It was clear that Arakiya disliked Cecilus, but they still lived together and shared meals together.

If they were together, Groovy would be able to tell from the smell, but there was no sign of that. At times, they were a nuisance, as whilst seriously trying to kill each other they could change the topology of the empire.

Groovy: “But I don’t think that the Dream Sword or the Fiend Sword would be left alone even after the fucking idiot got shrunk. So it’s possible that…”

Al: “—. If they were to be put in the castle, they’d have done it from the start.”

Al was right in his concern regarding the uncertainty of whether they were put in the castle after the recovery.

If they were to be able to get into the Crystal Palace, they could not adopt the bastion storming strategy, as it relied on reinforcements. However, in order to receive the reinforcements, it is a prerequisite that this caster be stopped.

Cecilus: “Hmmm, what to do? Leaving such a great weapon in the castle would be a waste. Weapons that seem meaningful must be put to use.”

There, Cecilus, hands folded behind his head, interjected.

Cecilus, with his back to Groovy and Al, who were talking to each other, glanced at them and groaned, “Ugg”.

Groovy: “The fuck is it. If there’s something you want to say, just fucking say it.”

Cecilus: “No, no. Can’t the two of you speak by yourselves? It doesn’t seem like the two of you will hear anything I say anyway so I don’t really care.”

Groovy: “You’re sulking about Arakiya, fucking hell! You and that girl used to try and kill each other! This what you’ve been all pissy about ain’t it! So that’s all, you fucking idiot, now speak up!

Cecilus: “Huuhh, if you do want to hear it so badly. —To be blunt, I’m talking about the fact that from their point of view, it’s better to let someone else have it than to leave it in the castle.”

Changing from a smiling face to a sullen one, Groovy furrowed his brow at Cecilus's statement, and became frustrated that he was then offered an opinion that was more honest and plausible than he had expected.

In other words, if Cecilus was correct, the Dream Sword and the Fiend Sword, two powerful weapons, were likely to be possessed by one of the undead.

Moreover—

Cecilus: "If they are such powerful weapons then wouldn't you put them in the hands of someone to whom you entrust an important location?"

Groovy: "Fuck."

As stated by Cecilus, that was the most likely scenario, and thus Groovy agreed with a swear.

If this was the case, it was in their best interest to cut down on the possibilities they could and head for the correct locations.

Groovy: "If you don't like Balleroy over at number three, that bastard's different. He's got a spear. He won't make the shitty decision to switch weapons."

Cecilus: "Then it's somewhere else. It might be a waste of Al-san's efforts to use my father and his friend as decoys."

Al: "No, I agree with you that he's the one that needs to be put out of the way the most… It's no joke that he's the only one who can hold Bro and the others back when they arrive."

Al's clenched fist trembled, to which Cecilus, with one eye closed, looked at Groovy.

The plan was finalized. In order to obtain the Fiend Sword, they would go to the other bastions to find the person they thought might have it, a somewhat haphazard strategy—

Groovy: "Fucking idiot, at least be the first to go and pull it off.

Where's the best chance?"

Cecilus: "Hmm… I guess it's number two, isn't it?"

Al: "If it's the southeast, it's still pretty close to here. Then we'll use the leather cloak again, and the three of us can go to…"

Groovy: "No."

As they decided on the bastion to which they were headed, Groovy interrupted Al.

Shaking his head, Groovy threw the werewolf pelt in his hand to Al, turned his back on them, and went toward the entrance to the alley.

And then—

Groovy: "We're going to go our separate ways from here. I have to hold this fucking enemy's head down so he won't move. —It's a shitty role, but I'm the only one who can do it."

Al: "—Hk, I understand what you're saying, but there are thorns in our side! Aren't the conditions the same for you and me?!"

Groovy did not stop when he heard Al's voice trying to stop him.

Al was about to chase after him when Cecilus's small hand stopped him with a tap on his chest. While still holding back Al, Cecilus then asked Groovy.

Cecilus: "You can win, can't you?"

Groovy: "At least I'll make time for you, the fucking idiot, to do your work. Who do you think I am? I'm the amazing Groovy Gumlet, the Sixth of the Nine Divine Generals."

Groovy raised his arms and told Cecilus over his shoulder the basis of his confidence.

This seemed to have resonated particularly well with Cecilus. He let out a delighted snort that was obvious, and without even looking, Cecilus: “Well have fun. Next time we’ll meet with the Fiend Sword!”

With the leading actor’s familiar, florid speech, Groovy kicked off the cobblestone pavement and headed off to the battlefield.

2

—After parting ways with Cecilus and Al, Groovy, now all on his own, leapt his way across the Imperial Capital.

Regardless of being out in the open, he sailed past the streets, kicked the walls and roofs of the buildings, and bounced with great vigor.

From here onwards, unlike covert operations that might have been done by wearing the pelt of a werewolf, he had to garner the opposition’s attention by purposefully making his move in dramatic fashion.

Finally, at long last, the opportunity for Groovy to swing into action in his own element had arisen.

Groovy: “Making me do all this fucking annoying shit…!”

Placing the entirety of his accumulated frustration onto his tongue, Groovy spat out a spiteful sequence of profanity.

In the first place, behaving in a way that required him to scuttle around, such as running around in an effort to escape and lurking in secret out of the sight of others, was not Groovy’s thing at all. It was not about whether he was good at it or not, he simply hated doing it.

Despite that, ever since he had withdrawn from the western battlefield after the arrival of the undead, such a role had been unremittingly forced upon him until he had reached the Imperial Capital, and therefore, he was at the absolute limit of his patience.

Of course, his frustration was not the reason for his suggestion to act on his own, but now that he had obtained a perfect chance to run wild at his own discretion, he was going to savor it.

Groovy: "—Fucking dammit, it's here."

As Groovy spun in circles vertically while hugging his knees close to himself, the thorny vines surfaced and wriggled across his beastly fur-covered chest, its bindings undergoing reactivation due to the shortened distance between him and the caster.

The acute pain that pierced his heart directly was something that could not be withstood easily, even if the recipient was a warrior who was accustomed to pain. It was the complete truth without a sliver of falsehood, as stated previously.

Except—

Groovy: "If it's a shitty curse that torments the opponent, then there's gotta be a loophole…!"

Groovy barked, drawing out a single dagger from the waistband fastened securely around his own body.

Selected from the waistband, loaded with multiple daggers, was one with a purple line streaking across its blade, and Groovy pointed the sharp edge of the dagger at his own neck, pushing the tip into himself.

Immediately, the poison affixed to the edge of the dagger's blade coursed into his body, rapidly eating away at the petite build of the hyena human by flowing through his bloodstream. The deadly toxin ran amok, delighted by the joy brought on from fulfilling its duty of killing a living creature, and as it rushed to put a lethal end to the creature's vital activity—the blade was pulled back right before it could do so.

Groovy: "—Aah."

Enduring the sensation that caused the contents of his stomach to go through a reflux, blood rushed to Groovy's widened eyes.

With the capillaries of his eyeballs having been ruptured, both of his eyes were dyed red, but his physical body had stopped short of being felled by the virulent poison, and a change was delivered to it instead.

A part of his body's senses had been silenced by the poison. —His sense of pain had been suppressed.

The next moment, the pain from the thorns that would have been enough to immobilize him had disappeared, and the sensation that constricted his heart was subdued by the exhilaration that came from forcibly overcoming the threat to his life.

Originally, the poison was intended to be used as a tool for torture, the procedure consisting of administering it to captive enemies and letting them watch, fully conscious, as their own bodies were demolished, all the while being unable to feel any pain.

Although, as long as he adjusted the dosage, he thought it would be possible to maintain control over his body and carry on with his sense of pain eradicated, just like this. He had always wanted to test this but had lacked the opportunity to do so, yet it went swimmingly without any preparation beforehand.

Groovy: "If I ever tested this on that fucking dumbass Cecilus, then it's gonna be an irreversible mistake in case I fuck it up."

If it were a matter of his own body, then he had it completely memorized, starting from the number of his beastly hairs without a single fang's width of inaccuracy. He was able to make even the slightest adjustments thanks to it, but testing the poison on Cecilus or Al would have meant making rough estimates with their lives on the line.

More specifically, he did have an urge to test to see if even Cecilus would die from the poison—pushing down his slowly climbing curiosity, Groovy set out for the third bastion.

The current situation spoke for itself. Right now, his topmost priority was to save the Vollachian Empire from its imminent destruction.

Truthfully, he wanted to make the most out of this undead-reviving situation, going on a spree to collect materials from the limited numbers of rare races and those that had already gone extinct, but he had to choke back his regret and let the opportunity pass.

The reason to allow such a thing simmered and blazed within Groovy.

Groovy: “Fuck this shit.”

He threw out brief words of obscenity. Those had come from the constant feeling of frustration within him.

—Since the moment he had laid his eyes upon the Imperial Capital that was ruled by the undead, identical to how he was looking at it right now, Groovy had recalled the possibility that either Vincent or Chisha had died. On top of it, if one of them were truly dead, then he had thought it would have been Chisha.

There had been signs of a faint smell of death trailing after Vincent’s steps. For all that, when the smell had abruptly vanished at some point, or so he thought, the situation had gone to shit.

Groovy: “Fucking pale-faced motherfucking bastard.”

The guy was a detached man who kept his emotions closed off from the eyes of others, but he had ultimately hid away even the inner workings of his heart from the smell.

As the Imperial Capital’s decisive battle drew closer, it had been the orders from Vincent that had sent Groovy towards the west, keeping him away from the battlefield, but that Vincent must have been Chisha.

He had no way of knowing what had happened to Vincent in the meanwhile, but upon imagining the circumstances behind why Cecilus had been shrunk down, the sole winner of all of this was Chisha.

In spite of that, if the Empire were to be defeated, then even his victory would be brushed away as if it had never happened.

Groovy: “Fuck that shit.”

Such a stupid idea could not be allowed to become a fact.

Groovy was born in the Empire, raised in the Empire, and was a hyena human who lived in the Empire. The rise of his race's social status depended on the work he did, and he had always been told that his duty was to fight courageously until he drew his last breath.

He was aware that he was born as someone who would leave his mark on the history of the Empire. In fact, he had been scouted by the Emperor, climbing through the ranks in leaps and bounds and eventually rising to the position of the Imperial General First-Class.

The group that such a person, Groovy Gumlet, had acknowledged as his equals, or even greater than him, were the Nine Divine Generals.

Groovy was a warrior who belonged to the Empire, and was also one person who obeyed the philosophy stating that “the people of the Empire must be strong”.

That was why the matter of victory or defeat was sacred. —The victor must be honored, after all.

Groovy: “Fuck fuck fuck fuck fuck fucking fuck…!”

In Vollachia, the land of ceaseless battles, the world would sink to hell if even the aforementioned unwritten law were to be distorted.

Furthermore, hell was to be brought upon Vollachia's enemies, so turning this world into that place was not an option.

He had to give the enemy an idea of where hell resided.

Groovy: “—I fucking found it.”

Spinning alongside his body was his vision, and Groovy let out a mutter when he saw a few silhouettes on the move.

The horde of undead at the bottom of his line of sight were screeching out something. However, their reactions were beyond subpar. They would have been harmless even if he would have left them alone, but he had no reason to do such a thing.

Above all else, Groovy could not afford to let his prey get away in the midst of the smell of blood.

Positioning his fangs together with an audible click, he drew out the chain and sickle that he carried on his back.

It was a weapon that was difficult to handle, consisting of a wide, single-handed sickle connected to a weight with a chain. Usually, the chain would only be several meters long, and the chain and sickle were supposed to be used in fights that were close-ranged or middle-ranged, but Groovy's weapon was made out of unique materials.

Because of that, the chained weight had easily reached the group of undead, even if they were nearly thirty meters away from him.

He swung his sickle-wielding hand in wide arcs, and the chained weight that followed after a moment sang its metallic tunes as it flew towards the ground with tremendous speed. The size of the weight was equal to a fist, but the power behind its acceleration was too enormous to be converted to a mere punch.

Of course, the undead jumped out of the pathway of the weight, not wanting to be on the receiving end of it—but, how naive.

Groovy: "FUCKING MORONS!!"

The launched weight made contact with the ground in the direction of Groovy's roar.

Suddenly, the weight manifested a red hue from within, and the surrounding buildings were caught in the massive explosion that followed. The resulting powerful shockwave engulfed the undead that had narrowly avoided the blast, and just like that, one of the Imperial Capital's streets had been annihilated.

—The Crimson Hills Girall were located northwest of the Kararagi City-States, near the Great Waterfall.

The place that appeared as a red desert area was the most dangerous land in the world, made from delicate Fire Magic Stone particles resembling grains of sand. Because even a puff of wind could trigger a chain of explosions in that region, it was said to have been created from the bloody tears of a Great Spirit who had failed to become a part of the Four Greats.

The weight connected to Groovy’s chain and sickle contained Fire Magic Stones that were collected from the Crimson Hills Girall in its interior, and upon absorbing mana from its surroundings, it would be able to unleash its exceptionally destructive power in this manner.

Exposing himself to the aftershock from the explosive heat that had demolished an entire street, Groovy landed on the charred ruins that continued to let up black smoke and burn ablaze, and while leaning up to straighten his back,

Groovy: “Rrroooooohhh!!”

Like that, he roared as he let the destructive impulse that had been swelling up inside of him run its own course.

His pounding heart was bitching about the squeezing sensation from the thorns, but there was no pain to it. Moreover, he felt the scorching heat sear through his inner body, blowing out a breath that smelled of blood.

And then, he gnashed his fangs loudly, adjusting his hold on his chain and sickle,

Groovy: “Can’t fucking ambush me with a shitty curse like that!!”

As a shadow dropped from the sky, the hem of their red overcoat fluttering in the air, he launched the chained weight at them.

Just as how the power behind the weight had been demonstrated earlier, the opponent intercepted it with the sword in their hand, and immediately after that, an eruptive blaze swallowed them whole.

However—

Groovy: “Tch!”

Groovy leapt backwards immediately, witnessing the flames that had enveloped the sky becoming split in half.

The unnatural change that had occurred to the flames was a testament to the fact that the flying silhouette had chopped it down. In addition, the thorns pulsing with ardor at the arrival of their master, as if they were howling with joy, told him that his opponent was the one responsible for scattering the curse of thorns against Groovy, as well as his surroundings.

If he had not silenced his sense of pain with his toxins, then he would have been writhing on the ground as he vomited blood by now.

In the case that his opponent was someone who only relied on their thorns, Groovy wanted to say that he had the complete upper hand, but unfortunately, his enemy was apparently not easy to beat.

???: “Ambush? ‘Tis a rather strange remark. For what reason wouldst I resort to such an underhanded subterfuge?”

The silhouette spoke as he descended upon the scorched field, languidly gazing in Groovy’s direction.

Fractured, pallid skin and golden pupils floating atop black irises. His appearance was just as Groovy had expected, meeting the requirements of an undead, but there was something that had vaulted over a wall or two regarding his expectations.

First and second, there was the aesthetic garb that was only allowed to be worn by the Vollachian Imperial Family, and facial features that were somehow reminiscent of Vincent Vollachia. More than anything, it was about the thing that his opponent had in his hand.

That was something only permitted to be held by the Emperor of Vollachia, the crimson, scintillating glow of the Yang Sword—.

Groovy: “Fucking hell.”

If the undead were resurrections, then of course there was the possibility of the Vollachian Imperial Family becoming a part of the horde.

Because of it, although Groovy was surprised by the fact that his opponent had the Yang Sword, he was able to accept it. What he was not able to accept was that it was not the only sword in his enemy’s possession.

With the Yang Sword grasped firmly in his right hand, the undead Emperor was holding a different weapon in his left.

And, it was a blade that Groovy had not been expecting this one undead to have gotten ahold of in this place—

Groovy: “—How far are you gonna go to fucking defy me, you shitty ass katana!!”

As Groovy roared in an outburst of rage, in his field of vision was the undead Emperor, with the Fiend Sword Murasame in his hand—the Yang Sword and the Fiend Sword, two blades belonging to the Enchanted Swords were standing as an adversary against the Master of Curse Tools, Groovy, much to his chagrin.

V!c.ll2o

Chapter 42:
The Grand Slave

1

—Priscilla Barielle did not despise Stargazers.

Appearing only in the Vollachian Empire, they were pitiable existences burdened with mental illness.

That was the general perception of those who had become familiar with Stargazers, though to begin with, happening across those who harbored the disease of conversing with the world was not something that happened so frequently.

Even so, there existed positions that easily became entangled with those of the Stargazer affliction.

Those were people closely tied to the Vollachian Imperial Family.

Whether it was the Imperial Family themselves, or perhaps those who served the Imperial Family's needs in their daily life. Those appointed to positions of steward, guard, and all the like, had a chance to encounter individuals ailed by the Stargazer malady.

After all, the Stargazers were a lot who could not help wanting to be involved with the history of the Empire, and whenever there was a large incident that would seem to be recorded in Imperial history, they all appeared to blather on about it.

Although, there had never been a case in which the utterances of Stargazers, despised as madmen, were given significant importance.

Of course, there were likely some curious people who had lent their ears to the words of the Stargazers, but there were no history books, at least publicly, in which it was recorded that their ramblings had proved useful.

Until the current Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, granted Ubilk an official position and the permission to enter and leave the Palace, that was the common understanding of the relationship between the Empire and Stargazers.

Was it not just as if Stargazers were like swains, continuing to emit an unreciprocated passion for the Empire?

Endowed with a commandment, they were swains who blindly relinquished everything for its fulfillment. Many of the Imperial citizens aware of their existence despised them, however, Priscilla did not. Neither did she pity them.

Stargazers and the like were nothing so special as to warrant being the targets of contempt or pity.

From the beginning, the vast majority of living beings were slaves to something greater than themselves.

Be that to a King, to one's family, or to one's spouse, or perhaps to love, hatred, or fate; that was the only difference.

Thus, that was—

Priscilla: "—Even mineself is no exception."

With a clang, the chains of the binds cuffed around her wrists resonated as she murmured amidst the darkness.

When weaving words, she did not particularly care about whether an audience was present or not, but at the very least this murmur was not a soliloquy; it was uttered to be heard by someone.

Nevertheless, it seemed as if the other party had not desired such a thing, as there was no response.

Yet, if one was trying to conceal their presence, such petty desires would not be granted.

Priscilla: "No matter your attempt to bate your breath, there is no way to conceal the presence of a being such as yourself. Or perhaps, you shall not show your face unless I directly make mine way over to you?"

???: “—. As long as your hands are bound, that is an impossible action.”

Priscilla: “So be it. In that case, there is no choice but for you to take a step in mine direction. I do not intend to exchange words with someone who does not even show their face.”

???: “□□□”

A beat later, though there was no confusion to the extent of hesitation, the thought was interrupted before the sound of footsteps. Gradually, accompanied by the slow, echoing sound of footsteps striking the cold floor, a small figure emerged in the darkness.

The light source in the dungeon was meager, allowing only a vague perception of their form.

There was a limit to how much one’s eyes could adjust to darkness. Much less, when one did not bother closing one of their eyelids to adjust their vision to the darkness of night.

Priscilla: “Do not perform acts so uncouth as concealing yourself in unlit darkness. When you make your entrance, do so magnificently into the light.”

???: “Truly a prideful statement characteristic of yourself. Caution: Required.”

And, right after hearing the emotionless voice, a hardness separate to that of the shoes sharply struck the stone floor. A high-pitched sound cut through the cold air, and then a bluish-white light forcefully pushed back the darkness in the cellar.

Priscilla: “□□□”

In an instant, within that light, a beautiful white face emerged— With orange hair and crimson eyes, the beauty clad in a dress as red as blood, was Priscilla Barielle.

Chained up in a basement, Priscilla was flashed with a staff that shone a bluish white, and holding that staff was a young girl with long pink hair—with cracks running through her skin and horrifying eyes, she was an undead.

If there was something different about this undead, it was that she, having taken the form of a little girl before Priscilla's eyes, was—

Priscilla: "—The instigator of this Great Disaster?"

Girl: "I will not deny it, but where did you learn that term? You should not have had any opportunity to hear it?"

Priscilla: "It was your subordinate who served a meal to mineself. Perhaps you had starved him of conversation? Even without mine inquiry, he kept talking about various matters to alleviate his boredom."

Girl: "For General First-Class Temeglyph, Warning: Required. However—"

At that point, the youthful undead interrupted her words, and taking a step forth, she closed the distance between herself and Priscilla.

Even so, it was still far. No matter how slender and artistic Priscilla's legs might be, it seemed unlikely that she could lift her leg to reach the other's bangs.

Girl: "Have you managed to endure it? The boredom."

Priscilla: "□□□"

With the distance to Priscilla still maintained, the youthful undead continued her paused words.

Priscilla's eyes narrowed slightly in response to the question. There was a strange closeness in the young girl's statement, as if she were looking into her face.

It was not about physical distance, but about a mental one.

Priscilla: "You speak as if you have known mineself for a long time."

Girl: “What do you think? Do you remember me? Do you have any idea who I am?”

Priscilla: “Unfortunately, I am not so fickle as to remember such a trivial thing. So either you are unworthy, or this is the first time you have ever shown your face to mineself.”

Girl: “Correct. This is the first time you have seen my face.”

The nodding young girl’s answer, however, was not a thorough answer to Priscilla’s doubts.

But then again, precisely because the other party’s statement left out all of the most important bits that their intention was clear. — She was testing Priscilla. It was as if she was watching to see if a tethered beast would take the bait.

Priscilla sensed her intention and snorted slightly.

Priscilla: “Such fearless disrespect for mineself.”

Girl: “Indeed, I do not know the emotion of fear. What I do not know is not limited to fear, but as a venerable substitute for Mother, who greedily desires knowledge—”

Priscilla: “So you know mineself from a one-sided point of view. — You are the one behind the mouryou of the village of Coffleton.”

Girl: “—. Elucidation: Required.”

Priscilla interrupted the young girl, who rambled about herself, and as she spoke of something that rang a bell in her mind, the girl held her breath.

The mutter was proof that Priscilla’s idea had a connection to the young girl, but it was not clear to the other party how exactly Priscilla linked it to her.

Priscilla: “Hmm, it is not that confusing, is it? Once upon a time, within mine domain in the Kingdom, what is now happening to the Imperial Capital… or rather, the entire Empire, a similar incident occurred. When such rare events happen twice around oneself, it is natural to connect the two.”

The incident occurred within the Barielle Domain of the Kingdom of Lugunica, in the village of Coffleton, which was the center of the incident and whose residents were turned into undead.

However, at that time, it was not so much a case of the dead being brought back to life as it was a case of corpses being manipulated according to the will of someone else. The queen, who was the apparent cause, was defeated, and since then, there had been no reports of similar incidents. It was thought that the situation had been settled.

Priscilla: “It seems that you have changed the location of your nest and continued to perform your “tehsts”. You have improved somewhat in your appalling game of dolls with insects inside their corpses.”

Girl: “The previous approach had too many obstacles to achieving my goals. Improvement: Required.”

Priscilla: “You do not deny your involvement with Coffleton?”

Girl: “I do not see the point. Are these not meaningless inquiries?”

The young girl’s response, devoid of emotion, was more an expression of disgust than one of distaste for the wasteful use of time.

The clear indifference aside, such lack of denial was useful in obtaining the information she wanted to get. On the other hand, however, the dialogue with such a person was—

Priscilla: “You are quite the bore.”

Girl: “And that is important, how?”

Priscilla: “Disregarding whether this conversation is beneficial or not, that is the only value that can be derived from it.”

Girl: “So then, why do we not just ignore whether it is beneficial or not?”

Priscilla: “That is why I said I find your conversations a bore. It is like talking to a dead person. Talking to a gravestone would still be preferable, given the lack of your petulant responses.”

Girl: “□□□”

The young girl’s black eyes narrowed as Priscilla spoke, and she took another step closer to her. She put her hand on her chest, the one not holding the staff,

Girl: “Is it not as if you are conversing with the dead? When you see me, you would not suspect me to be alive.”

Priscilla: “It would be nonsensical to ascribe life or death to something that could not even be said to have lived. However, it was somewhat unexpected that you were undead.”

Girl: “—. Why is that?”

Priscilla: “It would be an ill-advised gamble for you, the originator of the ritual, to become undead yourself. Moreover, at the moment of your death, the technique that you have woven could be cut off, and all your plans may come to naught.”

Naturally, that might be an unfounded worry depending on information and evidence of which Priscilla had no knowledge. However, given the nature of this young girl, even that was highly questionable.

This girl, in particular, disliked inefficiency and had a propensity for not reaching for things that she estimated to have less than definite proof.

Despite this, she treated even her own life as a card in her hand that would bring about the Great Disaster.

Priscilla: “Perhaps when confronted with your inevitable death, you had no choice but to entrust your hope to the afterlife. Or perhaps you were already undead before you caused this incident. If not—”

Girl: “If not?”

Priscilla: "—Perhaps you deemed it acceptable that it would all come to naught had your life not continued beyond that point?"

Guessing at the inexplicable true intentions of the young girl who had turned into an undead, Priscilla voiced three possibilities.

Listing them out in order, based on the nature of the young girl that she analyzed so far, she held off the possibilities that would be far from being true.

However—

Girl: "Admiration: Required."

This was the young girl's reaction in response to Priscilla's speculation when she voiced what should have been the least likely possibility.

In essence, it meant nothing more than that the young girl had given up on the plans she had set in motion around the time of the incident in Coffleton, about at the same time as the end of her own life.

This fact alone was enough to furrow Priscilla's beautiful brows, but what intensified it further was the reaction of the young girl to the truth of the statement.

With her lifeless, pale face missing any signs of life, the young girl smiled as if Priscilla's intentions had been understood.

In the midst of the light emitted by the staff, witnessing that smile, Priscilla furrowing her brows became even clearer.

Priscilla: "Finally, you have shown that there is at least value in talking to you, disregarding gains."

Girl: "—. Has something changed?"

Priscilla: "If you have yet to realize it yourself, allow me to append some congratulatory words. The exceeding irony that is the sprouting of a life after death…"

Then, Priscilla stopped speaking, closing one of her crimson eyes. After a brief moment of beautiful and precious contemplation, Priscilla reopened her closed eyelid.

And, with both of her crimson eyes fixed on the face of the young girl, who had lost her smile,

Priscilla: “No, not quite. It did not sprout after death. You, did you sacrifice your own life to prove it?”

Girl: “I did not take my own life. The opportunity naturally presented itself. However, the speculation that I faced an unavoidable Death is not incorrect. Correction: Required.”

In response, the lips of the young girl once again painted a smile, similar to before.

In this clear reaction, Priscilla could distinctly sense the rhythm of life—The presence of emotions within the young girl. They were something that had not existed in the young girl until now.

And without that, the dead could not resurrect as undead.

Therefore, the young girl had proven it with her own life.

She might have had the qualification to become undead, but there needed to be a reason to place her soul back into the earthen vessel and make it cling to this current life.

It was a strategy with low certainty and could hardly be called efficient.

Priscilla: “But emotions are what lead to such choices, are they not?”

Girl: “That is correct.”

The young girl, with her hand still on her chest, had a sense of audacity emanating from her.

The previous emptiness, as if conversing with a doll with no substance, was gone. Instead, what was present was the tension of confronting a decidedly different and inorganic presence.

Girl: “The plan in the Kingdom was thwarted because the me of the past had dismissed this. However, though I may have failed to become the Witch of the Kingdom… it seems I have been chosen to become the Great Disaster of the Empire.”

Priscilla: “Chosen, you say. Is that the reason you have invoked the disaster?”

Girl: “Correction: Required. That is not the motive. It is the basis.”

To Priscilla’s question, there was a resolute answer.

Listening to the young girl’s response, Priscilla’s vague suspicions began to take shape.

What had been sinking into the shadows darker than the darkness of the underground dungeon gradually became clearer through the young girl’s words and expressions, just like when she had brought the light of her staff into the cellar.

And then—

Girl: “My name is Sphinx, I was also once known as a Witch in the Kingdom of Lugunica.”

Priscilla: “□□□”

So, looking directly at Priscilla, declaring her name, the young girl’s—Sphinx’s words and demeanor, and what they meant, were finally conveyed to Priscilla.

The explicit mention of being called a Witch in the Kingdom of Lugunica was likely to clearly distinguish herself from those known as Witches in other countries.

The six Witches who once existed, other than the Witch of Envy, had all but disappeared from history, but they were still commonly known as Witches throughout the world.

However, if one were to limit a Witch to the Kingdom of Lugunica, only one person would fit the description.

It was easily discernible through history that this entity had been involved in the Demi-Human War.

Yet, what this self-proclaimed Witch, Sphinx, wanted to convey to Priscilla was not merely some trivial information regarding her true identity.

What the Witch wanted to convey to Priscilla was—

Priscilla: "—The reason you overcame a futile death, and gained the sprout of life as an undead, was because of mineself."

That was a declaration of war, stating that Priscilla was the reason Sphinx had become the Great Disaster.

2

In the first place, she did not even have to mull over it to know that the situation was too conspicuous.

At the site of the decisive battle at the Imperial Capital, where the Imperial Army and the rebel army had engaged in a direct clash with one another, Sphinx had brought the undead along with her, interfered in the battle as the Great Disaster, and caused the end of the insurrection to be left undecided.

During the battle, Priscilla and Yorna had both been focused on their fight with Arakiya, leaving them with a delayed grasp of the shift in the situation compared to the other battlefields, and they had been defeated as a result, too late to discern the intentions of the undead.

As of now, Priscilla was chained up in the dungeon, and the well-being of Arakiya and Yorna remained unknown in the current situation.

During the fight with Arakiya, the Soul Marriage Technique that Yorna had placed within her still retained its lingering effects, so there was no doubt that Yorna had survived. Even if that were not the case, Priscilla had resigned herself to being held as a prisoner in exchange for the safety of Arakiya, who had lost her consciousness, and also Yorna, who had been disconcerted by the undead that had appeared.

The deal would not have been able to be established if the other party did not have the intention to capture her.

Therefore, the fact that Priscilla was chained to this prison while alive, just like this, it was only natural that the other party wanted something to do with her.

Priscilla: "I have imagined that, surely, it was Lamia who was particular about my life."

Sphinx: "Princess Lamia Godwin had agreed to spare your life. She was strongly attached to you. During her last moments—"

Priscilla: "—I do not intend to share the time between mineself and Lamia with another."

She cut her off, bluntly regarding her words as a mere stint of curiosity that existed for momentary satisfaction.

Sphinx simply pulled back with an, "I see," at Priscilla's declaration. She had brought it up as the subject of their conversation, but her interest concerning the topic was probably non-existent.

This much was evident to Priscilla, who had been kept alive even after Lamia's second death.

Sphinx: "Attachment is a mysterious phenomenon. It is too heavily influenced by elements that are contradictory to rationality. Regardless, I have struggled to understand outcomes where irrationality had prevailed over rationality at times."

Priscilla: "Rationality or irrationality, which one have you given greater importance to for the outcome of speaking to me in this manner?"

Sphinx: "I wonder which one it is. Deliberation: Required… Doing so is a thought-provoking action in itself."

As Sphinx answered her, Priscilla wondered if she was aware of it.

Regardless of whether she was aware of it or not, as Sphinx continued to speak with Priscilla in this place, there was a rapid increase in the human-like qualities of her speech.

The water that was her conversation with Priscilla had been poured onto her budding humanity, bringing a significant growth into existence.

Priscilla: “□□□”

Priscilla took notice of what Sphinx had truly meant by that, and it had not been refuted when she had voiced it out loud.

Judging from how Sphinx was maintaining her attitude of deliberately not probing further into the subject, it could be said that the idea of it belonging to the core of her motives was unequivocally affirmed.

There was one thing that Priscilla was, as much as she was vexed to admit it, falling behind Sphinx in regards to it—the fact that she was entirely clueless about Sphinx’s extreme attachment.

Of course, considering Priscilla’s status, there had been times when complete strangers and those whom she only knew the names of harbored some sort of one-sided obsession over her.

However, Sphinx’s attachment was clearly beyond the scope of her egotistical single-mindedness.

There was a reason. A reason that had become the origin of the Great Disaster.

Sphinx: “Earlier, you spoke of an interesting subject.”

Priscilla: “□□□”

Sphinx: “All forms of life are slaves to some sort of greater entity. In the past, I have not been able to understand this, but currently, I am sensing the signs that will guide me to my understanding.”

Sphinx started, seemingly finding the topic interesting, and Priscilla responded to her words with her silence.

She was not scorning her, nor was she ignoring her. If she were to put it into words, it was a type of curiosity that must not be trifled with. Sphinx had begun speaking while mentioning that she found it interesting, and her speech itself was what Priscilla was deeply fascinated with.

The Witch had expressed her understanding of something she previously could not fathom, and even showed her agreement with Priscilla's words. What was she planning to talk about?

Sure enough, in front of Priscilla, who prompted her to go on with her silence, Sphinx resumed her speech.

Sphinx: "Because of this, I am able to discover a new rationality in the midst of all the irrationality. Attention: Required."

She said, then struck the end of her glowing staff against the floor once more. The staff, with a glorious jewel inlaid into it, grew glaringly brighter, and during the moment, a change had occurred to the surface of the jewel.

—The view of the Imperial Capital, outside of the dungeon, had been projected onto the pale, transparent jewel.

Perhaps its principles were similar to how a Conversation Mirror would emulate the reflection on the other side over the face of the mirror. Priscilla felt that such a formula seemed rather grandiose to only be used for gazing at something from a distance, narrowing her eyes through the light.

Although, Sphinx had told her to pay attention.

Priscilla: "What do you wish to present to mineself?"

Sphinx: "The validity of your words, and the results of my renewed equation."

On the assumption that the accuracy of Priscilla's words was correlated to what Sphinx had said a moment ago, she pondered about what would be shown on the jewel, and then made a realization.

And then, simultaneously, Priscilla's realization and the jewel's projection became clear.

The scene that had been displayed was—

Sphinx: "By gaining an understanding of emotion and attachment, for the first time, I have discerned the methodology regarding their uses. She is commendable, isn't she? If it is for your sake, she does not take herself into account. —Deliberation: Required."

3

—At the same time, at the real location of the scene projected within the jewel.

???: "Oh dear, seems like I've done quite the bad thing to Groovy–san. I'd established in my mind that my intuition wouldn't be wrong at the critical moment… but it was fairly off the mark."

Voiced in a witty manner, a manner contrary to the cheerful tone of the words was the topic of his own mistake.

However, no diffidence could be sensed in his expression or narrating tone whatsoever. That was because he did not care about his mistake at all, and because he was not really serious about the desire to apologize—because his intuition had been half-right, and half-wrong.

Leaving the flashy role of a diversion to his ally, he had dashed along the undead-infested Imperial Capital to one of the bastions belonging to the city's walls, to a place that was known number two in that sequence, where something he was looking for ought to have been present.

Of course, his intuition had been the one to lead him to believe so; he held no doubts that were he to call that his conviction, many would end up rebuking him.

But, at the very least, he himself did hold a conviction. —That this was his time to shine.

That if he, the leading actor of this world, Cecilus Segmunt, were to arrive at this venue, a boisterous, obstreperous display of his magnificent deeds would be made to all those in the audience watching over him.

That was—

???: “…So, do you have some sort of excuse?”

Cecilus: “Dear me, you’re right about that, but how about this? “My intuition wasn’t wrong. If you want to know why, it’s because the thing I truly want is right here!”“

Next to him, holding the smoldering pelt which had already lost the meaning of “invisibility cloak”, Al spoke words of bitterness, to which Cecilus exultantly responded so.

In reality, whether that had been veracious or not was in a dimension beyond Cecilus’s comprehension, but was believing oneself not much, much more positive when compared to doubting oneself?

Cecilus: “Don’t you think so too, half-naked onee-san? A depressed face’s sure to be followed by a dark turn of events. In that case, then it needn’t be said what face the leading actor, who basks in light, ought to be making.”

???: “□□□”

His head cast above, facing the figure of a person floating in the sky, their altitude beyond even than the height of the ramparts they had arrived at, Cecilus raised his voice; but a reply came not, from the other party.

However, there had been an initial greeting from them. Something that had transmogrified absolutely everything in the surrounding area into a sea of flame in an attempt to immolate Cecilus and Al, both hiding under the cloak of fur, to naught.

While performing a deed immense to such a degree, no hostility, no intent to kill targeting Cecilus and Al could have been felt in said action whatsoever.

The only thing there had been from the slender body exposing plenty of its brown skin, had been merely the sobbing pleas of a young girl, who had taken in something so great that it seemed like she was about to be rended apart.

He did not know what kind of circumstances had led to that thing entering her, but—

Cecilus: “I guess she probably ate something bad. —You really are a handful.”

Girl: “□□□”

Cecilus: “Huh? That strange feeling just now…”

Just what was it, Faster than he could reel that answer in, there was movement overhead.

A flicker of light, and a tremendous power rained from overhead to destroy Cecilus and Al. Before that could happen, Cecilus licked his lips, and to his side, as Al cast away the fur cloak,

Al: “Ah, fuck it all! —Territory re-expansion!!”

As that desperate shout was engulfed in the midst of the impact, the greatest clash of the Undead Capital began.

Chapter 43:
To Each Their Long-Cherished Desires

1

—Aldebaran knew of what Stargazers were.

The person who had informed Aldebaran of their existence, in the past, was a being knowledgeable about almost everything about this world, who nevertheless still coveted the unknown, greedily.

His relationship with that person was a complex one.

It was not one which he could describe with words such as “like” or “dislike”.

If asked whether he was grateful to them or not, he would probably say he was. But, the degree of his gratitude towards them notwithstanding, he harbored reservations about how incompatible they were with him. Such was the kind of person they were.

At any rate, regardless of who had taught him that knowledge, he knew of the Stargazers’ circumstances.

And thus, they contributed nothing to the outcome of Aldebaran’s dearest wish whatsoever. More important than his interest in the Stargazers or whether they were involved with him or not, was the fact that they had dragged them into this.

When Priscilla had first declared she would head for Vollachia, through trial and error he attempted to stop her; once she had decided on something however, her mind would not be swayed no matter what.

So, the best he could do was to accompany her, endeavoring to serve as her insurance as much as possible, but—for Aldebaran, the fact that he had happened across them in this Empire, was undoubtedly a cruel twist of fate.

Always, fate would intervene in Aldebaran's life in extremely odious ways.

Therefore, he did not have the slightest good impression in regards to fate, but just this time, he was grateful.

If they were here, it would be a different story. If they had been dragged into this, the situation would be dramatically changed.

If they were to enter a frame, unable to abandon it, if the frame they were unable to abandon were to increase in scope more and more, to the point that they would not be able to handle all of it, then Aldebaran's dearest wish would be fulfilled.

Once before, Aldebaran had thrown everything away, entirely.

Amidst darkness, continuing to walk while solely relying on what meager starlight was present, he had given up on trying.

For that reason, the sun was radiant. As if there was no such thing as darkness, it had scorched his resignation to naught.

If it was to protect that dazzling sun, he was fine with licking the boots of fate. Enduring the pain that seemed to tear into him, he would not even hesitate to look them right in the eye.

Be it Witch, be they Stargazers, be it the Great Disaster, no matter what stood in his way, he cared not.

—It's just, I'm begging you, so please, don't get in my way.

2

—In total, twenty-two times.

That was the number of attempts it had taken Al to figure out what had happened to him. In an instant, there was a whiteout so abrupt that he did not even realize that his body had evaporated—.

Al: "—Nah, it wasn't caused by clouds or snow, it was fire, so I guess it'd be a redout. Or it'd also be fine to call it a crimsonout, 'cuz it sounds cooler."

Taking a deep breath, he uttered a pointless, nonsensical remark.

Although he could not say for certain whether his mind was normal or not, at the very least, he could bring himself to a tenuous belief that his mind was normal.

For the time being, that was fine. If there was a problem—

Al: “When it comes to fighting at this level, there’s no room for me to intervene!”

In front of Al as he barked this, was one of the duties that had to be accomplished in the Imperial Capital—the conquest of the five bastions of the star-shaped ramparts had been completed in one location.

The solid walls that boasted immense defensive capability had been annihilated without a trace. What else could this be called but the accomplishment of that objective?

But then again, at the second bastion, where the high, high walls and surrounding buildings had been completely erased, a greater obstacle than the now-vanished walls obstructed the way as the next hurdle.

—The cloudy sky was dyed red, and a girl surrendered herself to the sky through the work of some unknown principle.

The girl had short silver hair, red eyes, and much of her brown skin exposed; however, as much as her beautiful features were captivating, she exhibited an appearance that jolted the instinctive sense of danger of the beholder.

Having left the master of the thorns to Groovy, and by using the werewolf’s pelt, Al and Cecilus had safely reached the second bastion—no, they had attempted to reach it.

Strictly speaking, the second bastion had been wiped from the face of the world, and caught up in that annihilation, Al had suffered damage many times without being able to recognize it, before finally grasping the situation and the method with which to move it forward.

That said, he did not even want to think about how many extra attempts it would take to reach the same result if he were asked to do it again.

That was why—

Al: “—Re-initiate thought experiment, territory redefinition.”

Updating the matrix by ten-odd seconds, or perhaps just by a few seconds, Al put all of his effort towards finding an opening to escape.

As Al had shouted earlier, there was no room for him to intervene. Regardless, whenever Al suffered fatal damage, he would restart from a predefined point, so the world would not progress.

It would be a different story if Cecilus could pick up Al and let him escape from the lethal zone together with him, like the time with that sniper, but—

Cecilus: “Sorry, Al-san, but my intuition is telling me that this is my time to shine and that looking after you would spoil my state of being.”

With that stated, Cecilus quickly resigned from protecting Al and challenged the girl in the sky—Arakiya.

How many times had Al seen her by now? Looking back on it, their relationship had been steadily deteriorating: back when he was a gladiator on the Gladiator Island, he had fought together with her when she was still a little girl; next, they faced off as enemies in the Fortress City of Guaral; and now, she was vaporizing him in the Imperial Capital.

But, other than the viewpoint of a middle-aged guy who had encountered her several times, as Cecilus had said, it could be understood that Arakiya was not in her usual state with a single glance.

Arakiya: “□□□”

Arakiya was writhing in midair, and her state was evidently abnormal.

A Spirit Eater, Al had heard about their characteristics in passing from Priscilla. In reality, he had been able to see her transform into fire and water with his own eyes, but this clearly ran counter to those precedents.

Unlike when she assimilated her body with water, or when she soared with part of her body turned into flames, Arakiya's current appearance looked like she was just about to be devoured by an enormous white light from the inside out.

As if protruding out from the inside of her slender brown body, translucent crystals tinged a pale yellow seemed to be directly growing from her skin one after the other.

The purest form of magic stones were known as magic crystals, and they were encircling Arakiya's entire body.

If she could still remain composed like that, it would have seemed that Arakiya's appearance was another display of her power as a Spirit Eater, but—

Arakiya: "—Hk."

Arakiya's red eyes did not clearly reflect anything in the world, and with tears flowing from her clouded left eye, her lips spilled out a pained gasp for help.

Nobody would consider this situation as normal or as something that Arakiya herself desired.

If a child cried out with a gaping mouth, tears streaming down from their eyes as they repeatedly pounded on someone, even supposing they closed their eyes, plugged their ears, and covered up their skin, they would still know that the child was crying nonetheless.

That was exactly what Arakiya was doing right now.

Al: "Don't tell me you're gonna say that you can't leave a crying child alone?!"

Al, at the end of his rope and trying his best to flee from the ruin, shouted in desperation to Cecilus, who was rushing towards it.

Upon hearing this, Cecilus did not look back, but shook his shoulders in a way that made it clear that he had laughed,

Cecilus: “The tears of women and children can be the instigator to get a story moving. So it’s natural that I can’t overlook them, but that isn’t the case here.”

Al: “So then…!”

Cecilus: “But—I have business with those tears.”

Immediately after he spoke, Cecilus leapt at lightning speed, using a piece of melted debris as a foothold.

In the surrounding area, the barricades that had been erected to protect the second bastion had melted away, manifesting the appearance of a magma-filled inferno. Should one carelessly plunge one’s foot into the magma, the damage incurred would be much more than merely slipping, but rather the portion that had been plunged in would be instantly incinerated, leaving a scar that would not be seen ever again. Al’s source for this was himself.

But, Cecilus jumped into the area that had become a garden of magma, making full use of the limited footholds to close in on Arakiya, who was floating in the sky.

His speed and transience were beyond description—no, truly beyond description was the deed that was realized directly afterward, mixed in with Cecilus humming a tune.

Al: “No way?!”

Arakiya’s entire body radiated white light in the air, and a moment later, a flash of light scorched the spot where Cecilus was running.

The unleashed spear of light pierced into the magma, and a beat later, everything within a radius of a few meters around it had compressed, and was immediately blown asunder. The imploded magma and the destructive force that had caused it then spread out to the surrounding area, scattering it over a radius nearly ten times the size of the initial compressed space.

Al was speechless, and even though he knew he was out of range, he reflexively covered his head with his arm to protect it, and in that covered vision, he could see that even though that single shot alone was horrifyingly powerful, the bombardment still continued without cease.

One, two, three, four shots were fired in rapid succession, each shot reshaping the form of the Imperial Capital.

Streets ceased to be streets, and land ceased to be land.

They were fired one after another, pursuing Cecilus as he ran on the ground, but even he—

Cecilus: “Ta ta ta ta ta ta ta ta ta ta ta ta ta ta—!!!”

Splatters of the scorching heat known as magma were scattered about, the gaze of the blinks of destruction known as flashing light were evaded, and Cecilus broke through the white dust in a mad dash through the space where death rained down incessantly.

All the footholds had already disappeared, and through a space where magma would soak one’s feet in the place of solid ground, Cecilus swiftly ran with zori that did not seem to have any sort of fireproof quality.

Bearing witness to that sight, what flashed through Al’s mind was the absurd image of a shinobi running on water—the technique of stepping forth with their left foot before their right foot sank, then stepping forth with their right foot before their left foot sank.

Undoubtedly, Cecilus was performing that not on water, but on magma.

Al: “That shouldn’t be possible?!”

Cecilus: “As long as one thinks that way, they’ll never be able to do it!”

Cheerfully responding to Al's exclamation, Cecilus performed an outrageous act that scoffed at the very laws of physics; he ran straight forward and plunged into a house that had escaped harm's way, and in the subsequent instant, that house collapsed, and a pillar that had been kicked out of the crumbling building soared through the air like an arrow.

It was a rather girthy arrow with an incorrect size ratio, but it closed in on Arakiya with enough speed to bore through the torso of a large animal. But, before it could hit Arakiya, it spontaneously combusted, and smoldered to naught within the air.

Surrounding Arakiya as she radiated light, so much heat was being generated that it appeared as if both herself, and even the space around her were being distorted, so there was no way any half-hearted attack could have drawn near her.

Even Cecilus ought to have understood that. And yet—

Cecilus: "Go! Go go! Go go go!!"

Inducing a thunderous sound, Cecilus destroyed buildings one after the other, and, kicking the pillars, rooftops, and household belongings of the destroyed buildings flying at speeds unperceivable to the eye, he made an incessant onslaught on the airborne Arakiya.

Of course, it was not a matter of which would reach her, as all of them vanished in the air before they had the chance.

Moreover, in retaliation against those unsuccessful attacks, there were arrows of light that were sure to prove fatal with merely a graze.

Al: "Idiot, stop that, don't you get it?! If you recklessly attract her attention…"

Cecilus: "What are you saying, Al-san! It's totally totally totally totally the opposite! Rather, it's absolutely necessary that I attract her full attention to myself!"

Al: "This show-off… No."

Cecilus continued to contribute to the destruction of the Imperial Capital's scenery, voluntarily to the buildings, and incidentally to the rest of the surroundings. Trying to laugh off his usual leading actor-type statement with an unfunny one-liner, Al realized.

All of Cecilus's positioning involved placing Arakiya on the interior of the Imperial Capital, and going around so he would be outside of it to draw her attacks—That was to say, it was a battle with no attacks directed towards the inside of the Imperial Capital.

Having finally understood that, Al also understood what Cecilus was trying to say.

Cecilus: "Right now that woman has neither consciousness nor rationality. All she has are the defensive instincts in order to not be killed or burst apart. If left alone she would aimlessly head for the center of the city, but if we let her rampage in the center, what's gonna happen?"

Al: "It'd become a hole that nobody'd be able to live in for the next hundred years…"

Cecilus: "A whole lotta people would die. It may be fine if they were just enemies, but I don't really find it desirable for people who aren't enemies to die in great numbers. The world will get lonely, after all."

Saying so in a calm tone, Cecilus dodged the ray of death that attempted to graze him, and devoted himself to lightning speed in order to implement his statement.

Unable to hide his surprise at Cecilus's unexpectedly decent motivation, Al stuck his finger into his heated iron helmet, and adjusted its angle while holding his ground.

—As Cecilus had said, currently, Arakiya did not have the leeway to turn her attention anywhere else.

Arakiya had taken in something beyond Al's imagination, and desperately enduring as it overflowed, she was merely counterattacking by reflex against any threat that could impede her.

Thus, Cecilus continued to put himself at a critical distance and meddle with Arakiya in order to keep her contained here, as he claimed it was necessary to prevent the Imperial Capital from being destroyed.

Al: “□□□”

Cecilus’s aim, and the peculiar situation Arakiya had been placed in.

The choice to turn his back and flee, as there was nothing he could do, would always flicker in the corner of his mind, but even Cecilus had once had one of his legs blown off.

If Al’s presence had made it so that that had never happened, then there was value in him being here.

Al: “—Am I really doing this?”

Slowly shaking his head, Al drew in a long breath.

Right at the outset, he had already drawn the short end of the stick twenty-two times; from here on out, he did not know just how many times he would end up drawing it again. As a result, he wondered what might happen to his sanity.

However, regardless of whether he was sane or not, there would never be any mistaking that the sun was dazzling.

Al: “In that case, I’m fine with this.”

The metal fixtures on his helmet made a sound as he plucked them, and Al took one step forward.

Then—

Al: “□□□”

The unleashed white light aiming for Cecilus exploded ten-odd meters in front of him, and the magma droplets blown away by the aftershock directly caught Al, who had not dodged—

Al: “—Next.”

With his redefined territory, the ordinary man resolved himself to step onto the grand stage.

3

—Cecilus Segmunt had once told Arakiya something, in the past.

He had done so during a battle to the death between the First and the Second, an event regarded as commonplace in the Imperial Capital.

In the midst of a chat between Arakiya and Cecilus, who were the defeated and the victor respectively, a conversation taking place in a vast field reduced to a scorched plot, the latter had sliced open the clouds with his katana, a technique he had purported as being nothing but something for show.

In reality, Cecilus had thought it held no utility other than for surprising people; having witnessed it first-hand, Arakiya too evaluated that as a skill devoid of any useful purpose whatsoever.

That, was the divine miracle of empty sky that Rowan Segmunt had spent his lifetime devising—for those who were transcendent monsters, it was worthy of naught more than being dubbed a flashy performance.

That was to say—

—A long leg glided through the air, and with a delay, a strong wind blew the dust away.

Quickly stooping down to evade the powerful leg, he spotted an opening in the large sweeping kick of his opponent, and unsheathed his blade towards the slender waist in an attempt to cleave them in twain—an impact slammed into his chest.

The air was squeezed out of his lungs, and looking down with eyes widened, that which had caused his sternum to grate were the multiple tails growing from the rear of the woman who had unleashed the kick.

Rowan: “—Hk.”

Its fur soft, a tail like that of a fox had delivered a strike unbelievably vigorous, causing the body on the receiving end to fly backwards, bouncing off the ground.

Once, twice he witnessed heaven and earth revolving, and upon the third time, bidding farewell to the skies he thrust his sword into the ground, as to bring his momentum to a halt. Heels smashed into the ground, and clenching his molars he immediately sheathed his blade, his stance one for drawing his sword—

Woman: “Do you understand by now?”

Rowan: “—?!”

The very start of the movement, aiming to unleash his swordsmanship, ought to have had a glint of light reflect off the blade to accompany its drawing from the scabbard, but it was stopped by the hand of the woman, pressing against the handle of the katana still in its sheath. He fell silent at that instance, and as the woman faced him, the corners of her long-slitted eyes drooped as if pitying him, and,

Woman: “You are not worthy as my opponent.”

Rowan: “Ohhhhh—!!”

As if to sever that pity, instead of drawing the pinned-down katana, with the handle fixed in place as an anchor, he pulled off the scabbard, revolved by half a turn, and slammed the scabbard fashioned from the bone of a Witchbeast into the side of her face.

The force, the angle, the feedback from the swing, they all told him it had been more than sufficient to pulverize the human cranium.

However—

Woman: “□□□”

The one to be smashed to pieces was the scabbard, and the woman—the foxwoman who called herself Iris, displayed no sign of pain in her expression.

But, as she raised the hand that had been pinning down the handle, her lips, in which pity still remained, quivered,

Iris: “I shall not allow you to die, but the pain shall be to such an extent.”

Striking her palm against his forehead, he rolled backwards as his body was blown away.

This time, his defensive stance to endure a hit was torn asunder, his brain bobbing about. He traveled down the long, oh so long boulevard before the Crystal Palace, bouncing for tens of meters without stopping.

Bouncing, bouncing, bouncing and rolling, rolling and rolling, he rolled until he lay spread-eagled.

And then—

Rowan: “—Ah.”

Having been left half-dead after only a short battle, Rowan Segmunt gazed in wonder.

She was far too excessively, exceedingly, powerful.

An unbelievably strong individual. Of course, he had fully understood that she was a formidable opponent. And yet, he had believed that after one thing or another, he would be the one to come out on top ultimately.

As that was how things had always gone until then, this occurrence too would come to an end in the same fashion, most likely—.

—Here, the misfortune of the man known as Rowan Segmunt shall be narrated.

The man who had been traveling with him, Heinkel Astrea, was a man whose misfortune laid in the fact that he had not been chosen for a single thing that could only be obtained via being chosen.

On the other hand, Rowan Segmunt was a man who had continued to be chosen for things that could only be obtained via being chosen, which had resulted in his misfortune.

Rowan Segmunt held a long-cherished desire. Something he kept pursuing. A prayer he continued to long for.

In order to reach the Heavenly Sword, he had endured all kinds of hardship, mastered every conceivable necessity; no matter what sort of devil or monster he was branded as, he possessed the hunger to fulfill that goal.

In that wish, there was no lie or falsehood. It had nothing to do with compromise or resignation.

He had never once been dishonest about the sword or technique he tried to master, nor had he ever missed a training session.

But, Rowan Segmunt had never encountered them.

Had never encountered a worthy rival who had reached the same heights as him, a formidable enemy who could invigorate him with the notion that he had no other option but to overcome them, a love that would push him to places he could not reach alone; he had simply never done it.

He cut down every single person he encountered, and due to some causality, he had never collided with anyone whom his ability with the sword could not surmount; continuously he missed opportunities to clash with the many transcendent beings in this world, and, upon falling into despair at that which he could not reach, upon wishing for death, he had been bestowed a commandment, becoming a Stargazer.

Had he been granted the chance, Rowan Segmunt's swordsmanship would have likely made the world tremble throughout its entirety.

But, devoid of a worthy rival, devoid of a formidable enemy, devoid of a loved one, Rowan continued to be all by his lonesome.

It was not that he had come to the clear conclusion that feelings were unnecessary to master the way of the sword, nor was it that he had suffered a severe betrayal from someone he had formed a bond with.

It was simply that Rowan had never met someone who would inform him of his current position, nor had he met someone who could boost him up from his current position.

The reason he had been able to avoid Iris's initial attack from the Crystal Palace was because she, adverse to the deaths of others as she was, had had no intention of landing the attack.

The reason for which the undead Balleroy Temeglyph had fled from the "cloud-cutting" technique was because he feared an unexpected counterattack from Cecilus Segmunt; thus, he had wished to avoid pursuing them too far.

The reason he had remained safe until now, amidst the Great Disaster brought about by the hosts of undead, was because the only ones that had appeared before him were opponents his sword skills were perfectly capable of handling.

The reason for which Rowan had not been dispossessed of his life by Cecilus Segmunt, the latter refusing the former's attempt at instigating the assassination of the Empire, was because the latter had said "It may be impossible Dad, but get really strong then come back here and fight me, I've got a feeling that a development like that would be heated!" on a whim.

The reason why Rowan Segmunt had continuously escaped death till this day, was none other than the scales of fortune and misfortune always tipping in the direction of fortune for him.

And now, the opponent Rowan had encountered in the Imperial Capital, which had transformed into the Undead Capital, was also the sole enemy that had no intention of taking Rowan's life.

—The world would not grant Rowan's wish, but it continued to only illuminate the paths where he would survive.

Rowan: "□□□"

Iris: "—You intend to persist?"

As Rowan slowly raised his body from its spread-eagle position, Iris knitted her brows.

The distance between them had opened a few tens of meters, but perhaps because her unmistakable presence had made it so, Iris's words were fully understood by Rowan.

—Nay, this was likely a change yielded due to encountering a powerful enemy for the first time.

As if an unbreakable shell that had always been around his exterior had been shattered, that feeling was probably the reason. Because of that, he clearly understood.

As Iris fixed her gaze on him from the front, the powerful Mana in which her entire body was clad—its colossal magnitude was understood by him beyond a shadow of a doubt, as was the result of direct confrontation just a moment prior.

In the Undead Capital of Lupugana, guarding the Crystal Palace, where the ringleader of the enemy was likely present, Iris blocked the path—this woman was, unmistakably, the strongest being in the Vollachian Empire.

Someone that even Cecilus, extolled as First of the Nine Divine Generals, was no match for, the ultimate existence for the sake of this disaster—.

Rowan: "Kahaha, how fortunate, how so very fortunate! What a good day it's been…!"

Perceiving that through his experience, Rowan bared his teeth and smiled as his mind rang with a sound akin to his son singing in a loud voice.

He had thought that in order to reach the Heavenly Sword, there would be no means aside from cutting down his son once the latter did eventually reach it. However, if he were to encounter a being that surpassed even Cecilus, like he had now, it was a quicker story.

It was not eventually, the time was now.

Right now, at this moment, Rowan Segmunt would reach the apex of the sword, and seize the seat of Heavenly Sword.

For that purpose—

Rowan: "—Swordsman, Rowan Segmunt."

Once more, sheathing the katana which he had yet to let go of, he spread his legs, adopting a stance with the blade at his waist.

In the far distance of his vision stood Iris, the distance that had opened between the two of them a sign that he had run out of luck—no, the result of his days of blood and sweat in his endeavor to reach the apex remained, still.

And now, he would receive the reward commensurate with that from Iris's slender neck.

Rowan: "—Cloud-cutting."

With the blade being unsheathed, a flash of the sword was unleashed; Iris, standing motionlessly, faced it head-on.

The air present ahead was cut down by the flash, the foliage interrupting the path were cut down by the flash, all notions of sound and wind were consigned to oblivion; in all his life until now, it was the most honed Rowan's blade had ever been.

And the woman in the beautiful dress, Iris, would have her head lopped—

Iris: "—This is as far as it goes."

By merely tilting her head, she avoided the finest brandish of Rowan's life, and grumbling those words like a sigh, Iris firmly stepped on the ground, and moved forth.

The ultimate existence of the Great Disaster, did not grant Rowan the time to swing his sword a second time.

As a violent impact plowed into him right from above, Rowan could do naught but be buried deep into the street.

Iris: “□□□”

Looking down at the figure of the swordsman who had sunk into the ground, Iris waved the hem of the dress that had performed the deed, and turned her back to the man she had faced off against.

Likely, the strength to fight no longer remained within her opponent. She would be under no threat even with her back turned to him.

It was sad to say, but even supposing strength was indeed present, even if he did attempt to launch a surprise attack, it would not reach Iris.

Iris: “While you are still with your life, you must leave the Imperial Capital.”

Those words were to be spoken at the outset to the weak; spoken only at the end of a duel to the death were the opponent strong.

As an opponent to whom these statements ought be given, Rowan was a terribly troublesome person. —He was not weak. Yet, neither was he strong. If she was forced to put it to words, he would be the apex of the common man.

Thus, in regards to the reality spread throughout Imperial Capital as it was in the moment, his presence could even be called a sin.

Iris: “A sin, is it? How in the world could I say such a thing…”

Clutching her chest, Iris spilled those words out as if to curse herself.

Even so, her mind was made. She had made up her mind. Thus, she had carried that out in a form where she could not make excuses. No matter who or how many people closed in, she would force them all back.

As long as she did that, the story of Iris and Eugard would—

Iris: “—For what reason, do you stand?”

Halting her steps, Iris questioned the presence behind her without looking back.

To the swordsman who ought to have fainted from the strike a moment ago, to the presence of Rowan standing up. She had believed that she had dispossessed him of his consciousness, instead she now lamented for having been exceedingly naïve. However, had she applied any more force, his skull would have been shattered, most likely. That was because she had no intention of reaping his life.

Had she been too naïve, believing that she had properly conveyed the gap in strength between them, perhaps? There did exist some cases in which the other party would not back down despite a difference in strength, so perhaps this was one such case.

Iris: “There are times when your opponent has no intention of letting you go, so you must fight with your back against the wall. But, I have…”

Rowan: “…No intention of doing that. That’s the problem.”

Iris: “□□□”

The response, spoken in a frail, husky voice, was beyond Iris’s comprehension.

Be it the pride of a warrior, be it the obstinacy of a man, either way it was something Iris was unable to comprehend.

Iris began to think. She thought about that which she wished to cherish, even more so than those things.

That was why—

Iris: “If you still cannot bring yourself to give up—”

Until his spirit was crushed, she would keep going, even if she were to hear the sound of cracks forming in her own heart.

Indeed, it happened at the moment Iris was about to confront Rowan's resolve.

Iris: "…Eh?"

Turning around, Iris's eyes widened in astonishment.

Not because of any abnormal situation like Rowan closing their difference of ability in the blink of an eye, nor was it because someone else had come to this place, turning their weapon towards Iris in Rowan's stead.

Present there was merely Rowan, however, the one to have astonished Iris was unmistakably Rowan.

—With the katana in his hand, he slashed his own neck, fatally so.

Iris: "Wha…"

One beat elapsed, and in the subsequent moment, blood spurted out of the severed arteries in his neck with tremendous vigor.

The boulevard was stained with the gushing blood before her eyes, the essence of life flowed out of Rowan Segmunt's body, being absorbed into the ground.

Iris: "Why…?"

Witnessing a scene wildly beyond her comprehension, with that gasp a breath escaped from Iris's lips.

Seeing Iris's state, Rowan's eyes widened with a maniacal glint as blood gushed from his neck. And while that blood came up his digestive tract, flowing out of the corners of his mouth, he smiled.

And smiling, he spoke.

Rowan: "Even if I die, I'm go—"

Midway through his words, Rowan's blue eyes rolled around, and as his pupils dilated, he collapsed.

While perceiving that it was not a loss of consciousness, and instead was a loss of life, Iris quickly rushed over, trying to extend her hands to the man in an attempt to at least save his life.

However, her hands did not reach the man's corpse.

The reason for that being—

???: "—I'm gonna reach the Heavenly Sword."

???: "—I'm gonna reach the Heavenly Sword."

Having just died, several undead Rowan Segmunts swooped down from all directions in unison, set upon Iris as she sprinted.

V!c.ll2o

5

—When the unleashed breath of the Dragon ran through the townscape of the Imperial Capital in approach of him, there were not many things that Heinkel could do.

Only, wielding his sword in accordance with the appeals of his survival instincts, he dug enough of a hole in the ground to give himself scant consolation. Just in time, he slipped his body inside that hole.

But then again, consolation was merely consolation; with the trajectory of the Dragon’s breath boring deep into the ground as it closed in, the hole would probably amount to nothing more than consolation.

Thus, the life of the current head of the lineage of the Sword Saint, a family that had continuously protected the Dragon Kingdom for many a year, the life of the man known as Heinkel Astrea would, as irony would have it, be deleted by the breath of a Dragon, no trace of it remaining—

???: “—Oioi, ya can’t die so easily, Pops.”

Grabbed by the scruff of his neck, Heinkel was dragged out of the hole he had opened by force. With fierce vigor his body was hoisted; immediately after, a burning smell, that of the Dragon’s breath having scorched the world, could be perceived by him.

Heinkel: “Uoh, UWAHHHHHH?!”

His vision spun around, blood spilled from his broken forehead, gastric juices flowed out of the corners of his mouth; his body’s contents were scattered about without any impediment, and after experiencing the sensation of being afloat, he fell to the ground.

His state such that a defensive or even an adequate state could not be taken, he stretched out his legs, placed his arms on the ground as to raise his body, then looked at his surroundings.

Heinkel: “—Ugh.”

The reason he had reflexively let out a groan, was because he bore witness to the disastrous scene in the location he had been just a moment prior.

Caressed by the Dragon’s breath, white steam was being emitted from the area, which had been completely erased. Had his escape been belayed, most likely, he too would have become a portion of that white steam.

???: “To make it easier for Captain ‘n the others to enter, my amazin’ self was s’posed to rampage in the south ‘n draw their attention, but… Hah! Can’t believe my eyes!”

Heinkel: “Aah…?”

???: “Thought you’d flee for sure, but ya sure got guts, don’t’cha Pops?”

Amidst its roughness, praise was certainly present in that voice; once Heinkel did turn the side where its origin lay, standing there was the figure of the person who had dragged him out.

There was enough illumination behind him that Heinkel was unable to gaze at their face with clarity. His ears were still ringing due to the impact of the Dragon’s tail strike just before, so he was unsure if that voice was a familiar one or not.

But, as if to say that all of those things mattered not, the person gnashed their fangs, and proceeded forth.

Behind Heinkel kneeling on the ground, they moved to square off against the colossal Cloud Dragon, its glare on the two of them.

Then, powerfully striking their fists together before their chest,

???: “—My amazin’ self’ll lend ya a hand, Pops! “None can lift the Quain Stone alone”, ain’t that right!!”

—With a roar akin to that of a beast, as the vanguard of the “Rescue the Vollachian Empire from Destruction” squad, Garfiel

Tinzel raised a warcry at the start of the bout against the Cloud Dragon.

Interlude:
Ubilik

1

—As we all know, Ubilk was a Stargazer.

The commandment bestowed upon him, was that of saving the Vollachian Empire from the ruin of the Great Disaster that befell it.

For that purpose, he, a mere male prostitute, had acquired unexpected intelligence, and eventually came to be recognized for his certain value by Vincent Vollachia.

Of course, Ubilk was not so naive as to view that as an achievement of his own merit.

Even so, amidst the many who were granted the position of Stargazer and seemed to tread on tragic paths, Ubilk thought himself to be in a fortunate position.

For the vast majority of Stargazers, being granted a commandment meant distorting the human nature that they had possessed up to that point, and being forced to live in an entirely new way. One might evaluate that as unfortunate or pitiful, but from Ubilk's perspective, the prerequisites for that were extravagant, and it could not be thought of as anything but the viewpoint of someone who was blessed.

A twisted human nature, and surrounding individuals who could sense a change within them—if not for acquiring those things, they would never be able to harbor such a recognition in the first place.

Ubilk was certainly one of those people, and he was deeply grateful, from the bottom of his heart, for his commandment, which had altered his way of life; a life which ought to have been expended with him remaining a nobody.

Even now, after having fulfilled his commandment as a Stargazer, that did not change.

Ubilk: “Stiiill~, it’s not like Vollachia has been saved though…”

The reinforcement of armaments and appropriate stationing of capable personnel, in the Fortified City of Garkla where preparations for war were being made all throughout the night, Ubilk, with no position of his own, muttered so as he overlooked all the busy people.

Sensing that the fog which had always occupied a corner of his mind had cleared up, his thoughts were suddenly free from the influence of the fog, and Ubilk became aware that he was no longer a Stargazer.

As previously mentioned, the commandment bestowed upon Ubilk was that of saving Vollachia from the Great Disaster.

In spite of that, the fact that Ubilk was currently released from his commandment, was tantamount to implicitly notifying that there was no longer anything Ubilk could do regarding the Great Disaster.

As soon as he woke up from the frenzy that had been stimulating him, Ubilk felt like he had been made naked.

Ubilk: “I’m grateful you know? Eveeen~ thoooough~ I’m grateful…”

He had taken close to ten years for its manifestation, it was exactly like a grand bout one has only once in a lifetime.

Had he had the ladder pulled out from beneath him just before he got any results, he might have been tempted into grumbling his dissatisfaction with “that’s not how it’s supposed to be.” He had even put out his evil eye, a natural feature of his as one from the evil eye tribe, just to prove to Vincent that he held no treachery, thus declaring his position.

Even now, he still had the scar from his evil eye right in the middle of his chest, and such a lonesome thing it was.

Ubilk: “Well, either way, it’s a good thing that as a user of an evil eye I don’t have any talent for it.”

The problem was, the firewood he had been tirelessly burning until today had vanished, leaving behind his proxied beliefs, that just continued to raise smoke, along with the being known as himself after that had been quenched.

Until now, he had continued to progress in the direction indicated by his commandment, and had carried out his duty as a Stargazer.

That had been Ubilk's method of fighting, so he had not acquired knowledge of the fighting styles of warriors, such as swinging swords or drawing bows. The days he had spent on the Gladiator Island, too, involved making it his number one priority not to die in order to fulfill his commandment, thus he had absolutely no combat experience.

Therefore, in this fortress where everyone had the resolve to fight, Ubilk was all on his lonesome.

Ubilk: "I wonder if I shooouldn't~ have informed His Excellency in such a foolishly honest manner."

Leaving the Fortified City of Garkla, Vincent was headed to the Imperial Capital of Lupugana for the decisive battle.

Before his departure, Ubilk was directly questioned by him. — About if as a Stargazer, there was still some use he could provide in stopping the Great Disaster.

If he had lied and said that his commandment was still unfinished, perhaps he would not have been left behind in the fortress.

Ubilk: "Buuut~, it's not like I really want the Empire to be destroyed."

By telling a lie because he had no place, needless worry would be bestowed upon Vincent, and it would serve as an act that would benefit the enemy.

Weighing Vincent and Chisha as to who would serve the Empire better if left behind, Ubilk took part in Chisha's plan, and assisted in having Vincent survive.

He was bestowed with a commandment, but in contrast, Chisha, who had established his own way of life without having been granted one, was much more admirable.

Ubilk did not want to disgrace that decision. On the other hand—

Ubilk: “□□□”

Within the restless fortress, Ubilk aimlessly passed by many people.

Absolutely all of them understood the adverse situation they were placed in, yet still did what they needed to in order to challenge that which they must. Regardless of how well they performed, Ubilk respected that they were devoting themselves to their duty. At the same time, he was envious. Just a little while earlier, Ubilk had been on the same side as them.

Ergo, Ubilk thought to himself.

Ubilk: “Supposing the Empire were to be in danger… I wooonder~ if I could be bestowed with a commandment again?”

If he was deprived of his role, as it was no longer necessary, what if it were to become necessary once more?

At this point, there was nothing Ubilk could do concerning Vincent’s group, as they had already departed for the Imperial Capital. But, even if Vincent’s group were to eliminate the ringleader of the Great Disaster, what would happen if someone who held an important position in the Empire were to lose their life, or if someone from the Kingdom who was helping out were to die?

Would that not be a crisis threatening the ruin of the Empire, in a form entirely different to that of the Great Disaster?

Ubilk: “The possibility of something like a Stargazer being bestowed with a commandment, fulfilling it, and then being granted a new commandment, is close to zero. —But, it isn’t zero.”

If only a commandment to save the Vollachian Empire from ruin could be brought down to him.

If that new crisis were to come about, commandments would likely be passed down in order to prevent that.

—Yearning for such a possibility, Ubilk's legs began to head for the back of the fortress.

Ubilk: "□□□"

Ubilk, along with important people of both the Kingdom and Empire were packed inside the sturdiest great fortress within Garkla.

In order to reach this point, the undead would need to capture the protective walls enclosing the city, as well as the numerous forts along the way. By that point, the perspective of those defending would treat it as a lost battle.

However, there were no further means of retreat within the Fortified City, and the soldiers would have no choice but to fight until the very last soldier fell. Quite literally, this grand fortress would be the last bastion of the Empire.

—If there was an opening in that.

Ubilk: "Just anything small."

Just one opening would be fine.

Even if he did not go so far as to remove the latch from the gate, he could leave it raised a bit so it would be easier to unlatch. Setting up a simple magic stone time-based device to go off after a certain amount of time within the outer walls of the fortress would also be fine. If only to push the backs of the undead, one step forward.

If he did that, the flame that had gone out in Ubilk's heart would receive a new kindling—

???: "—You, what are you doing over there?"

As a voice suddenly came down on him from overhead, Ubilk halted his step, and tensed the expression on his face.

Turning around, a gaze was looking down upon him from the second-floor passage of the fortress—his eyes met with those of a brown-haired woman, who rode in a wheelchair and had a nasty look in her eyes.

A woman that had also been riding in the coupled dragon carriages, where she too had no idea what her role was. With a look of suspicion on her face, she glared at Ubilk, who was present in the unpopular rear of the fortress, and,

Woman: "Don't tell me… you're slacking off? If so, can't get any worse than that. Listen here, even though a woman with bad legs like me is working, do you want to die? Yes you."

Ubilk: "…Nooo~, it's not like I'm slacking…"

Woman: "So then, why are you in such a place? C-can you not make such poor excuses? You think a person like me is ignorant about the world, so it's easy to deceive me, don't you? Those sorts of things, I can tell."

While mixing in a strange self-punishing viewpoint, the woman denounced Ubilk.

Her attitude was extremely one-sided, but anything that he could say in response would pointlessly provoke her ire, so Ubilk was earnestly troubled as to what he should do. Wracking his brain, he suddenly had a thought.

Ubilk: "I want to ask sooomething~ really quick… Your legs are disabled, and you're probably unable to fight, so why exactly does a young lady like yourself continue to live?"

Woman: "You, are you trying to pick a fight?!"

Ubilk: "Ah, no, you're mistaken. I wasn't reeeally~ trying to speak ill of you…"

As the woman widened her eyes in anger and leaned out of the window, Ubilk raised both of his hands and apologized. As he did, he truly tried to formulate what he wanted to say within his mind.

In this predicament, within the grand fortress in which warriors were coming and going, was a disabled woman who could serve no purpose.

Ubilk: “Why does such a person go around searching for things to do like that?”

Woman: “That’s, well that’s obviously because it’d feel awful to just stay put without doing anything!”

Ubilk: “□□□”

Receiving a blunt, angry voice in response, Ubilk was startled. Seeing Ubilk’s surprised reaction, the woman gave an “Argh geez!” and bit her fingernails in irritation.

While biting them, she fixed her eyes upon Ubilk as if he had killed her parents, and,

Woman: “…You know, my fiancé died in this conflict. He went out of his way to come and save me, and he died.”

Ubilk: “…Thaaat∼ must have been tough.”

Woman: “Don’t speak as if you know. Though, it isn’t just you. Everyone is saying things like they know, but it’s none of their business. But…”

Ubilk: “But?”

Woman: “What would they think if a woman in a wheelchair remained whimpering and cowardly, unable to serve any purpose? They would make a fool of Todd, saying stuff like “Ahh, her fiancé died because she was such a burden”.”

Her voice and lips trembling, the woman spoke while tears welled up in her eyes as she gave an angry glare.

The name that had suddenly appeared without explanation was likely the name of her fiancé. What she was speaking of was undoubtedly just her paranoia. But, though it was excessively dramatic, there was also some truth to it.

Without knowing the circumstances, without knowing the relationship between this woman and her fiancé, if strangers were to cross paths with her for just a moment, the majority would likely harbor such pity for her.

Woman: “I don’t need anything like pity. I-if I can have even a little bit of dignity, if there is even a little bit of work I can do, then that idiot, then that idiot won’t need to be looked down on by people who didn’t even know him.”

Ubilk: “□□□”

Woman: “I’m, going to live my life with dignity.”

Clenching her teeth, with tears welling up in her eyes, while her pitiful voice trembled, the woman spoke thus. Saying that, the woman glared at Ubilk with her moistened eyes once again.

And with a snap, she thrust a finger out from her elevated position.

Woman: “I-if you understand, then find a job to do and get to work. Are you below a woman in a wheelchair?”

Was that intended to light a fire in him through rough words, or was it purely just her having a sharp tongue? For Ubilk, who did not even know the woman’s name, her true intentions could not be deduced.

Though he could not deduce them, the woman was sufficiently conveying what way of life she had established for herself.

And that was—

Ubilk: “You’re quite praaaiseworthy~, young lady. After all, you just crushed one of the reasons leading to the Empire’s ruin.”

She became the impetus for Ubilk, who had ceased to be a Stargazer, to be released from his commandment in a true sense.

2

Katya: “Saying such nonsense like that, that man was trying to redirect the conversation. Well, after that, it looks like he properly went to the soldiers in the fortress to find work to do…"

Walking next to Katya, who was breathing roughly unable to relieve her anger, Rem sighed deeply at the story of the man she had reprimanded.

Even in such a situation where everyone needed to work together as one, there would always be a certain number of troublemakers. They were the ones who would discourage the morale of those around them and disrupt the loop.

Rem: "But, please be careful. There's no guarantee that they won't lose their temper and turn violent on Katya-san."

Katya: "Um, that's…"

Rem: "I'm glad that this time someone listened to you obediently. Next time, please don't be so reckless when I'm not around."

Katya, her lips pouting with bitterness, had nothing to say in response to Rem's concern. She did not outright acknowledge it, but she also did not want to say something that would make her feel bad for no good reason. As she caught a glimpse of such Katya-like anguish, Rem's expression grew gentler.

Subaru and the rest had left for the Imperial Capital, and the people that remained in the city were busy preparing for the defensive battle.

Those who could fight were assigned to their respective positions, while those who could not were assigned to support them. Rem, who could use healing magic, was valued highly. It was literally an all-out war.

Katya, who had converted one of the unmotivated personnel, was one of those who were doing everything in their power to help — Rem knew, of course, that although she was fighting hard, that did not mean she had recovered from the feeling of loss.

Katya had lost her fiancé, Todd, and even her brother Jamal had proudly announced his intention of going to a place where death was certain. Only able to imagine how that must have felt, it was heartbreaking for Rem. Katya's brave front, which she had also put on in an attempt to not allow Rem to worry, contributed to this.

So—

Rem: "Katya-san, can I ask for help gathering clean cloths? I'm sure we'll need a lot of them when the fighting starts."

Katya: "That's fine. You know, you can pile a surprisingly large amount of things on my lap."

Without pointing out Katya's brave front, Rem asked her to help with her work. She believed that this was what Katya needed right now, and that it would help as many people as possible reach tomorrow.

And then—

Petra: "—Ah, Rem-neesama."

When Rem looked up upon hearing her name being called, she saw a girl barging in, waving her hand at the end of the passage. It was a pretty girl with a big ribbon on her head—Petra. Besides her was the tall figure of Frederica, and there was also another person—

Rem: "Nee-sama too; what are the three of you doing together?"

Rem tilted her head as she caught sight of Ram, who was leaning her back against the wall.

These three women, according to Subaru, were apparently Rem's colleagues from when she had her memories. She was satisfied with her relationship with Ram for the time being, but she had not gauged the distance with the other two yet.

Frederica, with the crinkles of her eyes lowered, smiled when seeing Rem's slight nervousness.

Frederica: "We have finished our work for the time being, and we have come to invite you to take a break with us. We can't overly let our guards down, so a minimal sense of urgency may be necessary, but…”

Ram: “You won’t last long if you stay tense all the time, plus, the more time I get to spend with Rem, the better.”

Petra: “I also agree with Ram-neesama. Besides…”

Smiling in response to Ram’s candid words, Petra turned a meaningful glance to Rem mid-sentence, glancing up at her.

Realising Petra’s gaze was on her, Rem was silent for a moment and perceived what she truly meant. They were people Rem was trying to feel out their relationship with, but the same could be said of them too.

That said, it was also true that things right now were in a state of emergency, so—.

Rem: “I feel grateful about how you feel. But, now is not the time…”

Ram: “No, Rem. You have it backwards.”

Rem: “Nee-sama…?”

Ram: “It’s an imminent situation, after all. You may think this is not the time for this. However you can also say it’s the only chance we’ll have. Ram can trust Rem, no questions asked. But—”

There, Ram squinted her light-crimson eyes, and pointed out the two by her side with a glance.

Rem thought that friendship should have been put on the back burner due to the urgent situation. However, Ram and her colleagues thought that trust was important in a situation like this.

Rem: “…Katya-san, what do you think?”

Katya: “Huh? D-don’t ask me something like that. First off, I wasn’t even invited…”

Ram: “What are you talking about? Aren’t you a friend of Rem’s?

You had better come too.”

Katya: “Wha…e-even though your face looks similar, you’re way more pushy than Rem… no, thinking again calmly, the one here is a very pushy woman as well… hk.”

Rem and Ram, the two sisters, spoke to her at the same time, and Katya looked awfully puzzled.

Anyway, when asked for her opinion, Katya’s gaze wandered for a moment before she said,

Katya: “…Why don’t you try to get along? You won’t be slacking off if you talk to them about work-related matters, and I’m sure on the flipside too that they wanted to see you anyway, no? Or so I think.”

Frederica: “Katya-san.”

Petra: “Katya-sama.”

Katya: “N-No need to be so forceful! I don’t even know your names.”

Petra and Frederica were pleased with Katya’s opinion, which was opined closely to Ram and the others after some puzzling. Rem also had her notions, sneaking a glance at Katya who was trembling at the vigor of those two.

It was not like Rem did not like it. It was just that she could not help but feel pressured—.

Ram: “—Are you really that worried about Barusu?”

Rem: “Yes. He’s always acting so over the top… ah.”

From Rem’s side, Ram quietly asked this of her, who was watching Katya and the others with her hand on her chest. It had been so natural that even Rem had unintentionally let her true feelings slip out.

Without realising she was doing so, Rem, whose hand had been on her chest, put it back over her mouth and gawked at Ram.

However, her big sister just batted one of her eyes shut and gave a proud smile, making her aware that she was no match for her.

And, that was when it happened. —In the sky above the grand fortress, a loud, loud explosion rang out..

Everyone: "—!"

A moment later, Rem turned her head in a hurry to look out the window and she saw a flash of light cutting through the morning sky. It was a report from a city watchman, who had used the signal that was agreed upon in advance—

Ram: "—Frederica!"

Frederica: "Understood!"

Immediately after, faster than Rem could stir, Frederica responded to the sharp call of Ram. She quickly stepped behind Katya, and grabbing the handles of the wheelchair,

Frederica: "Katya-sama, be careful not to bite your tongue!"

Katya: "W-wait, hold up… gyah."

Petra: "Frederica-neesama, this way!"

Katya, who was in her wheelchair, let out a scream as Frederica broke into a very brisk run. Meanwhile, Petra began running with her small body through the fortress corridor as if she were leading the way for the wheelchair.

One moment later, one after another, all of the people in the great fortress—or rather, everyone in the entirety of the fortified city of Garkla, began to move at once; in a flash, the city had transformed into a singular living thing.

They all shared a common fate, they were all in the same boat, such applied to the living, to the dead, all and one the same creatures.

Ram: "Rem, are you prepared?"

Rem let out a gulp, feeling this illusion that made her feel like the whole city was shaking; and standing next to her was Ram. Looking back at her intrepid big sister's face in profile, who had asked her that question, Rem took a small breath and said,

Rem: "What would happen if I were to say I am not?"

Ram: "If that was the case, rest assured that Ram has already prepared for Rem as well."

Rem: "—. As expected of Nee-sama."

Ram: "Of course. Ram is the kind of older sister you should be proud of."

Nodding to Ram, who shared her courage without even needing to ask her for it, Rem followed Katya and the others ahead as she ran with her sister through the noisy fortress.

The battle was about to begin. —The final battle that would determine the fate of the Empire.

Rem: "Please. —I'm relying on you."

Thinking of the boy who was not here, Rem bashfully prayed for him.

Whether it was because she was relying on that boy, or because she was not able to be by his side to help him, she did not know the source of her frustration.

Rem ran through the shaking fortress, following behind Ram, who had set off ahead of her.

The large-scale evacuation of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, accompanied by the retreat on a scale unprecedented within recorded history.

While casualties among the civilians and the soldiers were by no means negligible, the present outcome was nevertheless far less severe than had been originally anticipated; in large part because of the mindset by which the Imperial citizens lived their daily lives.

—The people of the Empire must be strong.

That teaching and philosophy had pervaded each and every citizen of the Empire, and it had succeeded in allowing many to take the best possible measures for surviving in this extreme situation.

In addition to the success achieved through such individual resolve and actions, the fact that the various plans that were made for times of emergency, like the coupled dragon carriages, had been fully functional was also significant. These were the achievements of the person who had grasped the forthcoming threat of the Great Disaster, the arrival of which originally being foretold by the Stargazer, and had made the proper preparations.

The fact that said person had been unable to arrive at the fight against that very Great Disaster could be called a bitter regret.

???: “Still, that selflessness has kept the Empire alive! I express nothing but the utmost respect, General First-Class Chisha…!”

As the voice bellowed, Kafma Irulux mowed down the hordes of the undead with thorns discharged from his arms, fighting hard in order to defend the road leading to the Fortified City behind him.

The Imperial Army that had been deployed incrementally along the highway going from the Imperial Capital to the Fortified City, had been gradually falling back towards the city while supporting the evacuation of the retreating Imperial citizens, with the aim of merging with the group within the fort.

Among the Generals who had participated in this decisive battle for the Imperial Capital, the role that had been assigned to Kafma was of the utmost importance, and although he himself would not admit to it, it could be said that the work he had done was influencing the survival of Vollachia.

The resolve of the Imperial Citizens had a large impact on the reduced casualties during the evacuation; the advance preparations had a large impact on the sturdy defenses of the Fortified City; and Kafma’s valiant efforts had a large impact on the high morale and minimal losses of Imperial Soldiers.

Serving as the rear guard to the formation that was gradually falling back towards the Fortified City, he used the power of the “insects” he had taken in to slow the march of the undead, an achievement worthy of being left behind in the annals of history.

However, all of that would be contingent on whether the Vollachian Empire escaped ruin.

Thus, Kafma’s eccentric achievements were also the results of fighting without taking his own survival into consideration.

Kafma: “—Hk.”

As far as the eye could see, the hosts of undead had blanketed the vast plain.

While striking them with thorns, bullets of light, and blades of wind, Kafma gritted his teeth against the appetite of the “insects” that were eating away at him from the inside, stifling his urge to scream.

The Insect Cage Tribe could use the power of the “insects” that coexisted within their bodies, and depending on the type of “insects” that were taken in, they could manifest a wide variety of abilities and combat techniques. But, the relationship between the Insect Cage Tribe and the “insects” was always a symbiotic one.

Neither was it one-sided usage, nor was it assimilation.

Naturally, the “insects” would seek compensation from their host for their work. That would usually be the host’s mana or life force, but if that was found to be insufficient, it would be their flesh and blood.

Already, more than fifty hours had passed since Kafma had decided to fight with the resolve to die, and during that time, he had quite literally been forced to go without eating or drinking.

Although his consciousness had been sharpened like never before by his awakened fighting spirit, to the “insects” inside his body, the host’s state of mind was irrelevant. They would simply lodge a complaint to the host about the fact that they were hungry, run out of patience if the host refused to lend an ear, and start to devour their flesh.

Kafma: “I’m the one breaking the promise. But still…!”

He could not desert the warfront, nor could he allow himself to fall.

The Empire had many other dependable warriors besides him, but Kafma prided himself on being the bravest when faced with death. He had to prove that his pride was real.

For that reason—

Kafma: “I, must not—”

Fall here; it happened at the moment he roused himself with those words, about to step forth with his organs still being devoured.

From behind, a large palm grabbed his shoulder.

And, the one to whom that palm belonged was—

???: “Fall back, General Second-Class Kafma! You have fulfilled your duty sufficiently!”

The loud voice seemed to be shouting, however, that was just the usual volume for this person.

Being told thus with a voice akin to being struck by a gust of wind, Kafma stared wide-eyed, looking at the giant in golden armor who stood next to him—Goz Ralfon.

Gripping a mace that only he could handle was Goz, whose arrival at this scene surprised Kafma.

Kafma: “For what reason have you come to the front, General First-Class Goz? A General First-Class should be commanding things from the fortress…”

Goz: “High Countess Dracoy is over there! Even without me shutting myself in the fortress, that woman can handle the troops skillfully! More importantly, I can be of more use to His Excellency on the battlefield!"

Kafma: "—. In that case, I will accompany you."

His heart, on the verge of cracking with determination and earnestness, sought to reinforce itself with Goz's appearance. However, Goz interrupted Kafma's plea with a firm "No".

Then, as Goz extended his thick fingers and pressed them against Kafma's chest,

Goz: "The sound of stirring and devouring echoes from within you. It seems you have lost control of the "insects". If you were to be consumed entirely, it would be a significant loss!"

Kafma: "That may be… But, everything I've built up is for this battle!"

Goz: "Kafma Irulux ! Death in itself is not atonement!!"

Kafma: "—Hk."

Getting directly slapped with an angry voice this time, Kafma's entire body began to tremble.

Just at this moment, even the "insects" that were eagerly devouring Kafma's body halted their movements, paralyzed by the fierce aura of Goz standing before them.

Looking down at Kafma, Goz, with his scarred, bearded face, expressed his anger.

Goz: "I understand that you still seek to atone for the rebellion orchestrated by your kin, along with that damned Balleroy! But! Atonement can not be achieved through death! You must live!"

Kafma: "General First-Class Goz…"

Goz: "Even after the Great Disaster subsides, the Empire will not instantly return to normal! Both you and I can become His Excellency's strength! That is why!"

With a roar filled with loyalty as if about to burst, Goz bashed Kafma's thoughts.

Realizing that this was not a place to sacrifice his life, Kafma, with his innermost feelings laid bare, tightly closed his eyes and deeply bowed his head before Goz.

Goz: "What, anyhow, it is not so easy a conflict that you can simply step back and be done with it. Your turn will come again soon! Until then, eat, rest, and regain your strength!"

Kafma: "Under, stood. General First-Class Goz, I entrust this place to you…"

Goz: "No need to say it. —I too, have pent-up frustrations!"

With a wide grin at Kafma's strained words, Goz aimed the mace he had shouldered towards the enemy lines.

Handling the excessively heavy weapon that no one but him could with ease, Goz's entire body overflowed with a tremendous fighting spirit, so immense that it had an illusion of visibility.

Once again, feeling the apprehension of the "insects" within his own body, Kafma fell into deep thought.

Chisha Gold, who demonstrated an unfathomable strategy to take precautions against the ruin of the Empire, and Goz Ralfon, who frightened the "insects" by merely standing there with his tremendous spirit, were both those who had reached the position of the Vollachian Empire's Generals of the First-Class, all of which were transcendent beings no less competent than another.

Envisioning how he had almost been ranked among them in the past, and how he must be ranked among them in the future—

Kafma: "—The Empire is strong. We won't be so easily taken by the undead or disaster."

3

Otto: "It is not a matter of being strong or weak, but it is rather a matter of quantity, and one that is difficult to deal with. Fortunately, the supplies and defenses of the Fortified City are abundant, but… we cannot withstand such a siege for long."

Serena: "You speak your mind clearly. Well, I certainly have a better impression of you than those who can't express their opinions for fear of offending others. If only your cunning could be matched by your military strength, then you would be more to my liking."

Berstetz: "High Countess Dracroy, let us not digress any further."

Berstetz, chiding her, glared at Serena with thin, thread-like eyes. Serena shrugged her shoulders under that gaze, and Otto, who was being flirted with, let out a small sigh.

The setting was the command room of the great fortress, and those facing each other were responsible for leading the full-scale defensive battle of the city.

From the reports of the lookouts, it was confirmed that the Fortified City of Garkla had entered a state of being ready for combat around the great fortress.

The delaying force that had been holding back the enemy's advance had also joined the city, and staged within a city that boasted the Vollachian Empire's strongest defenses, the largest siege in the history of the Empire was about to begin.

Anastasia: "That bein' said, ya typically win a siege by waitin' for reinforcements, but we can't be countin' on that this time, y'know. The only way we can be sayin' we've won is…"

???: "—When Natsuki-kun and His Excellency the Emperor splendidly defeat the enemy's mastermind. Until then, our role is to struggle to ensure that Vollachia does not fall."

Anastasia: "If Vollachia goes down, then Kararagi 'n Lugunica are gonna be in hot water too… What the heck, it's really a battle for the survival of the world, ain't it."

Placing her hand on her white cheek, Anastasia broke into a graceful smile as she spoke, and the fox scarf that chimed in with her let out a sigh of exasperation.

Having quite the peculiar form, the fox scarf brought by Anastasia was supposedly a Spirit. They needed as many capable heads as they could get, as this truly was an all-out war.

Serena: “The first question is how long the city’s defenses will hold.. General Second-Class Irulux has been replaced by General First-Class Ralfon. Despite his appearances, he’s a man capable of delicate and skillful work. He should follow the directive of sparing the lives of the zombies as much as possible, but…”

Berstetz: “It is unrealistic to consistently expect non-lethality. This goes not just for General First-Class Goz, but for everyone else. If there is any hope for us to hold onto…”

Anastasia: “I’m guessin’ it’d be Natsuki-kun’s group of friends.”

Otto: “I think so, too.”

Anastasia and Otto exchanged glances, aligning their opinions with each other.

The topic the duo raised concerned the strange defensive force for the Fortified City, in whom they held high expectations, the members of the Pleiades Battalion.

The black-haired boy, who had formed a miraculously friendly relationship with Vincent, led this group. They had significantly aided the refugees with their strong solidarity and mysterious combat abilities.

Currently, the boy in question was headed to the Imperial Capital with Vincent and the others, leaving the group under the leadership of Gustav Morello—led by the stern member of the Multi-Arm Tribe, the Gladiators were fighting exceptionally well.

Echidna: “Their morale is high, and their ability to prevent casualties is impressive. I often think to myself, Natsuki-kun is a genius at bringing what is needed to where it is needed.”

Otto: “Yes, that seems to be his one redeeming quality. Though, I wish he would just make deliveries or bridge political divisions, instead of recklessly running into the most dangerous of situations."

Anastasia: "But ya know, ain't that more of a problem on Emilia-san's part? If Emilia-san starts runnin' ahead, Natsuki-kun's gotta run too, ain't no way around it."

Anastasia shook her head with a "good grief" gesture, and Otto dropped his shoulders in agreement.

While watching this exchange and the development of relationships would be interesting, spending too much time on it would draw a stern look from the Prime Minister.

Serena cleared her throat, and after capturing everyone's attention,

Serena: "As per our prior agreement, our combat strategy is strictly to hold a siege, a defensive battle. If defeating one specific opponent could resolve all of this, I'd consider assassination as an option, but…"

Berstetz: "As it stands, let us consider His Excellency and those headed to the Imperial Capital as the arrows of assassination."

Serena: "That's how it is. —It's an all-out war."

At Serena's words, there was a palpable tension in the air, and everyone's expression became more intense.

The light-hearted banter from just before had ended, and from that point on, it would be a world where they needed to exert their utmost efforts.

The Imperial Generals, the rebel fighters, the Gladiators of the Pleiades Battalion, the People of Shudraq, and even the allies of the Kingdom and the emissaries from the City-States, all part of a battle that utilized everything at their disposal.

And, as the first hurdle—

Serena: "We'll be counting on you, envoys from the City-States."

Anastasia: “Sure thing, leave it to us. —As far as I can remember, he ain’t ever let me down, not even once.”

4

—Amidst the warfare waged in the Vollachian Empire, what exactly was the aspect that differed most greatly to that of other countries?

If one were to ignore the resolve harbored by the Imperial Soldiers, or their fiery spirit to contend in battle, the answer to that was plain and simple—the potential for aerial combat.

The technique of flying dragon taming, which was absent from other nations, and the fact that a large number of flying dragons inhabited the Empire exclusively, were aspects of their superiority that were thoroughly demonstrated in warfare.

It was a fact that went without even needing to be thought, but merely being able to fly through the air was something that proved advantageous in war.

In fact, the Fortress City of Guaral, which was said to boast high defensive capabilities among other cities of similar size, had fallen into a state of utter destruction due to a flock of flying dragons commanded by the Flying Dragon General, Madelyn Eschart.

By merely throwing things down from an unreachable position, a battle would become one-sided.

That remained a threat even for the Fortified City of Garkla, a city surrounded by a towering wall.

However—

???: “Fire—!!!”

Lined up atop the wall, Shudraqian warriors with bows at the ready fired arrows into the air in unison.

The barrage of arrows covered the sky, offering no escape, and directly pierced by those countless attacks was the flock of undead flying dragons that had been ordered to assail the stout city from the skies above, and was soaring through the air as they drew ever closer.

Pierced by the merciless blows, one after another the heads of undead flying dragons shattered before they turned to dust and fell to the ground.

Among them, there were some that continued to fly without paying any mind to the attacks, but—

Shudraqian: “Take them down!”

Shudraqian: “It’s best if they fall to the ground~.”

Struck by a blow from an arrow incomparable to a normal arrow in terms of length and thickness, one of them was blown to smithereens in mid-air, and met its end.

In response to aerial combat, the Shudraq boasted unrivaled strength—the experience of the aforementioned crushing defeat in the Fortress City had a great impact on the fighting style of these women.

Had they not suffered that defeat, the Shudraq would likely have not been fighting the undead flying dragons here.

Giving meaning to each and every one of their battles, the People of Shudraq had fought since the start of the Empire’s upheaval, which began with Vincent Vollachia’s ousting.

And,in response to the morale of those women—

Shudraqian: “Go get them! Guy with the handsome face!”

Man: “I shall do my best to meet your expectations. —Al Clauseria.”

Weaving an incantation with a fine tone of voice, the tip of the Knight’s sword traced the sky, and following that trajectory a rainbow light was born, thwarting the path of the undead flying dragons.

Despite the beauty of the rainbow aurora, it became a barrier that rejected anything and everything.

Man: “Wholly different from when they were still buds, these girls have blossomed, and this is their glimmer.”

In the blink of an eye, the skies of the Fortified City were engulfed in an aurora of rainbow—however, the size and extent of that rainbow were enough to defend around half of the extensive Fortified City.

The Imperial Soldiers fighting on the front lines, as well as those who were also responsible for protecting the city from atop the wall, were left speechless by that extraordinary combat capability, and they could not help but feel a surge of courage from that reliability.

Sensing that swell of morale, the Knight who birthed the rainbow—Julius Juukulius, waved the hem of his kimono, and looked up to the sky once again.

With a white scar underneath his left eye, the dauntless young man participated in the battle out of honor, and nevertheless trained his gaze upon what he ought to do without an iota of hesitation. His eyes were fixed upon the sky, upon the vast lands where the undead drew near, believing in the efforts of his friend, who was headed even further beyond—

Julius: “—I shall carry out my own duties. I hope you also do so to the fullest, Subaru.”

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Wolves: Death unto the Weak, No Mercy XI

1

Chisha: “Groovy-dono, if it is alright with you, I would like to invite you to join me.”

Groovy: “Geh.”

Being told so as they passed each other in the corridor, Groovy Gumlet made a mighty frown.

Looking down at Groovy, who had a short build characteristic of hyenapeople, was a lanky man who was taller than the average person. His hair, complexion, clothes, and even the iron fans that he kept on himself were all white, and he was an overly dubious, lanky bastard.

Though, he was also aware that the name of this lanky bastard was Chisha Gold.

In the Crystal Palace of the Imperial Capital, Groovy had run into Chisha in a corridor; the latter turned his back to the former, and calmly began to grow more distant as his long legs stepped on the carpet.

Stopped in his tracks, Groovy silently saw the back go off, but—

Chisha: “I find it difficult to comprehend why you are not following me.”

Halting his step, Chisha turned around to face Groovy and spoke those words, to which Groovy snorted out a “Hah”.

Groovy: “Though you fucking prefaced it with something along the lines of “if it’s alright with you”. In that case, even if I don’t go along with your summons, which you only fucking made because it was convenient for you, you don’t have any right to say anything.”

Chisha: “Hm, I shall admit that it was an error of mine. But, have you not heard the report from His Excellency, Groovy-dono?— Within this Crystal Palace, my words are tantamount to those of His Excellency the Emperor.”

His gaze and tone had not changed, but the sharpness of the demand in Chisha’s statement had increased; Groovy closed his mouth with a small groan, and made a face that appeared like he was chewing on a bitter-tasting insect.

Thinking back on it, it was how Chisha said, the ruler of this Crystal Palace— no, the ruler of this Vollachian Empire, Vincent Vollachia, had said something like that to Groovy.

—It was something that happened immediately after Groovy was discovered by the Emperor himself, and had been welcomed to the Imperial Capital as a General.

Those offered the position of General were called before the throne, and after Vincent had them pledge allegiance to the Empire, he introduced Chisha as his aide, and ordered Groovy and the rest to give him the same regard as they would to Vincent himself.

Groovy: “—It really doesn’t fucking sit right with me.”

That special treatment was the biggest reason why Groovy continued to snap at Chisha like this.

Special treatment, Groovy would give that a warm welcome if he were the target, and he would be proud that receiving it meant that he had value. Therefore, when he came around to the Imperial Capital with fanfare and heard that there were others receiving the same treatment that he was, he had some mixed feelings.

And, something that his feelings towards were more hateful than mixed, was Chisha Gold.

Groovy: “Such a weak fucking bastard is equal to His Excellency the Emperor? That’s not how the Imperial way works. You had the fucking nerve to make His Excellency take a liking to you because of your fucking way with words and your ability to get basic fucking work done, fucking lanky bastard.”

Chisha: “I shall proceed with the conversation, having surmised that that nickname is referring to myself, but… as you say, Groovy-dono, I shudder at the disrespectful notion that I and His Excellency are equals. Much less, is His Excellency a personage gullible enough to easily fall for any cajolery of mine.”

Groovy: “Stop being so fucking roundabout. What do you want to say.”

Chisha: “For one in the position of General to say something along the lines of myself and His Excellency the Emperor being of equal rank, is a rash remark in violation of the Empire’s law of iron and blood. I advise that you be more careful.”

Groovy: “—Hk.”

Groovy’s pupils contracted, and blood began to rush to his head at Chisha’s attitude. But, right before his boiling blood could burst out, Chisha stopped him by adding a short “Additionally”.

After that brief addition, Groovy’s anger, having surrendered himself to the impulses of his blood, was put on hold.

With Groovy silenced, Chisha continued.

Chisha: “I suggest you do not cover your ears simply because you dislike me. After all, that which I wish to discuss is Groovy-dono’s responsibility— a matter pertaining to “Curse Tools”.”

With blood still in his head, it was a topic that did not cause Groovy’s impulses to explode. As Chisha had raised that subject, Groovy had no choice but to endure the explosion and abide by him.

His anger only deepened as his dislike for this lanky bastard increased more and more.

2

—The Master of Curse Tools, Groovy Gumlet.

That was the renowned reputation of Groovy as a member of the Nine Divine Generals that was well known even in other countries, but in these days, when he had just been accepted as a General, he had yet to be referred to by that alias.

However, that was just because it had yet to be established as an alias, and Groovy's eagerness to create Curse Tools was something he had harbored long before Vincent had discovered him.

That was to say, when he was invited to the Imperial Capital as a General, he was already engaged in the production of Curse Tools—

Chisha: "—The Curse Tools produced by Groovy-dono are circulating throughout the black market, and are giving rise to mayhem."

Closing the office door, the first thing Chisha said got the ball rolling on the main topic.

Having a one-on-one in a room where there would be no interruptions, Groovy plunked himself down into the provided chair, and raising his eyebrows at Chisha's comment, he stroked the fur under his chin.

While stroking, there was only one thing he thought.

Groovy: "What's wrong with that?"

That he was objecting due to sulkiness, was not the case. That was what he actually thought.

Mayhem and chaos, it was natural providence for those to exist in Vollachia, where matters were all decided based on the superiority of strength. Being told there was something of which existence was only natural, it would be illogical to then say this and that about it.

Chisha: "I would like to think that those who become Generals surely would not believe that mayhem and chaos are natural providence, but… based on your reaction, it seems that is right on the maaark."

Groovy: "You got some fucking nerve to phrase that in a way that's not to my liking in the fucking slightest. But, you're not wrong. Or what? Are your abilities so fucking useless that letting that go overlooked would be troubling?"

Chisha: "No, I would not say that. It is true that I am unsuited to the Imperial way, where right and wrong are determined by superiority in strength. However, that in itself is a principle that His Excellency the Emperor has come to accept."

Groovy: "So then…"

Chisha: "—Nevertheless, if there are individuals who have erred in their perception of that principle, they ought to be corrected. All the more if they are a General whom His Excellency the Emperor has found promise in."

Interrupting Groovy's words, the following statement caused Groovy's patience to rupture.

That instant, he threw a dagger he had drawn from his clothing, and it grazed the unmoving Chisha's cheek as it passed by to his rear. The dagger made a sound as it thrust into the wall; however, it would be naive for Chisha to think he had escaped death.

Groovy: "That's been laced with some powerful fucking venom extracted from a snakeman. Even if your head's still full of energy, it'll make everything under your fucking neck unable to move."

The snake demi-humans that were snakepeople had various toxic substances mixed within their bodies, but it was a relatively unknown fact that in proportion to the level of danger that their lives were placed in, their poison would be refined to be of higher efficiency.

This was a mixture of poisons Groovy had concocted himself, a masterpiece that severed the nerves between the head and the body.

He was still in the process of looking into if there were any other amusing uses for it, but—

Groovy: "Currently, it's being used for a fucking frightening torture method where you watch as your own fucking body gets dismembered."

Chisha: "Then, allow me to preface one thing. —The contents I shall speak of here, are not something I am conveying due to Groovy-dono's threats, so do not be mistaken in that regard."

Groovy: "…"

Chisha: "In accordance with His Excellency the Emperor's wishes, I deliver this information."

Sat in his work chair, Chisha did not wipe the blood as it ran down his left cheek, and as it dropped and stained the shoulder of his white clothes, he faced Groovy without his voice trembling in the slightest.

While his life was in the clutches of the raging hyenaman before him, Chisha showed no fear on his face, and declared that he would not succumb to the poison— no, that he would not succumb to Groovy.

At Chisha's demeanor, Groovy became aware of a misunderstanding he had harbored.

Chisha did not have the adequate strength to be a General. But, it was not as though he did not know how to do battle with his life on the line, much less underestimate that he would not have to do so against Groovy.

At any given moment, he harbored within his chest the mettle of a warrior risking their life.

Chisha: "His Excellency the Emperor has also accepted the principle of things being decided by superiority in strength. However, for both that strength and the chaos born as a result, he desires it not to be disorderly, but rather to have order to it."

Groovy: "…Chaos, with order to it? That just seems like a beautiful fucking load of shit."

Chisha: "If you perceive it as something filthy, I would like you to keep the amount you speak of it to a minimum, for it is the contraction desired by His Excellency. The Generals are required to serve as the spear and the shield for the purposes of making it a reality."

Groovy: "—. Fucking lanky bastard, in the end, what is that you want me to do."

Feeling obliged due to having misjudged Chisha's demeanor, Groovy would listen to what Chisha had to say.

Be that as it may, Groovy would not concede when it came to producing Curse Tools. One of his original objectives when he accepted the invitation to become a General was to elevate the position of hyenapeople as a tribe, but it was his personal desire to obtain the raw materials from Witchbeasts and rare races, and craft new Curse Tools to his heart's content.

That was, through the creation of tools that were in times of yore called "Meteors", and recently in the Kingdom as "Magicreation Tools", to produce results in the world that differed from those of simple blades and armor.

That was what Groovy wanted to do. —He wanted to create devices of violence such that they remained in the world for generations to come.

To still be in active use no matter how many years, decades, or centuries passed, continuing to be treated as influential; those were the sort of devices of mayhem he wished to create. That was Groovy's personal dream.

Groovy: "I need a lot of fucking money for that. I'll say this now, but the wage for a General isn't enough. I didn't know that the Curse Tools were circulating in the black market, but my desires aren't so fucking trivial that I'd give 'em up just because of that…"

Chisha: "Do not misunderstand. His Excellency desires chaos with order… Groovy-dono, your current irresponsible handling of the Curse Tools is not conducive to that purpose."

Groovy: “So, did you fucking decide to strip me of my title as a General?!”

In that case, Groovy howled that he did not want to be in such a restricted position.

To begin with, if he could not do what he wanted to, then the position of General was nothing more than a burden. If he could not fully devote himself to studying how to produce violence that would last into the future, he would give up his title and do whatever it took to fulfill his goals.

Before the angry Groovy’s ambition, Chisha narrowed his eyes, and,

Chisha: “As I have said, I request that you do not misunderstand.”

Thus, he spoke as if admonishing Groovy.

Groovy widened his eyes at those words, and Chisha continued with “May I proceed?”,

Chisha: “I have said that Groovy-dono’s current handling of Curse Tools after their production is irresponsible. Hence, it shall be fine if you take responsibility. For that purpose, using your position as General would be most beneficiaaal.”

Groovy: “…Ahh?”

Chisha: “From my own perspective, I have great expectations for the potential concealed by Curse Tools. It would only make sense for my powerless self to arm myself with equipment of extraordinary power… rather than conducting research as an individual, what of expanding it to be a large operation? If you do so, shortage of funding will no longer be an obstacle.”

At Chisha’s lengthy suggestion, Groovy’s eyes were bewildered as he listened attentively.

The reason he did not interrupt midway through, was because he could not keep up with the contents, and after he did catch up, he was dumbfounded at how unthinkable the contents were.

Groovy: “Bastard, weren’t you just trying to fucking shit on me by saying that the Curse Tools were a problem?”

Chisha: “—Since the Empire is a soil that cannot be separated from violence, the violence and the chaos brought about as a result ought at least be controlled; that is what he thinks, and thus by that I shall abide.”

Groovy remained silent when hearing what Chisha had to say in his unchanged matter-of-fact tone.

There were many things he thought about it. Nevertheless, instead of saying all the things he thought, he first decided to follow his impulses.

Drawing out a dagger different to the one he had thrown, he traced it along Chisha’s bloodstained cheek.

Chisha: “…What was it this time? A lethal poison, perhaps?”

Groovy: “No, fucking hell! I haven’t prepared anything of so fucking high quality like an antidote. That’s a medicine made out of snakeman venom. It’ll counterbalance the poison that went in earlier… at least it should.”

Chisha: “It seems like you are speaking with an excessive amount of apprehension.”

Groovy: “That can’t be helped! I’ve never tested it! That’s generally how it is for everything, fucking hell!”

Raised in a remote tribe, Groovy was hopeless when logical knowledge was requested of him.

The insatiable inquisitiveness he harbored in his chest towards Curse Tools, came from when he had thought one of the bones of the first demi-human he had killed was in an interesting shape, and had found it fun to wield it like a weapon to go hunting.

His untiring inquisitive spirit and ability to take action, that was Groovy’s passion for Curse Tools.

Chisha: “…It appears like it has worked as intended.”

Suddenly, Chisha had become able to move again, and he opened and closed his hand. Taking a white cloth from the inside of his clothes and placing it against the wound on his cheek, he looked towards Groovy, who reseated himself with a thud.

At that gaze, Groovy grimaced with a “The fuck do you want”, and then,

Chisha: “I was just examining to see whether you were giving some thought to my earlier proposal or not.”

Groovy: “…It’s not really like that talk about Curse Tools was the reason I removed the poison. Your way of living is way too fucking risky.”

Chisha: “Though, I suspect you did not remove the poison, but rather added more.”

Groovy: “Don’t get down into the fucking details. Nobody else fucking understands what you say like I do.”

With the cloth placed against the wound, Chisha lacked awareness of the parties involved, and Groovy snarled at him for it.

As he had said, Groovy was still someone who was willing to listen. That was why he had lent an ear to Chisha’s opinion regarding Curse Tools, and had accepted his proposal as rational.

However, many Imperial people were not like that, and it was Chisha’s position to face those many.

Groovy: “Chaos transformed into order… though it sounds like some fucking righteous bullshit, are you serious about this?”

Chisha: “Frighteningly so. For that is the desire of the Lord we serve.”

But, Chisha was also guilty of not trying to stop it despite understanding it to be reckless.

Beholding that way of living, of proceeding down such a thorny path by one's own volition, Groovy scratched his head. —Groovy Gumlet's insatiable inquisitiveness towards Curse Tools was a major light in his life.

Chisha also had something similar. That was likely the reason he held his ground without fighting strength of his own.

Groovy: "That fucking proposal from before, tell me about it in more detail."

Swallowing that, Groovy urged Chisha to proceed with the matter from earlier. Upon hearing that, Chisha's expression and tone did not change; however, there was a scent of a slight uptrend in his emotions,

Chisha: "The stability and integrity of performance, in order to industrialize Curse Tools there are many challenges we need to go throoough."

Groovy: "You're talking too fucking fast! And also, you love fucking talking like this when you don't have any work to do, bastard!"

3

Groovy: "In the end, I completely went along with your intentions, fucking lanky bastard."

Chisha: "My goodness, you've brought up quite the nostalgic nicknaaame."

In front of Groovy as he snorted, Chisha, sitting at his work desk, responded with a wry smile.

It had taken Groovy a while to realize that his noh mask-like expression could unexpectedly crumble, but with that much time having passed, Groovy recalled their initial hostile relationship.

Chisha: "I think Groovy and Goz-dono have been relatively cooperative from the start, which was unexpected."

Groovy: "It's awful that all the targets for comparison are a fucking shitty bunch! Besides, didn't I fully succeed in pulling off what you had said? Thanks to that, money is no longer an issue when it comes to making Curse Tools."

Chisha: "But then again, there has been a problem caused by the Curse Tools you have created…"

Groovy: "I made sure that if anybody except the proper owner uses it, they'll die. I won't hear any complaints."

Arms folded, Groovy snorted his nose as he objected to Chisha.

Once a hole was closed up, another hole would open, and that applied to creating Curse Tools, enforcing the law, and everything else. Somehow, having spent a few years as a General, he was aware of that to a painful extent.

However—

Groovy: "Well, it does work better than I had thought. That fucking righteous bullshit way of doing things."

Chisha: "Your phraseology is something I shall never get used to, no matter how many years paaass. Additionally, there is the matter of your next expedition."

Groovy: "Ahh, to the west, the border with Kararagi smells fishy, you said? I don't think those fucking merchants aiming to make a quick buck would do some fucking shit like lay their hands on the Empire, but…"

Chisha: "Groovy?"

Groovy: "If it's what you and His Excellency think, I'll go along with it."

At first, he could neither understand Vincent's thoughts nor Chisha's thoughts in the slightest, and even now it was hard for him to say that he understood them. But, even if he could not understand, he could trust them.

Groovy: "After all, that's something you came up with, your fucking weak self, who can face people as fucking strong as us as equals. It’s not as good as my Curse Tools, but it’s not bad.”

Chisha: “—. Good grief. I shall remember those words, Groovy.”

With that, Chisha took a long, deep breath, and nodded with a slightly pleased look on his face.

—That was the final conversation exchanged between Groovy and Chisha.

Afterwards, Groovy had been deployed to the west, and when he approached the core of the peril assailing the Vollachian Empire, the man known as Chisha Gold no longer remained.

What did exist, however, was that which Chisha had left behind. And, the fact that protecting that until the very end was the sole tribute he could make to his comrade in arms, was something Groovy had understood.

END

Anastasia’s Search for Her Companions: Second Chronicle

1

In a place where the presences of many people crowded together could be felt, a precarious atmosphere began to tense over.

The heightened tingling sensation felt upon the skin reflected the feelings of the participants in the tense atmosphere.

Standing right in the center of that atmosphere, was a tall beastman wearing a black kimono.

The long arms of the beastman were bound by handcuffs, and he was surrounded by imposing men carrying swords. At a glance, the scene made it apparent that the beastman was not in the best situation.

However—

Beastman: “Golly, ain’t it quite over-the-top ta have the full force of the League of Cities’ representatives all gathered ‘gainst me.”

Pierced by the stinging atmosphere and gazes, the beastman in question did not pay any mind to their sharpness.

If the beastman felt like it, neither the handcuffs nor the tense swordsmen would be an obstacle.

That was a fact understood not just by the person himself, but by everyone else present here.

That was because this beastman was the most famous being in the Kararagi City-States,

???: “—Halibel.”

Beastman: “Yep yep, that’d be me.”

His name having been called out, the beastman—Halibel, relaxed his shoulders and smiled.

At Halibel's response, the person who had called out his name—one of the mayors, who filled the ten special parliamentary seats that had been prepared in the assembly hall, knitted his eyebrows. While making it apparent through the wrinkles on his brow that he thought Halibel's attitude lacked seriousness,

One of the Mayors: "Actin' so flippantly, would it be wrong to suppose that'cha got an excuse?"

Halibel: "An excuse… I wonder what'd be good ta say here?"

Another one of the Mayors: "Without hidin' nothin', speak of absolutely everythin' ya got up yer sleeve. If ya don't, ya ain't gonna be able to convince us. —After all, it was two thousand people."

Halibel: "…"

Yet another one of the Mayors: "The annihilation of a town inhabited by two thousand people, no matter how much of a pillar Halibel-han may be to the City-States, we ain't gonna be able to ignore this level of damage."

Taking turns, the mayors cast their voices towards Halibel, and the instant that the specific scale of damages was touched upon, the dry atmosphere of the assembly hall tensed up even more.

Two thousand people, that was the number of casualties from the most recent disaster. It was the kind of statistic that would only ever emerge in the case of a large famine, natural disaster, or civil war, but this event was none of those.

Those two thousand people were casualties that had been brought about by none other than the individual known as Halibel.

One of the Mayors: "D'ya remember what our request was, Halibel-han?"

Halibel: "Hmmm, what was it now, I wonder? Prolly 'cuz of my age, recently, I’ve been forgettin’ a bunch of important things. Stuff like where I’d placed my kiseru before I went ta bed.”

One of the Mayors: “It was to investigate the unusual occurrence at Nanou, the town sittin’ ‘long the border with the Empire.”

Ignoring Halibel as he tilted his head and feigned ignorance with his answer, the conversation continued matter-of-factly. One of the mayors, with fingers as thick as hornworms, as he narrowed his droopy eyes,

One of the Mayors: “Investigatin’ the strange occurrence, that essentially means searchin’ for the truth ‘n solution to the problem at hand. Get it? Ya completely ignored that, ‘n instead entirely wiped out all two thousand inhabitants of the town.”

While maintaining a composed voice, there was an intense indignation housed within. The man was performing a strict interrogation, but he did not receive any reprimanding response from his surroundings.

It was customary for such a conference to get the briefing out of the way first, and then to proceed accordingly from there.

In the Kararagi City-States, the parliamentary system of mayor representatives from each city was a tradition dating back to the era of their founding father, Hoshin, but somewhere along the line, the system had been reduced to a mere formality.

Hoshin loved discussions, and it is said that he desired a parliamentary system in which differing opinions would clash and produce a conclusion that would not have come about from a lone individual. However, the current parliamentary system of mayors would head towards a predetermined conclusion from before the discussion had even begun, merely proceeding by tracing the form of a conference.

Therefore, a conclusion had already been prepared regarding the treatment of Halibel, regardless of any excuse he might have given.

One of the Mayors: “It’d be impossible to cover up such an outrageous story. We're aware of Halibel-han's contributions to the City-States. Even so—"

???: "—Can I have a quick word?"

Right when the discussion was about to reach its premeditated conclusion, a voice suddenly called out.

At the interference that had not been present at the prior briefing, the gazes of the mayors turned to the person who had interrupted. In the corner of the assembly hall, was the girl who had been permitted to listen in on this conference.

However, she had only been permitted to observe. Not to voice any opinions.

One of the Mayors: "Ya can't be speakin' out, Anastasia-han. I'll say this now, but you're only permitted to observe this conference 'cause of Chuden-han's influence. To impudently…"

Anastasia: "It ain't impudent or nothin' like that, Orgo-san, ya can't be sayin' things like that. Besides…"

Orgo: "…"

Anastasia: "For us merchants, impudence is naturally the tool of our trade, much like how a sword would be for a swordsman."

With an elegant smile, the girl gently sidestepped the words of the mayors who were over double her age. Then, stealing initiative from them, the girl stepped forward to the center of the assembly hall.

Naturally, the girl's actions and appearance attracted attention. Stroking the white fox scarf wrapped around her neck, nobody stopped the kimono-clad girl as she walked in a relaxed manner. It was to the extent that even the presence of the longsword-wielding escort with his graceful facial features had disappeared from everybody's perceptions for a moment.

Halibel: "Lil' Ana, this ain't no playground for children, ya know?"

Halibel calmly called out to the girl who had stepped forth. More so than his responses to the mayors, he used a tone of voice that was, to put it frankly, tender, harboring a clear warmth.

At Halibel's words, the girl—Anastasia closed one of her pale turquoise eyes, and ignored him.

Ignoring him, as Anastasia looked around at all of the mayors present in the assembly hall,

Anastasia: "Excuse the hurried greetings. I'm Anastasia Hoshin, representative of the Hoshin Company. Thanks to the kindness of Orgo-san over there, I've been allowed to sit in on this conference, but… I've become a lil' unable to just shut up 'n watch."

Orgo: "What're ya…"

Anastasia: "Look, Halibel's a careless, impolite, 'n hopeless loose-liver. Even so, he's got strength 'n popularitry, so I get why y'all mayors dislike his company. But—"

Pausing her words there, Anastasia opened her previously closed eye, and gazed at the mayors with both of her eyes. Within the gaze of her round irises, the expressions and shoulders of the mayors stiffened.

It was as if they had remembered the fact that, as the head of a company who still had youthfulness in her face, she was the representative of a large company that vied for the position of first or second within Kararagi.

As those mayors stood at the ready, Anastasia made a declaration without changing her expression.

Anastasia: "Ya can't be misjudgin' the reality of the situation. It's the teachin' of Hoshin to seize all the opportunities for business 'n for victory. In order to solve this problem, don't'cha think that ya gotta put yer displeasure with Halibel aside for a bit?"

Quietly and gently, Anastasia's words dominated the assembly hall.

—No, to be precise, it was Anastasia's overwhelming presence that dominated the assembly hall.

Next to Anastasia, with the attention having been taken off of himself, Halibel gave a comment,

Halibel: “Lil’ Ana, it hurts my feelin’s when ya talk ‘bout me like that.”

Then, while gnawing on the kiseru he had taken out, after having removed his handcuffs without anybody noticing, he grumbled so.

2

—The closure of the national border between the Kararagi City-States and the Vollachian Empire.

In a position of wanting to hasten to enter the Empire, this was certainly not a situation she found to be acceptable. In order to remove that issue, or perhaps to deal with it, Anastasia and Julius had wedged their way into the conference of the mayors.

As a result, while they had made a mess of the conference, they were able to get them to listen to what they had to say.

Julius: “Even so, a strange occurrence concerning the residents of Nanou, two thousand people… was it?”

Anastasia: “Accordin’ to what Halibel said, it ain’t got nothin’ to do with an epidemic or curse-arts. Either of those woulda been a huge problem, but it’s also a huge problem that it wasn’t either of ‘em.”

Seeing his lovely master place a finger over her lips, frowning in rumination, Julius narrowed his eyes. In terms of her demeanor from earlier at the assembly hall, Anastasia’s mannerisms entranced people.

As expected, having displayed her true talent at such a location, she was the woman whom Julius backed for the royal throne.

Anastasia: “How are ya, Julius? Tell me now, did ya happen to think of somethin’?”

Julius: "—. My apologies. Nothing that is for certain. Only…"

Anastasia: "Only?"

Julius: "In the past, I recall reading about a case that bore quite a resemblance."

When asked for his opinion, Julius searched around his own memories for an answer.

Before Anastasia, deep with curiosity as she was, what Julius remembered was from within history books documenting the Demi-Human War, a small detail that was only slightly touched upon.

The greatest civil war in the Kingdom's history, it was spoken of by many in a historical or gruesome sense, and though that one account essentially only amounted to being touched on,

Julius: "It is said that amidst the events of the civil war, the most unsightly battle was brought about through magic that controlled the dead."

???: "The dead… I see. Certainly, that can be interpreted as coinciding with Halibel's testimony."

Responding to Julius's report as the tone of his voice lowered was not Anastasia, but rather the Spirit around her neck covered in soft fur, Echidna.

The assent of an individual like her was reassuring, and Anastasia also nodded "That's right" without objection.

Anastasia: "They had bad complexions 'n their blood wasn't flowin'… Halibel said somethin' like "livin' corpses" were walkin' around, so I guess that's exactly what it was. Although…"

Julius: "Two thousand people, that is a vast difference in scale."

At Anastasia's identification, Julius touched the white scar under his left eye in agreement.

Though the accounts in the history books were few, and the events of those days were not clear, Anastasia's view was correct. In the battle that utilized the dead in the Demi-Human War, based on the way they were being controlled, the number would not have been so high.

Here, it was two thousand people. Even if there was a technique to control the remains of the dead, to actually implement that, and to go so far as to have them enact the form of a regular town, was devoid of sanity.

The competency, talent, and above all, the concept of the magic made Julius think so.

???: "Oh, didn't know y'all were over here."

Turning around towards that aloof voice, Julius slightly raised his eyebrows.

The one who had spoken was a tall wolfman of black fur, Halibel. He was the one held at speartip at the assembly hall earlier, but Julius could not avoid feeling tense at his calm demeanor.

After all, he was none other than the strongest shinobi of the Kararagi City-States—said to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with the likes of Reinhard, he was one of the strongest warriors of the Four Great Countries.

However, contrary to the tension of Julius, Anastasia spoke "What?" while she turned a suspicious look to Halibel as he approached them,

Anastasia: "Why aren't'cha in handcuffs 'n bein' accompanied by guards? It's terrifyin' for a large criminal to have been set free."

Halibel: "Wasn't it lil' Ana who asked that I be released? Shouldn't'cha be glad that I've been set free? C'mon now, why don't I raise ya up in my arms like I used ta do back in the good ol' days?"

Anastasia: "'Cause I'm already a grown woman. We ain't that close."

As Halibel reached his hands out towards her, Anastasia bluntly slapped them down. Even towards that cold attitude, Halibel reacted cheerfully; witnessing the exchange between the two, Julius blinked his eyes.

He had heard that they had known each other for a long time. So he had heard, but they were far closer with each other than he had expected.

Halibel: “Hey, onii-san over there, must be tough bein’ lil’ Ana’s guard, ain’t it? After all, she’s a lass who seems ta have a curious soul, always scamperin’ about here ‘n there.”

Julius: “I consider that to be one of Anastasia-sama’s many charms. —Halibel-dono, allow me to introduce myself once more. I am Julius Juukulius.”

Halibel: “Stuff like dono, it’s alright even if ya don’t use such a formal way of callin’ me. Ya can just call me Halibel.”

Julius: “That is…”

Halibel: “I don’t mind. Or rather, I’d actually be more comfortable that way. It’s quite tiresome ta always be treated like I’m super important or incredible, after all.”

As Halibel spoke to him with a carefree smile, Julius hesitantly nodded.

He had not expected to receive such a request from the most powerful warrior of the City-States, but therein, Julius felt something akin to the power of Anastasia’s fate.

The right person in the right place would naturally have their life intersect with such things.

Anyhow—

Julius: “So then, what of the mayors?”

Halibel: “After chasin’ me ‘n lil’ Ana out, they’re in the midst of conversin’ without any nuisances. That said, ya don’t gotta worry. They ain’t so thickheaded that they wouldn’t be able ta recognize that persuasive power of what lil’ Ana said.”

Echidna: “—With that, it all depends on the extent to which they follow through on Ana’s request.”

As Echidna made that remark, having received the words of Halibel who was shrugging his shoulders, the shinobi in question reacted with an “Oh”, and jerking his face towards the fox scarf,

Halibel: “What’s this what’s this? Have ya finally given up on keepin’ yer mouth shut?”

Echidna: “—. From your reaction, were you perhaps already aware of my presence?”

Halibel: “Look, it’s my job ta be perceivin’ these kinda things. Since it didn’t particularly look like ya were doin’ anythin’ bad ta lil’ Ana, I just thought that maybe ya were a lil’ bit shy.”

As the kiseru in his mouth bobbed up and down, Halibel answered so, to which Echidna heaved a sigh.

It had been spoken like it was nothing special, but Echidna’s camouflage was not something that could have been easily perceived. It was the type of invisibility that neither Julius, Ricardo, nor Mimi and the others had been able to realize over many years.

Julius: “I understand that you have known Anastasia-sama for ten years now… nah, that you’ve known her for ten years, but what sort of time was that?”

Halibel: “Oh, stories of the good ol’ days? Well, Ricardo’s kinda like a brother ta me, and he brought lil’ Ana… jeepers, lil’ Ana, please stop givin’ me that look.”

As Julius carefully selected his manner of verbal expression, Halibel tried to start speaking of some old reminiscences, but he was silenced by Anastasia’s gaze. Julius found this to be unfortunate at heart, and as Halibel whispered “Another time” to him,

Halibel: “Even so, it’s quite unusual for ya ta be this impatient. Is there someone ya care about that much in the Empire?”

Anastasia: “Mph… what’d’ya mean?”

Halibel: “Ain’t no use in playin’ dumb. Makin’ such a passionate speech at the assembly hall, suggestin’ that ya take me along ta go ta the Empire as emissaries, somethin’ like that ain’t for the sake of Kararagi, nor is it for yer own sake.”

Anastasia: “…”

Halibel: “In a way that’s typical of lil’ Ana, ya rationalized it with this ‘n that, but yer real intention’s somethin’ else. But, since the feelin’ that ya didn’t wanna miss the business opportunity seemed so desperate, I thought that it might’ve been for somebody else’s sake. Am I right?”

Bending his tall body at the waist, Halibel asked this as he gazed into Anastasia’s face. With a sidelong glance to Anastasia as she remained silent, Julius stepped forward in order to defend her.

There was no strong reason to keep it a secret, but if it was something that Anastasia did not wish to disclose, Julius would stand up for her.

At Julius’s movement, Halibel lowered the ends of his eyebrows, wondering if he had gone too far.

But—

Anastasia: “—Someone whom I’m indebted to might be in danger. That, ‘n I’m worried ‘bout my friend.”

Anastasia, hiding behind Julius’s back and not showing her face, spoke so to Halibel.

What sort of face Anastasia was making, that was something which Julius, who was protecting her with his back, did not know. Halibel, too, was likely unable to see her face, as she was pressing her forehead against Julius’s back.

The person whom Anastasia said she was indebted to, would have been Subaru. And, the person whom she called her friend would have been—

Halibel: "—As ever, you're quite skilled at gettin' me motivated, what a naughty girl."

Julius's quiet conviction, and Halibel's warmth-filled voice, occurred at the same time.

At that response, Julius understood that Halibel, much like himself, was also someone who had been charmed by Anastasia's humanity.

???: "The conference has reached a conclusion. Return inside."

Then, one of the guards from the assembly hall called out to Julius and the others.

The discussion between the mayors—it was about the plan Anastasia had suggested in order to enter the Empire. The duty of secret messengers to offer relief to the Vollachian Empire from the Kararagi City-States.

If the situation was as they had predicted, and the disaster of the dead was also befalling the Empire, they would need support.

Anastasia: "Shall we head in, Julius, Halibel? —I'll be sure to work both of ya hard, after all."

Saying that, and removing her forehead from Julius's back, Anastasia stepped forth.

She was already back to being her usual self, so her previous statement was indistinguishable from a strategic move to inspire motivation within Halibel, and to have him accompany her.

Echidna: "She is not that clever of a girl, you know."

Halibel: "After all, she's got some surprisingly cute aspects ta her."

At Julius's speculation, Echidna and Halibel answered so one after the other—

Anastasia: "Don't be sayin' any unnecessary things, hurry up 'n get movin'! "Time is money!" As Hoshin says!"

Hastened by an angry Anastasia, Julius exchanged wry smiles with Halibel and Echidna as one of the people who surrounded her, and stepped forward.

—Not towards the assembly hall, but in order to proceed towards the Empire, he took a step forward.

END

The Dragon Kingdom:
Meili's Witchbeast Observation Record V

1

"Stay here, okay?" ordered Felt. "Can't tend to you even if you follow us in."

The one who received the order, the Divine Dragon Volcanica, let out a deep voice. "I, am Volcanica. In accordance with the ancient covenant, the will of thee who hath reached the top shall be questioned."

Felt scowled, unsatisfied with his response. Her distrust in the Dragon was apparent through her expression. As one of the esteemed participants of the royal selection to decide the next ruler of the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, her attitude was rather insolent, considering it was the Dragon, a being that deserved her utmost respect. However, her rudeness paled in comparison with the behavior of her other companions.

"Master Divine Dragon sir, please have some of our dried meat," said Flam, offering dried meat to the dragon from her bag.

"Let's domesticate a Dragon," added Grassis.

"Stop it you two!" exclaimed Ezzo from the side. "This is the Divine Dragon we are facing! A living, breathing Dragon that's famous the world over! I have nothing but great admiration for him on both an intellectual and emotional level."

Despite his tremendous power, Volcanica seemed to have treated Felt with respect. Felt, on the other hand, was worried about angering the Dragon and becoming a target of the devastating power he had displayed earlier, which was why she was taken aback by the nonchalance shown by the other three.

"Or maybeee," said Meili, as she rested her elbow on her lap and placed her chin on her hand, "they're not worried because you're with us, Mister Red-Hairr."

"…I suppose that's not entirely inaccurate," responded Reinhard. "I've known Flam and Grassis ever since they were babies. I've looked after them as if they were my own sisters."

"Hmmm, so you're like a real brother to them, huh?" Meili asked, squinting her eyes, before gesturing at the twins. "What about you guyyys? Do you feel the saaame?"

"The Young Master is the Young Master," answered Flam.

"The Young Master who needs to be taken care of," said Grassis.

"You heard themmm?" Meili said to Reinhard suggestively.

He let out a bitter smile without saying a word.

Reinhard was quite inept at hiding his feelings. Even during their short journey, he had allowed a stranger like Meili to see through him time and time again. I was nervous at first knowing the Sword Saint was tagging along, but I'm not scared anymore. "Before I knew it, all my anxiety was gooone. Kinda like when I was with the white-haired lady. Maybe all strong, important people are alikeee."

In Meili's mind, Emilia and Reinhard were similar in terms of their strength and air-headedness.

"Elsa was also…" Like that. Emilia and Reinhard's demeanor reminded Meili of her late sister figure. My chest used to start aching whenever I thought about her, but that hasn't happened lately, she thought. Emilia once told me that that's not a bad thing, "But I don't knowww…"

It was difficult for Meili to contemplate her own feelings. She'd always done whatever she wanted, whenever she wanted, like an animal. That was the only sort of lifestyle she knew. Now, she was burdened with responsibilities even if she didn't want them. But weirdly enough, I don't hate this. Maybe I'm growing as a person too.

"Gosh, he's finally calmed down," said Felt as she returned to the group after convincing Volcanica to remain outside the entrance to the watchtower, where he could be seen with his wings folded. Despite sitting there quietly, he still exuded an overwhelmingly intimidating presence.

Ezzo let out a small “hmm” as he stood next to Meili and observed the Dragon. “But to think that the Divine Dragon would listen to your orders… If you add the Sword Saint Reinhard into the mix, you might just be able to acquire the Kingdom with might alone, Miss Felt.”

“What a savage suggestion,” Felt replied. “If power is all ya need to rule a kingdom, then Reinhard coulda done that yesterday and made himself the sole conqueror. There’d be no need for me. Right?”

“I would never do such a thing,” responded Reinhard. “The Astrea Family was given the title of the Sword Saint and kept away from the seat of power precisely because they feared we might act on such a barbaric idea.”

“Don’t bombshell us with your heavy family history!” Felt exclaimed as she smacked Reinhard on the back while he smiled bitterly. She shrugged her shoulders at his expression.

As Ezzo had stated, however, with the devastating power of the Sword Saint and the Divine Dragon, which had nearly obliterated the desert in their earlier bout, under her belt, Felt was practically invincible.

“Buuut,” interjected Meili. “That Dragon is also on good terms with the lady in my caaamp. There’s no guarantee that he’ll listen to Felt alone.”

“Did ya hear that?” Felt said. “Maybe he kisses every candidates’ ass. There goes your plan, Ezzo.”

“As your strategist, I wasn’t seriously suggesting the idea. Although it’s natural to aim for victory in a competition, it must be attained through fairplay. Relying on an outrageous power, and one that we just so happened to stumble upon by chance if I may add, is not an action deemed worthy of a true victor.”

“I wasn’t being serious either. Jeez, learn to loosen up a bit.”

“Master Ezzo is a very stern individual,” commented Flam.

“He should learn from people like Lady Felt and us,” added Grassis.

Their comments were rather disrespectful considering it was directed at their mistress, but Felt simply brushed it off with a laugh and said, “That’s for sure.”

With Felt standing in the center, the group turned around to get a view of the desert.

“Your wish finally came true, Reinhard,” Felt remarked. “Last time you were here, you couldn’t get past the wittle sandbox and went crying home, right?”

“Yes, I’m thrilled to have finally reached here. It’s all because of you and Meili,” he replied with a smile, completely unfazed by Felt’s crude comment.

Amused, Felt snickered and started walking. Everyone followed.

As Meili walked at the very back of the group, the little crimson scorpion came out of her hair and sat atop her head. Feeling its weight, she entered the tower and looked up at the long spiral staircase that seemed to go on forever.

“Seems like we’re back here again,” she muttered without anyone else hearing.

2

The Pleiades Watchtower was also known as the Great Library of Pleiades.

Meili had to prove she could help anyone traverse the Auguria Sand Dunes with her ability in order to obtain her right to stay in the Kingdom of Lugunica. Her ability was technically already proven the moment the group arrived at the tower. However, some may argue her mission was only complete after they got back safe and sound.

“Imagine if they said we were only able to cross the desert because Reinhard was with us,” mused Felt.

“Lady Felt…” said Flam, exasperated by the idea.

“That’s not funny,” commented Grassis.

There was a good possibility their accomplishment was going to be invalidated by having such an extraordinary companion, but if it weren’t for Reinhard, they could have very well perished from Volcanica’s greeting. However, it was also possible that Volcanica wouldn’t have gotten so worked up in the first place if Reinhard wasn’t there. So, it was difficult to give a final verdict on whether his accompanying them was good or bad.

“I don’t hate Mister Red-Hair, thoooough,” said Meili. “I mean, he is kinda coool.”

“I’ll take that as a compliment,” responded Reinhard. “It’s true that you kept all the other witchbeasts at bay, while all I did was rouse the Divine Dragon. I’m really ashamed.”

“It’s not uncommon for a backup plan to backfire,” commented Ezzo, sympathetically. “I’ve had such experiences before.”

It was rare for Meili to pay someone lip service. So she was confused by her own actions, but she quickly concluded that it must have been because she’d let her guard down when she realized she had succeeded in her role. In other words, she was in a good mood. She was glad that she was finally able to do something for Subaru and the others.

“So this is the Library of the Dead!” Ezzo exclaimed, throwing his arms wide open with widened eyes. “The place that caused the greatest conflict in the Pleiades Watchtower!”

As a dwarf, Ezzo was small in stature, but usually carried himself in a dignified manner, which made him appear more mature than one might expect from a person of his height. However, at this moment, his eyes were glimmering with curiosity like a child that'd just been given a new toy. He looked like a totally different person.

"Master Ezzo, you look as happy as a clam. It's very heartwarming," said Flam.

"Master Ezzo, you're smiling like a conniving person who came up with a great scheme," added Grassis.

"No one is scheming anything, Miss Grassis!" Ezzo retorted excitedly. "Although it's not like I'm trying to warm anyone's heart, either, Miss Flam… All I'm trying to say is that this is a historic moment!"

Ezzo started running into the library. He couldn't keep his attention on any one thing, instead trying to consume everything around him. Seeing him run around, Felt let out a sigh. She looked around the room filled with books. "Books, books, and more books. Makes me sick."

"Are you being humble?" Reinhard asked. "You've been reading a lot of books lately, my lady."

"That's only because I thought it's better to be well-read," said Felt. "I still don't like books, and still get sick being surrounded by books I don't care about."

"You don't care, huh?" Reinhard said, furrowing his brows.

Noticing his reaction, Felt asked, "What?" as she looked up at him. "What's with that solemn look? Is it weird that I'm not interested in dead people? Not to sound crass, but I don't remember actin' all whiny to have you believe I'm that sorta person."

"No, you're absolutely correct," responded Reinhard. "I can't imagine you obsessing over someone who has died, Lady Felt. I was just impressed how you could have such a strong conviction."

"Impressed, huh?" Felt closed one eye and made a skewed frown. After a pause, she said, "Ahh," realizing something. "Reinhard, there's a Book of the Dead you wanna read, right?"

Reinhard said nothing. It was extremely rare for him to not respond to Felt, whether in word or action. His silence alone was proof he had a lot on his mind about the matter.

"I could never fool you, my lady," he finally said.

"The only way you could get one over me is through a physical fight. There's no one in the world who can beat you at that."

"That's not what I meant." His eyes began to wander, as if he was trying to process his overwhelming emotions. He then looked around the library. "If this library really contains books recording the memories of all the people that died, then…"

"Then you'll be able to know the feelings of the person you want to know better," said Felt, crossing her arms. "Let me guess, you wanna read your grandma's book, right?"

Reinhard gasped. "How did you know?" he said, blinking rapidly.

"You know that I've been corresponding with Granny Carol, right?" Felt replied, letting out a laugh. "And it's not like I wasn't paying attention in Priestella. Everyone knows you and your granddad ain't on good terms. They just don't say anything."

Reinhard said nothing.

"Would finding your grandma's book make you happy?"

Felt sounded like her usual self, but there was a tinge of kindness in her voice when she asked her last question. It was a question meant to console Reinhard, and he also noticed it. However, he slowly shook his head.

"It wouldn't," he answered. "I'm interested in her book, of course, but it wouldn't have much of an impact on me. It's just…"

"It's just, what?"

"I want my father to read her book."

Felt paused as she processed the reason Reinhard wanted his grandmother's book. It was to help someone else. As simple as that.

She let out a big sigh, exasperated by his attitude. "And here I thought you were getting better. It looks like you might be getting worse."

"I apologize if I'm being unprofessional by bringing personal matters up during a mission."

"I'm not angry about that. Did you think my reason for participating in the royal selection is unrelated to my personal reasons?" she answered before gesturing at the library with her chin. "C'mon, let's start looking."

Reinhard said nothing, looking confused by her gesture.

"Didn't you hear me? We're gonna look for your grandma's book. Although, knowing you, you might not need any help."

"Lady Felt!" Reinhard called out her name ecstatically.

"Stop lookin' so happy. I just don't want you standing next to me lookin' all depressed. Speaking of which," she said, turning her face away from Reinhard.

Ezzo was running around the library, followed by Flam and Grassis. They looked as lively as ever. By contrast, Meili was standing quietly by herself. Although Felt wasn't expecting a thorough tour of the library from Meili, who said she didn't know the library too well, her quietness was rather conspicuous.

"Why are you being so quiet?" Felt asked. "Don't tell me you're just annoyed by Ezzo's enthusiasm."

"Felt," responded Meili, looking up at Felt and Reinhard as they approached.

Noticing her eyes shimmering with anxiety, Felt quickly asked her, "What's wrong?"

Meili hesitated for a moment before she spoke. "I got an eerie feeling from the libraryyy… Those books on the floor were already there when we came in, riiight? Buuut…"

"But, what?"

"Emilia tidied the place up before we departed the last time we were heeere. She saaaid, 'It's not good manners to leave a place a mess'."

"Reinhard, Ezzo," Felt quickly called their names as soon as Meili finished talking.

Reinhard, who was already by her side, responded, "Yes, ma'am," and stood next to them. Ezzo, Flam, and Grassis also came rushing back.

Ezzo looked confused, expecting an explanation. Felt pointed at the books on the floor. "According to Meili, there shouldn't be any books out."

"So are you suggesting someone came here before we did?" Ezzo asked.

"That's one possibility. Another possibility is…" Reinhard replied, as he picked up one of the books and opened it.

"Ah," exclaimed Meili, noticing something.

Felt also noticed what that was.

"Meili, you said there were Books of the Dead that you can and can't read, right? Are all the ones you can't read blank like this one?" asked Reinhard.

The book in his hand was filled with blank pages.

Meili shook her head as she looked at the book he was holding. "Nooo, nothing of that sorttt. The books that can't be read also had their own unique letters written in theeem."

"Miss Meili is right," said Ezzo. "All the books I pulled from the shelves had something written in them. Although many of them were too difficult to understand, the only books with blank pages are the ones on the floor.”

“You say ‘only’, but…” Felt said, scratching her head and looking at the pile of books on the floor. It looked as if someone had knocked down a whole bookshelf. There must have been a few hundred books scattered about.

“If someone went on a rampage here, it must have been someone who’s skilled enough to sneak past the Divine Dragon,” suggested Flam.

“A big weirdo like the Young Master,” added Grassis.

“But that’s more likely than an entire bookshelf falling over on its own,” concluded Ezzo. “Miss Felt, if there is an intruder, we must consider searching for them, or withdrawing.”

Taking her vassals’ advice into consideration, Felt turned her attention to the spine of the book Reinhard was holding, then to the pile on the floor. No matter who the intruder is, the hint lies in the books. However, there wasn’t much she could glean from them.

“From the names, all I can say is that they’re probably related to Vollachia. Not to mention that this is all happening at the same time Emilia is infiltrating there. I’m getting a bad feeling about this,” she muttered to herself, starting to suspect that the Empire had some sort of connection to the anomalous Books of the Dead.

END

Comic Alive Collection 10

The Golden Lion and the Sword Saint: Riot in Flanders
(CA)

1

The room was saturated with the smell of blood. To be precise, rather than the thick stench of fresh blood, it was more that of the stain it left behind; a lingering smell that could never be washed away.

Without exception, every single person gathered in this room had lived a life bathed in the blood of their victims. Consequently, the smell of it was ingrained into their very beings, and its persistent presence dominated the atmosphere. The way they stared at one another hinted towards the hostility beneath their gaze—the kind of tension that kept their blades sheathed but their hands on their hilts.

In this place, where imposing men and women had gathered, several gave off a particularly prominent smell of blood. They shared an impervious gleam in their eyes—evidence that they shouldered duties and self-awareness befitting their positions.

This should come as no surprise, for the group assembled here controlled Flanders, one of the kingdom's five great cities, from the shadows. In other words, the underground elite.

"This is the sixth occurrence this month… Give me a break… I've had enough of this."

What had cut through the blood-swelling atmosphere was the sweet scent of tobacco smoke and the languid voice of a woman. The woman, nubile and relaxed in her seat, was reclining to reveal the slit in her skin-tight dress, exposing most of her thigh, a golden tobacco pipe nestled between her lips. With skin the color of sun-warmed wheat, her voluptuous body was rich in feminine charms. Such devilish good looks could entice men and women alike to give in to their passions with a single glance. She was also known as the Wicked Temptress—a truly fitting name.

This beautiful woman—in fact one of those who gave off a particularly thick stench of blood—was Toto, the proprietress of the Flower Prison Garden.

When Toto, who had started the conversation, saw that no one followed suit, she took in a long drag of her pipe, gave a sidelong glance to a man at the back of the room, and then sent smoke his way, followed by her words. “Not saying much today, are you, Manfred? Which way is The Balance leaning? Cowardly opportunism? Or perhaps you’re unable to speak because you decided to place that precious tattoo of yours directly on your tongue?”

“Shut your trap, you shameless woman. If you insist on running your mouth over trivialities, I’ll gather all the women in your place and turn them into lap dogs. Then I’ll train you thoroughly and present you to my boss.”

The one who had responded with vicious words to Toto’s provocation was a slim man leaning against the wall. He was tall, bald, and wore long robes, but the skin exposed on his head, neck, and even his face was densely packed with tattoos of balance scale motifs. It was likely that they extended even underneath his robes.

It was one of The Balance’s rules that every member had to be tattooed with balance scales where they were visible, and he had more such tattoos than any other. This was an obvious sign of loyalty in the eyes of the organization; therefore, he won their favor, and they gave him an executive position in the organization in Flanders. The name of this young wolf, here to represent The Balance, was Manfred ‘Tattoo Face’ Madison.

The proprietress of the Flower Prison Garden and the representative of The Balance; between them, they represented two of the three big factions operating the underworld syndicates in Flanders.

And then, the third and final leader of the underworld, the head of the Black Silver Coin, spoke. “Did you gather here just to have a childish dispute? Know your place, you pigs.”

"…"

A deep, solemn voice reverberated throughout the room, and the two who had been bickering shut their mouths instantly. What the owner of that voice inspired was not fear. Rather, it was a subtle kind of awe. Fully aware of that, discontented expressions were etched onto the faces of Toto and Manfred.

Despite having the power to silence the two powerful syndicate leaders, the speaker merely sat in a cramped chair in the rear of the room, impassive. "What, no witty retort?—Not even a 'You're the one who's a pig'?" the large man said as he shrugged his large shoulders, sounding bored.

"…Good luck to you, if you're willing to risk your life to joke around the Pig King," said Manfred.

"As for me," added Toto, "I simply have no intention of going along with such an unamusing joke, Mr. Doltero."

Having provided excuses for their silence at Doltero's interjection, Toto and Manfred appeared mollified. At their rebuttal, the giant man clasped his wide fingers together above the table. "Good luck to those who crack jokes, huh. Well said."

"—? It sounds like you're referencing something specific. Something you'd like to share?"

Despite his grumbling, the large man only frowned in silence at Manfred's provocation. He approached two meters in height, his thick and mighty width a good match for his height. His limbs were as large and tough as tree trunks, and his physique was like that of a great tree in comparison to Manfred's, which was like one that had withered away. In contrast to his powerful body, he had blond hair that was combed back and azure eyes that anyone would find attractive, giving off a certain distinctiveness within the pig race that was known for its ugly appearances.

He was the Pig King, Doltero Amule, leader of the Black Silver Coin—the largest faction of the underworld syndicates of Flanders—and the most feared man in the city.

Even the Wicked Temptress and Tattoo Face would not lightly go up against the Pig King. This was a reflection of just how long-lived and influential Doltero's power over the city truly was.

The representatives of the three major criminal syndicates of Flanders chose a basement tavern on neutral ground in order to meet face-to-face. One couldn't wish for a more suitable place for holding secret meetings, and they had made ample use of this venue to hold these regular meetings.

The purpose of these regular meetings, centered around the Big Three and attended by the entire underworld society, was to reaffirm precarious peace treaties as well as re-establish the balance of power. Though the three syndicates had originally been true enemies in battle, they were nonetheless business rivals now, so not once had they tried to move towards building an amicable atmosphere at these meetings. However, even following the general conventions of a regular meeting, the tension in the air today was abnormal. The reason for that was…

"—Stop dilly-dallying. Have you figured out the identity of the criminal…of that scum?" Doltero fired off that question, bringing up the source of this meeting's bloodthirsty atmosphere.

In the last couple of months, there had been a number of injuries and deaths in Flanders—none of which were unusual if looked at individually. Though unfortunate, incidents that resulted in casualties seemed to be a rather commonplace thing; however, for the people present—who understood the connection—this wasn't something they could ignore.

"If all the victims are related to us, the situation is quite serious. Who is attacking us?" Doltero asked.

"Who knows?" Toto replied. "I was certain, for my part, that we had been invited to gather here in order to make that clear. Perhaps to receive a formal declaration of hostilities. Right, Manfred?"

"In general, I never trust the word of a harlot, but in this case I think so too," concurred Manfred. "I was expecting something similar. That's why I can put up with the feminine stench in here, which stinks more than usual.”

After exchanging murderous glares, Manfred and Toto settled back into an uneasy, silent war. Among the Big Three, they were the only two who had actually crossed blades with intent to kill, so there was certainly no love lost between them. Unfortunately, when the leaders of two vicious, rival syndicates got heated, it made sense that their subordinates would take that as a sign to be ready for anything.

The fighters from The Balance began shifting restlessly, and the flowers from the Flower Prison Garden eyed them with penetrating glares. Before they thoughtlessly went at it, however, Doltero crushed the armrest of his chair.

The iron armrest was deformed, as if it were being molded like candy, before being twisted off the chair. Then, without the slightest sign of distress, Doltero flung the detached armrest to the floor. “If you want to end up like this armrest, then by all means, keep dithering. Time is short for the elderly. Don’t waste it.”

“Even though you are just as on-edge as the rest of us?” Toto retorted. “What an insufferable man, trying to pretend to be the only mature adult in the room… Don’t you think so as well, Miss Golden Beetle?” Having smiled sweetly in the face of Doltero’s warning, Toto tried to draw the third party out, the golden pipe still nestled between her lips.

“Oh? You want me to take sides? I wouldn’t be much of a peacekeeper if I did that. More of a fire-starter.”

The one who’d frowned at being called upon was a petite woman who hadn’t spoken once until now. She sat at the corner of the table, skillfully avoiding detection since the start of the meeting, wearing a well-made black suit. Along with her black suit, she had been thorough enough to wear a black tie, gloves, socks, and shoes. She also had green hair of a shade so dark that it looked black depending on the light. A woman of ambiguous age, her hair was tied into a knot on either side of her head, and her faint, pasted-on smile was clearly designed to conceal her intentions.

Upon noticing her, Manfred raised his finger and said, “That’s right. Why the hell’s Helaine the Golden Pest even participating in this meeting, huh? This woman shouldn’t even have the qualifications to participate in the regular meetings.”

At the matching hostility from both Manfred and Toto, neither of whom bothered to hide their feelings, the woman in the suit—Helaine—scratched her cheek absently. “This lowly one surely cannot fault your logic… Ah, and the name is Golden Beetle, not Golden Pest, Mr. Manfred.”

The one who had extended a helping hand to Helaine was none other than Toto, who was still mildly puffing out tobacco smoke. As if trying to emphasize her voluptuous breasts, she crossed her arms. Giving Helaine a sidelong glance, she addressed the room. “It was I who invited her. That should be a good enough qualification to join us, yes?”

“It’s nothing but unpleasant to see these women hanging around each other, one reeking of blood, and the other of metal. You must’ve been prepared to be shunned since you bothered to show yourself here.” Clicking his tongue, Manfred threatened Helaine as he touched the tattoo on his face. “You have something to share, don’t you?”

To this vicious but hypocritical threat, Helaine broke the ice with an, “Actually…” This garnered the attention of the room. “As I am sure everyone is aware, our company has received the patronage of this city for a long time. This gift was only possible because of the daily assistance of everyone involved…”

“Enough with the pleasantries. Get to the point,” commanded Doltero.

“—Our company’s office was attacked, and the precious lives of my employees have been lost. We took for granted the harmony that your organizations grant the city, and for our under-preparedness in the face of a crisis, I can only express my shame.”

“…”

None of the Big Three took Helaine's humble, self-deprecating words at face value.

Though Helaine was ashamed of not being able to protect it herself, she was by no means as sorry as her words seemed to suggest. She was what they called a "moneylender," belonging to a company called the Golden Beetle. Her being able to participate in the regular meeting was simply a result of her having a lot of clients from the underworld.

Of course, their clients included personnel involved with the Big Three, and the Golden Beetle was an inviolable domain thanks to their patronage. No fighting and no aggression against them were unwritten rules, so if the Golden Beetle was ever threatened, these syndicates, including the Black Silver Coin, would do everything in their power to crush whoever was responsible.

And now, the guarantee of security that had been implied in that unspoken agreement had been ruptured.

She continued, "Whether it be money or human lives, we would like to avoid any further losses. And, as one who can serve as a representative of private citizens, I'd like to humbly request the swift intervention of this esteemed gathering."

"What an obvious lie," Manfred spat. "Calling yourself a representative of private citizens."

"I implore you to make haste in restoring our sense of security and peace of mind," Helaine went on. "Otherwise, the trust that has been cultivated between us and all of you will be in jeopardy."

Even as Helaine was politely lowering her head during her explanation, even Doltero couldn't help but feel disgusted by her words. The existence of the Golden Beetle itself was like a type of magic in Flanders, after all.

The Golden Beetle lent money to the underworld organizations to guarantee the safety of their operations within the city. If they were unable to do that, it was only reasonable for them to resort to methods that allowed them to get the money they had lent back.

Not a single soul here was foolish enough to brush her outlandish remarks off as being those of a mere moneylender.

“To sum it all up, the scoundrel in question brought disgrace to us, and laid hands on something that should have never been touched,” Toto began. “Vengeance must be vicious and thorough. Any objections?”

As ash fell from Toto’s pipe into the silence of her suggestion, Manfred took up the lead of the conversation to propose a course of action. “Fine by me,” he said. “We’ll find them and carve balance scales on their eyeballs. More importantly, there really are laudable idiots in the world, to try something like this. On our turf; in the Pig King’s territory, no less.”

When he’d finished speaking, Tattoo Face sent a meaningful look Doltero’s way.

“…What?”

“Nothing. It’s just that now we’ve got a guy who’s not afraid of the Pig King himself, who makes villains tremble in their boots. Perhaps times have changed? Maybe you aren’t as feared as you once were?”

“You seem to be in a hurry to have your head crushed before that scumbag does.”

“That’s what I’m talking about.” Manfred did not back down at Doltero’s dangerously low voice, sneering at him. “If you were truly still the man in the legends, you’d have crushed my skull before bothering to threaten me, right?”

As the meeting derailed, Toto’s scowl continued to deepen. Finally, she barked, “That’s enough!”

The one who raised a black-gloved hand to politely insert herself into the conversation was Helaine. “Now, now, please calm down, you two. Fighting like this will not result in profit for any of us. Please consider it as allowing us to save face…”

Doltero roared, “Why should I allow you to save face and let this insolent piglet off the hook?”

“That’s…ah, that’s right. I have some good news! It may even have something to do with the incident that happened recently.”

In the face of Doltero’s increasingly intimidating air, Helaine placed her hand in her breast pocket and pulled out a piece of paper.

“And what would that be?” Toto asked.

“An investigative report,” Helaine replied. “In order to do something for the surviving family members of the employees that passed away, we determined that we couldn’t simply wallow in despair. We worked tirelessly to investigate what happened.”

“Did you find anything?” asked Manfred.

“This is not yet confirmed, but…there is a possibility that this crime was committed by someone who does not know how the city works. And this reminded me of Hakuchuri’s Sword Saint.”

“…Hang on, you’re serious, aren’t you?” Manfred muttered.

The second those words had left Helaine’s mouth, chaos began to roil among those present. Even Manfred, Toto, and Doltero were no exception. However, although it seemed that no one noticed this, Doltero’s surprise had a distinctly different air to the rest of those in the room.

Hakuchuri’s Sword Saint was a disaster that even the people from the underworld trembled to mention.

Seeing that there was a possibility that this criminal had a part in it, everyone went into an uproar, prompting Helaine to quickly wave her hands. “Oh, please do not misunderstand me. We need not concern ourselves with the Sword Saint himself, but rather the young lady he brought home with him.”

“Young lady… So, that royal selection candidate, then?” Toto inquired.

“The selection battle for the throne… You mean that young chit who's just there to make up the numbers?"

Realizing that the disaster wasn't at the center of what was going on, Toto and Manfred seemed happy enough to throw themselves back into the conversation.

The royal selection was currently the biggest matter of interest for the people of the Kingdom of Lugunica. Since every member of the royal family had died due to an illness, the kingdom had announced the start of the royal selection in order to select a new ruler. One of the candidates had a base of operations in Hakuchuri, a town near Flanders. Unfortunately for her, however, she didn't even have a proper sponsor. She was just a pitiful little urchin found to make up the numbers to start the selection—common knowledge for the people of the underworld, who were sharp-eared for that kind of information.

Helaine, however, threw another piece of information into the pot, one that was worthy of causing a stir. "If this report is accurate, then it seems the aforementioned young lady has met with the Black Silver Coin."

"…"

Bringing her hands in front of her slender chest, Helaine declared cheerfully, "It also revealed that she had been extremely discourteous towards you, Mr. Doltero. If that is really the truth, then I can only call her a fool eager for the grave, but… Perhaps this was all a ploy to earn herself some popularity?" In clear contrast to the content of her speech, those listening were unable to maintain a similar state of calm.

In particular, Doltero found himself suddenly expected to explain the situation.

"Is what she just said true, Mr. Doltero?" Toto asked.

"…We had some altercations, yes. However, I've already taken care of it."

It was no different than telling them plainly, "I have no responsibility to explain the details to you." However, upon hearing that, Toto and Manfred's eyes flickered with hidden emotion as they exchanged knowing glances.

"If it's true that she had a dispute with the Black Silver Coin, the Golden Pest's words aren't something we can simply laugh off. The presumptive loser may simply be looking for a last chance at glory, reviving her candidacy by cleaning up the underworld. It's possible."

"It may only be the cute, naive rashness of a child, but this one does have the capacity to actually pull it off."

"The Sword Saint…" uttered someone in a low voice, gulping as they did.

Toto and Manfred's attention remained shifted over to the young selection candidate, ignoring Doltero, who suddenly had little to say. Never mind whether they saw her as the one responsible for their present circumstances, or whether they were interested in her on a more personal level.

"Credibility aside, shouldn't we first talk with the girl, at least?" Toto posed. "Especially since the girl in question is only a town away, and…well…she was rather cute, as I recall. A diamond in the rough, I'd wager."

"Ugh, there we go again," Manfred replied. "Your appetites repulse me. That said, we'd be remiss if we didn't pay her a visit, huh—what was she called again?"

"Hmm, let me see… If I'm not mistaken—"

Manfred absently touched the tattoo on his face as Toto gave a captivating smile, then looked at Helaine, who tilted her head at that—stealthily looking Doltero's way.

With that gesture alone, it was as if the tendrils of Helaine's nefarious nature had worked their way into his skin.

Then, without bothering to bring him up by name, Helaine smiled softly and answered, "—Lady Felt. That was her name, I believe."

2

"—Lady Felt!"

The instant she realized she wouldn't be able to evade the inevitable collision, she heard the dulcet tones of a male voice echoing toward her. Before she could react to that cry in any way, however, something collided with her forehead. With a light "plop," it sprayed her forehead in a shower of red liquid.

With the spray of red, her slender figure toppled backward. Then, without anything to break her fall, she crashed straight into the wooden crates behind her, smashing them to pieces in a large cloud of dust. Having fallen into the scattered wooden crates, the girl miraculously landed in the only spot she'd remain unharmed.

On her back, gazing up blankly at the clear, blue sky, her crimson eyes revealed no emotion. Instead, her usual air of implacable tenacity, as well as her dainty, refined features, were overtaken by the mass of red splattered over her forehead. Her gold hair, which seemed to shine like the rays of the sun itself, was also stained by it, and one couldn't help but avert their gaze at the terrible sight.

In fact, many had already averted their eyes, their shoulders giving off a slight tremble. Among them, however, was one who could not look away.

A quick burst of wind vaulted the gate to swirl around the fallen girl. No, not quite the wind, but rather a young man who had bolted toward her so quickly that one could easily mistake him for the wind.

"Lady Felt…" said the youth, down on one knee, peering at the fallen girl's face. He had a striking physical appearance—deep red hair that seemed to burn as brightly as a flame, blue eyes that seemed so clear as to have swallowed the whole blue sky in a single breath, and a handsomeness so heavenly that not even a sculptor with a lifetime of experience could replicate it.

The handsome young man's shapely eyebrows distorted with remorse as he kneeled beside her and murmured, "My deepest apologies. I…was unable to reach you in time…”

His voice was tinged with sorrow, revealing his feelings of regret and responsibility for what had happened. It looked so excessively tragic that, if put into a painting, it would be a timeless masterpiece capable of making anyone who saw it weep.

Within that scene, which seemed so detached from reality…

“—Reinhard.” As if by some miracle, the girl managed to murmur the word from amid her state of distress. And the arm, which had fallen limply to the ground before, began to rise, and little by little, her fingertips approached the face of the young man. As the young man watched with bated breath, her fingers drew inexorably close until the moment…she pinched his nose.

“Lady Felt?” came his now slightly nasal voice.

“Hey, you! Haven’t I told you to stop doing stuff like that—it totally puts me off my groove!” replied the irritated girl as she continued to pinch his nose. From that position, she stretched out her legs, brought them up, and then swung them down with enough momentum to bring herself upright. After that, she wiped off the red stuff that had stained her face with her hand. “Whoa, it’s sweet. Now that’s pretty cool. Didn’t expect that at all.”

“I am not sure if it is sanitary to lick the stuff on your face, my lady…”

“The hell you say?” she replied. “Are you implying that my face is dirty? I’m gonna kick your ass for that!”

“No, my lady’s countenance is extremely lovely. Though loveliness and hygiene are not exactly the same…”

“Ugh, enough, enough!” said the girl rudely, covering her ears. The girl—Felt—then sprang to her feet, brushed the dirt off her clothes, and hummed in thought as she looked around. “So? I gather the reason you barged in like that wasn’t just because you’re a total airhead.”

“That is correct, my lady. Though it pains me to say it, your team has lost.”

Propping a hand on her hip, Felt smacked her lips, accepting her defeat. “Hmph. Can’t be helped.” The young man—Reinhard—gave a wry smile at the sportsmanlike behavior, then passed her a cloth to wipe her face with before stepping into the middle of the square.

He then announced in a sonorous voice, “The winner of the Harvest Festival game this year is the team from the West District!”

“—!”

After a heavy moment of silence to take in this announcement, the crowd burst into an explosion of cheers. The town of Hakuchuri wasn’t all that large, but it was still amazing to see nearly every resident gathered in the town square. While wiping her head, Felt’s expression relaxed at the sight of everyone embracing each other and cheering.

“Ah, I lost, I lost, damn it!” And then, after a pause, said, “And some of you guys still have the nerve to turn your faces away!” Felt scowled in the direction of the spectators, sharply thrusting her finger at them. Everyone she was pointing at had turned away, their shoulders trembling, when she’d taken her fall.

Felt suddenly narrowed her crimson eyes at them. “Don’t bother holding back your laughter. Look at me! I look ridiculous, right?” she admitted, proudly showcasing her tometo-covered self.

And with that, a roar of laughter seemed to envelop the town square, reverberating without reserve throughout the town.

3

To the southeast of the Kingdom of Lugunica lay Hakuchuri, a town governed by House Astrea. House Astrea was famous for having produced a great number of Sword Saints, but in contrast to the Sword Saint’s clear value to the kingdom, their house received very little in the way of rewards from the royal family. The situation was related to the governing style of each generation’s head, as well as whoever bore the mighty title of Sword Saint.

In brief, as a sign of their allegiance to the kingdom, House Astrea would not use its might for anything other than serving the kingdom in times of peril and would never gain more power than was necessary to do so. And so, although they were a vital martial force for the kingdom, as far as being nobility, the territory they governed was rather unremarkable.

Hakuchuri was an ordinary town without any particularly striking characteristics. Its primary industries were agriculture and animal husbandry, and it relied on earth dragon-related jobs, which were in great demand in the nearby city of Flanders.

On this day, in the unremarkable town of Hakuchuri—as a part of celebrating their successful harvest—the traditional annual Tometo Festival was held.

During the Tometo Festival, the town split into four teams: east, west, south, and north. They would then grab tometoes from the baskets placed in the center of the town and throw them at each other. Those who got hit were out, and the game continued until only one team was left standing. In other words, this was the source of Felt's unfortunate tometo-splattered face.

And so Felt, playing for the eastern team, had been defeated in a final decisive battle with the player on the western team, concluding the Tometo Festival with the western team being declared the victor.

Felt, as the last one left standing on her team, could not help but feel frustrated. Well, it's not just because I'm annoyed by my loss, but…

"What do you think secured your victory today?" asked the mayor.

"Daily training and strict adherence to a healthy life of service," came the small voice of one of the western team's winners.

"Meanwhile, you stayed up all night, Lady Felt…" Reinhard lamented softly.

"Oh shut up!" she retorted. "It was the night before the festival; there was no way I could sleep! So what?”

Standing up on the winner’s podium, receiving the Tometo Medal from the town’s mayor, were the twin girls who’d led the western team to victory with Felt’s crushing defeat. They had pink hair, their bodies even more childlike than Felt’s own small frame. The two girls, still in their early teens, were called Flam and Grassis—chamberlains of House Astrea, who had taken the pissed off Felt in. To make a long story short, it was a case of “subordinates overthrowing their masters.”

Felt had been on track to win the Tometo Festival at the end by utilizing her talents, but had suffered defeat at the last moment thanks to the twins’ killer technique.

“What the heck was that last move?!” Felt demanded. “Are there three of you?”

“Certainly not, my lady. It was simply a matter of me moving back and forth with great speed, you see.”

“The Reverse Flip Sideways Jump-Back.”

“I can’t believe I lost to such a ridiculous move…” Felt lamented.

After them, Felt received a Consolation Medal from the second-place platform with drooped shoulders, feeling crestfallen. Though she was feeling a sense of defeat right now, it would be fair to say that the Tometo Festival itself had been a great success. She got a sense of accomplishment from looking down at the townspeople from her high vantage point on the podium.

The success of the town’s small festival was truly a cause for joy. At first, there had been a lot of controversy about whether members of House Astrea, including Felt, would participate. For over ten years, the town’s ruler, House Astrea, had seemingly distanced itself from it, forgoing any participation in any of its festivities. And yet, just as it seemed to be business as usual this time around…

“Hm? What’s wrong with that? It sounds fun. Why don’t we do it?” Felt succinctly said when it was explained to her. And so, after an absence of 10 years, House Astrea decided to join in the festivities once again.

The festival didn't really have any strict rules originally, but because Felt and company were participating this time, they had to make some changes. In particular was the division of teams; typically, participants broke up into four groups based roughly on where they lived on the town map. However, since House Astrea didn't really fall into any of them, organizers weren't sure where to place them. So, they eventually decided to divide the members of House Astrea among each of the four teams: Felt in the east, Flam and Grassis in the west, Old Man Rom and Rachins in the north, and Gaston and Camberley in the south, making it a fair enough division to start the festival.

"Well, the condition was that Reinhard couldn't participate. If he did, no one would have stood a chance… Which makes sense, considerin' what he did last year."

The Sword Saint, with his overwhelming power, would have annihilated anyone in his way at the Tometo Festival. With him in the mix, the city's inhabitants would have quickly been covered in tometoes, bringing the festival to a swift end. That would have been a major deviation from the festival's main purpose, for people to relax and have a good time.

"Anyway, after all the fuss about participatin' or not, it's a good thing we did, right?" asked Felt, glancing to the side with a wry smile, simultaneously wiping away her sense of defeat along with the tometo.

Reinhard nodded in agreement to the girl with the prominent fang at his side. "I was honestly worried it would make things awkward and cause needless problems for everyone…"

"You were worried over nothing," chided Felt. "Listen to me more carefully next time."

"Yes. But next time…no, nevermind." Reinhard stopped mid-sentence, as if reconsidering what he was about to say.

Perturbed, Felt glared at the tall man. “What were you trying to say?” she pressed. “If you have something to say, just say it. It feels gross when you keep it to yourself.”

“…I’d appreciate it if we held the next one in a format where I can also take part. Just watching makes me feel a little…”

“…lonely?” Felt supplied the answer casually, but Reinhard’s eyes remained downcast. Her eyes widened as she took in his words. It was surprising because it was him who had said it.

Even if he was kept out of the loop, he would have just watched with a smile, she thought, reproaching herself for having had such a selfish impression.

However, as if to directly contradict Felt’s reflections, Reinhard shook his head and said, “No, I’m just not the type of person who can be content just watching. I’d really like to move my body too.”

“You’re just a sore loser, aren’t you? You were the one who suggested that you shouldn’t take part. So next time, do you wanna participate with your hands and feet bound in chains and make it a rule that you can’t touch any tometoes with your hands?”

“That’s it?”

“What do you mean ‘That’s it’? That’s psychotic! And if you want to join, tell me beforehand. This year’s festival is almost over, ain’t it?”

In any event, Felt was at a loss due to how bad Reinhard was at articulating his desires. When it came to snide remarks about her daily attitude, he had no problem doling them out one after another.

“Oh…?” Amid her foul mood, Felt raised her eyebrows at something she saw in the corner of her eye. At the back of the crowd of city dwellers surrounding the podium, there was a familiar mother and daughter. The mother, beautiful and young, was holding a baby with golden curls. The two were Kalifa and Ilya, whom Felt’s party had met two months ago because of a certain incident. The mother and daughter had moved to Hakuchuri to escape a difficult situation, and Felt had arranged for them to live and work at a ranch there. From the looks of it, it seemed that they had not taken part in throwing tometoes, but their expressions suggested that they were enjoying the festival nonetheless.

However, what caught Felt's eye wasn't that heartwarming sight. It was…

"That Gaston… Looks like somebody's enjoying himself," Felt muttered.

Not far off from the pleasant picture of Kalifa cradling Ilya in her arms was a large man with a perpetually fierce expression—Gaston. He was a man under Felt's employment, but his face as he spoke to Kalifa displayed shameless devotion; his fondness for her was amusingly transparent. Nevertheless, it appeared to Felt that Kalifa was not averse to it.

"Come to think of it, Gaston worked pretty hard for the southern team today."

Reinhard had noticed the same scene and gave his opinion, having acted as a referee for the festival. "Unfortunately, he didn't make it to the end, but he did quite well. He's gradually learning the Flow Method, so I'm looking forward to seeing what he can do in the future."

"Is that what you've been teaching them recently?" questioned Felt. "So, how did Camberley do? They were on the same team, right?"

"Quite soon after the event began, Camberley was thrown headfirst into a box of tometoes. It is a rare thing to see someone covered so entirely in tometo juice. "

"Oh. Right."

Though on the same team, the results of Gaston and Camberley were like night and day. But the difference could probably be attributed to one having someone they wished to show off to.

"I guess you could say my defeat was due to Old Man Rom being on a different team," Felt said primly.

"I think you're giving Master Rom a bit too much credit…but I'm sure having him in our camp will prove to be beneficial for the royal selection."

"Oh, yeah, yeah. Old Man Rom is amazing. You're startin' to get it now, ain't ya?"

The essence of the story aside, Felt was in a good mood after hearing praise for her Old Man Rom. If the Tometo Festival could finish here, on such a good note, and move on to the closing ceremony, that would be great, but…

Reinhard's hushed voice cautioned, "Lady Felt."

"…I know. I can see him." Felt crossed her arms and drew her chin back in defiance. In an instant, the atmosphere between the mistress and knight changed as they caught sight of something.

An uninvited visitor, out of place in this lively festive atmosphere.

"Let's move somewhere else," ordered Felt. "Leave the closing of the festival to the mayor."

"As you wish, my lady. Please leave your personal safety to me."

Rolling her eyes, Felt stepped down from the podium, not letting her inner frustration show on her face. Then, with Reinhard in tow, she strode off to a place away from the hustle and bustle of people, eventually arriving at an empty meadow.

"Look, there's no one around, so hurry up and show yourself."

"I'm sorry to have interrupted your fun. But the quicker we talk, the better."

In the meadow on the outskirts of town, the figure appeared at Felt's call.

The man in the slender black suit had a sharp, serpentine look about him—Felt recognized those creepy, snake-like eyes.

"You're from the Black Silver Coin, right? Your name was…"

“My name is Safis, and I’m very sorry I didn’t have time to say hello to you the other day,” the snake-eyed man—proclaiming to be Safis—greeted them politely, causing Felt to snort. She was mocking him rather brazenly, but in truth, no love was lost between them. After all, this man was the mastermind behind the incident involving Kalifa and Ilya two months ago.

“Didn’t you die when Pig-Nose punched your lights out last time? Good job surviving.”

“I was saved by the generosity of the Boss. Now I’m working like a dog to regain the trust I’ve lost. Naturally, I also lost my position as an officer.”

“That’s great. It would’ve been even better if you had lost your head too,” Felt barked without remorse.

“That’s going too far, my lady. Although I too have my own opinions about him,” said Reinhard, always quick to rebuke his mistress’s speech and conduct, though he himself had little positive to say about their interloper.

“Mr. Safis, the relationship between you and Lady Felt is far from good. Even if Master Rom and Mr. Doltero are on friendly terms, I personally can’t condone having a lengthy conversation with you.”

“I’m already aware that you both dislike me. That’s obvious. But I did not come to harass you two. I have a message from the Boss.”

“From Pig-Nose…?” Felt pondered Safis’s words, whose veil of superficial politeness had yet to break.

The Pig King Doltero—Leader of the Black Silver Coin syndicate—was in fact, Ilya’s birth father. However, to distance himself from Kalifa and Ilya, the man declared that he had no wife or child. That was why Felt despised him enough to never forgive him. But that was just her personal opinion. If he had something to tell them, she had no right to stop him—

“I’m sorry to disappoint you, but this message has nothing to do with a certain mother and child.”

Disappointed and irritated on their behalf, Felt snapped, “Tch! Then what is it? I have nothing left to say to you.”

Safis seemed unconcerned by her anger and merely continued, “Now, now, don’t say that. Lady Felt, are you aware of the events currently causing a ruckus in Flanders?”

“No idea. I haven’t been in Flanders since I was with you guys.”

“I am aware of your efforts in the past few weeks, Lady Felt. The way the inhabitants of Hakuchuri treat their lord has improved considerably. For better or worse.”

Folding her arms, Felt curled her lips in annoyance. “Quit speakin’ like everything has a profound meaning behind it.”

For the past two months, she had been actively making contact with the residents of Hakuchuri, not only at the Tometo Festival, and showed a willingness to get closer with them. It certainly sounded calculating when said that way, but she was ultimately just doing what she wanted, regardless of the impact on her reputation.

“Not that I’m soft-hearted enough to be creeped out by it, but you’re still a perverted bastard for spying like that, you know?”

“Spying, you say? Hardly. After all, if I had any kind of malicious intent—even a dirty look—it would not have escaped the attention of the Sword Saint. Am I wrong?”

“Exactly right,” Felt said haughtily. “So, if you’re done playin’ around, may I ask what exactly is going on in Flanders?”

“Hmmm… I can only say that several organizations have been targeted, including the Black Silver Coin. Anything more than that, you’ll have to find that out for yourself.”

Despite the arrogance in his speech being a clear attempt to rile her up, it conversely helped Felt regain her composure. Having grown up in the slums of the royal capital, she was sensitive to these petty tricks. The fact that Safis’s words had a slight hint of anger and a dab of truth behind them was also quite clear to her.

At any rate, it didn't seem he had come here for idle chatter. She decided to investigate his implications on her own later.

"Well, fine. I'll bite. So, what's the message?"

"Including the recent contact with the Black Silver Coin, Your Ladyship's reputation isn't great within our circles. In particular, besides the Black Silver Coin, the Flower Prison Garden and The Balance have been wanting to learn more about you. I've been told by the Boss to inform you of a possible courtesy visit from them soon."

"By 'courtesy visit,' you mean…"

Safis merely narrowed his serpentine eyes in response to Reinhard's question, giving no other answer. That alone was enough to tell them that the "courtesy visit" was not all it seemed to be.

"In the end, you're saying that that Pig-Nose's underlings are coming after me because they don't like me? I don't know why you'd warn me instead of stopping them."

"The Boss also has his position to think of. Just like last time, it won't be a light thing for him to give his support to the cause. Besides, the two organizations I just mentioned aren't subordinate groups of the Black Silver Coin. Sad though it is to say."

"…For now I'll just listen to what you have to say." Felt waved her hands vaguely in response to Safis's reasoning, perhaps because it was the way things were done in the underworld. Then, as she clenched her hand into a tight fist, she said, "I'll accept Pig-Nose's… Doltero's advice. You go back home to your menial job. If some douchebag comes to say hello, then bring it on."

"I'll protect Lady Felt, no matter what tricks they throw at us," Reinhard boldly announced by Felt's side.

In response to these words, Felt straightened, suddenly an imposing figure in her own right, even as she made no move to deny Reinhard's vow.

Despite having the strongest Sword Saint at her side, her stance did not indicate the slightest trace of dependance on the martial prowess he possessed.

“I see. The number of chinks in your armor has certainly decreased. It seems that the boss was right,” said the man, who stared at the two figures while licking his lips with his long, slender tongue.

4

“Oh, you wanna know what’s happen’n in Flanders? Everybody knows that. They’re all sayin’ that the Black Silver Coin or Big Three or whatever are gettin’ the crap beat out of ‘em.”

The man who answered Felt’s question with his tongue sticking out was the slender-faced Rachins. Like Gaston, Rachins was under Felt’s employment. Considering the competition, he could be considered quite clever, but only when compared to Gaston and Camberley.

This exchange between Rachins and Felt took place at Astrea Manor after they had retired from the Tometo Festival. Back in the mansion, where each resumed their daily routines, Felt called Rachins into the lounge and began her story over a game of Shatranj.

Rachins, the wisest of the Three Idiots and a frequent visitor to Flanders, lived up to Felt’s expectations beautifully. Satisfied with his response, she moved a piece on the board and urged him to continue his story. “What are the details?” she asked.

“Well, for the past month or so, big shots from those syndicates that run Flanders on the down low have been offed one after the other. Nobody knows who did it or why, but the word is that when the culprits are caught, there’ll be hell to pay. Hard to believe there’s someone crazy enough to stir up that viper’s nest.”

“So that’s what you mean when you say they’re gettin’ beat. But I don’t understand why the Black Silver Coin warned me regardin’ the incident.”

“The Black Silver Coin warned you?” Rachins repeated with a heavy dose of skepticism.

Move your pieces, and try to steal your opponent’s pieces. Win by invading the opponent’s camp and toppling their king. These were the basic rules of Shatranj.

As they talked, Felt fiddled with the pieces she had taken with her fingertips, while Rachins contemplated something at length. It most likely had nothing to do with his next move in Shatranj, but rather careful deliberation over the content of their conversation.

Sitting cross-legged on her chair, Felt patiently waited for an answer. Then, after a few minutes, Rachins dropped the hand he had been holding to his chin and said, “Hey, Boss Lady. You’ve got yourself a big ol’ problem.”

“A problem?”

“If you’re not careful, they’ll suspect you of havin’ tried to set ‘em up the last time. You’ve had tussles with the Black Coins before. They’ll be liable to think that you’re out to get ‘em.”

“Huh? What’s with that accusation… That was all about Ilya before, wasn’t it?”

“Yeah, and Doltero prob’ly knows that, but it’s not somethin’ he can make public. That’s why he’s tryin’ to be smart about it by givin’ you a heads-up.”

“Draggin’ us into it isn’t being smart about it.” Scratching her gold hair nervously, Felt had a sudden awareness of the awful situation she had been put in.

Rachins raised his eyebrows in surprise.

“What?” asked Felt.

“Oh, nothin’. Just thinkin’ you actually believed me. You do understand that all of that was just guessin’ on my part, right?”

“I was the one who asked you. If I asked your opinion and then gave you shit about it, it would mean that I have a really bad personality… Anyway, it makes sense, doesn't it? I'd be more surprised if you were just makin' this up as you go."

If he can make up such a convincing story on the fly like that, he should just use his talent to write a book. But looking at him leaning back in his chair and resting his cheek on his hand, it seemed safe to believe that he wasn't making it all up.

"So what are you gonna do? How is our royal selection candidate going to explain it to these guys?"

"Why do I have to be the one to make excuses? In the first place, I don't have anything to make excuses about. I also can't talk about Ilya and her mother."

"That's why they warned you to find a way somehow."

"…"

Felt pursed her lips and made the most unpleasant face she could muster. Seeing this, Rachins puffed out his cheeks and moved a piece on the board. "There you go, checkmate."

"Ah! Oh, you're kiddin' me. Even though I was winning?!"

"I was just makin' it look that way. You think too straightforward, boss; you should try an' hide your plans a bit better."

A strike by Rachins had left Felt's King with no escape route. Standing up, she looked at the Shatranj board from different angles, but she was trapped. It was a complete defeat.

"As if I'd admit defeat to someone who's just started learnin'. Though I'll admit that y'er a quick learner."

"Heh heh heh… Just remember this. Next time, I'll have you beggin' for mercy."

While Felt lamented her defeat and idly envisioned her King being burned at the stake, the winner, Rachins, got up from his seat in a thoroughly good mood. "I'll never say no to whippin' you at Shatranj, but you need to think about how you're gonna get through this. You should also bear in mind that their ‘courtesies’ are seriously dangerous.”

With these words, Rachins waved his hand over his shoulder and left.

In the lounge, left with some advice and a defeat, Felt scratched her nose. “If they send a greeting my way, then I’ll have something to say to them: Don’t drag us into your fuckin’ fight.”

5

Having collected the evidence regarding the incident in Flanders and listened to Rachins’s opinions, Felt was practically chomping at the bit for this “courtesy call.”

If a fight was going to happen, Felt would always rather be the one picking it. This was something she had learned in the slums—when the helpless got bullied, there was a reason for it. In most cases, Felt had learned, it was because they never got a win. Therefore, she would win, no matter what.

With such strong resolution, she was raring to go to get this “courtesy call” over with, but…

“Nobody’s frickin’ here!”

On this peaceful afternoon several days following the Tometo Festival, Felt’s anger finally exploded. In the room she had been confined to—otherwise known as her office—there was a mountain of reference books. These were handpicked by Reinhard every single day. As a candidate for the royal selection, it was undeniable that she was inferior to the other candidates in terms of knowledge. And it was true that she would have to work hard to catch up. However, no matter how many books she finished reading, there was always another. It was entirely reasonable that even the ever-ambitious Felt would throw in the towel. But precisely because the selection was so important, a “courtesy call” from an underworld organization was her biggest concern at the moment. And yet, no matter how long she waited, there was no sign of it happening.

"Day in, day out, I sit in my house starin' at books… My head's going to start growing mold."

As Felt was pouting her lips in frustration, a soft, tutting voice sounded from behind her. "Such language. What's not to like about uneventful days? Now me, I'll take a boring day over an eventful one every time, with open arms."

In response, Felt leaned back against her office desk and let out a purr.

Normally Felt, who was harsh to everyone, only showed a softer response to either those younger than her or otherwise to old and trusted acquaintances. And with the exception of young children, those lucky enough to receive her favor were naturally limited.

Sitting on her desk, Felt tilted her head and said, "You know what they say, if you're bored for too long, you'll grow senile. Are you sure you're okay with that, Old Man Rom?"

Even while sitting on the floor, his head still sat level with hers. The bald giant waved his hand dismissively. "Are you pullin' my leg?" he asked with a chuckle. "Don't you worry, I've been swamped with work nonstop since I came to this house. It seems that the mayor has been in charge of the estate in the absence of the young Sword Saint."

"You do like to beat about the bush, Old Man Rom. You tryin' to say he's abusing his position, doing something evil on the sly?"

In Felt's mind, the image of the mayor on the festival platform came to mind. He had a heavy build with a kind face—certainly not the sort of person who would line his own pockets.

"The opposite, actually. Apparently, that family is too good-natured and are taken advantage of all over the place. And it's not the first time either…both the previous head of the family and the one before that seem to have been too kind-hearted for their own good."

"The previous one, you mean… Reinhard's grandfather?"

"No, the one before him…his great-grandfather. The head of the family is still supposed to be that young one's father. That's another thing that gives me a headache…"

"Great-grandfather… Now that you mention it, Reinhard said something about that before. Something about respecting him or what not."

Felt was relieved that, according to Old Man Rom's words, there seemed to be no need to doubt the mayor's goodwill. However, it would be pretty terrible if he heard that he was being referred to in private as a bit of a doormat.

The documents that Old Man Rom was going through one after another were filled with reports and figures and so on, and were nothing but gibberish to her. He was now working with Reinhard and the mayor, and doing his best to improve the situation somehow, but…

"The Black Silver Coin is a matter of concern too, of course, but our own house needs your attention. If we don't have at least one person who can manage our internal affairs properly, it's only going to get harder from here on out."

"Why not you?"

"Unfortunately, I'm too underqualified. Even if it's just a desk job we're talking about, it's still different from my field of expertise," replied Old Man Rom as he stroked Felt's lowered head with his large palm. Closing her eyes in contentment at the familiar touch, Felt quietly puzzled over what was going on. If Old Man Rom is complaining about it, then it's obvious that there's a problem with the so-called internal administration. It all came down to a need for more personnel, but Felt didn't know how to deal with that.

It would be wrong to pick them all off the streets, like what she did with Rachins and the rest—although for a moment, she thought she might have found the right answer with the 'streets' idea.

"Ah, I don't get it! Why can't my problems just come one at a time, damn it!"

"Watch that mouth, now. You'll have a lot to think about from now on, but at least your appetite never suffers. That hasn't changed since we were in the slums."

"That's true, but… I've got an idea!" She had been pouting at Old Man Rom's sermon before her eyes suddenly lit up. She kicked her chair enthusiastically and leapt lightly over the pile of books on her office desk. Her petite body landed on the lap of the surprised Old Man Rom, and she looked up into his face from below.

"Don't startle me like that. Well, what brilliant idea did you just think of?"

"I'm talking about how I'm an idiot! This isn't the time to be complaining about too many problems at once. Why are we just waiting so patiently? All I have to do is go there myself." Pressing the back of her head against Old Man Rom's chest, Felt laughed at her bright idea.

She assumed that she had to wait because she was told in advance that there would be a "courtesy call," but that was her first mistake. Why should I wait patiently at someone else's convenience? she thought. "If they want to 'visit' me, I can just go and approach them myself. Wouldn't wanna make those busy folks come all the way out here, now would we?"

Old Man Rom made a face at Felt's aggressive idea. "Hmm… If you were going alone, I'd tell you to reconsider." He may have been emotionally opposed to the idea, but he couldn't find any reason to hold back his bold granddaughter.

In between feeling sorry for causing worry and the feeling of satisfaction with being cared for, Felt said one last word to make the final push to Old Man Rom. "I know it ain't safe to go to their hideout. That's why I'm takin' Reinhard with me. I mean, I'll still go on my own if he refuses, but…"

"For goodness sake… I sometimes wonder exactly who you take after." Sighing with resignation, Old Man Rom plopped his hand affectionately on Felt's head once more.

They had known each other for a long time, after all. When she had this look on her face, he knew she wouldn’t budge no matter what. When that happened, the most Old Man Rom could do was to help pave the way for her. In this case, it was to persuade a certain someone to keep her out of harm’s way.

As if to express just exactly how much he opposed the idea, Old Man Rom’s sigh was long and deep.

6

“Try to avoid doing anything dangerous. Do not leave my side unless absolutely necessary.”

“I got it, jeez. I’m getting an earache, for cryin’ out loud.”

Reinhard, her escort, had repeated the warning so often that she could almost see it in her dreams. He told me the same thing when we visited the hideout of the Black Silver Coin before, but where does he think I grew up? The slums of the royal capital weren’t exactly the safest of places, either.

“Every city, every land has places where normal laws don’t apply. I’m not saying you should avoid those places specifically, but… please refrain from lowering your guard just because you’re used to them.”

Taking in how little Felt seemed to be interested in heeding his warnings, Reinhard let his lecture falter off. He had no intention of insulting her, of course, and she could see nothing but concern for herself in his blue eyes. Chastened, Felt reluctantly grunted her assent.

Felt and Reinhard were currently on their way to the Earth Dragon Capital, Flanders.

After following Safis’s advice to wait patiently at their residence for this elusive “courtesy call,” they had grown tired of that and decided to take matters into their own hands.

To be honest, she had her suspicions that the whole thing was a fabrication by Safis, and that this was his way of getting back at her for exposing his previous plots. But after some probing, Felt found it to be true that her reputation wasn't the best within the city's underworld.

In order to find out what was going on in the area, she tried probing around Flanders, but…

"Heeey, what are you doing? A regular to this place has come all this way to show you around. Quit gettin' yourselves lost and follow me!" exclaimed Camberley, giving a wave as he looked back at Felt and the others who had been left behind.

The last of the Three Idiots—the tiny Camberley—was indeed a regular visitor to the city of Flanders. He and Rachins frequently traveled to a certain district within the city, as it was only a half a day away.

And that district was precisely where Felt and her team were heading.

"But, man, never know where life's going to take ya. To think that I'd be bringing a knight and his mistress to the red-light district," Camberley said nonchalantly, his arms folded behind his head.

"…"

Hearing his declaration, Reinhard gave a strained smile, which amused Felt.

"…Lady Felt, what have I done to deserve that look?"

"Hm? Oh, nothin'. I just thought it was funny how the great knight among knights makes such an awkward expression whenever the red-light district is mentioned. Ironic, since I bet that face of yours would be very popular there, after all."

At Felt's impish grin showing her fang, Reinhard merely kept his silence with a world-weary sigh.

They were taken by Camberley to a section of Flanders that was classified as a nightlife district—commonly known as the red-light district. The streets were full of lasciviously dressed women, and men who ogled and scoffed at them.

In a nutshell, the red-light district was a district of brothels, interspersed with scenes of customers who desired such services and the prostitutes who catered to their needs, interacting in front of their shops.

Fire Time had already ended, and Water Time was about to begin. As the full-blown night approached, the streets of the red-light district were filled with the glimmering light of crystal lamps. Men intoxicated with the decadent, out-of-this-world magical ambience were lured to bed for a single night's dream.

However, it was not only the male clients who were dreaming in the red-light district tonight.

Idly, Reinhard murmured, "I often wondered why Camberley and the rest frequently vanished off to Flanders."

"Well, that's just not bein' very observant," Felt retorted. "Since Gaston never went with them, you can easily imagine what they would be coming here to do. But still…"

"—?"

The well-mannered Reinhard seemed oblivious to it, but Felt was already getting sick of all of the intense stares being directed at them.

Many of the gazes directed at Reinhard were by those same women who were the stars of the red-light district. Every day, these women captivated many men with their beauty, but at Reinhard's appearance, suddenly their positions had been reversed.

The sight of Reinhard's leisurely stride, taking in the atmosphere as he went, seemed to have an allure that made it difficult for the veteran night flowers to take their eyes off him. And because he was standing beside Felt with even greater vigilance than usual, the reproachful glances directed at her were also quite intense.

On rare occasions, Felt also seemed to catch the eye of men who had come to find a lover. For this, however, she had a simple response.

“Grrrrrrr,” she growled.

When she poured her disgust and enmity into her glares, that was enough to scare most of them away. But as there was no real harm beyond making Reinhard a little uncomfortable, he had no choice but to put up with it.

With Reinhard in such a complicated state, Felt left Camberley to lead the way and headed towards the interior of the red-light district. After all, they hadn’t come to this street for fun.

“But is the leader of an organization like the Black Silver Coin really in the red-light district?”

Camberley scoffed. “You don’t get it, do you, Miss? In any town, it’s a given that the big movers in the underworld take charge of the upkeep of the brothels. The Flower Prison Garden is just the one in charge of this red-light district, that’s all.”

And this Flower Prison Garden that Camberley talks about is one of the Big Three, just like the Black Silver Coin, huh.

Although she was still a bit incredulous at this explanation, Felt had no choice but to follow the guidance of Camberley for now. After all, he was a frequent visitor and knew his way around. In fact, his boasts about being a regular here were seemingly not lies, as he was often approached by prostitutes on the street.

“You’re a dwarf, aren’t you? No offense, but can you even satisfy a partner?”

“Of course. It all depends on your technique. They don’t call me the playboy of the red-light district for nothin’.”

“And…you want them to call you that?” Felt was taken aback when the boastful Camberley responded in such a way, his small nose raised with pride.

Reinhard, meanwhile, remained silent with a difficult expression on his face. “You sure know a lot, Lady Felt. In the slums, did you…”

“Even in the royal capital, brothels exist. When I was a kid, the prostitutes used to give me food and their kindness. Though…it got harder to stay close with them as I grew older.”

Even if the women in the brothel had no intention of doing so, the shop owners carried suspicious glints in their eyes for fresh meat. If the prostitutes who had treated her well there had not secretly told her of the unspoken danger she faced, she might have been forced to join their ranks. In that sense, the red-light district of Flanders was much more well-ordered. In the royal capital, perhaps precisely because the leadership was too concerned with appearances to ever get their hands dirty, they kept turning a blind eye to it, and lawlessness was allowed to reign there.

“I see. If so, I am glad to hear it,” Reinhard replied, appearing relieved at her response.

What the hell was he thinkin’ to make him feel relieved? thought Felt.

“We’re here,” Camberley said after coming to a stop, before any further conclusions could be drawn. “This is where the proprietress of the Flower Prison Garden sets up shop.”

The sight that greeted Felt and her friends was the most luxurious brothel at the far end of the red-light district. Even from the shop’s interior, you could tell that it was of a different class from the other brothels from the stately arrangement of its alluring exterior.

Although the woman in question could not be seen from the outside, it was possible to perceive the presence of the kind of wicked charm that could easily seduce and beguile. A strong man stood guard in front of the shop, on the lookout for tactless people who might be drawn to it.

“…Right. This is actually pretty impressive,” commented Felt. “Shall we just go straight on in?”

“We are uninvited guests,” replied Reinhard cautiously, apparently hoping to dull Felt’s enthusiasm. “Since we are unlikely to receive a warm welcome, we should be careful…”

But their conversation was interrupted in the next moment by a voice that came between them.

“Wh-…wh-wh-what? Y-Y-You are! How can you be here?!” The cracked voice was trembling with surprise, anger, and inexplicably a certain degree of joy as well. It was high-pitched, partly because it had cracked, but that slight heaviness of the voice was certainly that of a man.

While a man’s voice ringing out in the street wasn’t exactly welcomed in the red-light district, what was even more undesirable was the action that immediately followed it.

“…”

At his sudden shout, Felt turned to see the man—or rather, dwarf—who had appeared at the entrance to the brothel. The figure was roughly the same height as Camberley, with a sharp countenance and an outstretched finger thrust in their direction. Felt saw a faint light concentrate on his outstretched fingertips, distorting the air around them. It was at that moment that she realized he was using magic.

“Lady Felt!” cried Reinhard from her side, moving quickly to place himself between her and the threat. Then, just as the dwarf man was blocked from Felt’s view, a light exploded.

And with that, the air of the red-light district of Flanders rang out with a cacophony of panicked screams and shouts of rage.

7

The moment the light exploded, Felt’s eardrums were assaulted by screams and hollers from all around. Still crouched where she had ducked to avoid the blast, she clicked her tongue in irritation.

“What the hell just happened?”

Straining her eyes in the twinkling white light, all she could see was an array of confused, fleeing figures with their heads in their hands—all men who had come to the red-light district to buy a dream for a night.

In the confusion that erupted from the sudden burst of light, sending men scattering in the illuminated streets, the prostitutes who resided here remained unfazed. These were women for whom sensual pleasures were tools of the trade, and trouble was common—none of them even batted an eye.

Some dropped down on all fours, some ran into the shop, and some skillfully used nearby men as shields. In this respect, Felt saw obvious differences between the sexes in their ability to comprehend and react to sudden dangerous situations.

In fact, Felt would also like to praise herself for handling the situation much more admirably than her companion Camberley, who simply stood stock-still as if waiting to be bowled over. However, her achievements faded when compared to Reinhard, who had the source of light grasped in the palm of his hand, shielding her from possible danger. “Are you alright, my lady?”

Felt looked up at the red-haired knight standing before her. “Yeah, I’m fine. Seems like you’ve learned your lesson from the Tometo Festival,” she said with a smirk, referring to the way he’d overreacted at the harmless tometo in the past.

Reinhard let out a wry smile, but despite his apparent humility, that movement was by far the fastest Felt had ever seen him perform. That scene must have been that shocking to him.

“Excuse me, my lady, please wait here for a moment,” he said, and upon confirming Felt’s safety, his figure instantly blurred.

In the blink of an eye, the knight appeared ten meters away and leapt at the dwarf at the entrance to the brothel—the culprit behind the magical attack.

The small man gawked at his frightening speed. “Wai-, what? Ah! W-Wait! I haven’t done anyth—”

“I’m sorry, but you made the first move. So I’m going to have to take you down,” Reinhard informed him in a cold voice he had never used with Felt.

“Gunu! That’s true, but… Ei! Then at least!”

Seeing Reinhard’s indifference to his pleas, the small man’s face reddened and he thrust both hands out toward Reinhard. A moment later, powerful mana swirled around his hands, attempting to warp the natural order of the world…

“Huh? Wait, what the… My mana’s formation is unraveling… Aahhhh!”

With the desired effect not taking place, Reinhard knocked the bewildered man to the ground. As he was even shorter than Felt, it looked to all the world like an adult bullying a child.

Even so, Reinhard mercilessly twisted the small man’s arm further.

“Ouch! Ouch, ouch, ouch! Wait, wait, wait, it’ll break! It’s going to break!”

“In that case, I would rather you stopped your vain attempts at resistance. The fact that you attempted harm upon my esteemed lady will not change, but I still have no desire to hurt you.”

“You think I’m going to believe you when you’ve got me pinned by the elbow, neck and wrist?! In the first place, what just happened with my mana…I see! You have an Excess Mana Circulation Constitution …?!”

“…”

Reinhard was taken aback by the odd, complex terminology coming from the small man while his arms were locked. Taking note of his reaction, Felt butted in. “Hey, let’s hear him out,” she said. “Just keep him restrained for now, Reinhard. He didn’t actually hurt anyone, right?”

“True, and I’m sure things will settle down momentarily as his spell was just a cheap parlor trick.”

This earned a slightly bitter scowl from Felt. “Coming from you, I’m sure it was ‘just a parlor trick’, but let’s not say that right to his face, huh?”

From Reinhard's perspective, it was true that anyone with less mana or strength than him may look like vermin, but even vermin had their own pride.

But at Felt's rebuke, he shook his head. "Excuse me, my lady, but I did mean 'parlor trick' in the sense that it is a common tactic designed to confuse and deceive. There was no killing intent behind that spell just now."

"You mean that glowing light was just a scare tactic?"

"Yes, my lady. But that doesn't mean I can ignore the act of malice committed in your vicinity…"

Satisfied with Reinhard's explanation, Felt nodded in acceptance. With her assent, the Sword Saint looked down at the back of the small man's head, ready to hold him responsible for his reckless action.

"Yeah, that's right! Don't let him get away with it, Reinhard! Make that ungrateful bastard sorry he ever woke up this morning! Go get him!!"

The one yelling in their direction so assertively was Camberley, who had finally managed to come to his senses in the wake of the chaos.

Despite having been like a scarecrow during the initial attack, he seemed to have recovered completely. Even so, Felt couldn't approve of his jumping straight into the conflict only to act like a petty small-time villain. She then noticed something. "Hey, Camberley. You just called this guy an 'ungrateful bastard.' So I take it you know him?"

"Hmm? Oh, yeah, I know him. You're real sharp, Miss," Camberley replied with a sour expression as he crossed his arms. "I think it was, hmm…about ten days ago. I saw this guy wandering around town, penniless. And we're both dwarves, right? I thought, hey, this is probably some kind of fate, you know? So I got this good-for-nothing set up with a sweet job. And then, look at how he acts, after all I did! Can you believe that?"

Clearly harboring a grudge, the small man scowled relentlessly at the sour-faced Camberley. “I was only penniless in the first place because you got me drunk till I passed out and took money from my pocket to pay for the drinks! And after all that, you tricked me and abandoned me here in the red-light district!”

As to which side of the argument was more credible, there seemed to be no need for debate—this was a can of worms Felt thought she was better off simply not opening.

“In other words, it was Camberley you were after, not me?” Felt ventured.

“Naturally—I have no idea who you are. Although it is of course my fault for surprising you like that. It was unmannerly of me…”

“And there you have it,” said Felt, idly rubbing the back of her neck, as she saw no need for further punishment toward someone so meek and honest. “Let him go, Reinhard.”

Reinhard gave a quick utterance of “My lady,” in assent and released the small man’s arm.

The attitude of the lord and her retainer astonished both Camberley and the small man.

“Wha… You’re going to let me go?”

“Yeah, man! What’s with you two? Didn’t you hear what I said? I’m telling you—he’s a bad guy!”

“You’re the one who’s clearly bad here. I actually feel sorry for this guy,” Felt snapped at her errant retainer, indicating the small man as he got to his feet.

Felt sympathized with the small man. He was extorted by Camberley and offered a job he did not want in the red-light district. His resentment had been building ever since, so it’s no wonder that he lost his cool the minute Camberley appeared in front of him.

“But what’s done is done. You caused all this mess, so what do you plan to do about it?”

Although he had escaped a severe punishment from Reinhard, the fact that he had been a nuisance to the people of the red-light district had not changed. Naturally, it had probably had an impact on the business of the surrounding brothels, too.

“Ugh…! I-I understand. I, too, am an adult who can take responsibility for my actions. I’ll fix the mess I’ve caused here somehow and return the town to its usual atmosphere of deplorable hedonistic lust and depravity!”

“Would you mind your tongue? What a rude person, you are,” came a lilting voice from within the brothel.

“Wha-!”

The boisterous enthusiasm of the small man was snuffed out in an instant. It was the sight of the figure standing in the entrance to the brothel—the owner of such a sweet voice—that stopped him in his tracks.

“…Wow.” When Felt turned around and saw the person, she couldn’t help but let out an unconscious murmur of stunned appreciation.

The character that had appeared was a stunning young woman, suffused in a sinfully enticing aura and possessed of an unparalleled beauty. She wore with utter confidence in her lush, alluring body, a dress that boldly exposed her shoulders, chest, and back. The combination of smells that wafted from the smoking pipe in her mouth and the perfume she wore felt like poison to Felt, with her good sense of smell. She felt that smelling it for too long would make her brain melt.

Indifferent to Felt’s reaction, the beautiful woman gently placed her hand on the petrified small man’s shoulder and said, “Mimosa came to me with tears in her eyes, saying that her teacher had caused a commotion on the street.”

“I-I’m sorry… I have no excuse. I apologize.”

“My, how obedient,” she cooed.

Tilting her head flirtatiously, the beautiful woman raised a shapely eyebrow at the small, meek man. Then, inhaling deep from her pipe, she blew a puff of purple smoke into the near-evening sky and said, “Girls, I will buy you two candles. Go ahead and call all your guests to your bedchambers.”

Although she did not raise her voice at all and gave off an air of nonchalance, the reaction from the prostitutes standing nearby was dramatic.

One by one, they got hold of the men who had been so shamelessly fleeing a moment before. Each of the prostitutes used the means at her disposal, whether a skillful play of words or the equally skillful application of feminine wiles, to coax each man back into the brothel, encountering minimal resistance along the way.

In a matter of seconds, every male customer involved in the commotion had been sucked into the brothel.

“Being too eager to get a sale will get you hated…at least, from what I’ve heard,” commented Felt.

“Surely, that applies to flowers only capable of providing wilted dreams. Unfortunately, I’ve made it a rule in my garden to pluck off any such flowers of such low quality.”

“Is that so?” said Felt with a begrudging smirk at the deftness with which this impressive person had nipped the commotion in the bud. “Well, I shouldn’t be surprised that the woman managing a place like the Flower Prison Garden would be so well-spoken.”

At these words, her red lips relaxed, and she gave a respectful bow. “The feeling is mutual.” Then, with a magical smile that even the same sex would be charmed by… “It is an honor to meet you, Lady Felt. It is truly a privilege to meet one of the five who are now in the most exalted positions in the Kingdom of Lugunica.”

By exchanging their identities this way, they had each played their first card.

After being guided into a VIP room at the back of the brothel, Felt's eyes widened at the softness of the sofa. She had been steadily acclimating to the disparity in living standards since her time in the slums—first at the Astrea's mansion in the capital, and then at the one in Hakuchuri. But now all her hard work had been undone.

The sensation of her hips sinking, her back supported, and the back of her head enveloped—this is the devil's chair. If it were to become Felt's office chair, there would be no chance of her ever being able to read or study again. This is definitely the type of sofa that can corrupt people, she thought.

"As expected, there's no expenses spared when it comes to the VIP room of a high-class brothel."

"Lady Felt, please don't accidentally fall asleep. This is the building of the Flower Prison Garden, and we are here to give our greetings."

"I know. I came a bit close, but I'm not going to fall asleep."

With a sour expression on her face, Felt defended herself against Reinhard's nagging. Unfortunately, the man waiting beside her had no notion of the sofa's power of corrupting people.

Nevertheless, Felt pulled herself together, understanding how problematic it could be to be too relaxed in semi-hostile territory.

The VIP room not only had the sofa but was filled with a large number of high-end-looking furnishings. It might be beneficial for them to be lectured on the principles of frugality, but then again, it was nothing compared to the somewhat poverty-stricken House Astrea.

While looking around such a splendidly decorated room, Felt—who had sunk deep into the sofa—turned the conversation to the small man standing in the entrance to the room. "So, are you going to keep me company in my spare time until the proprietress comes back?"

Upon closer look, he was a rather neat-looking figure. As a dwarf, he was half a head shorter than Felt, but his short limbs made him well-proportioned. Many of the dwarves looked young, and so—with no way of knowing their actual age—he gave off an air of an intelligent, handsome youth. His hair was grayish-brown and neck length, and he stood out with his rather pretentious dress code and oversized cloak.

Having already introduced themselves to each other on entering the brothel, they already knew his name.

"Mr. Ezzo Cadner, was it? Please excuse me earlier."

"N-No, I was at fault for that. Considering the position of the woman accompanying you, I'd say your attitude was justified. You have nothing to apologize for."

Reinhard apologized to him for bending his back and locking his arm, but Ezzo felt nothing but shame.

Placing a hand to his chin, he said, "Nevertheless, I didn't think I would get acquainted with a candidate for the royal selection like this. It annoys me, but I guess what that man said wasn't entirely untrue."

"Umm, I'm kind of scared to ask this, but what exactly did he say?"

"In short, all he said was that he was working for a great person. He didn't give me any specifics, but when I heard that someone like that was offering me a job, I was…I waaas…!"

"Seriously, Camberley is always troubling me."

Felt and Reinhard sighed in unison at the violently trembling Ezzo's testimony.

Camberley was not present on this occasion. Taking advantage of the proprietress' kindness, he had cunningly slipped into another brothel after the mess at the brothel's entrance had been cleared up.

Although he had fulfilled his duty when he led Felt to the brothel, he clearly had more energy to spare. However, it was interesting to note that the prostitutes' delight at being chosen by him was different from that of those they had chosen themselves for business. Perhaps his nickname as the red-light district's playboy was not as ridiculous as one might think.

"So you got led around by Camberley's words and that's how you ended up working in the red-light district. But if you're going in and out of the brothel owner's room, then she must be relying on you a lot."

"It's the result of a shortage in manpower and education. To begin with, being a guard in a brothel is not something that should be done using the noble power of magic. But despite that being the case, since it was introduced to me as a job, I thought that I shouldn't be so arrogant as to let my abilities weaken over time, possibly causing trouble for others."

"I see… How diligent. You seem so different from a certain someone I know."

In short, Ezzo had a tendency to take on responsibilities. Otherwise, he would have most likely run away as soon as he realized he had been introduced to a job he didn't want to do.

As he muttered, Ezzo searched for a compromise between his dissatisfaction with his circumstances and his sense of responsibility. As Felt's cheeks relaxed at such a sight, Reinhard also looked at him with a similar expression.

And so, it was while they were killing time in that fashion that a devilish beauty appeared and opened the door to the VIP room. "Apologies for keeping you waiting," she said. "It took me a while to fix my makeup."

The woman, who had changed into a more lascivious dress and shrouded herself in a new fragrance, was the proprietress of the Flower Prison Garden—Toto.

She looked at Felt, who had sunk deep into the sofa, and Reinhard next to her, with a beaming smile. "You are our special guests. So I have to be prepared when entertaining you, don't I?"

“Well, I’m the one who came to see you out of the blue. We’re lucky we didn’t get turned away at the entrance—I hear it’s hard to meet popular prostitutes in brothels.”

“Hmmm, that’s true. But I haven’t worked in the shop since I reached my current position, you see, so I’ve been surprisingly free… Today was a pleasant surprise!”

With a strong charm to her smile, Toto sat down in the chair in front of Felt. The way she crossed her long legs, and the exact angle of her smiling lips and eyes—everything had been done with purpose.

To come this far, every movement of Toto’s body had been subconsciously ingrained with the seductions of being a prostitute. Although she said she had not been working in the shop, her top-class abilities working as such had not diminished in the slightest.

“Is something the matter?”

“…Oh, it’s nothing. I like people who’ve lived a tough life. So I was just thinking that you and I might get on better than I thought.”

“…Oh my, to think you’re seducing me.”

Perhaps surprised by Felt’s response, Toto put her hand over her mouth and chuckled. Her gaze then shifted towards Ezzo, who was standing at the entrance. “Ah yes, I’d like to apologize for the impudence of our people. Although, knowing his character, I believe he has most likely already apologized and expressed his remorse…”

“Yeah, that’s right,” said Felt. “He got the message across—it was just an unfortunate misunderstanding.”

“No!!!” cried Ezzo. “There are definitely reasons to defend me, but for the most part, the situation was caused by my hasty decision and short temper. In light of that, I would like you to decide how you’ll treat me from now on.”

For better or for worse, Ezzo’s diligent attitude made Felt make an exasperated face as she poured out her words. “That’s such a troublesome thing to say…”

“Anyway, now that the initial rift between us has been filled…may I ask what I can do for you?” Toto inquired.

“…”

“It’s definitely no small matter for one of the candidates bearing the responsibility for the kingdom’s future to visit such a shady place. And even more so when they’re accompanied by the greatest knight of all time, the Sword Saint.”

Toto’s flirtatious glance turned to Reinhard. At her gaze, the red-haired knight looked towards Felt next to him—for confirmation as to whether he should speak up or not.

Felt let out a sigh and shifted in her seat, lifting her body back up from a sunken position. Then, she pulled an item from her pocket—an insignia—and showed it to Toto. The emblem with the dragon jewel inlaid in it was proof of eligibility to participate in the royal selection, and the emanating light from the dragon jewel, which only shone when held by a certain person, was proof of Felt’s position as a candidate.

“I don’t like the method of tryin’ to sound each other out, so I’m going to be straight with you. As you said, I’m one of the candidates for the royal selection. And as a result, I’m doing various things over here in Reinhard’s domain. Today was just a courtesy call to say hello.”

“…You don’t really like playing by the book, do you? But even then, ‘various things’, huh?” Toto tilted her head suggestively, rolling her pipe between her fingers.

It was clear from the way she said ‘various’ that she was suspicious of Felt, but that was exactly the kind of thing Felt came to dispel. “I told you, didn’t I? I still have my hands full with this domain. That’s why…”

“‘That’s why’?”

“Don’t get me involved in your mess. I ain’t interested.”

"…"

Felt made it clear she had no connection to the incident that had caused such a stir in Flanders, and Toto's eyelids fluttered ever so slightly at the declaration. She most likely had her own plans, but Felt wasn't someone who'd act according to another's plans.

When she had declared this, Felt pointed to Reinhard next to her and said, "To begin with, if I really wanted to destroy you, I could have just sent Reinhard after you. Don't you agree?"

"If you say it like that, then I have nothing to say in reply—I am just a simple brothel owner."

It may have sounded absurd, but Toto's words did not sound like a disagreement.

In fact, if one had heard the rumors about Reinhard, then they would know it would be ridiculous to have him as an enemy and back off. Even more so if they knew that the rumors didn't do him justice.

And that's exactly what Felt had done, having been the one to decide against his participation in the Tometo festival.

"Ummm, Lady Felt, what's the matter? You seem rather upset."

"It's nothing. I'm just angry at myself for something that has nothing to do with this. You don't have to worry about it. I mean, don't."

"Lady Felt, I don't mean to be presumptuous, but I think you should concentrate more on this situation…"

"Shut up! Whose fault is it that you think it is? You, you bastard!" Having been scolded by the man in question, Felt lost her temper and bared her teeth.

Reinhard was bewildered. "I don't understand…"

Toto narrowed her eyes at the exchange between the mistress and her servant. "…You two have an interesting relationship. It doesn't look like a normal mistress-servant relationship.”

“Sorry about this. I’m still in the process of learning what ‘normal’ is.”

“It is an honor to hear you say so… However, I beg you not to take what Lady Felt just said lightly.” After letting out a small smile, Reinhard turned towards Toto, his face now void of any such thing. Although he didn’t seem particularly conscious of it, the pressure of his gaze was so strong that any normal person may very well hyperventilate just by seeing it.

The proprietress of the Flower Prison Garden, however, paid no mind to that level of gaze. “Yes, of course. It is self-evident that Lady Felt’s opinion is reasonable… Besides, it’s not like she doesn’t recognize our value… Right?”

“Talking about whether or not I recognize someone’s value makes me sound like a snob. But everything that runs well has a reason behind it, and I’m not childish enough to bring my personal likes and dislikes into the mix.”

Waving her outstretched hands, Felt expressed her lack of hostility towards Toto.

As she mentioned earlier, Felt didn’t hate Toto. In fact, if their relationship persisted long enough, she was certain she’d come to like her—but only if it persisted long enough, that is.

Reading Felt’s inner thoughts, Toto smiled softly. “Well then, I will do my best when entertaining you in order to make that happen.”

“In that case, I’ll make sure to inform you in advance next time, so make sure you have some good snacks ready. That would be easier for you, wouldn’t it?”

“As you wish. In fact, if you wish, we can even entertain you with our expert services… Although I am a little afraid of the Sword Saint.”

Despite the assessment, Reinhard’s expression did not alter. He was probably used to being described as ‘scary’.

Toto exhaled a cloud of purple smoke. “Oh kind and beautiful lord. In your presence, the flowers that make their living by selling dreams may end up caught in a dream themselves. So cruel, is it not?”

“—Uhh.” Struck so unexpectedly, Reinhard choked on his words and turned his blue eyes, filled with bewilderment, towards Felt. They seemed to be asking for help.

Felt flashed Toto a broad smile. “As I thought, I think we’ll get along just fine.”

9

“My lady, this may not be something I should say as a knight, but…”

“Oh, what is it? Say it.”

“…I don’t think I’m very good at dealing with the lady we just met.”

“Hahahahah, I thought so! You were totally losin’ your nerve, especially at the end there! It was satisfying seeing something as rare as that, though,” Felt replied, slapping her knees in good humor.

Having safely finished talking with Toto, Felt was about to leave the Flower Prison Garden’s brothel. Reinhard seemed to have been so effectively brought down a peg by Toto that he remained silent even when Felt burst into laughter. “She was complimenting you by sayin’ that all the prostitutes would fall for you, ya know? You should be happy, my dear Reinhard.”

“The sentiment itself is nice, but I also have my position to think about. It’s just troubling for me.”

“What? Are you looking down on prostitutes?”

As a person who had been taken care of by several prostitutes during her days in the slums, Felt was not amused by Reinhard’s words. But after she had snapped at him, he shook his head.

"You've got it wrong. It's not because it's the relationship between a knight and a…woman from a brothel. It's because I come from a family of Sword Saints and am the current owner of the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint."

"…"

Lowering his eyebrows, Reinhard solemnly explained his position. "The Divine Protection of the Sword Saint is a divine protection that has only existed in the bloodline of the Astrea family for generations. There's a possibility of it manifesting itself even in indirect descendants. Therefore, I can't do anything carelessly."

Felt narrowed her eyes at his story and responded only with a short "Is that so." I see, the more I ask, the more I realize that he is seated in a troublesome position. According to the story, Reinhard was also forbidden to travel outside the country—he was treated more like a disaster than a human.

"Tch…" Clicking her tongue in irritation, Felt decided not to delve into the subject further and walked out of the brothel. As they had separated from Toto in the VIP room, their guide up to this point was someone else.

The figure opened his hands, gave an exaggerated sigh, and looked back at the two of them. "Well then, we've reached the entrance. This is the best brothel in the red-light district. If a man and a woman were to quarrel here, it would damage the name of the establishment," Ezzo said, flipping his cloak in an exaggerated manner.

It was all very dramatic, but Felt shrugged her shoulders at his concern and said, "Hurting the name of the establishment? Are those words really comin' from a man who cast magic on the street?"

"Ugh! Well… Yes… As you said…"

"Casting magic with that many people around, I guess that half-elf lady was also rather guilty." Folding her arms in front of the mumbling Ezzo, Felt recalled an event from a few months ago.

That half-elf Emilia's sure done some pretty reckless things while pursuing me after I stole her royal insignia, Felt thought to herself. Shooting magic in the street was just one such example.

Looking back, it was that request that had brought her to where she was today. Fate is such a strange thing—to think that I am now competin' with the very same Emilia in the royal selection.

"Even so, it was quite an interesting discussion. I would say it was the second most significant event for me since I started working in the red-light district."

"Now that you mention it—what kind of work do you do? Are you really a guard?"

Felt compared Ezzo with the strong-built gatekeeper standing at the gate in her head. Of course, Ezzo's specialty was probably not in hand-to-hand combat, so his appearance may not be a correct gauge of his ability.

"There are definitely those who judge people by their appearance. Even I can recall meeting some."

"Of course, there is no end to such shallow people. But they soon realized that I was a man who should not be messed with. Hahahah, Ha-Ha-ha-ha!" Ezzo was smiling broadly, puffing up his small body to its fullest, as though he was very confident in his magic skills. It was great that he did not mull over his defeat against Reinhard. As proof of that, he pointed a finger at him and said, "You, too, mustn't get carried away by a single victory. Let me make this clear —I wasn't serious and I still have a lot of room to grow. Besides, the higher the wall, the more it is worth climbing."

"—. I see. I'll bear that in mind, Sir Ezzo."

Without the slightest hint of false bravado, Ezzo Cadner spoke of his future as though it was a given. Reinhard straightened his posture at Ezzo's admirable attitude, and finally let out a faint smile.

As she watched, Felt grinned and folded her hands behind her head. "Well I'm sure if you're an actual magic user, there're a bunch of employers who'd want you. Toto's probably feelin' like she won the lottery, too."

"Though I don't enjoy being treated like an object, I do agree with you. But perhaps the reason behind Miss Toto's positive attitude to my employment was due to the identity of the person who introduced me. She must have known of your relationship with my detestable kin."

"You mean she knew that Camberley and I were friends? Does that mean that it was indirectly thanks to us that you were hired there?"

"I'm merely saying that it's possible. However, there is no doubt that I would never have visited the red-light district without that person. Ugh, I get angry just thinking about it." Ezzo's fingers trembled as his anger rekindled.

"All the unscrupulous ones, whether the people of my race or affiliation, always block my way…! Seriously! Such insolent people…!"

"You seem to have got a lot bottled up inside. Do your best."

Ezzo was turning purple from anger as he talked about Camberley and various other things all mushed together. Felt sympathized with this attitude, but—

"—Ma'am, you forgot something."

The voice that interrupted her came from a woman who had appeared at the entrance to the brothel.

She was around 20 years old, wearing a dress that was not too revealing but clearly showed off the curves of her body. She looked rather innocent for a woman working in the red-light district, and her somewhat timid eyes had the kind of feel to them that tickled men's hearts.

"Hmm, it's you, Mimosa. Has Mistress Toto sent you here?"

"Yes, Teacher. She told me to give this to our guest."

The woman called Mimosa gave her greetings to Ezzo and then turned to Felt. She then gently presented something wrapped in a white cloth to Felt. What was hidden inside was—

“Oh, the insignia. My bad, I forgot.”

“Lady Felt? Do you understand just how important that item is…”

“I know, I know, I’m sorry. It was sticking into my butt when I was sittin’ on the sofa.” Scratching her head, Felt accepted the insignia that Mimosa brought her. While putting it back in her pocket, she suddenly glanced between Mimosa and Ezzo. “Now that ya mention it, you called him Teacher, is that what you would usually call a guard?”

“No, Ma’am. Teacher teaches me how to read and write, and how to do calculations. That’s why I call him Teacher.”

“Reading, writing, and calculations… Is that also a guard’s job?”

As Felt seemed perplexed by their story, Ezzo put a hand to his chest and explained himself. “I’m hired as a guard, but this area is already well-regulated by the Flower Prison Garden. At the very least, I’ve not really come across any problems since I started working here. I was uncomfortable with accepting so much money despite that, so I started doing this to keep myself busy.”

“Thanks to Teacher, some of us girls can read now. Everyone is grateful to him.”

In contrast to the boastful Ezzo, Mimosa’s look of respect was genuine. Seeing this, Felt nodded to herself. Ezzo mentioned earlier that his meeting with Felt and the others was the second most meaningful thing that had come out of his arrival in the red-light district. The first and most meaningful thing was clear from his face and lively voice.

Ezzo’s logical nature was very obvious. The presence of his pupils must have been very encouraging.

“How admirable. Keep up the good work, Teacher. It definitely suits you.”

“It is the duty of a good person to teach and guide well. It’s also my vocation.”

“Heh, you’re right… Well then, we’ll be on our way.”

Raising her hand, Felt, together with Reinhard, said their goodbyes to Ezzo and the others. But Ezzo suddenly stretched out a hand. “Wait, wait, wait,” he said. “What about my kin who was with you? Are you leaving him behind?”

“Yeah, I’m not waiting for two candles worth of time. I’ve done my job and he’ll probably go back on his own even if I leave him be.”

Toto offered two candles for the disturbance caused by Ezzo. A candle in the red-light district was a sign that a customer had bought the time to be spent with a prostitute. The prostitute will show the customer a dream until the candles burn out. At most, only one candle’s worth of time had passed by.

“Speaking of which, Teacher. Mistress Toto said that she was going to pay for tonight’s candle out of your stipend.”

“What…! No, that was certainly my fault. But the payment for that ancient document is…”

Shocked by Mimosa’s words, Ezzo had paid the price for his temper. This time, Felt and Reinhard waved and finally took their leave of the Flower Prison Garden.

“They were interesting people, weren’t they?”

“You’ve recovered very well for someone who said he was bad with them. Well, my impression is still the same. The Flower Prison Garden’s people aren’t as hostile as I thought they were. They even returned my insignia to me.”

Felt and Reinhard walked side by side as night approached the dimly-lit, red-light district. Smiling, Felt lightly tapped her pocket.

At this gesture, Reinhard looked a little surprised. “Did you forget your insignia on purpose?”

“I was just wondering what they would do. I didn’t think that everything they said in that room showed their real intentions. So I figured I’d test them a little.”

To prove that it had not been switched, Felt moved her hand to the insignia in her pocket. A faint glow leaked through her clothing.

Now either they’ll think I’m some kinda moron or be more alert. Felt quietly assessed how her opponent would view her after her little stunt. Well, either is fine.

“After all, they are the ones who started the fight. Besides, we did our part to show respect by comin’ here today. They won’t be stirrin’ shit up anytime soon. Let’s move on. Next up is…”

“It’s an organization called The Balance that runs the gambling quarter. This place also requires special attention, for reasons different from the red-light district. The Balance, along with the Black Silver Coin and the Flower Prison Garden, also don’t have a very good reputation. Please take extra care not to leave my side.”

“Yeah, yeah. As Sir Reinhard commandsss.” Felt responded in a light tone, but Reinhard’s eyes were full of worry. He doesn’t seem any more nervous or anxious than usual, but I wonder if he’s even had a chance to rest at all since he came to Flanders, she thought. “You look as though you’re gonna collapse from worry any moment now.”

At Felt’s tone, which seemed almost like someone else’s entirely, Reinhard gave the biggest smile he could muster.

10

The gambling quarter was another name for the eastern part of the city of Flanders, a section of the city where gambling activities were permitted. In the first place, there were no strict laws on gambling in the Kingdom of Lugunica, but such activities were often associated with crime and violence. Before legalizing it became possible, the problem lay with improving the environment it was in. As a result, such problems were addressed by an organizational deterrent that outweighed violence committed by individuals—an organization to operate the gambling dens.

Licenses for gambling activities were not issued by the Kingdom, but by the organizations in charge of the gambling dens in each city. And in the five great cities of the Kingdom of Lugunica, it was always The Balance in charge of managing these gambling establishments—no matter the size or form these places manifested.

In this city, too, The Balance controlled the gambling quarter. Together with the Flower Prison Garden, which controlled the red-light district, and the Black Silver Coin, which controlled the rest, they made up the Big Three.

Felt had decided to go and give her greetings to the representative of The Balance.

“Unfortunately, the Boss says he won’t see anyone without an appointment.”

The large man had a face like a crushed frog and gave a bow to Felt as he spoke.

The place was a large one-story building known as the Grand Casino in the gambling quarter. Despite it being the time of day when night began to draw in and the temperature began to cool, the atmosphere in the area was getting rather heated. With its business hours reaching peak times, the traffic coming in and out of the gambling den had increased enormously. Similar to the red-light district, the places that came alive at night were packed with people, who could be seen cheering and screaming here and there as they played various games.

In the midst of all this, Felt and her companion walked proudly through this gambling frenzy to visit the leader of The Balance, without any prior appointment. So, it was no wonder that they stuck out like a sore thumb.

“…”

Slowly, a group of men with a solemn presence surrounded Felt and Reinhard. A man in front of them—who introduced himself as Mozolite—was silent, waiting for them to speak first.

So Felt scratched her gold hair roughly. “I know, I know. You don’t have to be so tense. I’m not gonna do anything… Although…”

Felt was about to add ‘I’d welcome a fight if you’re gonna turn me away,’ but Reinhard cut her off as he took up position in front of her. He stared Mozolite down, with a somewhat puzzled Felt behind him. “I understand that this is an abrupt visit. But if you have a representative present, could they please make some time for us? This person here is…”

“A royal selection candidate. The Boss knows that, too. He still refuses to see you.”

“…”

Interrupting Reinhard’s words, Mozolite refused to yield. Being aware of Felt’s identity, he must also know that the one in front of him was the Sword Saint. He certainly had some nerve.

Looking at Mozolite’s expressionless face, a tattoo of scales could be seen on his eyeballs—rumor had it that all members of The Balance were required to have a tattoo of scales on a visible part of their bodies. In fact, they could see tattoos on every single one of the men surrounding them, whether it was on their arms, necks, or other parts of their bodies. It did seem to be a special exception to have them on their eyeballs, however, for better or for worse. That alone just goes to show Mozolite’s loyalty to the organization.

“Reinhard, stop it. You’re the one who said we won’t be welcomed here because we didn’t make any appointments beforehand.”

“That’s true, but is that fine with you, my lady?”

“We came to say hello. While we’ve been turned away, the fact that I’ve come by has already been noted. So, it’s not that bad of a deal. You’ll pass my words to him, won’t you?”

Felt shrugged her shoulders while Mozolite raised his eyebrows in slight surprise.

"Yeah… Your message has been delivered, together with the fact that you greeted the red-light district's proprietress before the Boss."

"Don't tell me that's the reason he's being difficult. If I'd done it the other way round, would it have been the proprietress who refused to see me?" Felt's shoulders slumped in disappointment. The first thing that comes to mind is the fact that the two organizations are in balance.

The power of each organization was kept in a perpetual balance, but the cooperation between the Big Three was on thin ice. She'd heard enough about this from Old Man Rom and Rachins beforehand. The disagreement between Toto and Manfred, the man in charge of The Balance, was also a well-known story.

"…"

Seeing as Mozolite was silent on the matter, Felt felt that her guess might not be far off the mark. However, her intuition kept her from wanting to continue the conversation. The Balance knew that I was here. Then we're done.

"I'll make sure to bring a gift and make an appointment first next time. Sorry to interrupt your business."

With that said, Felt decided to end the conversation early. Reinhard was surprised at how easily she withdrew and quickly followed her as she left. Following Mozolite's gaze, the men around them also made way for them.

Felt quickly made her way through the crowd and headed towards the exit. "That place was no good. It smelled a lot more sinister than the red-light district."

Reinhard, who walked beside her, made a strange face at Felt's mutterings.

"A more sinister smell?" he asked.

Surprisingly, Reinhard did not have a nose for danger. There was no one who could make him feel endangered in a literal sense, so it was not surprising that he lacked the ability for it. But more than just the threat to one's own life, a sense of danger could account for the harm to others, their property, or a multitude of other things.

This exact sense was what alerted Felt to the unique and dangerous scent of the gambling quarter.

"It's not like I'm too scared or anythin', I just got a bad feeling about this place. Either way, this guy's gotta be the most uncooperative one so far."

"I trust your intuition, my lady, and I agree with you in that they were not the most cooperative." Reinhard then looked around alongside Felt, who had stopped in her tracks. Around him in the Grand Casino were various spaces for gambling, and everywhere seemed to be packed. There was a certain madness in the eyes of customers who sat here drinking with women at their beck and call. This type of excitement in the air was not something Reinhard was accustomed to, and he became rather timid.

Looking at his face, a sense of mischief began to grow in Felt's heart.

From the standpoint of someone usually subjected to Reinhard's nagging, it was a nice surprise that his weaknesses had been exposed in both the red-light district and gambling quarter in rapid succession.

"I'd never thought the day would come when I'd enjoy seein' that face of yours…"

"I'm honored to hear that, but I don't think it was a very pleasant process."

"Isn't that just your imagination? Besides, it'd be a shame to leave so soon; let's take a look around."

Fortunately, they had already put quite a distance between themselves and The Balance, including Mozolite. Of course, there were members of the group dotted about the place, but the sinister scent seemed to have weakened somewhat.

At Felt's smile, Reinhard hesitated for a moment before nodding, and together they decided to take a quick tour of the Grand Casino.

Gambling here still mainly involved using cards that followed a basic set of rules. Some of the games were unfamiliar to Felt, but while watching others play, she was able to get a vague idea of what was going on. Once she knew how to play, she observed wins and losses, and the strategies involved. Having done all that, she discovered that gambling was surprisingly fun to watch.

One, in particular, caught Felt's eye. "Oh, there's a Shatranj board. Can you make a bet on that, too?"

Felt's gaze fell on a game being played on the edge of the Grand Casino, with a Shatranj board in between the two players. From the looks of it, there was no difference from the Shatranj board she knew, and compared to the other gambling games, it seemed far quieter and more modest. However, there was definitely a kind of quiet intensity there.

"…"

The two men locked in battle at this board wore serious expressions filled with a sense of urgency, each looking as though they were about to reach out and cut each other. The spectators surrounding the two also exuded a different sort of atmosphere compared to the rest of the crowds there.

"I guess that means there are one-on-one bets like that too."

"Your Ladyship also studied Shatranj, did you not? What do you think of those two?"

"Ah, it's impossible for me. I'm no match for them. The way they use their heads is very different from how I use mine. The me right now wouldn't be able to do anything. I'm certain I'd lose." Shrugging her shoulders, Felt honestly raised a white flag. Hearing such a blunt declaration of defeat, Reinhard let out a small chuckle.

"What are you chucklin' about over there? You aren't supposed to be happy if I lose, right?"

“That’s true,” Reinhard said. “I was surprised when you declared there will be times we will lose, after meeting with Mr. Doltero. But just as I am capable of gaining new perspectives, I am also capable of noticing things about others.”

“Like what?”

“Your Ladyship said ‘the me right now’. That’s good enough for me.”

At Reinhard’s cheerful words, Felt pursed her lips and fell silent. Even though she was amused by his unusual weakness, she was not amused by the unexpected counterattack. With such feelings, Felt looked away. “Aaa, damn, I’m done with the tour! Come on, let’s head back to…hm?”

As she turned around and was about to head for the exit, she felt a hard sensation on the sole of her shoe. When she lifted her foot, she realized what she stepped on was a coin. “A fake coin… A coin used in this gambling den?” Felt muttered with some disappointment at the fake coin, which, for a moment, could be mistaken for a gold coin.

“Well, would ya look at that. It’s your lucky day, lil’ missy. Why not try your luck at a game?”

“Huh?”

The person who approached Felt with the object she found was one of the owners in charge of the gambling business. He was a tall, thin man with an unhealthy, sickly complexion. The game he was in charge of was a famous betting game called “Oka” in which players guessed numbers. There is a disk with holes and numbers on it that spins, before the owner throws a small ball, about the size of a fingertip, into the disk. The game is as simple as guessing which hole number on the disk the ball will fall into.

On a separate table from the disks was a table with numbers on which participants placed their bets. There was no upper limit to the number of participants, and the most interesting part about Oka was that it pits the owner against a large number of other participants.

"…"

With so many customers already at the table, there was no reason for them to bother bringing in Felt, who only had one coin. Felt's cheeks curved upwards at the pretense.

"Ha! A weird game with a lost coin. How fun. I'm in."

Sniffing, she took her place proudly in front of the man who had invited her to play. Staring at the numbers on the table, with the written choices from one to fifty, Felt challenged him to a match.

"Let's go."

In response to her enthusiasm, the man spun the disk. He tossed a small ball sharply in the opposite direction of the disk's rotation, which was so fast that the numbers appeared to melt into one another. When both the disk and the ball have momentum and the ball falls into a hole, that's the end of the game. So long as the disk and the ball are still spinning, the customer can place their bets on the table.

"Lady Felt, with that momentum, the place it's likely to fall is…"

"Hold it; I wouldn't be surprised if you could see the balls and the rotation of the disk and know where they will fall, so shut up. This is my game!"

"Wasn't it just supposed to have been a coin you found… Nevermind. Sorry, I'll keep my mouth shut."

Reinhard kept his mouth shut, but he didn't deny that he could see the spinning.

Either way, she put the matter to the back of her mind and stared at the disk. Then she glanced up at the man who, having thrown the ball, crossed his arms and gave her a snide smile.

"One or fifty…"

"…"

"But which one…ah, I don't know, so fifty!"

And, after much deliberation, Felt forcefully placed the coin on the fifty on the table. Immediately after, the betting period ended, and all that remained was to watch the fate of the disk and the ball. Slowly, the disk decreased in speed, and eventually, with a clatter, the hole that the ball fell into was…

"—! Oh, damn! It was one!"

"That's too bad, my lady. But it was a close game—you did narrow it down to two numbers. How did you manage that?"

With her prediction being off the mark, Felt held her head in frustration. As Reinhard's question hit her from the side, she cleared her throat and let out a, "Huh? I was torn between choosing the most auspicious number or the biggest number. If there's a choice, I gotta be number one or the biggest number there is; either way, the middle ain't for me."

"I see. I'll keep that in mind."

"Why're you so serious? There's no need to remember such things."

Pursing her lips at Reinhard's response, Felt left the table with a simple, "Oh well." It was also the etiquette of a gambling den to leave promptly after losing a game.

Watching Felt's gracious defeat, the customers around waved her off pleasantly. Though she couldn't deny the feeling that she had contributed to the gambling den after seeing the rest of the customer's enthusiasm to try and win in Felt's place.

"But I gotta say, even though I've fulfilled my goal of sending my greetings, things ain't going as smoothly as I'd hoped. Even if I say it's fine as long as I win in the end, I still need to get my edge back."

"…By the way, Lady Felt. How would you like to pay your greetings to the Black Silver Coin?"

“We got them real good before. That should be enough. I know it’s my fault for taking a detour, but it’s gettin’ dark already, so let’s head back to the mansion.”

The town of Hakuchuri, where Astrea Manor was located, was a few hours away from Flanders by dragon carriage. If we leave now, I wonder if we can make it to the mansion before daybreak, Felt wondered. “Nah, let’s stay here tonight. We can just return to the mansion during the day tomorrow.”

Unexpectedly, Reinhard shook his head at Felt’s suggestion.

“Haaa? Why? I admit it’s a little rushed, but it’s not too late, and with you around, walkin’ around at night shouldn’t be an issue. What’s the problem?”

“Well… I’m worried about your health if you stay up too late…”

“I’m going home.”

Felt asserted her thoughts strongly with her eyes at Reinhard, who she knew was telling a blatant lie. She continued pressuring Reinhard with her crimson-eyed stare to tell the truth, and after a few moments of endurance, he let out a sigh and said, “I will tell you tomorrow, I promise. So, will you please listen to me just for tonight?”

“Hmph, you pompous prick. All right, tomorrow, then. Since that’s decided, it’s time to find an inn. Let’s look for a place with good food!”

“Please rest assured, I have already found a place to stay.”

“You were plannin’ to stay the night from the get-go, weren’t you!”

He had indeed been planning something before coming to Flanders. Felt looked at Reinhard’s profile, trying to get a read on him, but somehow only caught a hint of relief and anticipation in his face, and stopped there.

“Well, I guess it’s fine.”

Unlike life in the slums, whatever Reinhard was up to would not directly affect Felt's life or death, nor would it humiliate her dignity.

To that extent, Felt placed her trust in her knight.

11

—Mozolite saw Felt and her companion off and then turned back to the Oka gambling parlor. "You okay with letting them leave like that, Boss?"

"It's fine. I just wanted to take a look at her for today. I also got them back for meeting with that vixen before me by messing with their luck at gambling," said the slender-faced man as he stood up from the dealer's seat at the table Felt had just left. "Besides, we got what we needed, didn't we?"

When a different person came into the gambling parlor to fill this seat, the slender-faced man brushed a hand over his own face as he calmly walked through the Grand Casino. And with that, his face came off. What appeared from beneath was a bizarre face covered in tattoos. It was the master of the Grand Casino, Manfred 'Tattoo Face' Madison.

"So that bodyguard is the Sword Saint. He isn't as great as the rumors suggest. He is oblivious to things other than pure animosity… It shouldn't be difficult to fool him with a bit of trickery."

Mozolite, his right-hand man, followed him without saying a word. He wasn't looking for an answer or any sort of reaction—the young wolf's monologue was directed at himself. "But, the candidate girl has a better hunch. On top of that, she was able to correctly narrow the choices down to two."

"Are you saying that if she had two coins then she would have won by fluke?"

"—No. If that girl had two coins, she would have placed them on the same spot both times. Money isn't her concern, it's about the way she conducts herself.”

Manfred’s murmur had a hint of joy and expectation. It was like a child getting a new toy or like a predator finding easy prey. His voice was practically seeping with bloodlust.

“Seems like you’re in a good mood, Boss.”

“Yeah, I don’t feel bad for a change—don’t let them out of your sight, Mozolite,” ordered Manfred, a menacing grin on his face.

“Yes, sir,” replied Mozolite with a low voice, bowing his head.

Held within the hand of the large, bowing man was a coin. Looking at that out of the corner of his eye, Manfred licked his lips. “Alright, show me what you got, royal selection candidate. Whether you end up as a mere insect in a bog, or you become something more, it will be worth watching.”

12

As the sun rose, bringing forth a new day, Reinhard led Felt to a certain place.

Having stayed the night in Flanders because of her knight’s stubborn request, Felt enjoyed the food served at the inn and slept in a soft bed. Early the next morning, she was woken up by Reinhard and drifted between being in a really good mood and a really bad mood. Nonetheless, she went with him without resistance, but…

“Your ass is mine if this ends up being a waste of time.”

“Very well. If that comes to be, then you may berate me to your heart’s content. It would be a failure on my part, after all.”

Reinhard’s attitude while replying to Felt was somewhat strong, which Felt found suspicious, but they soon reached their destination.

And, what awaited Felt there was…

“It’s the earth dragon I told you about before. It belongs to the brilliant Diana species.”

“Woa, woah, woaaaaaaah—ah!” Felt’s eyes sparkled in excitement at the sight of the bright red earth dragon standing on the other side of the wooden fence.

The place Reinhard took her to was a ranch situated south of the city of Flanders—a place with a lot of earth dragons that roamed around freely in the grasslands within the vicinity.

Reinhard had arranged for the rancher to bring one particular crimson earth dragon, which was now subjected to Felt’s admiring gaze as its gallant form rose to stand before her.

“Earth dragons from the Diana species are rare; they are a toughened earth dragon species that can give their fullest, no matter the landscape or climate. As it is a gift for Your Ladyship, I took my time, but…”

“Amaazing! It’s big, coool! This, is it fine for me to have it?”

Though Reinhard politely explained, Felt was crowing like a rooster without hearing any of it. Reinhard smiled and nodded. “Yes,” he said. “I have arranged it for you, Lady Felt. Please, accept it.”

“I don’t like it when it’s your shitty plans that make me happy, but, well, that doesn’t really matter. Alright, then.”

Her emotions changed hastily and Felt jumped across the fence. And just like that, the girl went in front of the crimson dragon. The sharp glare of the dragon was pointed at its master candidate. Yes, she was still only a candidate for being its master.

Earth dragons are all friendly with humans, and there are times when even a child can easily ride on them, but the Diana species were an exception to that. Along with their superior ability, their pride and obstinance is great, rarely accepting others as their master.

The one Reinhard had arranged for Felt was especially hard to please.

"…"

The rancher panicked at the sight of Felt facing the earth dragon and tried saying something, but Reinhard gestured with his hand to stop, nodding to reassure him that he'd intervene if necessary.

As Felt got closer to the earth dragon, they watched with bated breath. "It's really sudden," she began, "so it would be difficult to accept me immediately, but you're my earth dragon from today. Let's get along."

"…"

As Felt spoke and reached her hand out towards it, the earth dragon lowered its long neck and started to sniff around as if to tickle her. "Oh, you…haha, it tickles! You're a friendly one, aren't ya!"

Reinhard gave a short sigh looking at Felt jerking her body around in laughter.

"I am baffled that that girl is being so tame…at her first encounter."

Even the rancher couldn't hide his awe at the sight of Felt and the earth dragon mingling.

After that, Felt took the earth dragon since it accepted her as its master and was about to return to Flanders triumphantly. However, her way back was far from smooth. Since…

"Uh, woah?" Letting out a small scream, Felt panicked, having lost her balance on top of the earth dragon. Reinhard rushed to her side and supported her with his hand, pushing her back.

Felt somehow managed to get into the right position and let out a sigh of relief. After that, she looked at Reinhard. "The hell did you mean when you said they are easy to ride! It's a handful even sittin' on it! Where is the divine protection of the earth dragon?!"

"Please endure it, my lady. While it's true that the earth dragon's Divine Protection of Wind Evasion is excellent, you'll lose control once the protection expires."

“Argh, you may have a point, but…”

“I think you will be able to ride immediately if you learn the ropes. But until then…”

Stopping Reinhard in his tracks before he could say something like practice makes perfect, Felt cried out in excitement as if to say it was a brilliant idea. “Oh yeah, Reinhard! Show me how it’s done.”

Reinhard frowned to figure out her intentions behind that.

“Come onnn.” Felt slapped the saddle on the earth dragon and continued. “Riding alone is dangerous, and there ain’t no way I can learn the ropes like that, right? But then again, I can’t learn by watchin’ other people ride either…so I think it would be quicker doing that here.”

“That’s…I see, you have a point.”

“Right? So hurry up and get your ass over here.”

Reinhard respectfully followed the instructions of Felt, who had jerked her chin up at him. He made brief eye contact with the earth dragon and leapt onto its back.

Reinhard sat behind Felt, inevitably embracing the small girl from behind. While in that position, he held the reins in her hands. “Now, with all due respect, allow me to demonstrate. Please watch carefully, memorize the sensation of moving the reins in your hands and how you focus your sight.”

“Alright, I’ll be depending on you. I want to be able to ride Romy here and there as soon as possible.”

“So, it’s Romy…I think you should discuss the name with Master Rom before naming it that.”

“Shut up! It’s fine! Hey, hurry up and show me how it’s done!”

Felt’s cheeks turned red and she shouted to hide her embarrassment since the origin of the name was found out in an instant. While listening to her voice, he waved the reins with vigor.

“Alright.”

Slowly, Romy the earth dragon began running towards the Astrea Domain. Turning off the divine protection intentionally, feeling the pleasant wind against her, Felt let out a shout of joy.

“…”

Hearing that up close, Reinhard also smiled happily.

And just like that, the Felt Camp had finished paying their respects to the city of Flanders’s underworld. By making their point clear, they had shown their standpoint that they were not related to the incidents happening in the Earth Dragon Capital in any manner, but a flame once lit from the past wasn’t going to let them go so easily.

Things took a drastic turn a few days after Felt’s visit to Flanders.

It all started with the bad news brought to Astrea Manor by the Black Silver Coin’s Safis, who had once again come to them as a messenger…

The news was that Ezzo “The Gray” Cadner was on the run after burning down a brothel and that Camberley had been taken into custody as his accomplice, making it an unprecedented emergency.

13

Peace, meaning her routine life going uninterrupted by odd occurrences, never lasted long for Felt. The leaders of the underworld suspected her of being behind things she didn’t even do, so in order to prove her innocence, she paid them all a visit—going here and there for several days—even though she didn’t want to. It wasn’t like she was all relaxed thinking that everything was fine, but at least she’d made her point clear. With this, she hoped she could enjoy a brief time of tranquility. However, things seem to have been worsening a lot faster than she had expected.

“—What did you just say?” asked Felt with her elbow on the table, cheek resting on her palm. Her fang poked out as she grimaced at what she'd just heard.

The one at whom her question was directed at was Safis, the snaked-eyed man who had been led to her office, the messenger from the Black Silver Coin.

Safis was also the one who had visited them during the Tometo Festival as the messenger of his leader, Doltero. This time, however, he visited them early in the morning without warning. Felt would usually send a rude visitor like that packing due to being in a bad mood and sleep-deprived, but there was a reason she couldn't do that this morning. And that was…

"—Sorry. This is our blunder." Rachins mustered up the words in frustration next to their visitor, Safis.

He was in terrible shape. He was bruised all over, and it was evident from the smeared blood on his face that he had tried to rub the blood from his nose. His clothes were covered in blood and dirt, looking as if he'd been beaten to a pulp—no, it wasn't as if he had, this was definitely the appearance of a guy who had been punched and kicked by a mob.

Leaving Rachins next to him, Safis bowed respectfully. "Lady Felt, allow me to give you my report once again. Last night, there was a fire in Flanders and a building owned by the Flower Prison Garden was partially burned to the ground; some of the guards and prostitutes were unable to escape and burned to death. We know who the arsonist is, but as for the one who assisted in his escape…"

"You're tryin' to say that it was Camberley, right?" interrupted Felt while ruffling her hair with a serious look on her face. She had a feeling Safis's explanation was just contempt masquerading as politeness. Her nerves had started to settle down from when she first heard the unbelievable news, but it wasn't something she could easily accept. She then directed her crimson eyes at Rachins, who was hanging his head. "And, you also assisted the culprit in his escape… Is that right?"

"I don't know if he's the culprit or not, but it's true that I assisted Camberley in helping someone escape. And when I was getting beat on by that mob chasing us…"

"We, the Black Silver Coin, took him in. He might have been killed by the ruffians if we hadn't stepped in time. The dwarf got taken away by the Flower Prison Garden, however."

As a result, Camberley remained captive in Flanders, and only Rachins was brought back to Astrea Manor to report the news to Felt.

She was still drowsy and not fully awake, but after hearing the report she had a rough idea of what was going on. However, there were still a few pieces missing from the puzzle.

"What are we going to do, my lady?" asked the knight by her side. Felt was deep in thought, her arms crossed. Sitting beside her, Reinhard showed no signs of being sleepy or worn out despite it being quite early in the morning. The stately Sword Saint turned his blue eyes towards Rachins, who was hanging his head. "The situation demands that we pay a visit to the Flower Prison Garden to explain ourselves."

"Why should we have to explain ourselves? And why the hell did you and Camberley try to help someone who was tryin' to escape out in the first place? What is the relationship between you and…"

"Ezzo Cadner." Safis cut off Felt's interrogation as he gave a cold smile. Both Felt and Reinhard's cheeks stiffened upon hearing the name he uttered.

The name instantly rang a bell in Felt's mind. On top of that, it was a name closely connected to Camberley. "Ain't that the name of the bouncer teacher that Camberley brought to the red-light district?" she asked.

"And if that's the person who committed arson in the Flower Prison Garden's domain, then…it is understandable that Camberley would be caught up in the incident," Reinhard added.

The dwarf magic user's earnest-looking face came to Felt's mind. He was robbed of all his belongings by Camberley and fell to the position of bouncer in the red-light district, but if he's bein' suspected as an arsonist, Felt thought, there must be some complicated issue at play here.

"Is Camberley safe?" she asked.

"Even we aren't sure how the Flower Prison Garden is treating him," Safis answered. "But that proprietress of the red-light district isn't a short-sighted person. It's hard to imagine she would do anything that would cause her to lose the only lead she has connecting to the culprit."

"You still believe there's a possibility of her doing that, it's just that you think she won't."

Safis smiled gently at Felt, who was complicating things. But she could infer how bad of a situation Camberley was in from that attitude of his. Being Camberley's patron, she couldn't just ignore the dangerous predicament he'd gotten into.

"Of course, we at the Black Silver Coin believe Your Ladyship has no connection to this. But it won't be so easy to calm the other two organizations down…especially the Flower Prison Garden, whose reputation took a hit."

Felt swung her legs up and down and leapt out of her chair, then glared at Safis at the other side of the desk. The snake-like man living in the underworld showed his long tongue in response to her glare. "Worry not… I'm sure their demand is simple," he said with a provoking smile, as if he was enjoying the sight of them being cornered.

14

"My demand is simple, Lady Felt… You just need to hand over the arsonist your subordinate helped to escape."

"…I thought so." Felt snorted at the aroma sweet enough to melt away any man's rationality and sank into the soft sofa with a bitter look on her face. She was unhappy, as Toto's demand was just as the snake-eyed man had expected.

They were now in the manager's room of the Flower Prison Garden's top brothel. It was located in the red-light district where they had gone to greet her the previous day, but the atmosphere had taken a dramatic turn; the flower paradise that was supposed to give men a dreamy night had a dark shadow cast over it.

But then, the night flowers weren't so mentally frail that they would give up just like that. If the red-light district became gloomy, the women would address it by changing their makeup and attire to match the tone. As a result, men who came to enjoy the night continued to do so and business in the red-light district was prosperous as ever. However, this was only a facade for those looking from the outside.

"The building that burned down was on the street we crossed on the way here, right?"

"Yes. The partially burned-down building is still there, yes? The culprit has yet to be apprehended, so we don't have time to repair it yet… Good grief, my ability to judge a person's character has grown weak. I hate myself for that," muttered the proprietress of the Flower Prison Garden listlessly before blowing purple smoke out from her pipe.

"Miss Toto, are you also of the thought that Mr. Ezzo was the arsonist?" inquired Reinhard, a painful expression on his face due to the tragic event.

"Obviously," replied Toto with one eye closed at the Sword Saint's anguished expression. "If Ezzo was innocent, then he should have stayed behind and helped put the fire out and made an effort to prove his innocence. I am not so dense that I would deny someone their right to give their side of the story. Ezzo likely knows that as well. Nonetheless, he fled the scene."

"Which is why you believe that Ezzo is the one responsible for burning the building down and causing many people to lose their lives?"

"Yes, that's right. Ezzo Cadner is a murderer…and a coward who fled after turning his student who admired him as a teacher into a charred corpse.”

“…”

Reinhard furrowed his eyebrows at Toto’s heavy words of denunciation against Ezzo. Felt also took her words with a sense of bitterness.

It’s been confirmed that there were a few prostitutes and guards, as well as male customers, inside the brothel when it burned down. One of the pitiful victims was the prostitute that Felt had talked with, Mimosa. Though lacking in seductiveness, she was a girl who showed signs of being a naive hard-worker… She had addressed Ezzo as “Teacher” and learned reading and writing from him, but her future was now forever lost, stolen away by the inferno.

Normally, prostitutes are hired with a term limit. Once they fulfill their terms, they are released from their duties. Most prostitutes enter this profession to pay off a debt, or to settle some sort of deal of various kinds, and when this is also fulfilled, most of them lead a normal life afterwards. So, after learning how to read and write, Mimosa definitely had a different life waiting for her as soon as her term ended, but not anymore.

“Regular customers from both the Black Silver Coin and The Balance were inside the building as it burned down. So, for the time being, I think that Ezzo is working as a pawn of someone unrelated to the big three.”

“Which brings us to the top of the suspect list, right? Can’t say I can blame you,” said Felt.

At the moment, the most logical conclusion would be that the Felt Camp had sent their pawn—Ezzo—to the Flower Prison Garden and successfully tarnished their reputation. And the fact that Camberley and Rachins had assisted in Ezzo’s escape made it nearly impossible to dispute this accusation.

“That has nothing to do with us though,” declared Reinhard. “Shouldn’t you, the citizens of Flanders, solve the city’s problems yourselves?”

“I can’t believe that those cold words were spoken by the knight among knights, the Sword Saint. However, I can’t deny that after causing such a blunder. Since it is a fact that we let someone scheme and have been unable to catch them to this day.”

Toto smiled charmingly and raised a white flag at Reinhard’s assertion as she had no objections against it.

“But then,” she continued, still remaining in a submissive posture. “ What are you going to do about Master Camberley? Surely you aren’t thinking about abandoning him, are you? Or am I mistaken? Are you saying that that dwarf thug who is all talk has nothing to do with you? That he is unrelated to you?”

“…”

Reinhard’s aura sharpened a bit at the cruel choice Toto had suggested. Felt glanced at him out of the corner of her eyes and heaved a short sigh. I see, the proprietress of the Flower Prison Garden is smart. In short, she’s saying that we don’t have to go through all the trouble of proving our innocence for shit we didn’t do if we sacrifice Camberley, who is nothing but a mere thug without any sign of productivity and hasn’t made any contributions so far.

If Felt did that, then she’d be cleared of all suspicion and everything would be water under the bridge.

“Ha, it seems like we’ve been underestimated.”

“My, in my opinion, I’ve thought of your position as a candidate for the royal selection and made a huge concession.”

“And what am I going to pay in return for being able to escape from the trouble? Becoming indebted to you, being looked down on by my knight, spat at by my stupid companion I abandoned, and worse, turning into a coward, the very thing hated by my family that I respect…Don’t mess around with me.”

Felt stood up from the sofa she was sinking into and looked down at Toto, who was elegantly crossing her legs. Toto’s eyes widened slightly under her long lashes after seeing those crimson eyes peer into her.

“Remember this.” She pointed her finger at Toto’s well-defined nose and declared, “Camberley belongs to me. I am his mistress. His liabilities are half mine too. And I am my own master. I don’t intend on bein’ bossed around by anyone.”

“…”

“In addition, I am his mistress too. He’s ready to bite anyone if something happens,” Felt said with vigor while pointing at Reinhard, who was standing right behind her.

Reinhard deeply bowed after hearing her words and said, “Yes,” before nodding. “If it’s by Lady Felt’s order then I am always ready to bite into the throat of her choosing.”

“I was thinkin’ of an ear or finger. You’re…really scary…saying throat…”

“My lady…” Reinhard dropped his shoulders as if he had just been betrayed.

Toto went silent for a moment at their exchange and then placed her hand over her mouth. It was a graceful gesture—moving in such a way so that she wouldn’t get any lipstick stains on her hand—but it was definitely a movement following the urge to smile. “…Fufufu. Oh my, how boorish of me, and to call myself the proprietress of the red-light district… My apologies, Lady Felt. It appears I’ve underestimated you.”

“Yeah, and don’t you forget it!” Felt said, proudly puffing out her chest.

Toto nodded while still smiling. “Understood.” Then, shaking the pipe between her fingers, she let the purple smoke flutter in the room. “If that is Your Ladyship’s resolve then I have nothing to say… Though we have the dwarf who assisted Ezzo Cadner in his escape in our custody.”

“You aren’t gonna let us meet him easily, will you?”

"At least not until we get him to start talking. We are quite desperate," replied Toto with an expression showing no signs of being desperate. Camberley was alive, at least if her words were to be believed, but it was clear that there wasn't much time left. The terms for his release had already been made clear and tensions were high.

"If we find out who burned down your brothel, will ya hear us out?"

"Yes, of course, as I believe that culprit would be the same one behind these many incidents occurring over the past few months. It would be a great help to me as one of the representatives of this metropolis to settle this situation."

"Don't say something you don't mean." Felt ruffled her hair after listening to Toto's words and smiled. "I can't wait to see how you're gonna thank me after we solve this whole situation," she declared with a fierce smile without the slightest hint of fear.

15

"We weren't able to meet Camberley, so what are you going to do now?"

"I guess we could roam around the city or something, but…what good would that do?"

After ending the talks with Toto in the Flower Prison Garden, Felt pondered while walking around the city with Reinhard. To convince Toto and make her release Camberley, we need to capture the arsonist. For now, Ezzo is the prime suspect and the Big Three are desperately searchin' for him. I can't imagine that we, as outsiders, will be able to get to him before they can, though.

"Do you have a divine protection that helps you find someone you're lookin' for? If you do, spit it out right now."

"I truly want to be of assistance to you, my lady, but I can't claim to have a divine protection that doesn't exist. Nonetheless, if Your Ladyship orders me to search around the city without anything to go on, I will have no other choice but to obey…”

“That would be a waste of your existence. Seems like we alone can’t come up with a solution.”

Disappointed and somewhat relieved to learn Reinhard was not almighty, Felt swiftly crossed the street and walked towards the rendezvous point. Only she and Reinhard were allowed into the Flower Prison Garden to meet with Toto. The rest of her companions who couldn’t join them at the brothel were waiting at the charred remains of a building—the scene of the crime in question.

“Lady Felt, Young Master, we’ve been waiting.”

The one who had rushed across the street to greet them was a timid-looking pink-haired young girl, Flam—one of the twin chamberlains at Astrea Manor. She usually moved around with her other half, Grassis, but the sisters were acting separately today for a certain reason. Which was…

“So, how’d it go? Were ya able to meet Camberley in the brothel?” said the person leaning forward and inquiring about the outcome—a suspicious-looking man covering his head with a scarf and his mouth with a piece of cloth.

“Calm down.” Felt waved her hand at the hasty query of the suspicious man. “Stop bein’ so loud. You’re gonna blow your cover. You promised you weren’t gonna cause me any trouble, remember?”

“Yeah yeah, but how d’ya expect me to stay calm…!” the man—Rachins—spat, stomping on the ground out of frustration, before looking up at the sky. He was in disguise, hiding his identity because he was also suspected of attacking the Big Three alongside Ezzo and Camberley.

He had helped Ezzo escape and was nearly beaten to death by ruffians. So, whether to take Rachins to Flanders or not was a subject of much debate in the mansion. In fact, Old Man Rom and Reinhard were against him accompanying Felt. Nonetheless, Rachins insisted that he be allowed to join them and would not back down in the slightest. Felt couldn't help but respect this tenacity and commitment to see his friend.

As a result, Rachins accompanied Felt to Flanders, but she made him follow a few conditions. The first condition was that he keep his identity hidden in disguise; additionally, he must always remain with a guard since he could not fight very well on his own. That guard was Flam, who remained by his side.

"All things considered, Mister Rachins, aren't you ashamed of being protected by a young girl like this?" Flam asked with a shrug.

"Shut up! I had no choice, ya know?! I wasn't allowed to be here without you!" Rachins cried angrily at her. Either way, she was stronger than him, so his angry shout didn't really pack much of a punch.

As expected from someone serving the Astrea family, Flam and Grassis's fighting abilities were extraordinary despite the way they looked. Even Felt would be no match against the twins in a serious bout.

Felt interrupted them. "Well, we can leave that aside. As for everything we've learned…ah, Reinhard, I'll leave that to you."

"As you wish. Flam, Rachins, I want you to calm down and listen."

Like that, Felt tossed aside the long explanation and Reinhard thoroughly informed them both of the things discussed in the Flower Prison Garden.

Hearing that, Rachins narrowed his sanpaku eyes annoyingly and said, "So I have ta catch the guy I helped escape…"

Reinhard nodded. "Camberley's safety won't be guaranteed if we don't do that. But it isn't a good idea to search around the city blindly. Does anything come to mind? You guys know the city better than we do."

"What's that supposed to mean…nah I guess you weren't tryna start nuthin. Shit, this is why I hate people with good upbringin's…"

Rachins clicked his tongue at Reinhard's question and started pondering something. "It ain't like there isn't somethin' that comes to mind," he continued after placing his hand on his thin jaw. "It's real weird that the people here still can't find him after searchin' around. There ain't no way they wouldn't be serious about searchin' after bein' so dang humiliated by all this."

"Yeah, right," Felt said. "The Flower Prison Garden is probably hunting him down as we speak. So there's really no point in searchin' for him ourselves."

"Yeah. Others are already doin' that and they can't find 'im, which means that…"

"Could it be that he has already left the city?" muttered the young girl after hearing Rachins's inference.

"No," Rachins replied, shaking his head at her words. "Remember how the woman Gaston is hittin' on and her kid were found in Hakuchuri? Escaping from them ain't an easy task with the kind of influence they got. It's impossible for him to escape on his own. And if it's possible he isn't alone, then…"

"…There is a possibility that someone is giving him asylum," blurted out Reinhard.

"Bingo," Rachins said with a snap of his fingers before pointing at Reinhard.

"I get it now," added Felt, also feeling satisfied with the conclusion.

"He's someone who has caused such a big mess." Rachins faced the charred remains of the building and continued. "So giving 'im asylum would require great resolve… But I think I might know someone who'd be stupid 'nough ta do it."

"Is it someone who's close enough with Ezzo to want to protect him?" asked Felt.

"Not quite. If we're talkin' about how close they are, they ain't that close. It's simply that it ain't that difficult to receive their protection," replied Rachins while putting on airs and looking around at everyone. He then nodded at the three of them, who were frowning, and continued. "…There is a moneylender in this city known as the Golden Beetle."

16

"Well, well…if it isn't the most talked about person in the Kingdom now. I am most humbled that you came to visit someone like us."

Felt received the green-haired woman's greetings and squinted her crimson eyes. Black suit, twin tails, and a polite demeanor. The woman, armed with qualities that made her seem like a true professional, made Felt tense up like she had when facing Toto. She had previously come to this city to greet the Flower Prison Garden and The Balance, but forgetting to visit this place was a matter of deep regret.

"My apologies that I couldn't go to greet you… To say that we were extremely busy would be nothing more than an excuse, but nonetheless, I am ashamed of my shortcomings."

She slyly mentioned the other day as if she had read Felt's mind. A bitter taste arose in Felt's mouth at the mention of this and she shook her head. "Aah, enough with the pleasantries. My name is…"

"…Lady Felt, correct? We are the Golden Beetle, I am Helaine, the one in charge of the office in Flanders. Pleased to make your acquaintance."

The woman who introduced herself as Helaine bowed repeatedly and escorted her visitors to the parlor. According to Rachins, the Golden Beetle is the biggest loan shark in Flanders, in addition to being active throughout the entire Kingdom. In this city, they've been able to run smoothly and maliciously under the protection of the Big Three.

Protection or not, the Golden Beetle had also been a target during the past months. One sales office, separate from the one Felt and her group were visiting, had been attacked just the other day. With all of these disturbances, they were certainly in a position to want this solved quickly as well. Felt took a lesson from Safis this time and paid a visit to Helaine without any prior appointment. However, her response was quick and flexible, almost as if she'd expected them to visit.

Flam spoke up suddenly. "Young Master, there seems to be a problem."

"I know," Reinhard said. "We're in the dark here with no idea what this woman may be planning. We must be ready for anything…"

"It's not that. The cost of this cup of tea is equal to the cost of an entire month's worth of our tea back at the mansion."

"…Flam, I'm glad you're enjoying these luxuries, but please be on your guard."

While listening to the leisurely conversation between the two standing behind her in the parlor, Felt glared at Helaine sitting in front of her.

Helaine shrugged her petite shoulders after being exposed to Felt's glare. "So, what brings you here? Considering we're a mere nobody around here, I don't know how we could ever meet a royal selection candidate's expectations, Lady Felt."

"Are you hiding a guy named Ezzo Cadner?" Felt asked.

"…"

"Sorry about that. I ain't that good at negotiating."

Helaine went quiet at this blunt question. The faint smile she'd worn since the beginning was now cast in a slight shadow. While normally concealing her intentions, Felt caught a glimpse of Helaine's true nature beneath that smile.

"My my, what a strange thing to ask. If I'm not mistaken, that's the name of the dangerous criminal who's been ravaging the streets in our fine metropolis. For us to hide someone like that would certainly jeopardize our position…"

"Let me make this clear," Felt interrupted. "We ain't here to snitch on you. And, the guy, Ezzo, may not even be the culprit behind any of this."

"So Your Ladyship believes the reality of the incident to be different?" Helaine asked.

"Nah, I'm not sayin' that I know what really happened, but the person who got caught after it all happened is from my camp. So that's something I can't just ignore."

"I see. So your driving force lies in your captured subordinate…" Helaine stopped there and rubbed her chin with her black-gloved hand. "Speaking of which." She looked behind Felt. "The person over there has been staring daggers at me for a while. Do you know why he is doing so?"

Her query was directed at Rachins, who was standing next to Reinhard and Flam. His gaze was sharper than usual, not able to conceal his animosity at all. Felt waved her hand between Rachins and Helaine as if to block his gaze. "It's nothing. He's just being grumpy so don't worry about him. But if you want, I can make him wait outside."

"No, it's fine. I was just worried if there had been any discourtesy on our end. As long as that's not the case, there's no problem."

"Seems like you're used to being glared at, huh?"

Helaine nodded. "Yes, since our reputation is immensely bad among people who are prudent and aren't in dire financial crisis."

More than mere moneylenders, they were loan sharks with deep ties to the underworld. Violence and excessive interest rates were standard in their line of work. Felt, however, had no intention of criticizing their business. More often than not, the ones borrowing money are the ones at fault, she thought.

Felt continued. "So, I haven't gotten your answer yet. Where's Ezzo Cadner?"

"Haven't I given you an answer?" Helaine retorted. "The person at the center of this is said to have opposed the Big Three. Our position would be in danger if we protect someone like him."

"I'm sure that's true, but if you find the risk to be worth the payout, then that's a different story. Right?

"…"

"I don't intend on meddlin' with how moneylenders work, and you can do whatever side business you have. But if it comes in my way, then I'm free to try to move it out of my way, right?" Felt moved away from the backrest of the chair and joined her fists in front of her thin chest.

For the first time, Helaine's smile completely disappeared. Felt's words could easily be taken as a declaration of war. The atmosphere in the parlor grew tense, as now all eyes were focused on Helaine. Without any chance of assistance from other members of the Golden Beetle, she was all alone. It was obvious enough that a physical altercation would be hopeless for her, but not every altercation had to be won through physical means.

"We are moneylenders…so the way that we settle things around here should be clear enough," she said, reaching a hand into her pocket.

"Stop. If you try anything…" Reinhard warned.

Felt stopped Reinhard, who was now on high alert. "Don't move, Reinhard. She ain't that stupid."

Helaine nodded at their exchange and took a missive out of her pocket. She spread it on the low table in front of Felt. The content of the missive was…

"…This, would be master Camberley's IOU."

"Wait, wait, wait! That rascal had debt in this city?!" Felt screamed at this surprising turn of events.

"Yes, and it is quite a sum…it would be quite a financial blow to us if we aren't able to retrieve it. And now that he's been captured amidst all this commotion, we find ourselves with numerous options on how to retrieve the money owed."

At a cursory glance, the IOU seemed genuine and without any errors. She hated to admit to herself that all of her studying for the royal selection came in handy right now; as a result, she knew that if Camberley's blood seal on the missive is real, then the missive is valid.

Flam frowned at Helaine's suggestion of gruesome retrieval methods.

"…Numerous options, you say?"

"Turning the human body into capital isn't just through the red-light district or slave traders, young lady."

Flam murmured to herself, "…I can't let Grassis hear this."

It looks like Flam decided to keep this unpleasant social studies lesson a secret from her sister. Looking at that from the corner of her eyes, Felt speculated the reason behind Helaine taking out the IOU at this particular moment.

If things remain the same, then Camberley will literally be dismembered in order to pay off his debt. Helaine's conscience won't be hurt by that since it is her job to retrieve the money they have lent. In that case, to make her back off from dismembering Camberley with means other than guilt would be…

Felt began to speak "…This IOU."

"It is a huge sum of money for unknown use. Master Camberley often mentioned that he was serving a person in a prominent position… What are you going to do?" Helaine inquired, looking at Felt, who had picked up the IOU.

The question gave little detail, but Helaine's intentions remained clear as day.

To be honest, this feels like repeating the negotiation with Toto in the Flower Prison Garden. Camberley is making me really exhausted. I've been told continuously to let him go, give up on him, that he is no good, that he is a lump of debt and a womanizer. And I can't deny it if someone were to tell me he's my camp's burden. But…

"Please," Rachins implored. "I beg of you, don't abandon him."

Despite Camberley's reputation, the man pleading for his salvation by putting his forehead on the table with the IOU did not bad-mouth him. Felt could tell that Reinhard and Flam had gasped slightly at that sight. The disguised Rachins had put his forehead on the table between Felt and Helaine, kneeling and pleading for Camberley. It was evident from his stance he was serious about what he wished for.

Come to think of it, Rachins has been desperate from the start. He's been giving all he has for Camberley.

"He's my friend. Only Gaston and Camberley helped me when I was on the verge o' death and couldn't do anything! So, please…" Rachins's words trailed off in despair.

"…So?" Felt replied. "What does that have to do with me?"

"Nothing! You don't have to tell me. I know it's got nothin' to do with you!" Rachins lifted his face up and shouted at Felt's cold query. "I know we jus' been a burden on you! It'd be no loss for ya to jus' abandon us here either! But it's the same as back in that alley. You could'a jus' left us there too, but ya took us in!"

Rachins was referring to the time when Felt first met the three friends in a random back alley. She was on her way back from the remains of the loot house after having just declared that she would take part in the royal selection when she found them. The three of them were down on their luck and on the run and when she welcomed them to her camp. Back then, it was even Rachins who sneered at her initially. Reinhard complained that she should reconsider, and Old Man Rom just heartily laughed it off.

But now Rachins was here pleading desperately for mercy for his friend, his face on the verge of oozing with snot. Reinhard hadn't changed his position of waiting for Felt's decision, and Old Man Rom had stayed in Hakuchuri, so he wasn't here.

—Seems like the tables have turned within just a few months, thought Felt, amazed. "A sum as big as that can't be arranged right away. My walking wallet doesn't have that much, right? Am I right?" Felt teased.

"If by walking wallet you mean me, then it is as you say," Reinhard replied, unamused.

Felt closed an eye and looked over Rachins's head to Helaine.

The lady from the Golden Beetle smiled faintly and pointed at the IOU on the table. "Of course, I am not asking you to return all the money immediately. It would be of great service to us if you could do that, but I understand the sum is quite large. So for starters, how about a down payment?"

"Down payment…"

"It will be a guarantee to show me that you intend on returning the debt, though it would not hold any weight unless it's worth something to you. Thus—"

"Thus?"

What's she going to say? Felt had a bad feeling about what Helaine was about to say, but she urged her to continue. The Golden Beetle's Helaine was an unrivaled negotiator despite her young age. She deepened her smile as if she was testing Felt's resolve and said, "The red earth dragon tied to the dragon carriage outside…it would seem to be worth quite a hefty sum, am I correct?"

17

"Taking advantage of my situation, that damned Golden Pest…I'll make her pay next time."

Without intending to do so, Felt correctly used the standard derogatory term for the Golden Beetle, and clicked her tongue at the content of their negotiation. As tough as it was to say, they had achieved their objective safe and sound. Thinking of her dragon, she couldn't help but object at how safe it had been, but they had received a near-perfect response nonetheless.

She had to make a great sacrifice, but this yielded much for their efforts; as such, there was no time for them to slow down or stop now. However…

"What are you so giddy about?" Felt spat over her shoulder. "You're as deep in this shit as I am. Get your act together."

Confused and startled, Rachins meekly replied, "Oh, yeah…I know that but…"

Rachins had been acting like this since the negotiations with the Golden Beetle.

It wasn't like they couldn't understand Rachins's confusion.

"Excuse me." Seeing as Rachins had trouble putting it into words, Flam interjected to speak on his behalf. She then stood up straight, and looked back at the Golden Beetle's office. "Are you really okay with that? Romy was a gift from the young master, not to mention you had a deep fondness for it."

"No, it isn't fine. It ain't fine at all!" Felt shouted back. "They took my precious earth dragon as collateral! There's nothing fine about that at all. I'm definitely not gonna let this slide."

Her face grew closer and closer to Flam's as she babbled to the point where the young lady was bending backward. Felt caught Flam by the shoulders to keep her from falling and let out a deep sigh. Her anger was understandable since the collateral Helaine demanded was her crimson earth dragon, Romy.

It had only been a few days since Reinhard gifted the earth dragon to Felt, but it was clear that Romy had become completely attached to her. The two of them were eager to spend more time together. That was real precise harassment, Felt thought. I could have rejected the offer, saying the conditions weren't something I could agree with, but…

“She wouldn’t be nice enough to let us off any easier. If I said no, she’d probably be a lot more unreasonable, too, so what we got is the best we’ll ever get.”

Reinhard nodded. “But, you will definitely get it back. That’s what I’ll believe, my lady.”

“Obviously. And I’m not saying that ‘cause it’s a gift from you. It’s because Romy is my precious earth dragon already. I don’t intend to rest my ass anywhere other than Romy’s back,” Felt declared.

Reinhard gave a deep, trusting smile and nodded. He probably didn’t object to her decision because he truly trusted her. After all, the only person who did not object to Felt immediately accepting Helaine’s condition wasn’t Flam or Rachins, but Reinhard.

He continued, “It really was quite unexpected that she’s been hiding Mr. Ezzo.”

Felt agreed. “I thought she just might know where he was hiding, but I got a bit spooked by just how involved she was. Rachins was right for saying that we should go to her first.”

Reinhard nodded in agreement. Being given Romy as collateral without any resistance appeared to deeply satisfy Helaine’s code of honor as a moneylender. She confessed everything—leaving aside whether it being true or not, but she gave so much information to Felt and the rest that they felt like she’d shared everything she knew. She explicitly detailed where to find Ezzo Cadner, who’d been hiding out since last night after burning down the brothel.

“We are acting together with the Big Three of Flanders, but we aren’t their complete ally. Our profits are of utmost priority.”

That was what Helaine had to say, and they did not intend on telling it to anyone.

“Why is Helaine going on such a dangerous path?” Felt wondered.

“…She just cares about reachin’ her end goal, no matter what.”

She looked at Rachins. “Her end goal?”

“The Golden Beetle’s public stance is that they’re nobody’s ally. So if ya look at it from a different perspective then it means they wanna put on a good face for everyone. You bein’ a candidate is included in that everyone.”

Rachins hadn’t fully snapped out of the mood he was in, but his explanation here showed he was getting back to normal. After hearing that, Felt came to a late realization that Helaine had considered her position as a candidate. In short, she wanted to have something on the candidate for the royal selection, so she collected information on Camberley and Ezzo just in case.

The reason behind that was—

Felt was confused. “Are they suspecting us of planning to eliminate the people of the underworld?”

“No idea. But their doubts are growing I s’pose. We didn’t even visit ‘em last time we came here, so they couldn’t know what we were up to unless someone talked.”

“Aah, shit, what a drag.”

Felt was fed up with all of the unwarranted suspicion directed at her and the barrage of consideration she didn’t ask for. It had been two months since she decided to take part in the royal selection. When facing the desk in her study, she felt like she’s learned a lot since then, but in reality, she lacked experience in the practical application of her newfound knowledge. She was irritated at her complicated position.

“What should I do with this irritation now…”

“With all due respect, it would be nice if you would find some comfort with me on the task.” Reinhard joked with Felt, whose grumpy face wouldn’t let up. The slender figure leading them had stopped, which meant that they had reached their destination.

Ahead of them was an old Western-style house on the outskirts of Flanders. According to Helaine, the building was confiscated as collateral for another man’s debt. She hadn’t heard what happened to him after his mansion got confiscated, but she wasn't that interested in that, either. There was only one thing she was interested in at the moment.

Reinhard stepped forward. "Flam, please protect Lady Felt and Rachins in my stead. I will break in."

"Understood, Young Master. Please be carefu…be careful not to kill him."

Reinhard smiled wryly at Flam, who had rephrased her words into something more considerate for his opponent. The Sword Saint then knelt in front of Felt and gazed up at his mistress. "My lady, I'll be leaving your side for a short while. Please forgive me."

"Alright, alright, just don't let him escape. And no killing either. I wanna hear what he has to say."

Reinhard turned around towards the mansion after hearing Felt's apathetic instructions. With his graceful side profile and heroic gaze, a mere search in this rundown mansion seemed like an act from a great epic poem. Reinhard, with an air about him like that of an epic scene that marks the beginning of a grand tale, walked toward the mansion. He carried with him the great Dragon Sword, which he could not unsheathe.

Reaching the front door, he took a short breath and without any hesitation blew the door open with a front kick.

Felt chuckled. "He's oblivious to words like 'sneaky' and 'infiltration.'"

"That is how the young master is."

Felt and Flam exchanged their remarks as Reinhard broke into the mansion and quickly entered. Just as they thought he would begin his search, he unexpectedly shouted out—

"Mr. Ezzo Cadner, I know you're here! Please show yourself!"

Even Felt and Flam were baffled by his ridiculous act.

No way someone who's suspected of arson, running around the city would appear just by being called. But Felt's assumption was shattered immediately by the dwarf who appeared from one of the mansion's backrooms.

"…Who would have thought that the Sword Saint himself would pursue me? It would seem that I am quite popular."

"Huh, is he for real?" Felt muttered with a husky voice, having witnessed something unexpected. The person who had appeared there was undoubtedly Ezzo Cadner himself, distinguished by the gray-brown hair, intelligent look, and clearly short stature. His appearance was a bit of a mess due to being on the run, but the fire in his eyes hadn't faded one bit.

Reinhard looked at Ezzo's appearance and then pointed an empty palm at him.

"Mr. Ezzo…I would suggest that you surrender for your own good. Considering you've shown yourself so quickly, can you confirm the charges against you are some sort of misunderstanding?"

"Are you saying that you'll give me a chance to explain myself if I surrender? I'm not such an optimist to believe something like that. Nor am I a fool oblivious to his own sins, either," Ezzo dejectedly muttered, slowly shaking his head.

Reinhard furrowed his brow. "Your own…sin?"

"That's right," answered Ezzo before lifting his arms. "An unforgivable sin which demands atonement. This meager tribute to Mimosa is all I can do—what I must do, to atone for the severed future of a bright young girl who looked up to me.."

"Mr. Ezzo!" shouted Reinhard, sensing a change in the air. Ezzo, however, kept his arms raised to shoulder height, showing no signs of budging. A complex magical formula mingling in red and blue projected from both his raised palms…

"Your consideration is most appreciated! However, there is something I must do! I refuse to turn myself over to you before that has been accomplished! Even if the one standing in my way is you, Sword Saint!”

Reinhard glanced briefly at Felt to his rear. The reason was clear—it was to ask whether he should restrain Ezzo by force or not. Of course, he had no hope of getting past Reinhard, but even so, it was true that he had some level of ability, so…

“…Reinhard! Just do it!”

“As you wish…” Reinhard gave a short response to Felt’s order. Then in the blink of an eye, the Sword Saint exploded forward, the ground at the mansion’s entrance erupting behind him. Immediately the empty-handed Reinhard was close enough to reach for Ezzo’s shoulder. It was all playing out the same as that night in the red-light district, with Ezzo helplessly pinned on the ground…

“…You underestimated me, Sword Saint.”

“Wha?” Reinhard exclaimed in surprise as a purple shock exploded into his chest, sending him flying backward. Reinhard widened his eyes at this unexpected impact. He looked down to see that two buttons had been blown off his white shirt.

“Behold! A countermeasure to your Excess Mana Circulation Constitution!” shouted Ezzo with a satisfied smile on his face, both hands stretched out, blood dripping from them. The backlash of casting on Reinhard appeared to be great; he’d lost a few nails and he now had cuts all along his arms where his sleeves had been rolled up.

However, he’d managed to land an attack. It was the first time Felt had seen Reinhard get hit by anything—let alone magic.

“Did you really believe no magic user could harm you?! That would be true arrogance indeed, Sword Saint!”

“…”

“I have created a distortion in the normal conduction of mana by rearranging the magical composition! Make no mistake, it is no easy feat! It would take a lifetime for an average magic user to even be able to change the composition of a spell while executing it! But I have done it!" shouted Ezzo as he ripped off a barely-attached nail, ignoring the pain. Though it didn't do much, it was a blow nonetheless. Reinhard had no equal in combat skill, but his strength was not only derived from his extraordinary physical abilities. The Sword Saint possessed an innate ability that was said to nullify incoming attacks—particularly magic attacks—almost entirely. This had just been proven wrong.

"Let me thank you, Sword Saint Reinhard van Astrea! Thanks to you, I've proven that my hard work can overcome even an Excess Mana Circulation Constitution such as yours! Now all that is left is practice!"

Ezzo's bleeding hadn't stopped yet, and neither had his elemental assault. Bursting from his outstretched hands came a stormy gust and a torrent of gushing water, clashing into a muddy stream right before Reinhard's eyes. The area was then blanketed in a heavy fog. Providing this cover for himself, Ezzo chose to flee. Making a preemptive strike, preventing his opponent from making a move, then fleeing was the best possible move for anyone in his situation.

...Unfortunately for him, this opponent couldn't be stopped so easily.

"..."

Reinhard stepped forward. The shockwave from this simple motion instantly cleared the fog with such force that water droplets bore holes into the mansion walls. He lunged forward and immediately caught up to Ezzo, giving him no chance to flee. Reinhard had already underestimated this dwarf once. There wouldn't be a second time.

"Ga-ah!"

He grabbed Ezzo by the nape and smashed him on the wet floor using a combination of power and skill. The force knocked the wind out of him and broke his focus, stopping him from composing another formula immediately.

"It is over now. Continuing would be…"

"No! We aren't done yet!" Ezzo screamed.

He refused to admit defeat even in this position. He glanced at his pinned right shoulder and a quick, sharp gust cut straight into it, causing blood to splatter and gush out. Reinhard was speechless, taken aback by the gruesome scene. Taking advantage of this surprise, Ezzo was able to squirm away and put some distance between them, his arm barely hanging from his shoulder. The arm would have been detached entirely if Reinhard hadn't let go immediately.

"You're soft, Sword Saint. I highly doubt that you would be able to protect your noble lady like that."

Stunned, Reinhard uttered, "That wound…needs immediate treatment. Why do something so reckless…"

"I told you. It's for my atonement!"

Ezzo grit his teeth, clutching what remained of his shoulder with his remaining hand. Blood flowed from his wound, undeterred by his tiny palm. Due to their small stature, it's clear that dwarves don't have much blood to begin with. His blood loss was fatal.

Ezzo roared at them without care for the danger he was in, his face pale.

"You people have plans of your own! I know that! But, there is something I need to do!" His voice trembled in rage, pain, and sorrow. "…I must avenge my student and answer for her stolen future."

This wasn't adding up for Felt. This dwarf's tragic cries were inconsistent with the confession of a sin. What it meant was…

"Mimosa was not a smart girl… She was not literate, had poor manners, and wasn't a fast learner, either. But she was earnest! She may have been slow, but that did not detract from the noble will to learn. And she didn't have a choice, her parents sold her to the red-light district. After all that, she wrote her very first letter to me with words she'd just learned. She asked me if it was weird for a girl who sold flowers at night to dream of being a florist. That's the kind of girl she was…"

His words became staggered, and the passion in his voice grew listless. He suddenly dropped to one knee, the wound taking its toll as he shook his head back and forth.

"No one can laugh at Mimosa's dream. I will not let anyone laugh. A prostitute in the corner of the red-light district having a small dream for the future, what's so weird about that…"

His once booming voice had now become a faint whisper, hardly audible to his audience.

Ezzo's heavy eyes were cast down struggling to stay open as he lifted his head up. He saw the silhouette of a thin girl before him and looked deep into her eyes. "Mimosa…" he muttered with a husky voice. "Nobody has the right to laugh at your dream. Neither the blood flowing through one's veins nor the place one grows up is relevant. I, the Gray, will prove that. So…"

"…"

"Someday, the day I get the titles, I'll pin a flower from your shop on my chest…"

His feeble voice drifted off as the strength left his body, falling limp in waiting arms. But it wasn't his dear Mimosa who held him gently, embracing his tired body; it was Felt.

"He lost consciousness. He pushed himself too hard and lost too much blood," she said. Pursing her lips, she looked down at the unconscious Ezzo. Blood continued to gush out from his wound. She ripped the cape from his back and tied it tightly to his shoulder to stop the bleeding.

Flam walked up to the girl. "Lady Felt, there's blood on your clothes."

"I can always get new clothes, that's not important. Flam, can you fix him up?"

"Yes. As a chamberlain of House Astrea, I have learned well from my grandmother."

With that, Flam gently took Ezzo from Felt and quickly began tending his wounds. Her movement and technique were brilliant, as expected from training with her grandmother, Carol.

I guess there's no need to worry now that Flam is taking care of him. As for this guy…

"You look super gloomy. I feel like I'm seeing you like this a lot lately."

"I am ashamed of myself," Reinhard muttered. "Honestly, I did not think that he could ever counter me like that…"

Felt nodded, "Yeah, that was unexpected for all of us. He's more impressive than I thought."

Gaining the upper hand on Reinhard even for a moment isn't something even a hundred normal people could pull off together. Ezzo definitely proved he's more than just talk. And that's not the only thing strange here.

"Rachins, aren't you going to say, 'Let's turn him in'?" she said, teasing him.

"…You don't gotta be like that. Even I can see it's more complicated after that whole thing."

Annoyed, he clicked his tongue at her with a scarf still wrapped around his head. His gaze was fixed on the thick pool of blood Ezzo had spilled on the ground. Only with extreme determination could someone do this to himself.

Delirious and at the cusp of death, Ezzo still howled sharply as if he were still engaged in battle. Felt could not possibly fathom that any of this was merely an act.

"My lady."

Felt responded with a somber nod. "I know."

She could hear the concern in Reinhard's voice regarding the now unconscious dwarf. Ezzo's critical condition and the mystery surrounding his actions left them with only one answer.

"Someone else is behind this, and Ezzo's taking the heat for it."

Seems like this is more than just simple arson. Felt looked up at the sky, lamenting the dire situation they'd become involved in. Annoyingly bright little clouds littered the sky in stark contrast to the grim, sinking feeling in her heart.

18

Standing in the pasture, Gaston felt a mixture of emotions after hearing that something was amiss. Earlier that day, he learned that Rachins and Camberley had gotten into trouble with some underworld syndicates after a night out in Flanders.

Gaston cursed himself for not keeping in touch with them lately.

He knew that Rachins and Camberley had a tendency to go overboard and lose control, but he had always been there to steer them in the right direction. However, now that he had let his guard down, they had found themselves in a dangerous situation. It was clear that they needed to stick together if they wanted to avoid any more trouble.

"…"

"Oh, aah, sorry about that, Kalifa. I spaced out for a bit."

Gaston suddenly felt a disapproving gaze boring into him from the side, and he quickly apologized with an expression oozing with love to the person looking at him. After receiving his apology, the gray-haired lady—Kalifa—smiled gently. He had become acquainted with this mother and her daughter a bit more than two months ago by a curious turn of fate. Kalifa was an admirable woman who, despite being young, raised her daughter diligently. Gaston had been getting along well with her and taking care of her all this time. She lost her voice due to a wound she received in a certain incident. This made her day-to-day tasks much more difficult to carry out.

They'd gotten so close that she doesn't get angry at him even if he calls her 'Kalifa' without any honorifics.

Ironically, it was Gaston's relationship with her and her beloved daughter Ilya that kept him from joining Rachins and Camberley's night out. On top of that, their past relationship with the underworld stopped him from leaving their side, which furthered the irony.

"…They might get dragged into the Black Silver Coin's mess, huh," he pondered.

It was something Gaston didn't want to think about, but that was the reason why Gaston didn't accompany them to Flanders. Gaston and Camberley were childhood friends who grew up in the royal capital together. Obviously, he wanted to take part in saving his friend from a dire situation, but he was advised to stay out of it. According to Felt, there's no guarantee that Kalifa wouldn't get dragged into trouble as well if Camberley's situation was related to the incident that wounded her.

If that were to happen, it would be up to Gaston to protect the two, considering his position and abilities.

Status-wise, Gaston was a servant at Astrea Manor, but he was continuously being taught how to perform various tasks and new skills as if being idle there was unforgivable. Among those, Gaston had quite the talent when it came to learning a systemized technique known as the 'Flow Method' and was being trained rigorously under Reinhard.

He used to give up quickly at the beginning, but things changed after he got to know Kalifa and found a reason for motivation. He could now take pride in himself that he had become somewhat better as a person.

"It's not like I really believe Felt when she says that bottom-dwellers like us are going to turn the kingdom upside down, but…"

Felt had boldly made that claim with a big smile the day she picked up Gaston and the other two as they were pursued for a huge blunder. They had the option to flee, sneering at her that it was a stupid ambition. But in the end, they didn't run away and found themselves gradually getting dragged in. Before he knew it, he had more reasons to stay than to leave.

Kalifa suddenly pushed the baby in her arms into the pondering Gaston's thick chest.

"…? Woah, woah, is it alright for me to hold her? Are you going back to work?"

It had become his routine to have lunch with Kalifa, a live-in worker at the ranch in Hakuchuri. After this, Gaston would normally take Ilya to the rancher while Kalifa took care of the grazing livestock and then leave after some small talk, but Felt had given him an order to lay low today, no matter how worried he was about Camberley, so he wanted to stick around here for a while.

"We'll stay here and watch you work. Ilya, you can cheer on your mommy as she works. You can do that right?"

Gaston held Ilya's small hand and waved it at Kalifa, who burst into gentle laughter. He smiled sweetly at that and sighed. He was happy here with the two of them and wished these little moments wouldn't end.

And then, it all changed…

"…Kalifa, hold Ilya and step back."

He noticed they were suddenly surrounded by suspicious men. Gaston clenched his big fists and held his ground, shielding the mother and daughter behind him.

There were eleven men he could see, all with their identities concealed by cloth wrapped around their faces. But the air around them wasn't that of an amateur and they didn't bother to make useless threats. These men knew exactly what they came here to do and weren't going to play any games.

"…"

Gaston let out a deep sigh in concentration. He extended his consciousness to the corners of his body and envisioned complete control over himself. The basics of the Flow Method were first to completely control one’s body. Despite what many believed, humans were terribly ineffective at controlling their own bodies. Understanding that limitation and breaking through it was the first challenge in acquiring the Flow Method.

He had gone through hellish days of training full of indescribable pain and torture. But I’m glad that I was able to survive that hell. I’m glad that I’m able to stand firm here. If I was the same old wussy, half-assed coward, then I wouldn’t have been able to fight for Kalifa and Ilya like this. So, I’m glad… All I have to do now is prove myself.

“I’ve stayed here while my buddies are in trouble, so I gotta make the ones who kept me around here believe they made the right choice.” He thrust his tightly clenched fist forward and stepped toward the men. The sole of his shoe, infused with the Flow Method, carved the earth beneath him as the men tensed in anticipation. With tremendous force, Gaston struck his mighty fist before him.

“Hraaah!!”

With Gaston’s war cry, a man was punched into the sky.

19

“So, why don’t you tell me what happened? Maybe we can help,” Felt said as she took a seat on the dusty staircase steps, her clothes still covered in blood.

However, the small gray-brown-haired man to whom the question had been directed made a sour face. “Thank you. I appreciate the sentiment, but…”

“But?” Felt tilted her head at the hesitant response. “But, what? You got something you wanna say?”

“Of course I do! I appreciate that you haven’t reported me to anyone before giving me a chance to tell my side of the story, but what is it with this treatment? What did I do to deserve this?!" the small man exclaimed as he swung his legs around.

He could swing his legs like this because they weren't actually touching the floor. They had bound and suspended him from the second floor of the mansion.

"Well, we still gotta be cautious. There's no telling what a magic user might try to pull if given the chance. But if you try something up there, you'll at least hit the floor first before you can do anything. That'll make it easier for us to deal with you."

"What do you have to worry about when you have the Sword Saint with you?! You're just having fun hanging me!"

"Yes."

"Yes?"

The name of the man responding to Felt's words was Ezzo Cadner—a dwarf magic user and currently the most wanted man by three of the largest underground syndicates in the city of Flanders. His charges ranged from arson, murder, and various other offenses.

"I am aware that I'm a criminal awaiting judgment, but this treatment is too cruel! I demand immediate relea…ugh."

"Mr. Ezzo, please remain calm. We found the rope in this old mansion, which could snap at any moment, and you yourself are gravely injured."

Turning his pale face up, Ezzo glared at Reinhard, who held the rope. "That's… something you should be telling your mistress, Sir Sword Saint…"

"Good point." The Sword Saint nodded. "Lady Felt, I must agree, this treatment is a little uncalled for. I also don't feel comfortable treating a magic user as skilled as Mr. Ezzo like this. If you are only fooling around, maybe it's time we stop…"

"Don't say anythin' more, Reinhard. Felt ain't just foolin' around.

Jus' like you said, he's a skilled magic user, and since we can't cover his mouth, we gotta at least tie 'im up so he won't be able to move. Just 'cause you can take him on, don't mean you should underestimate yer enemy."

"Rachins…"

The one who opposed Reinhard's request on behalf of Felt was a delinquent-looking man—Rachins. He sucked his teeth at the sight of Ezzo hanging below his feet. "I went through hell 'cause of you. Camberley is goin' through it as we speak. You better start talkin' now, or I swear Imma make you go through the same thing."

"Camberley… I see, my dwarven brother is…"

Ezzo's vexation and exhaustion seemed to fade at hearing Rachins's spiteful words. His face regained some color and showed more composure as he let out a deep sigh. "I understand. Though many parts of it may sound unbelievable, I will tell you everything I know."

"Why so cooperative all of a sudden?" asked Felt.

"He's in danger as a consequence of helping me. If I don't do anything to return the favor, even a little, I wouldn't be able to live with myself."

Felt narrowed her eyes at this dramatic statement, initially skeptical, but she could hear the earnestness in his tone. She then signaled Reinhard with her eyes, and with that, he lowered Ezzo to the floor and unbound him. Finally free from his bindings, Ezzo examined the wound on his right arm. Though there was gauze wrapped around it, he could see that his injury was dire nonetheless.

"This is a treatment done by a very skilled individual. Who did this?"

"One of our twins. She went out to get me some new clothes, so she ain't here right now. If you wanna thank her, do so later yourself."

"New clothes… Right, that blood on you is mine. My apologies."

"Don't worry about it," she said, brushing off his apology. "You said you'll tell us everything you know, right?"

Ezzo's face grew solemn as he continued. "First, you may not believe me when I say this, but there's something I need you to know. The arsonist who burnt down the brothel of the Flower Prison Garden and killed so many…that…that wasn't me!"

"Oh, yeah, I know. You can skip that part."

"You know?" Ezzo froze at Felt's blunt words.

Reinhard walked over to Felt and looked as though he was about to criticize her for her bluntness. "My lady…"

"What?" Felt bared her fang at the knight's presence. "We ain't got the time to be wastin' on something that's already happened. We already decided we're lookin' into this matter based on his innocence, right? Then we gotta move on from that."

"I agree with your splendid decision, Lady Felt, but…how do I put this… You've glossed over such a large portion of our side of the story, you've caused Mr. Ezzo a bit of confusion."

At Reinhard's comment, Felt looked at Ezzo with disappointment. "Confusion? What's there to be confused about? I thought all magic users were supposed to be intelligent."

Receiving attention from both of them, Ezzo placed his hand on his head. "Wait wait wait. So what you're saying is that you're asking for my side of the story and not my defense? And that you've already decided to trust me and are willing to help me catch the real culprit?"

Felt widened her eyes. "Ah, uhm…? Yeah, I guess?" she responded, perplexed by Ezzo's speedy rational assessment of his own situation. Reinhard was also astonished by his accurate ability to objectively see the whole picture.

Ezzo, however, grew suspicious of the story that sounded too good to be true for him. "Why? Why would you trust me so easily?"

"…"

"You and I have only met once in the past. I can't even say you were particularly on good terms with my kin who helped me. So why would you hear me out, even when it defies the will of the Big Three?"

None of this makes sense. Ezzo's skeptical eyes pierced at Felt.

From his perspective, there was no telling who was on his side or not—no, there should have been no one on his side. There were only enemies. It was obvious he'd be immediately skeptical if anyone appeared and claimed to trust him.

Felt also had no intention of nosing around to find the truth of that disaster in the red-light district initially, but when she came and saw Ezzo in person—

"There must be a part of you that still thinks…I'm a cold-blooded killer who burned many people alive."

"Nah, there ain't. At least not after I heard your desperate cry."

"Desperate…cry…?" Ezzo furrowed his brows, apparently unaware of what Felt was saying. The blood loss seemed to have made him forget about what he said before losing consciousness: his raging vow to avenge his student.

—It's stupid to even suspect him after hearin' something like that, Felt thought.

So if there was anything she needed to ask Ezzo, it was one thing—only one. "I don't care for complicated shit. We already made up our minds. So you're the only one left. Are you in or are you out?"

"I'm…"

"I can kinda guess the shit you're in right now. You ain't able to make a move while bein' hunted by the Flower Garden Prison or the Black Silver Coin and whatnot, right? And I also get that you're probably still rattled from gettin' caught by us with all that goin' on—but if you don't accept our help right here, right now, then this discussion is over."

"—!"

"Just so you know, I don't care either way."

Ezzo's expression changed as though he was struck by lightning when he heard Felt's firm position on the matter. She had already made up her mind.

With Camberley caught, Felt was driven to solve the case. All that was left was for Ezzo to decide whether he would be there to witness her solve this case or not.

Yet, if the anguished words he howled from a pool of his own blood were genuine, there could only be a single answer for Ezzo—

"—I kneel before you and ask for your strength, Miss Felt. I, the magic user Ezzo "The Gray" Cadner, swear on my life that I will repay my gratitude." Ezzo dropped to one knee before Felt at the base of the stairs. She tried to mask her relief when seeing his completely sincere face looking up at her. Reinhard, however, admiringly gazed at his mistress's face from the side. Whether he could understand their trust in him or not, he accepted their help. Kneeling before this mistress and servant, Ezzo continued in his booming voice. "—Please, help me avenge the death of my beloved student, Mimosa."

With that, Ezzo Cadner bowed his head and started talking. He told them everything he knew about what happened to him and his student on the night of the fire.

20

"As you already know, I had been working as a guard in the red-light district after being tricked by your comrade…my kin. Well, on that night, after I finished my normal patrol, I headed over to my students' rooms—the girls I'd been teaching to read and write—to collect their homework. Then brought all of it back to my sleeping area to grade them."

Felt and Reinhard had already heard about this side job of his the other day when they met at the Flower Prison Garden, completely aside from his contract there.

Dissatisfied with his workload as a guard, Ezzo had voluntarily started teaching some of the prostitutes. He became quite popular for doing this and once mentioned he gained great satisfaction from it. He also noted one particular student of his who dreamed of opening a flower shop one day, the young girl Mimosa.

“My sleeping area was in the building that burned down. Even though it was operating under the name of the Flower Prison Garden, that brothel was relatively cheap compared to other places… So it also attracted rude customers who caused trouble.”

Ezzo was placed in this brothel in case such problems arose. Evidently, his presence alone significantly worked as a deterrent and the usual trouble here became almost nonexistent. Ironically, less trouble meant less work to keep him occupied, but he wasn’t one to complain about peace. So, once he finished grading all the homework assignments, he was ready for a late bedtime as usual—and that’s when he noticed something.

“Once the flower and her customer enter their room, it becomes a place almost detached from the real world, if you will. Usually, it would be insolent for an outsider to intrude in such a place, but on that night I had an eerie feeling I couldn’t shake off, and before I knew it, I rushed into one of the rooms. Unfortunately, when I arrived, the customer was already dead, and Mimosa, who was supposed to be attending him, was…” Ezzo stopped his words and pinched between his brows. He became silent, but that was for no more than a few seconds. He quickly put back on a serious face, with regret and grief showing only in his eyes, and continued. “—Mimosa was lying on her side, gasping for air. I rushed to her and attempted to heal the wound on her chest. But my healing magic didn’t activate… All I could do was press on the wound to stop the bleeding—but it was too late for her.” He paused. “Her lung was ruptured and air was leaking out,” he added, weakly.

He added that he found a short sword thin as a needle lying next to her, which he believed was used to impale her.

"I couldn't do anything for Mimosa. She kept apologizing deliriously. That girl was in agony till the very end. All she could do was keep scratching her pathetic teacher's chest until…she stopped moving."

"It was a miserable death. Mimosa died, gasping for her last breath," Ezzo added. "It was an unforgivable sight. But what was more unforgivable was what came after. I was too distracted by Mimosa's death and failed to notice the assassin hidden in the room."

As a result, Ezzo failed to dodge the assassin's strike from behind and received a blow to the back of his head. He attempted to strike back, but his magic was once again inactive and he lost consciousness.

When he regained his senses—

"The building was on fire, and I was right in the middle of the burning brothel. I instinctively carried Mimosa's body and the thin short sword, and made my escape outside. That's when…"

"—The people from the Flower Prison Garden found you," Felt finished his sentence.

"You may think I could've surrendered and waited for my chance to explain myself… but I couldn't. If I did, the assassin might have gotten away while I wasted time trying to prove my innocence. I just couldn't let that happen."

Ezzo, face covered in black soot from the smoke, quickly analyzed the terrible predicament he was in. The customer who died in the room was a member of the Black Silver Coin. Many members from The Balance were also in the building that night. He deduced that whoever was behind this was going to frame him for both Mimosa's murder and setting fire to the brothel.

"If I stuck around, I feared there would be no way to avenge Mimosa," Ezzo said, remembering his feelings that night. "I just, couldn't, allow that."

—A sinner must be punished appropriately.

This was an unwritten code amongst demi-humans; a bloody oath etched deeply in the soul of anyone with tainted blood running through their veins. Ezzo had always despised such philosophy, arguing it to be barbaric, but that night he could not deny the irrepressible bloodlust he was feeling.

Retaliate! his blood screamed. Retaliate! his soul commanded. Retaliate! he howled.

“Before I knew it, I broke out of the people circling me, and made my escape out of the red-light district. That’s when I ran into my kin and him right there,” said Ezzo, referring to Rachins. “I’m here today because of them.”

“Then, you asked that shady-ass Golden Beetle bunch for help and ended up hidin’ here. Am I right?”

“Exactly. Miss Helaine from the Golden Beetle can be trusted so long as we share a common interest. Besides…”

“…Besides?” Felt prompted Ezzo as he suddenly stopped his words. Ezzo, however, hesitated to continue.

Irritated by such an indecisive attitude, Felt was ready to open her mouth, but before she could have the chance… “Mr. Ezzo, we have already made up our minds. We’re not going to back out now, no matter what you tell us,” Reinhard chimed in, using Felt’s words. He then glanced at his mistress, to which she huffed sharply through her nose and nodded.

“You’re right…” Ezzo sighed at the unwavering resolution of this mistress and servant, and continued. “I couldn’t rely on anyone other than the Golden Beetle. The assassin is someone from one of the Big Three… And they’re also connected to the recent incidents happening in the city.”

“—! You serious? This better not be a lie.” Rachins’s face twisted in shock as he processed what Ezzo had just said.

Rachins’s reaction was natural for anyone. It was generally believed in the city of Flanders that the Big Three was being attacked by a third party. Ezzo's testimony, if true, would overturn this premise and even shift the balance of power within the metropolis.

Rachins held his head in confusion. "But, everyone thinks it's a third party, right? Since all three groups were attacked?"

"It's so they can act like a victim too," Felt said. She began to feel sick at the culprits' underhanded tactic. "Who's your source?"

"Mimosa," answered Ezzo. His short, one-name answer only made her feel worse. He made a bitter face. "Mimosa kept apologizing even as death loomed before her. She said she lent a hand in a plan that could endanger me, her close colleagues…and even the city itself."

"Lending a hand in a plan… So you think they killed her to keep her from talkin'?" Felt asked.

"She wasn't the deceitful type. I'd like to believe she was just being used without even knowing."

"Whatever it was, people died because of her," she retorted. "It's way past the point of just being used…but—"

—How did a mere prostitute like Mimosa get such sensitive information like that? Her face soured at these newfound revelations. It's not like I'm gonna back out now after all this, but…

"I really don't like that things are turnin' out exactly like that snake-eyed asshole Safis predicted. We're gonna end up going against the underworld for helpin' Ezzo, right?"

"I suppose there's no way around that," Reinhard agreed. "However, if we are to take Mr. Doltero and Safis's warning into consideration…"

"We can scratch off the Black Silver Coin from the list of suspects," Felt replied, finishing Reinhard's thought. "I also want to scratch off the Flower Prison Garden's name too, since it was their building that burned down…"

"I'm afraid that wouldn't be wise. The Flower Prison Garden would have had the most opportunity to use Mimosa and, as much as it hurts to say this… She was…expendable," Reinhard said painfully. He looked distraught at the thought of treating human life as a mere tool. Felt and Rachins, on the other hand, were not so fazed by the whole ordeal.

They understood better than Reinhard that Mimosa's death was perfect for the Flower Prison Garden to obtain victim status, and that a mere prostitute's life was only a toy to certain sinister people.

Rachins appeared to finally process the situation. "I get it now," he said as he turned to Ezzo. "But how can you avenge 'er bein' cramped up in a dump like this?" He then gestured at the mansion and narrowed his sanpaku eyes. "Hidin' is fine and all, but how're you gonna look for anyone 'ere?"

"I asked the Golden Beetle's cooperation for that, as well," answered Ezzo. "The enemy has killed their confidant to keep their secret and found me to blame everything on. Their next move would most likely be to escape the city, so I asked them to notify me if they saw anyone from the Big Three try to leave the metropolis."

"That bitch didn't say anything about that to us…" Felt seethed as Helaine's condescending, fake smile popped up in her head.

"Helaine from the Golden Beetle, huh…" Rachins muttered to himself, looking like he was deep in thought.

Glancing at him from the corner of her eye, Felt scratched her head in frustration. "That's one more thing we gotta go and ask her."

"She'll probably demand an information fee when we do…" Reinhard added.

"If she does, I'll just offer her a Sword Saint and get Romy back for the price difference."

Reinhard let out hesitant laughter, unsure of whether Felt was joking or not. It was at that exact moment—

"…" Reinhard's expression completely changed. His piercing blue eyes focused on the main entrance to the mansion as if to look beyond the door. He narrowed his eyes and spoke in a low voice. "Lady Felt, we're being surrounded. There's at least 100 of them."

The door was closed and the outside was out of their view, but Felt widened her eyes at her knight's report. "What?"

Rachins sucked his teeth and rushed to the window. "Shit! He ain't lyin'! I can't tell the number but…they're members o' the Big Three!"

"Members from the Big Three? You mean, it's a group of members mixed together? Why are there so many people here…"

"They must have found out that I was hidden here," Ezzo muttered at Felt's question.

Felt's mind wandered to Flam, who was out on an errand. Did something happen to her? Did she give this place up?

"Lady Felt, Flam is quite competent." As if to read her mind, Reinhard jumped to defend the young chamberlain. "She would have never allowed us to be ambushed like this if she had known. I believe this is unrelated to her."

"Then who the hell did…" As if struck by lightning, a thought jolted Felt before she could finish her question. The face of a sketchy woman in black clothes popped up in her head. "That disloyal bitch!!!"

She was the type of woman who would sell anything for the right price. If someone had asked for information on Ezzo, the first thing she would have considered was the cost-benefit analysis.

"Yo yo yo yo yo, the hell're we gonna do? The Big Three are all out there! No way we could talk ourselves out of this if they find us!" Rachins screamed in a panic.

Felt began to brainstorm ways to escape.

Irrelevant to Helaine's intentions, the situation was unfavorable.

Felt's party had no chance to persuade this entire squad from the underworld to back off, not once they were seen together with Ezzo. They would be apprehended on the spot, and worst of all, the real culprit would escape out of the city while they try to prove their innocence; the fate Ezzo had feared the most.

Should we just go out before they come bargin' in and try to negotiate with them? Felt considered a preemptive move. No, they wouldn't even consider a negotiation unless we threaten 'em with somethin' equally or more damagin' than lettin' us go…

"Lady Felt." Reinhard called out her name from the side as she racked her brain.

He said no more, but Felt understood right away what he wanted to say: use my name and reputation.

Reinhard's martial might was known to all. The only thing Felt needed to do was hide behind his status and the people outside would be more than willing to negotiate.

Simply put, Felt had always had the upper hand. A simple command from her and Reinhard would have dismantled the entire underworld in less than a day. His name was more than enough to force their way out of this situation.

—That is, if she was willing to take advantage of Reinhard's overwhelming power for her own agenda and walk the path of a tyrant.

"Heh, as if. There's no way in hell I'm gonna do somethin' that lame." Felt stood up on the steps and looked down at Reinhard. This was something unusual for both of them for their height difference.

Reinhard had a puzzled look on his face, awaiting what he thought would be an order from Felt. She secretly enjoyed this expression on him.

"We can't have them find us together with Ezzo, right now. We gotta do something to get out of this mess," Felt declared.

"You say do somethin' but that's exactly the problem! The hell're we gonna do? They're professionals when it comes to cornering their target. Not a single cat can get away under their watch!"

"Rachins is right. Lady Felt, please use my name this once…"

"And I'm sayin' that I don't wanna do that… Wait, that's it!" Felt snapped her fingers.

It was true that if she used Reinhard's reputation, the people outside would have no choice but to falter. What she feared was if she allowed herself to resort to this method once, she would do it again and again until she saw this red-haired young man as nothing but a masthead. So, when she came up with an idea that would avoid using this method, she couldn't hide her excitement.

"Yo, Gray! You're an advanced magic user, right?" Felt asked with a wide smile that showed her fang. The men looked at her skeptically. "Then can you make a mask strong enough that it won't break in a fight?"

Her eyes were sparkling with enthusiasm.

21

—This was the exact moment when death suddenly became all too real to the men surrounding the old mansion.

Every one of the men there held a weapon and stood ready to attack and capture the wanted dwarf supposedly hiding in the building. More than 200 members had been gathered for this mission. That dwarf had tarnished the names and reputations of the Big Three that ran the city. Normally they would never stand side by side, but on this particular occasion, they stood together with one goal in mind.

None of the 200 members expected the capture of a single dwarf to be a difficult task. The only thing they had in mind was who would be the one to capture the fugitive, and which syndicate would take the credit.

—But now they stood frozen in place, even forgetting to breathe.

"I don't wish to hurt any… I don't wanna hurt no one, but I have a favor… You better do what I tell you to do," said the young man who stood tall and proud at the entrance of the mansion. His voice resonated across the area to every gathered man. He neither wielded a weapon nor was heavily armored, wearing only light, white clothing that exhibited a slim, toned body… Were it not for the funny-looking mask tightly covering his face, there was nothing out of the ordinary about the young man.

"…"

The young man's strange appearance and his awkward speech pattern would normally have been an invitation for the men to attack, but none of them dared to make a move. They lived in the world of violence long enough to know not to make an enemy out of the young man.

One mistake, and we're dead. They instinctively understood the monstrous danger the young man posed.

"This presence…and red hair…? Are you…" One of the men spoke up in a shaking voice.

The young man nodded to his question. "Allow me to introduce myself. My name is… I'm.."

The men gulped, eager to hear his next words.

"I'm the Masked Knight Veltol," proclaimed the young man, holding a hand to his mask. An overwhelming presence emanated from him as he spoke.

"…What?" One of the men voiced exactly how everyone was feeling.

The men were all bewildered by the unexpected name they were given. With his presence and appearance, there was only one name they expected.

"W-Wait! Aren't you…aren't you the Sword Saint?"

"Nah, I'm the Masked Knight Veltol."

“The Masked…Knight?”

“I have no idea what you folks are referring to. However, if you want to confirm my identity, come and try to unmask me.”

The men were stunned into silence. This was partially due to confusion at the inconsistency of the young man’s speech pattern, and largely due to his glare; they felt completely paralyzed, as if trapped in a never-ending nightmare.

The Masked Knight shrugged his shoulders at the men incapacitated by his gaze. “One more thing: though I feel bad about doing this, I’m going to have to knock each and every one of you out… Hope you understand.”

“The hell are you sayi…” As one of the men voiced his objection to the Masked Knight’s absurd declaration, he suddenly felt as though he was losing consciousness. “What the…?”

Though the man managed to pull himself together before completely blacking out, the same could not be said about the person next to him who was on the ground with his eyes rolled back—in fact, he was not alone. One after another, men collapsed all around, with only a little more than half of the 200 men remaining standing by the end of it.

“—More than half of you remain. I’m impressed. You possess a much stronger core than I expected,” muttered the Masked Knight to himself in surprise after knocking out nearly 100 people just by glaring as he looked around at the men still standing.

“U-Uwahhhhhhh!” One of the men suddenly charged at the Masked Knight with his weapon raised. This last comment acted as the final nudge for him to lose his mind, along with several others who followed this insanity.

“Guys, at least go in with a plan…!” cried out one of the members who managed to remain composed, but it was already too late.

The man charging in front swung his broadsword down at the Masked Knight, only for it to be stopped with a bare hand. The men watching could not comprehend what they'd just witnessed. The rest of the men who charged followed suit and swung their weapons one after another. Echoes of clashing and shattering steel cut through the air as their weapons broke to pieces. Again, none of them were able to comprehend what had just happened.

"Hmph!" The Masked Knight exhaled sharply as he forcefully stepped on the ground. The shockwave from his step blasted his attackers away, knocking a dozen men out cold.

The men on the sidelines looked at the Masked Knight who hadn't moved a step from where he started. They tried to process the idea that all he did so far was step on the ground with some force.

"The truth is, I have been feeling guilty," the Masked Knight suddenly muttered suggestively.

Feeling guilty about what? the men wondered. About your absurdly broken, unfair strength? Or about using some ridiculous alias like 'Masked Knight'?

"There've been many moments recently where my existence has caused my friends a great deal of trouble. I'm deeply embarrassed by my powerlessness to do anything about this. I must reflect on it accordingly."

The men were dispirited to learn their speculation was far off the mark. His shame had nothing to do with them. More than anything, they were dispirited by the fact he called himself 'powerless' in the wake of this domination. He stood among more than a hundred men he'd knocked out while barely moving his body. Nothing made sense anymore.

"…Yo, all of you, attack him on my cue," one of the members called on the others. There was no telling who was in which syndicate at this point, but none of that mattered anymore. They were all in this together.

"You serious? Isn't it better to look for an escape…?" another member asked.

However, the man who suggested an all-out attack made a bitter face. “You really think we can run away from this monster?”

“Impossible,” another member answered. “But it’s not like we can do anything to that thing even if we all attacked together.”

Only the hardiest of members were left standing and they could accurately assess what was going on. They knew well enough it was time to leave their egos aside. This was a war between a group of rats and a monstrous tiger.

“Yeah.” The first man nodded, well aware of the situation. “But imagine…just imagine if we manage to land even a single cut on him and live to tell the tale… That’ll be a story to tell for the rest of our lives.”

“Nice… I like it… I’m in,” one of the members answered; all the men smiled vulgarly and nodded in agreement.

A moment later, they all charged.

“Uwaahhhhhhhhhh!”

Countless attacks flashed towards the Masked Knight as he was quickly surrounded. He let out a faint smile at this and prepared himself for a counterattack.

—A few days later, one of the survivors spoke about the event in a bar. “Walking on air is just too unfair, man.”

22

“You don’t wanna use him as a bargainin’ chip, but you got no problem usin’ him to knock everyone out, huh? I really don’t get you sometimes, Boss Lady,” Rachins muttered as he ran with a horrified expression. He was taken aback by witnessing the aftermath of Reinhard’s actions. The entire group of 200 enemies lay defeated on the ground, out cold as the party fled. They had been running ever since they escaped from the mansion.

“It’s fine,” Felt responded as she stuck her tongue out. “Now, even if they accuse us of anything, we could just say the Masked Knight did it. They can’t prove we were there or that Reinhard did all that.”

“What if they say only Reinhard is capable of doin’ somethin’ like that?”

“They can say whatever they want. Like I said, they have no proof or witnesses. Why do you think I made him wear a mask? Right, Mr. Masked Knight?

“Yes, I believe I was able to deal with the problem without anyone seeing my face,” Reinhard answered, fiddling with the mask in his palm as he spoke. It was a mask created by Ezzo’s magic, which effectively hid his identity.

Felt had taken advantage of Reinhard’s overwhelming abilities, but without relying on his reputation.

“It’s lame to threaten people with Reinhard outright, but it sure feels good to deny using him.” Felt was amused by this whole situation and glanced at Reinhard, who ran beside her. “You looked like you were enjoyin’ yourself too. Maybe we oughta bring Masked Knighty back out every now and then.”

Reinhard shook his head at Felt’s proposal. “I’m glad to have assisted in your plan, my lady, but there will be no next time—my powers are far too dangerous to use anonymously. That’s a dangerous way of thinking.”

“…” Felt realized she was getting carried away and restrained herself.

“…So where are we going now? Is there a place you have in mind?” Ezzo chimed in from the back. His face grew more pale as he struggled to keep up with them.

Although they managed to escape from the surrounded mansion with Reinhard’s—The Masked Knight’s—hard work, their situation remained unfavorable nonetheless. Their first course of action was to find a new hideout for Ezzo as soon as possible and avoid being seen in public with him.

“I guess the safest place right now is the Black Silver Coin,” Felt responded to Ezzo's question. "Let's tell 'em what we know, ask 'em to hide you, then go talk to that Golden Pest again."

"Kinda awkward to go and ask for their help after all we did…" Rachins muttered.

"Shuuut up," Felt spat in frustration. "The Masked Knight did it. So you apologize, Reinhard."

Reinhard nodded. "Sure. I will apologize on behalf of that masked gentleman."

Despite a slight detour from the main topic, they continued to plan their next move. By the time their discussion came to an end and they decided to visit the Black Silver Coin, they came to a halt in a back alley, hidden from the public eye.

Then suddenly… "Lady Felt! Young Master!" someone called them from behind. They quickly turned around and saw the silhouette of a young girl approaching them. Flam had found them once again after they fled the chaotic scene at the mansion.

"Flam!" Reinhard called her name. "I'm glad you're okay. Are you unharmed?"

"Yes, I'm glad to see you're all doing well too, Young Master… But there's urgent news you need to hear." She was clearly panicked and cut the greetings short. Felt was surprised to see her so flustered. Flam had always been so composed in every situation, despite her age.

Reinhard placed his hand on her shoulders and lowered his eye level to hers. "Flam, calm down. Just tell us what happened, okay?"

Flam slowed her breathing and collected herself in the wake of his words. As expected from someone who's known her for a long time, Reinhard knew exactly how to calm down this young chamberlain.

As her breathing normalized, her expression grew solemn. "I received a telepathic message from Grassis back at the mansion—she said Mister Gaston and the rest were attacked by an unknown assailant, and Miss Kalifa was taken."

—The Divine Protection of Mindspeak is the unique power the twin chamberlains of Astrea Manor, Flam and Grassis, possess. This divine protection allows them to send a verbal message to each other once a day, unimpeded by the physical distance between them. Thus, the emergency at the mansion was relayed to Felt and the others.

Felt grit her teeth at Flam's report. We're always a step behind.

According to Grassis's message, though not life-threatening, Gaston was critically injured and unconscious. He resisted fiercely against the assailants and managed to protect Ilya, but Kalifa was kidnapped.

There's no way this raid and the recent attack on the Black Silver Coin aren't connected. Felt quickly interpreted this as an attack on the Black Silver Coin. It was evident to her that Ilya and Kalifa were the targets, and not necessarily Felt's party. But these two were family to her, and she had no intention of sitting idly by and doing nothing. Her patience had officially reached a boiling point, and her motivation peaked.

"…Your nerves of steel truly astound me," Safis said as soon as he walked into the drawing room to greet the visitors he'd been informed of. There was a hint of shock in his tone and demeanor, a stark contrast from his usual cold impression. "After you took in a fugitive, you single-handedly dismantled a large number of our forces. Now you come to see us as if nothing happened. Please, would you be so kind as to tell me your secret on how to be so audacious…guoh?!!"

As he finished the venomously sarcastic breakdown of events, Felt grabbed Safis by the collar and shoved him against the wall. She was in no mood to humor his sharp tongue.

"What are you…doing…?"

"I don't have time for your snarky bullshit right now. So listen carefully and just answer my question. Are you the one targeting Ilya and Kalifa, again?”

Safis paused. “I see. No wonder you are so worked up.” As suffocating as it was to be interrogated like this, Felt’s question allowed him to connect the dots. “I’m afraid I’m unrelated to this matter. As attractive as the idea is to again be the target of the Boss’s anger…there’s no point if I am also endangering his status.”

Felt continued to glare at Safis, gauging the authenticity in his words.

“My wish is for the Boss to reign over the metropolis as long as possible. No more, no less.”

Felt sucked her teeth. “Fuckin’ pervert.” She spat out her words in disgust and let him loose.

“Now,” started the snake-eyed man as he rubbed his neck and fixed his suit. “Based on your little outburst there, I assume that the mother and daughter in question were attacked? And that something has happened to them?”

“You really are keen,” said Reinhard. “So much so that it makes your last testimony suspicious.”

“If only I had the courage to attempt deceiving the Sword Saint after all this.” Safis raised his hands at Reinhard’s accusatory suggestion. “But, I see…that mother and daughter has… This is why I told the Boss many times that they’d be a liability.”

Felt stayed silent as Safis continued to babble. Despite her knowing that Ilya and Kalifa would constantly be in danger, she’d chosen to take them in and vowed to protect them from all harm. But now, she’d broken her vow.

“So this would mean the enemy’s true target is the Black Silver Coin… Were the attacks on the other syndicates merely a distraction?” Safis speculated. “By the way, how are you two intending to explain the ruckus you caused at the mansion?”

“The mansion? I don’t know what you’re talkin’ about. We have nothin’ to do with the Masked Knight.”

“I can’t believe you’re actually using that as your defense… Does this also mean you have no intention of explaining your relationship with the fugitive? And, if that’s the case, am I to assume that you’re working against us?” Safis asked in a cold-emotionless voice as he glared at Felt and Reinhard.

His eyes lacked any sign of the playfulness seen there a moment ago. Only pure hostility remained in this assessment of their allegiance.

Felt pursed her lips at his gaze. “Don’t start. Remember that we can kick your ass any day if we were to fight head-on.”

“Her Ladyship wishes to maintain balance,” said Reinhard. “Think of the Masked Knight as a gesture of her intention. Just imagine if he wasn’t there and it was me who had fought…”

“An all-out war would have been unavoidable, right?” Safis finished Reinhard’s thought. “But surely there must have been other methods…”

“I’m pretty sure I chose the most effective yet peaceful method.” Felt crossed her arms and smirked unapologetically.

Safis sighed and shook his head, having lost his animosity at the sight of her cheeky smile. “If you’re going this much out of your way to cover up for that dwarf… You must really believe he’s innocent.”

“He was framed by the real culprit behind all this. He’s in our custody right now and pumped to punish the real culprit.”

“Interesting. For being framed?”

Felt paused. “Apparently his favorite prostitute was murdered before the building went up in flames.”

She answered in a way that might cause a misunderstanding, but explaining Ezzo and Mimosa’s relationship would be too complicated in one sitting. She figured this simple explanation would suffice.

"Revenge." Safis let out an eerie smile. "Nice, it's my favorite type of motivation."

"We get it, you're a pervert," said Felt. "Anyways, that's the whole picture."

"I understand. I will make sure to keep my subordinates off of the fugitive. Moving on to the mother and daughter, are they…"

"The daughter is safe. The mother was kidnapped."

Felt decided to share all the information she had at the moment with Safis. As much as she hated to admit it, he was the only person in the Black Silver Coin who had the most updated and accurate grasp on Doltero's life. He understood that Ilya and Kalifa were Doltero's pressure points, and they had to be rescued at once.

"That's strange," muttered Safis after hearing Felt's report.

"Strange? Is there something that bothers you?" Reinhard asked.

"There's no doubt the kidnapper is going after the Boss considering their target, but the information about them isn't known to the public. I haven't heard of any leaks, either, so why were they targeted?"

"That's…true," Felt said.

"Besides, if they managed to get ahold of the mother, they should have made some sort of threat to the Black Silver Coin right away. The fact that we haven't received such a thing is strange."

Despite his sick personality, Safis was an intelligent man. Felt agreed with his line of reasoning and scrunched her brows at the opponent's unclear intentions. They each pondered a moment about why the kidnappers hadn't taken advantage of their first move.

"It's almost as if they don't know the relationship between Doltero and the two of them," Reinhard muttered.

It was merely a thoughtless comment, but Felt widened her eyes. "Maybe that's it."

“What?” Reinhard raised his brows at the unexpected response.

Felt looked up at him. “If the kidnappers knew Kalifa and Ilya were Doltero’s wife and kid, they would use them to blackmail him. But they haven’t done so ‘cause they don’t know their relationship.”

“But then why target them in the first place?” Safis questioned.

“They might not know the exact details of their relationship, but it was fine as long as they knew Ilya and Kalifa had somethin’ to do with Doltero,” Felt answered. “Say, Safis, didn’t one of your members die in the fire?”

Safis paused for a moment. “Yes. One of the old members did. I heard he went to buy a woman and was caught in the fire.”

“You know the name of the woman he bought?”

Safis remained skeptical at Felt’s line of questioning, but sensing she was on to something, he jogged his memories to find the answer to her question.

“He said something about receiving a letter from her. Something she had just learned how to do. I believe her name was…”

“Mimosa.” Without waiting for Safis to answer, Reinhard arrived at the same conclusion and said her name.

“Ah.” Safis nodded. “Yes, that’s the name of the prostitute. I heard she also died, but… I see,” he said, as that rang a bell for him.

Felt and Reinhard stared intently at him. Safis let out a small sigh. “The man who died didn’t know about the Boss’s relationship with the mother and daughter. He was, however, standing guard at the mansion the night when you came and visited the Boss with them.”

“In other words, he may not have known the exact nature of their relationship but…”

“He knew they were related to the Boss in some way or another. It’s certainly possible he may have leaked it to some prostitute during their pillow talk. What a pity I can’t kill him twice,” Safis said in a cold rage, cursing his subordinate who unforgivably leaked classified information.

That guy woulda experienced something way worse than death had he not died that night. Seeing Safis's face up close as he talked about his subordinate, Felt couldn't help but praise the dead man's luck.

"In any case, now we know why Mimosa kept apologizin' to Ezzo," Felt said, remembering Ezzo's recount of her last moment. "She was probably collectin' information from her customers in that fashion and sharin' it with someone."

"We would need to talk to Mimosa's employer…the owner of the Flower Prison Garden to understand further details," said Reinhard.

"Kinda like goin' in circles, huh? Although I can't imagine they'll be easier to see than the people here." As she gained a better understanding of the whole picture, Felt considered the possibility of not being able to secure a meeting with them. Unlike the Black Silver Coin, who they shared a secret with, they remained neutral with the Flower Prison Garden—actually, their relationship worsened after the incident at the old mansion.

"By the way, there's only the two of you here today… Where's the fugitive in question? It must be nearly impossible to find a hiding place in the city right now."

"Ah right, there's that too. I wanna talk to you about that later, but he's fine for now."

Noticing Felt and Reinhard alone had come to see him at the headquarters of the Black Silver Coin, Safis grew suspicious at the whereabouts of the dwarf in the middle of all this. Felt agreed with his sentiment. Having lost the old mansion as a hideout, Ezzo was in need of a new refuge.

"We couldn't bring him here while we still suspected you of targeting Ilya and Kalifa, but now we can," Felt said.

"Well… I'm so very sorry for being so suspicious," Safis apologized half-heartedly.

“If you’re gonna apologize, just retire,” Felt retorted as she glared at him. “Anyways, we’re split into groups for now to stay discreet.”

Felt looked out the window. Ezzo was hidden away with Rachins somewhere for the time being, thanks to some of Rachins’s connections.

“There’s nothin’ to worry about at least for now. He lived in the slums before, too. I’m sure he’s doin’ fine,” Felt said about the absent dwarf. A small smile grew on her face, exposing her fang.

24

“My, my… How unexpected to see you here.” The woman in black with navy-green hair in pigtails smiled faintly in surprise; she turned to face the one who called her from behind.

“Yes, I’m sure even a woman of your caliber couldn’t anticipate my coming to see you, Miss Helaine.”

As her name was called, Helaine from the Golden Beetle narrowed her eyes. The person facing her was the most wanted man in the city—

“Mr. Ezzo Cadner, isn’t it dangerous for you to be walking in public like this?” Helaine said as she cautiously glanced around. “I’m afraid it is rather difficult, even for us, to provide you with real estate as discreet as the one we’ve already provided for you.”

The two were standing on a bustling street corner in the busy gambling quarter. Although it was not uncommon to see people standing and talking there, Helaine and Ezzo’s conspicuous appearances inevitably drew attention from passersby.

“Not to worry,” said Ezzo. “I’ve magically altered my facial features and controlled the wind to redirect attention from me. It’s nearly impossible to recognize me without conscious effort.”

“…Well well. As expected from Ezzo the Gray.”

"I'll take that as a compliment. Also, about the property that you provided… Unfortunately, a bunch of guests who I don't remember sharing my address decided to drop in, cutting my residence there short. I've been very curious as to where it could've leaked from…"

"Oh, if that's what you want to know, I have great news for you. I can give you that information right away—it was us," Helaine said unapologetically, making Ezzo's cheeks stiffen.

A moment of potent anger flashed through Ezzo, but he quickly released a deep sigh and regained his composure. "So, you decided I'm no longer of any worth to you?"

"Your worth hasn't changed. It's just that as a businesswoman, when presented with a choice, I have to make the decision that yields the least losses. Have you come to harbor a grudge against me?"

"I've always known you were that type of person. To be honest, I've asked for your help in the past, relying on that particular trait. I'd be a hypocrite to criticize you just because I'm on the receiving end of it now."

"That's certainly an admirable attitude. But then you should know, we can no longer provide any assistance to you, Mr. Ezzo—so why are you here?" Helaine tilted her head in confusion as she learned Ezzo was not there with ill intent.

"Right." Ezzo nodded slightly. "I'm here as a middleman and insurance. That'll be my sole role for today."

Following Ezzo's words, a young man appeared beside him.

"And I'm the one who's got business wit ya today," the young man said in a strong-willed voice.

Facing straight at this newcomer, Helaine's eyes widened slightly. He had light-pigmented hair, displeasing sanpaku eyes, and the overall stature of a ruffian that could be found anywhere.

"My, it's you. I remember you from the office from the other day," Helaine said. She faintly smiled, raised a finger on each hand, and waved them amusingly. “After you left, I got curious and did some research on you. You’re one of the servants Lady Felt brought from the Kingdom of Lugunica… There are at least two more servants similar to you, but unlike them, you have a hidden past.”

The ruffian stared silently at Helaine as she unveiled his life. Ezzo had no idea what was happening, so he simply stood back and continued to assess the situation.

“Rachins Hoffman. The eldest son of Rickert Hoffman, head of House Hoffman and Royal Tutor of the Kingdom of Lugunica,” Helaine declared. “What is a runaway noble such as yourself doing in a place like this?”

“The Royal Tutor…” Ezzo quietly uttered at the surprising revelation. He was thrown off by the significance of this casual narration from Helaine.

The Royal Tutor was a title given to those who had the authority to educate royalty. This position was usually passed down from the current generation to the next within a noble family. Being the eldest son of such a family effectively ensured his right to inherit the title.

“You’re one talkative woman alright. How’s it feel to be so fuckin’ condescendin’ talkin’ about someone else’s family he cut ties wit?” The eldest son sucked his teeth in irritation and made a sour face. “Besides, what good’s a tutor when all the royals’re dead? Fuckin’ ridiculous. It’s jus’ an empty title now.”

“…I see. You’re not very fond of your family. That was rather insensitive of me to bring up then. So, what business do you have with me today?”

“The fuck do ya think? If I’m talkin’ to a filthy moneylender like you, obviously I’m ‘ere to make a deal,” Rachins said, intending to intimidate his opponent.

However, Rachins’s aggressive demeanor caused no apparent change in Helaine’s expression. As a moneylender, she was used to dealing with hostile individuals.

“Very well,” Helaine said indifferently, then bowed her head. “However, it is currently outside of our business hours. We will be happy to schedule you for an appointment and have you at our office at another time…”

“Can’t say that’s a wise choice.” Rachins interrupted. “You sure the branch manager o’ the Golden Beetle’s ready to ignore a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity?”

Helaine paused. “A once-in-a-lifetime opportunity, you say?”

Her already squinting eyes narrowed even further at Rachins’s proposal. She furrowed her brow as she took note that his mistress and her knight were nowhere to be seen.

“Miss Candidate and her knight aren’t here… Can it be that your deal involves them?”

“Truth is, I’m fed up wit them. Nothin’s gon’ right ever since I’ve been wit ‘em. Now my two buddies been dragged into their mess, ‘n I’m gettin’ real tired of it. I want out.”

“So you’re telling me you want to sell them out? I am not so naive to easily believe a story like th—”

“That’s why I’m here as insurance,” Ezzo jumped to Rachins’s defense as Helaine was about to decline his offer. “I’m also fearful for my life. It’s true that I once wished to punish whoever framed me, but I can see that’s not going to happen. Fortunately, with your help, I can still find a way to escape.” He meant this to explain his reasoning for cooperating with Rachins.

“And why would you think that I would help you? It is wiser to simply hand you over to the Big Three. Not to mention, it’s also the most natural course of action.”

“In that event, Rachins will refuse to negotiate with you. Consequently, you’ll forfeit a prime opportunity by opting for the safer choice. A shameful decision for the Golden Beetle, I must say.”

Despite his small stature, Ezzo boldly pumped out his chest to which Helaine placed her hand over her mouth. “Oh, you’re good.”

With that, she fell completely silent and deep into thought. All signs of emotion disappeared from her slanted eyes. The sound of beads resonated in her head as she calculated the pros and cons. She explored a multitude of diverting paths in a complex web to evaluate whether to take the deal or not.

After considering all possibilities, she resurfaced to the real world and faced her opponents. "It's certainly an interesting proposition, but I'm still unsure whether it's worth the risk."

"…So, that's a no?" Ezzo asked.

"It's more that I'm swaying between the two options…" Helaine said mischievously. "So, Mr. Rachins, would you be willing to up the ante?" she suggested in a soft voice and clasped her hands together in front of her chest.

"Up the ante?" Rachins pursed his lips.

"Yes, yes!" Helaine raised her voice. "You want to make a deal with me and sell out your current mistress, as you don't see a future with her. Would you be willing to add the family you cut ties with as part of that deal?"

"…There ain't much I know about them."

"That's fine. I don't ask for much in this part of the deal. Let's see… How about one letter? You send your family just one letter of what I ask you to write."

Just one, but more than none, Rachins thought. Although he cut ties with them, he was still anxious as to how the letter would affect his family. He couldn't even begin to imagine how cruel a letter written by someone from the Golden Beetle would be.

"…"

Rachins's face started to cloud over as he considered her new condition. Seeing his hesitation, Ezzo tried to speak up, but before he could…

"Of course!" Helaine interjected. "It would be an embarrassment as a moneylender if I didn’t offer any interest after asking so much. So allow me to offer you another condition, which greatly works in your favor, Mr. Rachins.”

“Another condition?”

“Yes. By some luck, we are coincidentally in the gambling quarter, so…” Helaine spread her arms and gestured at their surroundings. The gambling quarter’s madness, enveloped by money, violence, and insanity, deepened her insidious smile. “Play a game with me. If you win, Mr. Rachins, I’ll make a deal including only the first condition. But if I win…” Helaine calmly closed the distance between them until they could feel each other’s breath. “You follow through with my second condition. How about it, Mr. Rachins Hoffman?”

Helaine stared at him with eyes of insanity. Rachins, trying his best not to be intimidated, forced a smile.

“Sounds interesting. I’m in,” he answered.

25

—The sudden resurgence of liveliness in the city of Flanders indicated the night was near.

“The night is coming. The time for us flowers to bloom and dance…”

The enchanting beauty Toto, head of the Flower Prison Garden, leaned on a windowsill overlooking the red-light district. She held her pipe in her mouth as she blew a puff of purple smoke, basking in the night air. Women in charming attire lined the street below, illuminated by the flickering magic lamps that aroused hope and excitement in the darkening city. Soon, men with bloodshot eyes of lustful desires would fill the red-light district, seeking to tear the aromatic flowers to pieces with their own hands. Toto found such a view to be incredibly pathetic.

The men must believe they are liberating the flowers, Toto thought. She knew better, though. Most men were manipulated by these flower petals, captivated by their honey, and exploited.

Toto had once been among the many flowers that bloomed in these streets. The only difference was that she possessed an immeasurable amount of talent as a woman, almost to the point that it was sad. Although her talents did not bring her happiness, they did allow a girl who came from nothing to rise up and rule one sector of the city.

She was ignorant to regular happiness and unhappiness. She was born with a congenital numbness that caused her body to almost nullify pain, agony, pleasure, fatigue, drugs, or even poison. They were all foreign to Toto. However, this allowed her to always have the upper hand in the bedroom, never having to stop.

“Miss Toto, you have a guest,” called a prostitute who had entered the manager’s room. “It’s Miss Candidate and Sir Sword Saint.”

“Ask them to leave. I already have an appointment tonight,” Toto ordered.

She had already heard about the incident at the mansion where a large force from the Big Three was obliterated.

They might have come to explain themselves, but I can’t let them have the initiative. The Flower Prison Garden must also make a move.

“If they don’t want to be cooperative, then I’ll just do what we do best.”

She tapped out the ash from her pipe, then put on a dress tailored for entertaining guests. This dress was not meant for facing guests as the owner, but rather explicitly to exploit someone, whether man or woman.

As she prepared herself, the woman once hailed as the Hundred Flowers of the red-light district began to make her way.

“…”

I need to plant poison. In order for the Flower Prison Garden and I to always come out on top no matter what happens. I will protect my flowers from ever getting bent again. I must be ready for anything. And if taking on the painful role of a woman is what it takes, then so be it.

“Are you ready, my dear customer? I, Toto of the Flower Prison Garden, will be your companion for the night.”

As she opened the door and let herself into the room in a fluid motion, the man bound to the bed vigorously shook his body in dismay.

The man had the signature small-statured body of a dwarf. He was a servant of a royal selection candidate and a perfect target to plant poison in.

The charming woman once called the Hundred Flowers smiled with cruel seduction, like that of an irresistible poisonous flower.

26

The gambling quarter, with its array of tempting games and high-stakes wagers, was overseen by The Balance, a formidable presence among the three major gambling organizations. An unspoken decree held sway even among organizations of similar standing, such as the Black Silver Coin and the Flower Prison Garden, who abided closely by its unwritten code. Not even the Golden Beetle was exempt, despite their position of privilege within the city of Flanders.

“That’s why I can assure you, without a shadow of a doubt, that you can wager with confidence, even against us.” So professed Helaine, the enigmatic woman of dark green locks, as she narrowed her eyes and offered a profound bow. Rachins clicked his tongue at her condescending demeanor.

Ever since his family was brought up in their conversation, Rachins’s mood had been visibly sour. What made it even worse was that they were brought up to exploit him and undermine the deal. However, if the deal were to crumble in light of such circumstances…

"If that were the case, there would be no reason for us not to hand over the wanted man, Ezzo, to The Balance right here and now," she remarked sharply.

"You bastard…" Rachins muttered under his breath.

"Then, Mr. Rachins, you would have nothing left, correct? You'd never learn whether your friend was safe or not. All you'd be left with is the wicked rumor that he betrayed his master. A painful position for you to be in, I must say," she said with a hint of satisfaction.

Helene touted the worst possible outcome with an audacious flair. Her unabashed attitude, devoid of any trace of remorse for the calamity her words could bring about, revealed a chilling lack of humanity. It all boiled down to position. Rachins had long anticipated that this would barely amount to a negotiation between equals.

"You're a greedy bitch, ain't ya?" Rachins spat with evident disdain. "Hope ya ain't expectin' a respectable death."

"People don't have the privilege of dictating their own demise," she replied coolly. "However, at this moment, there's an unmistakable disparity between you and me regarding which of us is closest to their demise. Now, once again, I ask: what would you like to do?"

Rachins raised his gaze, eyes narrowing as he observed the figures flanking him. Amongst them stood Ezzo Cadner, a man of the dwarf tribe, and a subject of fervent discussion in the city. His fate now rested solely in Rachins's hands. He must feel like his back's against the wall. With that in mind, Rachins tried to gauge the tension in the man's intellectual, slack-jawed countenance.

"Stop with your gratuitous threats, Miss Helaine," Ezzo cautioned, crossing his stout arms, displaying no inkling of vulnerability. "It only diminishes your self-worth. For someone entrusted with matters of finance, undermining one's own value is utterly unacceptable." A momentary silence hung in the air as Helaine absorbed his words.

"What painful words to heed. I shall bear them in mind as valuable words of wisdom."

Whether the reason for his fearlessness was confidence in his own decision, faith in Rachins's judgment, or conviction in something entirely different, it remained shrouded in uncertainty. Yet, Rachins couldn't help but release a measured sigh of anticipation.

"Backin' out wasn't an option from the start," Rachins asserted. "And even if we end up losin', I couldn't give two hoots 'bout which way the house leans, so long as that bastard of a father is there. My answer is the same—I'll take the damn bet."

"I think you should have more consideration for your family," Helaine responded. "Nevertheless, I gladly accept your wager. Now let us ensure that our terms are fair."

"Fair? How so?"

"This is the gambling quarter, Mr. Rachins," Helaine explained. "Bets of all kinds are waged as far as the eye can see, so it is your choice alone to decide what you will contend for. I shall readily oblige."

Helaine gestured to the bleak and bustling view of the gambling quarter, leaving the task of selecting a game in Rachins's hands. After a quick survey of the surrounding gambling scene, Rachins's sanpaku eyes, inherited from his parents, caught sight of one corner of the amusement center.

Amidst the games of chance that dominated the district, there was a handful that relied on one's skill. It was within this subset that a particular game captured Rachins's attention.

"How 'bout a round of Shatranj?" he suggested, pointing toward the game in which two players vied to capture the other's king.

27

A mediocre move. Such was Helaine's assessment upon observing Rachins's moves against her. Positioned at opposite ends of the Shatranj board, they deftly maneuvered the other's pieces, aiming for their opponent’s king. With the watchful presence of The Balance’s overseer, the two players adeptly navigated through the initial phases of the match.

Rachins’s offensive moves appeared rather simplistic from what he had shown thus far. Not that they were bad. On the contrary, relying on the fundamentals could easily overwhelm opponents less familiar with the intricacies of the game. After all, the best way to improve was by learning from the book.

However, when dealing with more advanced opponents, adherence to the basics was tantamount to announcing your strategy. And Helaine was an extraordinary player who had mastered a myriad of techniques.

“…”

From behind her narrowed gaze, Helaine felt a profound pity for Rachins, sitting before the board with a vacant expression.

Prioritizing self-preservation over selflessness by abandoning his mistress with no future in sight is a natural decision for a commoner such as himself, Helaine surmised.

But for a man with the hand to dominate the board of the city of Flanders, involved with the royal selection candidate and organized crime, his actions were subpar, to say the least.

This is the best a man who was born into a wealthy household but ended up in the slums can hope for, I suppose.

Here was a man who, despite being fortunate with the opportunity to acquire various talents through formal education, failed to take advantage of his small but privileged gifts.

In return for divulging information about the royal selection candidate, Rachins demanded Helaine to fulfill his wish.

Although initially caught off guard by his unexpected approach in the gambling quarter, Helaine quickly understood that the implications of his proposition spoke volumes of his mediocrity, and that he must have run out of options. So, without a moment’s hesitation, Helaine opted to exploit Rachins.

He pleaded to Helaine for a modest fortune, and that was the end of his luck. Helaine had enticed him into the gamble under the guise of fairness. However, the truth was that no one could surpass Helaine in the games of the gambling quarter. For she was an extraordinary gambler with an intimate understanding of every game that permeated the town.

This wasn't attributed to past experience. Helaine had never been an avid gambler. She simply invested her blood, sweat, and tears, combined with meticulous research, into the art of betting, all in anticipation of the day a big game would finally reveal itself before her.

It was this unyielding mentality, verging on insanity, unburdened by the constraints of conventional efforts, that led Helaine's superiors to recognize her outstanding abilities and entrust her with the management of the Golden Beetle in this bustling metropolis, dominated by the notorious Big Three of the underground world.

Rachins gradually found himself outmatched on the board, driven into a corner from which he saw no escape.

I'll stay true to my words, Helaine thought. I'll provide you with a refuge, I'll even prepare you an escape fund. In return, you'll give me valuable information on the royal selection candidate, as well as the means to contact the family of the Royal Tutor. I can almost see the delight on my superior's faces with this unexpected accomplishment…

"Intriguing turn of events," a voice interjected. "I'll take over the supervision of this game."

At that moment, a man adorned in an array of countless tattoos on his face and body leaned in, observing the game as it progressed.

"Sir Manfred…"

"Looks like you're in a good mood, Golden Pest. If you're going to be naughty, at least let me get a piece of the action, scoundrel to scoundrel," Manfred "Tattoo Face" Madison, the leader of The Balance, retorted with a sneer. Helaine's voice caught in her throat as Manfred's expression distorted the countless scales etched upon his face, creating the illusion of the scales tilting backward.

Sporting a sly smile, Manfred relieved his subordinate of his duties, where he had been presiding over the game. Taking his place, he positioned himself strategically for an unobstructed view of the Shatranj board. Right beside him was Ezzo, who had transformed his face with magic.

"…"

At this spectacle, Helaine's heart danced with a frantic rhythm. Should Manfred see through Ezzo's guise, the game would come to a swift and disastrous end. Ezzo would be captured without delay, and the agreement with Rachins would be off the table. While Helaine herself had little to lose, there was a tantalizing prize on the line, too precious to surrender without a fight.

"Your turn, bitch," Rachins jeered, gesturing at the playing board.

Helaine, who was engrossed in her calculations to protect her gains, shifted her attention back to her opponent. "My, you certainly have a way with words, don't you?" she remarked calmly, moving her piece one step closer to victory.

With a thump, she advanced the ceramic piece into her opponent's territory. Seeing this, Manfred spoke with a hint of intrigue. "By continuing, that means you acknowledge my position here. So, for what exactly are you two competing?"

" I have no objections to the change in supervision," Helaine acknowledged calmly. "No one is more trustworthy than Manfred for a fair game in the gambling quarter. As for our wager, we have struck a deal."

"A deal, huh?" Manfred asked curiously. "What kind of deal might that be?"

Slightly widening her eyes, Helaine watched Manfred as he continued to trace the tattoos on his face. The role of Game Supervisor was to ensure a fair and orderly match. He had no need to delve into the details of the participants' wages. His sole responsibility was to draw the line between winner and loser.

Helaine had the right to remain silent regarding that answer. Despite her silence, however…

"It's simple, sir. The winner gets the opportunity to meet the guardian of the loser," Rachins responded in her stead.

"So I see," Manfred remarked, interest piqued. "A meeting of guardians. That's a rather interesting proposition for me, too."

"…"

Helaine's smile froze at the casual tone of his voice and the content of the conversation. She normally made a conscious effort to disguise her emotions behind a mask of stoicism. However, beneath this facade, now on the verge of shattering, one could almost hear it beginning to crack. What in the world did they just—no, did Rachins Hoffman just say?

"Mr. Rachins," Helaine began, her voice steady, "were the terms of the deal with us not a request for money?"

"Now hold on a sec," Rachins responded. "When did I ever ask ya for money? I said I had a favor to ask, y'know? However ya interpreted these words ain't my concern… But, it's too late for you to back out now."

"…" Helaine went silent.

"Your smile's gone, ain't it, bitch?" Rachins sneered. "What's eatin' at ya? Somethin' wrong? Huh?" As he spoke, Rachins revealed his elongated tongue and playfully flicked the ornament adorning its tip with his finger. A faint click echoed through the air. One click, then another, a total of six clicks.

Six clicks of his tongue. At that moment, Helaine's realization struck like a lightning bolt—she had been set up, and she knew it.

"I hate to say this," Ezzo interjected, shaking his head sympathetically at Helaine's stern expression, "but it was you, Miss Helaine, who started the off-the-board battle first."

Although she had only been in contact with them for a short period, Helaine had a keen eye for people. In her assessment, Ezzo appeared to be a decent man. One might even say he was too good, with the capacity of acting like an upright man.

However, there was something more driving him. Revenge lingered in his heart, even if it meant compromising his personal convictions.

"…"

She had plotted the course, chosen her tactics, thwarted actions, and driven hope into the ground, confident of victory. In fact, the Shatranj board showed victory as irrefutable. At the very moment she allowed Rachins to choose his bet, Helaine's victory had been all but guaranteed. However, there was one final move remaining before that gap could be closed. That was when…

"The royal castle's full of power and deceit," Rachins explained. "There, ya gotta shape yer opponent. Even if ya got the basics down, it's the ones who can put 'em to use that'll come out on top. Now, your move, bitch."

"Ah," Helaine squealed as Rachins slid one of his pieces across the board, knocking one of her pieces down. With it now being her move, Helaine watched through widened eyes as her lips quivered involuntarily. Rachins, Ezzo, and Manfred fixed their gazes upon her.

Through their timing and their breathless demeanor, Rachins and Manfred communicated a silent understanding to each other. Almost as if the two had struck a deal of their own before encountering Helaine in the gambling quarter.

It was Helaine, not Rachins, who made the initial misstep. She should have seized the opportunity to escape, without hesitation, the moment she crossed paths with him. Instead, she had underestimated the lowly commonor’s desperate plea for a small fortune, which they now used as leverage to block her escape. The result of the game of Shatranj no longer held any meaning at all.

“You can win and have your secrets exposed, or lose and suffer a great loss,” Rachins sneered. “Take yer pick.”

“Wai…” Helaine hesitated, weighing her options.

Upon being presented with those terms, Helaine realized she had underestimated him—she underestimated the breadth of his knowledge and experience. Not just as a royal advisor, but also with the influence and authority that came with the position.

So, Helaine bowed her head, forehead toppling the pieces on the board as she pressed it against the table. Grinding her head against its surface, she made a desperate plea, begging him not to pursue the defeat of anyone but herself.

“I lost, I lost. We’ve… no, I lost,” she confessed. She offered to divulge everything she knew about the city’s implosion, taking full responsibility for her actions.

28

“I’m back and I won!” Rachins exclaimed with a wicked grin plastered on his face as he swaggered back to the Western-style mansion.

Felt applauded at the sight of him looking so happy. “You managed to keep your limbs intact,” she congratulated, “and not a single finger was lost! I’m impressed!”

“Don’t say scary shit like that, man! Ain’t no way I’m crossin’ a bridge that big!” Rachins protested, rejecting Felt’s words of admiration.

“I mean, the bridge you just crossed was pretty damn close,” Felt said, scratching her head, disappointed by his reaction. “I was just givin’ you a compliment.”

The location was a Western-style mansion on the outskirts of

Flanders, once a fierce battleground. Fortunately, the Big Three's forces were all sent to a treatment center, making it now one of the quietest and safest places around. In that haven of tranquility, Felt anxiously awaited, her exasperation swept away by Rachins's triumphant report. Learning the outcome of the game in the gambling quarter, Felt nodded deeply and asked, "So you're saying that narrow-eyed lady confessed her involvement in the incident?"

"I mean, she jus' confessed that she connected the main suspect and the hitman," Rachins replied. "Tryin' to play nice an' soak up the sweet juices of the city… so she says."

"So she made up an excuse while her own people died. What a nasty woman." Folding her arms, Felt scorned Helaine's attitude. At the same time, she couldn't help but admire Rachins's astuteness in sniffing out Helaine's involvement and informing her of it. Rachins, who had boldly confronted Helaine, had made good on his lofty promise. Although Felt was taken aback when he proposed using Ezzo as bait for his plan.

"So you actually pulled it off for real," Reinhard complimented. "I'm impressed, Rachins."

"I could say the same 'bout you," Rachins returned. "You just let me go ahead without botherin' to ask what the hell I had in mind! Didn't ya consider the possibility that I might've sold 'er out and switched sides?"

"I wouldn't say that possibility never crossed my mind, but," said Felt, glancing at Reinhard, who was standing beside her, "people in the slums got a keen sense of smell, y'know? Why would they go out of their way to take a dangerous road just to get hurt? That's absurd."

"I swear. With Reinhard here, ya have nothin' to worry about," Rachins expressed with frustration, covering his head in his hands, to which Reinhard let out a bitter smile. If it's just a matter of winnin' or losin', it's pointless to make an enemy outta Reinhard.

Felt, observing the exchange, turned her head and said, "Well… Even if Reinhard hadn't been in the picture, I still would've left it to you."

"Why?" Rachins asked, puzzled.

"You bowed to me and said your buddy's life was on the line," she replied. "Ain't that enough?"

Originally, Felt and her crew became deeply entangled in this case because Camberley had been captured by the Flower Prison Garden. It was in this urgency to catch the real culprit and save him that Rachins bowed to Felt. That was enough to make his real intentions clear.

Recognizing his sincerity, Felt saw no need to inquire about the trump card he held to squeeze the truth out of the Golden Beetle. He made a promise, and he delivered.

"Well then, I guess there's no point in diggin' further," Felt remarked. "I'm not so stubborn that I need every damn detail to trust someone. Just tell me what's necessary."

"In that case, Rachins, it was enough that you were a friend."

Hearing the exchange between mistress and servant, Rachins stood stunned, mouth agape. Felt closed a single crimson eye, paying no heed to his reaction. Just then, it occurred to her that Rachins had returned to the Western-style mansion alone. "So, I guess that means there ain't no Ezzo…" she said with a sigh.

"Nope," Rachins replied. "The bastard went to get what he came for. Even Manfred of The Balance, who did the most, promised us the best forerunner."

"I see. So, forget about Ezzo's revenge, what about us?" Felt asked.

"We ain't lettin' 'em get away, that's for damn sure," Rachins replied, flashing his long tongue and a roguish grin.

Seeing that smile, Felt also grinned, baring her fang. "Super. Flam, you're up!" she called out, summoning Flam from the reserves. The young attendant quietly emerged and bowed before Felt's crimson gaze.

“As you wish,” Flam replied, looking back at her master with eyes devoid of emotion. “We can only perform this once per day, but I will make sure we fulfill it.”

“What a cute thing to say. Well, we’re counting on you to do your job. Let Grassis know.”

Flam bowed her head reverently at Felt’s command. With the power of their Divine Protection, the twins Flam and Grassis could communicate their words to one another once a day, regardless of distance. Through its power, Grassis sent word that Gaston, Ilya, and the others had come under attack in the town of Hakuchuri. And now, it was time for the counterattack.

“So, what’s the message?” Flam asked.

“Tell Old Man Rom who’s with them,” Felt began, “and tell him there’s someone I want him to contact.” With those words spoken, Felt turned her attention back to the fiery-haired Reinhard standing by her side, who met her gaze. He dropped to one knee for this long awaited moment. Felt couldn’t help but chuckle at his dramatic gesture, finding it a tad excessive. With her hands on her hips, she puffed out her chest and declared, “And now it’s our turn. So let’s give it all we’ve got!”

29

The moment he returned to his base, the man’s instincts tingled, sensing an eerie shift in the air that made his throat constrict. To survive in this business, one required a keen nose for danger. Grudges abound, and to that effect, the base was fortified with various traps, ensuring that only he could access it.

But those traps had been disarmed. The presence of an intruder was glaringly obvious. Yet what unnerved him the most was the unmasked hostility that thrust itself at him as he stood at the entrance.

Another man’s voice pierced the darkness at the far end of the hall, carrying a hint of intelligence and arrogance. “I’ve selfishly taken the liberty of paying you this unwelcome visit. But you mustn’t mind, as it was you who played dirty in my establishment the other day. You might even call it a brazen act of thievery."

The sound of this voice was familiar, though last time it was tinged with a sense of urgency and anger. Slowly, the other man's figure came into view from the far end of the hallway. There was no mistaking it.

"The guard from the Flower Prison Garden?" he uttered in surprise. It was the dwarf man he encountered in the burnt down brothel. Rumors had it that he was a formidable guard skilled in the art of magic, which meant he posed no real threat to the man. After all, the man possessed a natural talent to manipulate the essence of the mana that surrounded him.

"I'm merely a foolish man who failed to safeguard what I should have," confessed the dwarf. "The other day, I couldn't even put up a fight against you."

"And you think you can beat me today, magic user?" the man retorted.

"Is that…an Excess Mana Circulation Constitution?"

"As a magic user, you don't stand a chance. On top of that, I'm a hired hand."

"That's true. An Excess Mana Circulation Constitution is the natural enemy of magic users," the dwarf continued. "And it wouldn't be right for me to retaliate against you for just doing your job, while I couldn't even fulfill my own duties. I get it."

"…"

In the darkness ahead, the magic user nodded. Yet despite claiming that retaliation was off the table, his eyes, his hostility, and his determination to fight only grew stronger. His mana itself practically screamed that he had no intention of backing down.

Without waiting for the dwarf's next words, the man took the initiative and made his move. Although the magic user had no moves to make in the first place, it was best to not give him a chance to react. In their previous encounter at the brothel, the man had only spared the dwarf's life to frame him as the culprit. But this time, there was no other choice but to take him down. Brandishing the small sword concealed in his pocket, the man attempted to cleave the magic user's throat with a single, slick blow.

"You failed to finish me off that night. You missed your chance, and that's why you're going to lose now."

"Gah… guuuhh…?!"

In the next moment, a searing heat came from nowhere and erupted against the man's torso, blasting him backwards with a painful cry. Burning agony coursed through his chest, rendering his limbs numb. Unable to move, he collapsed. His thoughts wavered and clarity faded away. With widened eyes and twitching limbs, he struggled to comprehend what had just happened.

"It's the Excess Mana Circulation Constitution, patterns, and countermeasures…plus lots of practice and improvement." The fallen man's vision reflected the face of the dwarf looking down at him. He displayed his blood-stained hands as evidence of his attack on the Excess Mana Circulation Constitution, carried out through some mysterious method. How and where he had acquired this particular method remained unclear.

"It's a misplaced vengeance. The dead won't feel a thing, even if you retaliate. But my soul cries out for justice. So I decided to compromise."

"…"

"It's not about revenge; it's about proving something. That one can achieve the impossible if they just keep walking. That even a dwarf man inferior in Od could win a 'color' title. And that a girl selling flowers in the red-light district could build a future with her own flower shop!"

It was proof that what was deemed impossible, was indeed possible. The defeated man exhaled at the realization that he had lost precisely because of that. Ridiculous. That's why he wanted to overcome this wall? A wall no one had dared to challenge before, all for that reason?

“My name is Ezzo Cadner, the Gray, and I have at last avenged Mimosa.”

“I’m not…dead yet…no…” the man gasped, desperately clinging for life.

“I will not take your life,” said the magic user, Ezzo, with a flip of his cloak. “I don’t think she would want that either, for she knew the joy of nurturing flowers.”

At his words, the man caught a glimmer of hope, clinging to the possibility of survival. However, in that moment of hope, another figure emerged.

“Unfortunately, we don’t fall into that category,” came the chilling response. “We are a bit more savage.” The man’s throat tightened with grief as his gaze met the inked visage of Tattoo Face of The Balance, obscuring his view of Ezzo’s reflection. In swift succession, multiple individuals appeared and seized the man’s limbs, forcibly dragging him outside. Despite his futile struggles, his body, having been weakened by a vicious blow, refused to obey.

Interrogations carried out by The Balance, and those by Tattoo Face, were notoriously ruthless. It was widely understood within the realms of the underground that no one ever emerged unscathed, much less kept their mouths shut.

Thus, the man cried out, desperately clinging to a sliver of hope. “W-Wait… I’ll t-tell you… anything you want to know… about my employer,” he desperately appealed.

“Well, well, you sure talk fast,” Tattoo Face replied, his features contorting in a twisted smirk.. “That’s very helpful. Very helpful indeed.” The man’s eyes widened in sheer horror as the subtle shift in expression tipped all of the scales in unison. “I’m sorry,” Tattoo Face continued, “but unfortunately, I don’t put faith in tales from people I haven’t had the pleasure of torturing.”

"…"

"Take him along. I will personally attend to him later."

Tattoo Face's subordinate quickly and quietly fell in line with his directive. Unable to resist, the helpless man was dragged outside, never to see the light of day again. He only left behind a cacophony of despair, echoing in hopelessness that shattered his very core.

"So you're satisfied, avenger?" Manfred called out to Ezzo, his gaze fixed on the departing hitman, before tending to his own injured hand. Ezzo examined his fingers and sighed, shaking his head in response. There was only one way to answer.

"I can claim no sense of accomplishment. How can I fill this void in my soul, knowing I allowed her to perish? It was my own foolishness that brought about her demise. A remorse that will forever haunt me."

"You're quite the poet," Manfred remarked. "Not that I disagree. But then why did you go through with that plan?"

"I already told you," Ezzo replied. "I did it to prove a point. Nothing more, nothing less."

Manfred shrugged, not pressing further on the matter. Instead, he continued in his own distinctive tone. "Even so, you're quite talented. It's a shame that you're employed by the poison lady of the Flower Prison Garden."

"As expected," Ezzo continued after a brief pause, "I can't face Miss Toto after what has transpired. No longer can I call myself the guard of Flower Prison Garden."

"In that case," Manfred offered, "are you willing to accept The Balance's invitation? Anyone with a chip on their shoulder is welcome."

Ezzo's eyes widened lightly at Manfred's provocative words. Then, the Gray magic user shook his head loosely and replied, "I'm sorry to say… the one to whom I have entrusted my allegiance already has prior commitments."

“I see,” Manfred responded with a hint of regret. “That’s unfortunate. If that’s the case, then I’m sorry to hear that.”

Upon the rejection of his invitation, Manfred touched the tattoo on his face as if to convey he had anticipated Ezzo’s response. Ezzo squinted at the gesture, when Manfred twisted his expression once more, tilting the scales on his face. “How disheartening to lose both a promising individual and the forerunner for revenge to that young lady,” he muttered, his words tinged with a sense of resignation.

30

Mozolite was keenly aware that the scales had shifted in an unfavorable direction. As the trusted confidant of the Tattoo Face, Manfred, The Balance’s second in command, he himself did not know what he had done wrong that had driven him into such a position. With my special eyes, I should’ve been able to discern the movements of all the important people involved.

Mozolite was blessed with an extraordinary ocular ability known as the Divine Protection of Distant Vision, granting him unique eyes. These eyes allowed him to see the precise location of a target, or to determine and closely observe targets that fulfilled specific conditions.

Mozolite was supposed to have used his power to observe the leaders of the Big Three and their entourages, the young royal selection candidate and her Sword Saint knight, the dwarf man who had taken his place, and even the conniving Golden Beetle woman, with whom he maintained a tenuous alliance. He never let his guard down, and yet, the tables had turned. An irrevocable collapse was all that greeted him.

“Now is not the time to dwell on the cause of this failure,” he thought. “More importantly, it’s time to get out of here.”

Although his involvement had not yet been exposed, he knew it was only a matter of time. And often, the success or failure of escape hinged on how quickly one took their first step.

With that in mind, Mozolite departed the city before those around him had the chance to raise any suspicions.

Aligning himself with the Golden Beetle, he orchestrated attacks by assassins on the Big Three. Leveraging his position as a manager within The Balance, it was easy for him to facilitate such maneuvers. The rest was a ploy to strategically advance the situation, undermining the influence of the Black Silver Coin and Flower Prison Garden. And ultimately, to hold Manfred, who had long been a thorn in his side, accountable, thus replacing him. To this end, Mozolite had spent a significant amount of time meticulously crafting and executing this well-devised strategy.

“Where did the cogs in my plan go astray…?” Mozolite pondered aloud, voice tinged in frustration. Using his getaway plan he had prepared for emergencies, he had already departed Flanders, and intended to flee the country entirely. He would remove the organization’s tattoos, alter his face, and seek refuge in the countryside until everything quieted down. From there, he would embark on a fresh start within the shadows of the underworld.

“Sniff, sniff, sniff…” At the dragon carriage stop, where Mozolite waited for the dragon carriage to arrive, he felt something against his shoulder.

“Huh?” Startled, he glanced over his shoulder, only to discover a kitten girl nuzzling against his arm, sniffing curiously. Mozolite’s blood boiled in irritation at the sudden intrusion, but he managed to restrain himself. This wasn’t the time to cause a scene.

“Hey, Little Miss! I don’t know what you’re up to, but I’m busy. Where are your parents?” he demanded.

“Hmm, no good, no good at all. Old man, you smell like a bad guy! A verryy bad guyy!” the girl derided as she stared at him with her cutesy eyes, to which Mozolite could only gulp in response. At the same time, he noticed that this young catgirl before him carried a finely crafted walking stick while exuding a strong sense of fighting spirit. This realization sent a shiver down his spine.

“Bad Mimi. I told ya to keep quiet and watch!” A girl with flowing light purple hair materialized at the station entrance. Adorned in white, furry attire with a collar, she was a beautiful girl with a presence that seemed rather out of place.

“Ahh, Missy!” Mimi greeted the familiar girl. “I forgot! You did say that! You did!” The familiar girl was none other than one of the royal selection candidates who had recently become the talk of the kingdom.

“I’m hopin’ yer smart enough to realize it ain’t some coincidence we jus’ happened to cross paths,” she said with a glint in her light-blue eyes, causing Mozolite to jolt back instinctively. The cat-girl attempted to grab his sleeve, but he wriggled out of the way to escape, causing the fabric to tear as he stumbled away. Rolling over, he swiftly dashed off with all his momentum.

“Ahhhh! He got away! Hetaro! Tivey! Run run run run run!” the cat-girl shouted behind him. Mozolite activated his eyes, scanning for the hostile gaze as he wove through the winding streets, evading it.

It was like looking down at a map. Mozolite could perceive the actual location of any person searching for him. With this power, pinpointing targets and fleeing pursuers was a breeze. It was this very skill that made him invaluable to Manfred, and at the same time, what fueled his own ambitious desires.

Sure, there had been some minor setbacks, but Mozolite remained resolute in making a fresh start once he could elude his pursuers. I will reflect on what I did this time and do better next time. I will definitely get back at the ones who got in my way. If I can only just escape from that royal selection candidate’s underlings in the city and go to another land…

“Huh?” A moment later, Mozolite was briskly knocked off his feet and sent sprawling with a great impact.

“…”

My back is bruised and I can’t catch my breath. What the hell just happened? He looked at his feet, only to find them drenched in a vibrant shade of red. His right leg also emitted a fiery glow right around the knee.

“Ugh… ah…” The wound looked fierce, yet he felt no pain. Perhaps his brain had simply resigned itself to the incomprehensible injury.

In that case, it was worth it. I’ll prioritize escape for now, for as long as my legs will carry me. With this in mind, he took a step forward, when a sudden jolt struck his waist, causing him to collapse. Again, the wound erupted in a burst of red. Struggling to regain his footing, it was a relentless onslaught—my shoulder, my side, my leg, my hip, my foot, my arm, my leg, my hip, my shoulder, my stomach, my waist, my chest, my leg, my arm, I’m hit, I’m hit, I’m hit—

“Hey, wh-what the… huh? What the hell…?!” Mozolite exclaimed, his entire body now inflamed in red. He couldn’t comprehend the assault he was enduring. Desperately opening his eyes, he searched for the person who was aware of him—or rather, the person who was mercilessly attacking him. And before long, his opponent came into view.

Far away, on the other side of town, a young man raised his arm toward Mozolite. There stood the red-haired Sword Saint, holding a bright red tometo in his hand.

“This is ridiculous,” Mozolite muttered with a sense of incredulity. No sooner had he spoken when another tometo exploded right in his face, with an impact that shattered his awareness into oblivion.

“Lady Felt, he appears to have fainted,” Reinhard reported.

“Hmm, I see. But look…” Felt motioned curiously.

“Hm? What’s the matter?” Reinhard asked, a basket of red tometoes sitting beside him, from which he continuously picked them out and tossed them into the distance.

Felt’s lips curved into a frown as she watched the scene unfold. Grabbing a tometo from the basket, she pressed it against her lips and took a bite, savoring its fresh flavor. With a twinkle in her eyes, she turned to Reinhard and suggested, “For next year’s Tometo Festival, let's make it a competition between you and everyone else in town." After all, it would have to be that much to even be a match.

31

Mozolite awoke to darkness, his throat tightening as he realized his immobilized state. He was seated in a rigid chair, limbs rendered motionless. He cautiously attempted to make sense of what had happened with his hazy mind. And then, a presence emerged.

"I see you've come to," came the voice of the most terrifying man in existence, resonating through the pitch-black void. Mozolite's memories flooded back—the encroaching tometoes, his failed escape from pursuers, the revelation of his plan. He was in the midst of fleeing the organization's pursuers when his scheme was exposed. However, his escape had failed, and he found himself ensnared once again.

"Oh, Boss…" Mozolite uttered weakly.

"Oh, you still have the audacity to address me as 'Boss'? That's a surprise." Manfred's throaty laugh sent chills down Mozolite's spine.

Mozolite attempted to open his eyes, searching for a glimmer of escape in the darkness. Searching for a way to survive, even if his life was a meager one. However, he was met with disappointment. His eyes would not open. He remained shrouded in darkness, unable to see a thing.

"Your eyes were indeed precious," Manfred spoke with amusement, "but perhaps you relied on them a bit too much. Even I made a few misjudgments, but… This time, your focus was too misplaced."

Desperation filled Mozolite's voice as he pleaded, "Hey, I can't see a thing! Boss… I can't see anything! Please, let me explain…"

"The Pig King and the Hundred Flowers, myself and the royal selection candidate, even the Sword Saint," Manfred continued. "You had your eye on Gray and Golden Beetle, too. You were cautious. And yet, you were still defeated by a mere foot soldier."

Mozolite could hear Manfred's footsteps drawing near. And yet, he could not see him. Am I blindfolded? I can't see him. He should be right next to me.

For Mozolite, who had lived his entire life relying on his Eyes, this was an unbearable fear. Yet, despite Mozolite's fear, there was a trace of twisted satisfaction in Manfred's voice.

"To be honest," Manfred continued, "the recent incident has ruined The Balance's reputation. I was betrayed by my trusted advisor, and my name has been put to shame. However, amidst all this, there is a silver lining. That young golden-haired girl is truly a remarkable find."

Manfred's words resonated from such a distance that Mozolite could feel his breath run down his neck. Just then, Mozolite felt something being placed in his hand, still secured to the chair. It was a soft, round object, unfamiliar to him.

"Gah… Boss, is this…? Ugh…"

"Don't drop it, Mozolite," Manfred cautioned. "That object represents the risk you took. That you've gambled with your life and lost."

Mozolite, unable to speak due to the foreign object in his mouth, opened his eyes wide, only to be met with darkness. Empty, eye-less sockets. And what used to occupy those sockets, was now nestled in the palm of his hand.

"The retribution of The Balance is harsh," Manfred explained. "You have brought disgrace upon our organization and robbed six comrades of their lives in pursuit of your selfish ambitions. Your crimes must be accounted for, in the name of Typhon, the bearer of the balance."

"Nn-n-n-n!" Mozolite's attempts to protest were futile. Manfred grabbed the jaw of the terrified man as he writhed in his seat. A slender finger, with the force of a vise, crushed Mozolite's jaw on the spot. In pain, Mozolite let out cries of agony, wrenching up blood from his throat. His wailing continued, an agonizing struggle that persisted until Mozolite's life eventually came to an end.

And thus, the life of the mastermind behind the incident in the Earth Dragon Capital, came to an end.

32

“So, I guess we can say yer problem's finally all taken care of, eh, Felt?”

“Yeah, that's cool,” Felt said, replying with a smile. “Sorry for putting all that pressure on you, my loudmouthed sis.”

Anastasia Hoshin, the guest sitting across from her, returned the smile. They were in the parlor of Astrea Manor in Hakuchuri, where they had at last returned after the the Big Three's attack in Flanders, the Earth Dragon Capital of the world.

With the incident resolved and various issues taken care of, Felt finally felt at ease in the residence. And now, having invited the people who had helped them to the mansion, they were able to relax, enjoy the fruits of their labor, and appreciate everyone's hard work.

“But let's be real, we ain't really do much ‘til the end,” Anastasia remarked. “That ain't much of a contribution… But Felt, I'm sorry hearin' ‘bout all the troubles ya went through.”

“No kidding,” Felt replied. “I've been wondering, do all royal selection candidates have to go through crazy stuff like this?”

“I dunno. At least my place hasn't been all that busy,” Anastasia admitted with a laugh, tilting her head at Felt. Felt frowned in response as Anastasia continued, “But even if it's true the situation was dire, how'd y'all decide ya needed our help? Normally, ya ain't supposed to show weakness to yer competitors.”

“I ain't scared to take risks so long as it's not my people's lives at stake,” Felt said. “Besides, I chose you, didn't I? I figured you'd be the most level-headed of all the candidates.”

“So ya mean ya think highly of us?” Anastasia asked.

"Nah," Felt replied. "Just thought if we were gonna strike a deal, it wouldn't be too complicated and messy."

"Well, ain't ya an honest one?" Anastasia responded, now in a good mood thanks to Felt's answer.

Truthfully, when Felt considered the four royal selection candidates as potential allies, she thought Anastasia would be the best person to approach. She felt each of the other three would be a tough sell for various reasons. So, through Flam and Grassis, she reached out to Old Man Rom to establish contact with the Hoshin Trading Company. After that, Anastasia and her crew acted swiftly and efficiently, allowing them to successfully hunt down and capture Mozolite, the fugitive criminal, through their tactical maneuvers.

"But when I heard that half of the mercenary group we were counting on couldn't move, I got a bit nervous," Felt admitted.

"Sorry 'bout that," Anastasia apologized. "I reckon our guys got a bit carried away earlier. Now I got 'em lookin' after the trading company, so I'm a bit short-handed."

"No wonder," Felt said with a shrug. "You've been dealin' with all sorts of baddies like the White Whale and Witch Cult, haven't you?" Felt recalled the most recent topics that had shaken the kingdom only recently. This very girl, Anastasia, who sat before her, had also succeeded in defeating the White Whale, a troublesome witchbeast that plagued the world for years, as well as a leader of the nefarious Witch Cult, together with the camps of two other royal selection candidates.

The royal selection had just begun, but Felt, who had been preoccupied with internal matters, found herself trailing behind.

"But looks like yer jus' gettin' started," Anastasia said.

"Actually, isn't that how it is?" Felt responded. "If you snatch someone's wallet and make a run for it, you'll run outta steam real quick if you go all out right off the bat. It's about knowing how to make a clean getaway and when to catch your breath."

“Maybe that ain’t the best analogy, but I reckon I catch yer drift,” Anastasia nodded repeatedly. Felt, sitting cross-legged on the chair, watched her reaction perplexedly. But then, Anastasia timidly extended her hand, to which Felt grew more reluctant as she took in her white, slender fingers.

“Felt, let’s become pals! I mean, I know I been callin’ ya a competitor an’ all, but truth is, I kinda like ya.”

“I don’t mean to be rude, but that sounds so fake,” Felt bluntly replied.

“Aw, don’t be so mean, I’m serious!” Anastasia insisted, hand still outstretched. “I’m still in the business of honesty, y’know.”

It’s hard to tell if she’s serious or joking. At the very least, I can’t imagine an honest person succeeding in business, so her words just now obviously ain’t sincere, but…

“Well, alright then. Let’s give it a shot,” Felt conceded. “Alright, loudmouthed… I mean… Anastasia.”

“Then, shall we shake on it?”

“Well, it’s not like I’m losing’ anything, and you did help me a lot… and it’s not like I hate you, so…” Felt gave in and took her hand. Upon releasing their grip, Anastasia glanced at her own hand and let out a soft sigh of relief.

“I’m awfully glad,” Anastasia said. “I don’t got many friends my age. Let’s be good pals, alright?”

“Same age, huh?” Felt snickered. “From what I’ve heard, you’re one of the oldest candidates…”

“Oh, oh, I can’t hear you! I can’t hear ya! I can’t hear ya. Nope, don’t hear ya at all!” Covering her ears like a child, Anastasia blocked out the conversation she least wanted to hear. Chuckling at her childish gesture, something you typically wouldn’t expect an adult to do, Felt grabbed a tea cake and chomped on it. Not bad. Flam and the others must have gone all out with the treats when they heard who the guest was. Though even if that hadn’t been the case, we still got a lot of gifts from the people we helped. That's about the only thing we gained from this incident.

"By the way, did that lady in yer party who got kidnapped make it back safe an' sound?" Anastasia inquired.

"Yeah, she's alright," Felt confirmed. "They seriously couldn't figure out a use for her, so they just kept her locked up in the bad guy's hideout, but…then the angry Pig King came knockin'." Indeed, anyone who offended the Pig King, the one man in Flanders one should avoid offending above all, found themselves with a one-way ticket to the afterlife, courtesy of his iron fist.

So Kalifa was rescued and made it safely back to Ilya. However, Felt had mixed feelings about the fact that yet another contact was made between Doltero, Kalifa, and their daughter.

"Well, Gaston stepped up to the plate to protect Ilya, so I'd like to think he's got a good shot," Felt commented. I mean, he went all in, risking his own life and everything. I'd even feel bad for him if nothing pans out after all this. Although, there's probably nothing to worry about seeing as Kalifa's been visiting him nearly every day ever since she came back. "Gaston has manned up, and Rachins pulled off some clever work, too."

"Hey, wait a sec," Anastasia interrupted, "ain't we missin' someone? Ain't you and yer weird servant s'posed to have a three-man team?"

"Oh, that's the best part," Felt said with a laugh, rising from the chair in a huff. She walked over to the window and beckoned Anastasia to join her. Curiosity piqued, Anastasia followed and peered out the window beside her, gaze falling upon the well-maintained garden below, shaded by the surrounding trees.

"Oh, there he goes!" Anastasia pointed out. "In the corner of the garden with an awfully fancy lookin' lady."

"Oh, that's the proprietress who runs the red-light district in Flanders," Felt explained, holding up her pinky finger with a sly smile. "She ended up with Camberley, of all people."

“The proprietress of the Flower Prison Garden? Ain’t that a kicker?!” Anastasia exclaimed, taken aback by the unexpected revelation. For there in the garden of the mansion, sitting side by side in the shade of a tree, sat a rather unconventional pair—a far cry from what one would call picture-perfect.

At one time, Camberley was confined in the brothel of Flower Prison Garden, clinging to life by a thread. Rachins went to great lengths to rescue him, even taking on a high-stakes gamble with Helaine. However, as Rachins waged that battle of his own, Camberley managed to escape from his confinement by himself. But one question remained. Just how the hell did he pull off such a daring escape, anyway?

“How’d one of the most seasoned gals on the streets get so bent outta shape like that?” Anastasia asked.

“The Divine Protection of Bedroom Wiles,” Felt replied matter-of-factly.

“What?” Felt’s short answer stunned Anastasia.

Responding to Anastasia’s reaction, Felt continued. “Like I said! It was his Divine Protection of Bedroom Wiles. His infamy as a playboy of the red-light district really wasn’t for nothing. I’ve never heard of a prostitute in a brothel giving a customer their money back!”

“Felt, yer one of ‘em gals who collects all sorts of peculiar subordinates, ain’t ya?” Anastasia asked, putting her hand to her head and shaking it in disbelief. But it was all too true.

Once Camberley had escaped the clutches of Toto’s poison and returned from the red-light district, he requested that she be forgiven. He even vowed to make up any losses with his own labor if necessary.

Upon hearing this story, Toto also shared more about Mimosa, the unfortunate prostitute who had met a fiery end. Mimosa, the young girl with dreams of becoming a florist, had apparently hailed from the same hometown as Mozolite, the mastermind behind the incident. The whole story was as follows:

The girl had left her hometown in pursuit of her dreams, and found solace in a man from her hometown whom she had befriended in the past, entering the red-light district of this great city. She then innocently complied with his requests, unknowingly becoming a source of information herself. And so, she fell victim to the man's ambitions, meeting a tragic end before achieving any dreams of her own. Such was the truth of the unfortunate woman's death, and the end of her unsalvageable dream.

Having had it all explained, Anastasia asked Felt, "Are ya feelin' regretful?"

"Me? Don't be an idiot," Felt retorted. "I grew up in the slums. I've seen lots of people die in the shittiest ways. And I've seen lots of people die after being taken advantage of by other people. So…"

"So?" Anastasia urged her to continue.

"I'm frustrated and pissed off," Felt continued, brows furrowing in anger. "I'm so damn frustrated and furious… I'm gonna go crazy!" Yes, yes. That's exactly it. I'm angry. I'm pissed. I'm absolutely furious! I'll be damned if I go around tryin' to save every naive and clueless soul out there. But I sure as hell won't stand by and watch good folks being preyed upon.

Felt never really liked do-gooders. She felt as if she were exploiting their kindness and mooching off of them. That's why I'm gonna change it. I'm gonna change everything. And that's why…

"Hehehe…" Anastasia let out a mischievous chuckle.

"What the hell's up with you?" Felt asked with surprise. "Quit actin' creepy. Why are you smiling at me?"

"Oh nothin'," Anastasia replied. "Jus' thinkin' that I really do fancy ya after all, Felt." Anastasia's expression relaxed, and she swayed her shoulders in amusement. Felt rested her cheek on her hand. Although they shook hands earlier and made a verbal pact to be friends, with this off-beat attitude, Felt had a feeling she might regret that promise sooner rather than later.

“Oh, but don’t think for a second that I’m givin’ up on the royal selection,” Anastasia asserted. “I ain’t concedin’ my victory in this contest.”

“Couldn’t agree more,” Felt said with a nod.

Felt and Anastasia exchanged knowing smiles, a flicker of camaraderie forming between the two royal selection candidates.

33

While the two royal selection candidates engaged in friendly banter downstairs, an upstairs room in the mansion served as a makeshift office, where one individual held his head in great distress. This man, short in stature, found himself surrounded by scattered ledgers and letters. After a quick glance through them, his normally intelligent profile turned bright red, and his eyes practically bled in frustration.

“Wh-Wh-What in the world is happening? How is this domain even being managed?” Ezzo stuttered, agitation bubbling over. This must be some kind of mistake! And yet despite the messy contents, the details of these records are written in such neat, meticulous handwriting. In essence, its tidy appearance is only masking a ridiculously haphazard approach to managing the land!

“Wait, wait, wait, wait, wait! This is the most absurd thing I’ve ever come across!” Ezzo exclaimed. “Before relocating the base here… no, wait! Wasn’t this the main Astrea residence from the beginning?”

“Yes,” Rom confirmed with a nod, “but it appears it was always in this state. From my perspective, it was evident the economy was in dire straits, but getting a grip on the situation wasn’t easy.” Old Man Rom hunched his massive body over, stroking his bald head as he stood before Ezzo, whose eyes were widened in disbelief.

“But, old timer, leaving it in such a condition seems utterly hopeless,” Ezzo remarked, his voice filled with frustration and concern.

In the unusual setting of a room in which a giant and a dwarf had gathered together, the atmosphere indeed was a bit peculiar. However, the matter at hand demanded their attention.

“B-But, I certainly didn’t anticipate such a worm-eaten state of affairs…” Ezzo said. “Could it be, these are all false documents fabricated to test my abilities?”

“I’m afraid I haven’t the time to waste so much effort for you,” Rom stated bluntly. “This is the harsh reality of this mansion…or rather, our camp.”

“…”

Ezzo’s mental state seemed to crumble as he sank to his knees, sitting there for a moment. He then lifted his face to meet the stern gaze of Old Man Rom, towering above him.

“Anyway, I’d like to hear from the person who’s been in charge of these tax revenue matters,” Ezzo continued, regaining his composure. “These records indicate a complete lack of understanding. However, so long as one possesses the will to learn, that can change. Who in the mansion was responsible for these affairs?”

“Well about that, it seems that the people of the city of Hakuchuri were in charge,” Rom explained.

“Tax revenues managed by the very citizens being taxed? Why on earth?” Ezzo questioned, perplexed.

“Who knows…” Rom shrugged, his thick arms folded as he tilted his head.

Ezzo dropped to his knees on the floor, his face belying frustration and disbelief.

Sloppy management at its finest here. What’s even more astonishing is the absence of any attempt by the citizens to cheat their taxes. In other words, it’s a miraculous shortage of internal affairs management by a group of ignorant good people all leaning on each other.

“Bu-Bu-bu-but, now that I have joined the camp, I refuse to accept this subpar state of affairs!” Ezzo protested. “First, we need to set proper standards and hire the right people… Yes, Mr. Rachins seemed to have his wits about him! Let’s get him on board! Alright, it’s settled!” Ezzo laughed hysterically, jumping up and down.

This sudden wave of energy dispelled the previous air of frustration, leaving Old Man Rom raising his eyebrows at the rapid change. With an exhale, he let out a contemplative “Hmmm.”

“Positive and capable is exactly what we need right now,” Rom acknowledged. “If you can do that, you’ll be in great demand. But why did you choose Felt?”

“It seems you have a lot on your mind, old timer,” Ezzo responded to Rom’s inquiry, his expression stiffening as he turned to face him. Their eyes met, one low and one high. Then, Ezzo spread his cloak wide and confidently puffed out his chest, looking up at the huge man above him. “I am very grateful to Miss Felt, to the Sword Saint, to Mr. Rachins, and to everyone else who helped in this matter,” he began. “They helped me seek justice for Mimosa. I want to repay them for their kindness. Such is my premise.”

“Well, if that’s your premise, what are your real intentions?”

“I see a great talent in Felt, one that is worthy of serving. Part of it has to do with her current title of Royal Selection Candidate, of course, but Miss Felt has the capacity to lead others and the flexibility to utilize their strengths. She also has shown genuine concern for people. I believe that this, too, was a chance encounter.”

Ezzo extended his small palms. “I am indebted to you for aiding me in breaking through this impasse,” he spoke sincerely. Yet, it was Felt’s eyes that held the greatest significance. Locking gazes with her, he lowered his head and found resolve. If he was going to fight, if he was going to challenge, if he was going to face off, this was the right place to do it.

“Just as Miss Felt is competing in the royal selection, I too have an opponent I must confront,” Ezzo revealed. “Coincidentally, that opponent is also in a position to be closely associated with the royal selection. An unavoidable circumstance for me, as well.”

“So you’re implying you want Felt out of convenience?” Rom asked.

“No, I consider it to have been fate,” Ezzo asserted without a moment’s hesitation.

Reassured by Ezzo’s resolute response, Old Man Rom seemed mildly surprised. He scratched his bald head with his finger, and commented, “I see, so you’re an eccentric person yourself.”

“A girl from the slums with the Sword Saint as her knight; how could you expect a normal crowd to gather when the core master-servant relationship is this odd? Isn’t it exciting?”

“There’s one thing I should mention,” Rom cautioned. “Felt hates the word ‘fate’, so be careful not to alienate her with such terms.”

“I appreciate the advice! I’d be delighted to learn anything else you can tell me, old timer.”

Old Man Rom shrugged his shoulders in response to Ezzo’s sincere explanation, his movements constrained by the cramped space. He began tidying up the scattered ledgers and miscellaneous items on the floor. That’s when another thought struck him.

“Speaking of which,” Rom began, “I heard you mentioned some peculiar conditions for joining the camp… What in the world did you request?”

“Oh, that,” Ezzo responded with a chuckle. “I simply requested permission to visit the red-light district in Flanders twice a month. I have a group of students currently learning to read and write.”

“…”

“The will to learn is precious,” he continued. “I don’t want that to cease. That’s my revenge.” Ezzo stepped to the window, and as he fixed his gaze on the outside scenery, his expression softened.

Towering above, Old Man Rom's cheeks also lifted into a smile, mirroring Ezzo's sentiment.

Outside the window, Reinhard ascended the hill to the mansion, accompanied by a crimson earth dragon. The return of the earth dragon, previously confiscated from them after being offered as the price of their agreement, was a notable sight. A golden-haired girl raced toward the knight and the earth dragon. Felt's unwavering figure, running straight ahead without hesitation, brought an unexpected sense of tranquility.

34

And so, the problems surrounding the Earth Dragon Capital came to a close. With the exception of one thing, that is. The final scene unfolded in a stone room, stark and cold. Helaine surmised that it was somewhere in the basement of a nondescript building in some obscure part of Lugunica. The loss of the Golden Beetle in Flanders, coupled with her own failure, was too much to compensate for. The Golden Beetle's standing within that city plummeted, and Helaine, stripped of her administrative role, was relegated back to the royal capital.

The reason why she hadn't been handed over to the Big Three in the city was not due to any mercy bestowed upon her by her superior. She received no such generous compensation. In a sense, she may have even preferred her fate to have been entrusted to the Black Silver Coin, The Balance, or the Flower Prison Garden.

Of course, if this had been done, she would have faced severe torture or been subjected to their insatiable desires for a woman. Yet for Helaine, even such outcomes may have been preferable to being stared at with such indifference by the person before her.

"Let's hear your explanation, Helaine Gatness."

"Yes, of course," she acquiesced. "The unforeseen circumstances have dealt a severe blow to our plans of infiltrating the city of Flanders. The Golden Beetle's…false identity has also severely undermined its voice within the city."

Hanging her head, Helaine's gaze grew dim as she confronted the consequences of her own actions. However, she could not afford to falter and disregard what the other party had to say.

The magnitude of her blunder could not be erased. That's why, at the very least, I must atone for it with every fiber of my being.

"…"

Listening to Helaine's explanation, a man sat before her in a chair, his cheek propped on his hand, which in turn rested on the armrest. Even his gestures exuded an air of sophistication, and the way he regarded her stirred something deep within her.

Helaine was so captivated by the man before her, the word "captivated" alone failed to describe what she felt in its entirety. She was so enamored by this man that she would willingly forfeit her life should he ask her to die. However, such a notion seemed of little concern to the man. Wasting valuable resources was not an option.

"You said you planned to infiltrate Flanders. However, did I ever order you to do so?" the man spoke. "There existed a delicate balance amongst the three organizations in that city. Had you remained silent, there would've been no issue at all."

"There was an ambitious man, easily swayed, who possessed an unwarranted talent…" Helaine spoke with a tinge of frustration. "I believed that if I placed him in a leadership position in that organization, he'd have been much more manageable."

"You had to contend with the interference of the royal selection candidate, and your plan failed," the man admonished. "On top of that, your own involvement was exposed, nearly reaching the higher echelons. A complete fiasco."

"The eldest son of House Hoffman is now under Lady Felt!" Helaine's words grew increasingly frantic as she raised her voice, stumbling over her words. "So our…"

The man rose from his chair, interrupting her as he slowly approached her. “Rickert Hoffman’s son, huh?”

In the darkness of the basement, a tall man emerged into view, illuminated by the flickering candlelight. He was a man around 30 years old, with long, golden hair and a carefully trimmed beard. His blue eyes were filled with intelligence and reason, and he was known for his outstanding competence, which belied his appearance.

Most people probably perceived his position as that of a representative of the royal capital’s Merchant Guild. However, the reality of his position was far more significant than something so trivial. His decisions, actions, and statements had the power to influence the entire kingdom, and the importance of his role was comparable to that of the Council of Wise Men.

If it were the Council of Wise Men that ran the kingdom’s government, it would be his role to protect and support the very backbone of the kingdom. Forty years ago, after the Demi-Human War, a secret defense mechanism was created out of necessity to defend the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica from within.

The Six Tongues. An organization of which the man standing before her, Russell Fellow, currently held the esteemed position of director. And so, Russell advanced and stood before the kneeling Helaine, who gasped as the tall man looked down on her, anticipating his words as every nerve stood on edge.

“With the addition of the Golden Lion, the balance in Flanders has been fortified,” he began. “While we have fewer means to intervene on our side, there is no doubt that we have resolved a number of pressing matters.”

“…”

Helaine remained silent. Russell continued, “However, with the kingdom reeling from the royal selection, the Golden Lion and the Valkyrie, the half-devil and the Bloody Bride, and the Merchant of the West, we must be thoughtful in our response. Regrettably, you have proven lacking in this regard. Therefore, you must be punished.”

“Y-Yes, sir!” Helaine lowered her head to the ground with such force, her forehead collided violently with the floor. She unbuttoned her suit on the spot, exposing her undulating white skin. Russell’s palm slowly crawled down her bare back. As he did, the curse mark etched into her skin made her blood boil, the intense pain staining her vision white. “Kaa… ku… aah!”

“Having to withdraw competent pawns back is indeed troublesome,” Russell remarked, without so much as a glance at Helaine, writhing and weeping tears of blood. Lost in his own contemplation, he continued. “Nevertheless, should we consider it a gain to have assessed the potential of the Golden Lion, initially shrouded in uncertainty at the start of the royal selection? No, it is unacceptable to have the son of the Hoffmans aware of our involvement. Perhaps it is time to revise some of our plans?”

Russell’s mind teemed with an array of strategies and an army of pawns, all of which he’d utilized with utmost efficiency without a shred of selfish desires. His ultimate selflessness was the precise quality that allowed Helaine to pledge an unwavering allegiance to him.

Yes, indeed, that is why I must overcome all this suffering so that I may serve him again soon, she thought.

“Ah, ah!” Helaine’s anguished screams pierced the air, and as Russell listened to the agony in her voice, a tinge of concern washed over him for the future of the kingdom. The royal selection had already begun, and whatever the outcome, it would undoubtedly bring about a resolution. Russell hoped that the days to come would hold a glimmer of hope.

To realize this… That is the sole purpose of Russell Fellow of the Six Tongue’s existence, he thought with conviction.

END

The Witch's After Tea Party:
One Wild Night
(CA)

1

It was a terrible snowstorm. The fierce crosswind's sheer cold threatened to cut straight through her body. It sapped the strength from her feet, the sight from her eyes, her hearing, sense of smell, and touch. It made her feel as though it would steal all that she was.

"…ega!!"

From the haze which mired her thoughts, she realized someone nearby was shouting at her. When she glanced up, a face took shape inside the howling, snow-swept expanse.

The moment she could recognize the desperate cry from amid her stupor, two hands threaded themselves beneath her armpits, and she found herself yanked sharply upward from the snowdrift in which she lay waist-deep. The next instant, she found herself pulled free by sheer physical force.

And now she was free of the snow, into the open air. Although she had only gone from slowly freezing solid to an icy wind chill, this small change in body temperature allowed her snow-addled mind to realize something else.

"…hey, you! Are you listening?! Omega! I'm talking to you, Omega!!"

The discovery might have moved her if not for the banshee screeching inches from her ear. The owner of the indignant voice, currently peering sidelong at her, was a girl. Her refined appearance contrasted with the fury burning in the depths of her eyes.

"Oh good," the girl muttered in a small voice. When Omega met her gaze, she breathed a sigh of relief. “You’re not dead, right? Can you hear me? If you can hear me, say something!”

“…I can…hear you. You don’t…have to…yell…” Omega rasped out.

“It’s just like you to talk back even when you’re gasping for air… Do you remember what happened?”

“Of course, I do… Who are you again?”

“Oh, you’re useless!” the girl raged at her.

The girl reached the limits of her anger and promptly headbutted her. The loud thud and sudden pain from the impact on her forehead wrenched back her drifting consciousness. Flexing her numb fingers and prodding the part of her forehead that had received the headbutt, she murmured, “That hurt, Palmyra.”

“So you do know me! Listen up, Omega. You fell into a pile of snow and got buried. I said I didn’t think we should leave in this weather, and now look—thanks to you, we’re stuck in a blizzard!”

“…Okay, but don’t yell so close to my ear. Your voice is even louder than usual, Minerva.”

“Who the hell is that?!” Seeing her slow drift into delirium, the girl—Palmyra—widened her eyes. Repeatedly slapping Omega’s cheeks, she screamed, “Wake up! Wake up! Wake up!”

It hurt, but sleep was winning. Ignoring the pain, she continued drifting towards the peaceful feeling.

“Palmyra! Omega! Are you two okay?!”

“Colette! Are you okay?”

“Yes, yes, I’m fine. Don’t worry about me. But…but it’s been awful! I’ve been looking all over, but I can’t find anywhere where we can rest!”

Pushing her way through the snow, the girl who appeared before the two had gentle features and was called Colette. When she saw

Omega lying in Palmyra's arms so limply, she yelped in surprise. Taking off her gloves, she pressed a bare palm to the girl's frozen cheek. It wasn't much in the face of such a terrible blizzard, but Omega was grateful for the warmth. Relying on that warmth, her eyelids shuddered as she spoke. "Colette, Palmyra… I have one final thing I want to say to you both."

"Don't jinx it!" cried Palmyra.

"No!" exclaimed Colette. "Don't talk like that!"

Hearing her weak murmur, the two girls were in fierce denial at the possibility of her death. But that was merely the pointless struggle of those who couldn't accept the reality in front of them.

Each moment, death grew closer.

Pale white and ice cold—a hopeless end.

"…No, actually, there is one last thing I can try." Omega shook her head, picturing the results of not struggling like a fool. If not a fool's resistance, there is only a sage's concession. But how can this be better? she wondered. To just accept my fate graciously and not soil my last moments? Sounds like something that black-haired boy would never accept.

"…" Taking a shallow breath, she raised her arm slowly. Gathering at the tip of her fingers was the power to meddle with logic, a power only a select few could perceive. It was magic—an abnormality produced through the barbaric act of using mana to reshape the natural order to one's will.

That was what brought the bright red flame into the world—a scorching heat that contrasted with the surrounding snow; brought into the world with the sole purpose of driving away the cold. It vanished quickly, and then it was over.

"…What was that?"

"A ball of fire? It disappeared so suddenly…"

Palmyra and Colette stared at one another, muttering about the lingering heat from the swelling ball of fire. Listening to the two talking, Omega let out a breath. “That was… the best I could do…”

“Wait, what?” said Palmyra. “That was you?!”

“Omega?!” exclaimed Colette. “Omega!”

Having used up the last of her remaining power in a genuine attempt to preserve her life, Omega felt her conscience—or rather, her entire existence—begin to fade. When a body constructed of mana welcomes death, it is absorbed by the particles that make up this world, and can only disappear.

It’s a comfort, at least, that those two won’t have to break down in tears beside my corpse. “But… If possible… I think I’d like to see… your faces as you cry…”

“What a cruel thing to say…!” cried Palmyra as she pleaded. “You… Wake up! Wake up, I said!!”

“P-Palmyra, no!” warned Colette. “Omega’s neck… Careful of her neck—”

Palmyra continued slapping Omega’s cheeks, unable to let her drift off, while Colette clung to Palmyra, trying to stop her attacks. Within the blizzard, they continued acting in a way they probably shouldn’t have, considering their situation, and time ticked by.

The three inched towards death with each passing moment.

“There you are! It seems the fire I saw just now was real after all.”

At the sudden voice, Colette and Palmyra turned in surprise. Standing before them in the snow was a woman in a thick robe.

“I’m Lysa, an itinerant preacher. I’m here to help!”

2

The woman calling herself Lysa skillfully began her work to save the three of them. “First of all, getting warm amidst the blizzard will be difficult; let’s dig into the snow and make a simple hole to serve as a windbreak. Here, take my jacket.”

“Ah!” exclaimed Colette. “I’m sorry! So sorry! I’ll help too. Please, let me help!”

Lysa nimbly removed her thick outer garment, threw it over Palmyra, and—using her cane—began work on the hole in the snow with her slender arms. Seeing this, the confused Colette also offered to lend a hand. And so, just like that, they created a cave in the snow, which the four huddled down into.

“It may be a little cramped, but we should make a fire now that the windbreak is done. Let’s get everyone warmed up.”

“…air…the air.”

“…? Oh, right! If we don’t let air into our hole, we’ll all suffocate.”

“S-Suffocate?!”

Startled, Palmyra stiffened, but Lysa just laughed, saying, “There’s no need to worry.” Then, with her cane, she pierced the ceiling, opening a small air vent.

After that, the woman produced a single book from her bag and tore a page out to use as kindling. Slowly, she brought a fire to life inside the cave.

“…warm.”

“Yes, very warm. Fire purifies all. There’s nothing greater in this world than fire.”

“That’s a little extreme… But-But it does sound reasonable. After all… it’s just so warm.”

As they comfortably warmed up in the cave little by little, Colette and Palmyra’s severe expressions began to fade. And then…

“The fire…is warm…” Omega said, stretching her body from Palmyra’s arms and straining to get closer to the warmth.

Watching her do this, Palmyra raised an eyebrow. “Careful. Don’t burn yourself.”

“I wouldn’t do anything so foolish. Though numb hands sure are inconvenient…ow!” While suppressing a laugh, Omega slipped on the snow approaching the fire and, with a flutter of her peach-colored hair, fell headfirst into the open flame. This warmed her up incredibly quickly. “I see, so this is a fire…”

“Agh!” exclaimed Palmyra. “How could you do it just as I was saying not to? What were you thinking?!”

“Just now, the pain of being burned… So this is what Carmilla felt…”

“Is your face okay, Omega?” asked Colette. “Make sure you cool it down properly with some snow…”

Drawing away from the fire, she applied snow to her burned face. Even though she was burned, frozen, and uncomfortable, being together like this made it all rather enjoyable. Watching the three of them, Lysa was dumbfounded and had to cover her mouth to stifle a laugh. “…You three sure are a strange bunch.”

“Ugh… How…embarrassing…” Palmyra’s face reddened, and she lowered her head as Lysa laughed.

Huddling up next to Palmyra, Colette clasped her hands to her chest. “You’re right about that…I’m sorry, was your name Lysa?”

“Yes, that’s right. I’m Lysa, an itinerant preacher.”

“Thanks to you, Lysa, we’re alive. We’re so grateful! If you hadn’t come when you did…” Colette’s long eyelashes fluttered as a slight hint of fear crossed her pale face. “We’d all have…”

“We’d all have become snow algae… Is that the right word?”

“I don’t know what you’re trying to ask, but in that case, you certainly would have been the first to become one,” said Palmyra as she poked Omega between her furrowed brows as she attempted to finish Colette’s sentence.

Omega accepted both the finger and the protest and said, “It doesn’t matter. I’m grateful, too, Lysa. You said you were an itinerant preacher… Does that mean you’re part of the Gustekan Church?”

“Yes, that’s right. I spread our teachings as an itinerant preacher. I saw the red flame in the snow completely by chance… It took me by surprise.”

“And then you found us… How about that, Palmyra?” asked Omega. “Did you hear that?”

“I hope you’re not thinking it was all thanks to you,” Palmyra replied. “You’re the one who marched out into the blizzard in the first place and slipped into the snow. Everything was your fault.”

“…I see you haven’t learned to say thank you.”

“If I were to say thank you, it would be to Lysa—not you!”

The more Omega complained about the unreasonable assessment, the more she received Palmyra’s objections. As she shrugged her shoulders, Palmyra’s face turned redder and redder.

“Umm, these two are very sorry, Lysa. We haven’t even introduced ourselves. I’m Colette, and this child is Palmyra… And this very small child is—”

“Omega.” Riding off of Colette’s introduction, she chimed in with her own. Omega—a name suitable for this body, but not for a witch living in these times.

“So you’re Colette, Palmyra, and Omega, correct? Thank you for letting me know.” Listening to their introductions, Lysa gave a deep bow.

Omega was somewhat irritated at being called a small child, but it was true that her outward appearance made her look like the youngest of the three, so she didn’t protest.

“…”

As she warmed herself by the fire, Omega inspected Lysa’s appearance. She had gold hair that flowed to her lower back and clear blue eyes. Her fair skin and curved body were wrapped in a thick robe. Being an itinerant preacher, she most likely spent a lot of time touring various places within the freezing kingdom of Gusteko.

“This may sound a little rude, but isn’t being an itinerant preacher a difficult job for a woman?”

“It is. However, it’s my duty to travel across the kingdom on my own two feet and speak to the people with my own words. I truly believe there’s no better way to spread our teachings.”

“I see. But haven’t the Holy King Church’s Teachings already been spread to the vast majority of people? It’s hard to believe there’s any room for new teachings at this stage.”

“Our teachings are in the midst of a transformation. It’s my task as a servant of the Holy King to guide and instruct people in the new ways.” Lysa pressed a hand to her chest as she spoke, making her devotion to her faith clear.

Apologizing for causing trouble, Omega shrugged. “I’m not trying to test your faith with these questions. But there are people who follow the teachings without really thinking about them, aren’t there? Asking about things like this can give an interesting new perspective on it all.”

“Isn’t that the definition of testing…?” Palmyra scrutinized.

“Palmyra, you really do nitpick,” Omega shot back. “Don’t you ever get tired?”

Eyes locked on each other, there was tension in the air between Omega and Palmyra. Suddenly, Colette cut in, trying to move the conversation’s focus onto Lysa. “Excuse me! Lysa! Can I ask something?!” she asked. “Thanks to you, we managed to make a little house in the snow, but will we be okay staying here until morning?!”

“No, staying so long should be avoided,” answered Lysa. “There’s no indication that the blizzard will let up overnight, so once you've recovered your strength we should move. There's a church nearby we can take shelter in."

"A church… Well, if there's a building nearby, that's great," Omega chimed in.

Hearing Lysa's proposal, Colette and Palmyra looked relieved. Even Omega agreed with the suggestion.

"Anyhow," continued Omega, "I've used up most of my strength… I didn't think that just trying to survive in the snow would consume so much mana."

"Have you learned your lesson?" asked Palmyra.

"Everything in life is a lesson, and I'm here to learn everything life has to offer."

Upon seeing no indication of regret, Palmyra grabbed Omega's collar and shook her tiny body back and forth. "You…!!"

Lysa furrowed her brow at Colette, who was watching the two of them with a smile. "Are you three always like this?" she asked.

"Generally, yes. But the three of us have only just started our journey together…" replied Colette with a smile. Placing a hand on her cheek, she looked fondly at her quarreling companions. "Every day is completely different, and it's always so much fun."

3

The church had been constructed high in the snowy mountains. Back in the day, those in a position of authority had a preference for high places, and so churches were often built in similar areas.

"Naturally, churches on mountains also serve as a landmark to follow when looking from below," explained Omega. "Exactly as we're using it right now, they can be considered a beacon of hope when on the verge of death."

"Could you explain while walking on your own legs?" Palmyra grumbled to herself as Omega lectured about the church's history. In front of her, Lysa trudged along the snowy road, carrying Omega on her back.

"Sorry, Lysa. Are you sure she's not too heavy?" asked Colette. "If it's too much, let me know; I'll do my best to take over."

"I'm okay, but thank you for your concern, Colette."

Currently acting as their guide along the snowy road—on top of dealing with Omega—Colette was right to be worrying about Lysa, but her response did give some reassurance. The girls were grateful. After having the misfortune of being caught in the middle of a blizzard, they had been incredibly lucky to be found by Lysa.

"As an itinerant preacher…do you always take on such burdens? By the way, that question included a double entendre where I substituted the word 'myself' with 'burden'."

"It's not as if I always have to carry you on my back. But it's true that there are a lot of difficult roads that I have to take. Gusteko is just that kind of place."

Dominated by an extreme permafrost, the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko is a land far too harsh for humans to exist in. It's for exactly that reason that the Church protects those who cling to their beliefs. Thinking to herself, Omega smiled. After all, the Holy King Church hasn't changed one bit in hundreds of years. I do, however, still hold an interest in its history.

"If I have the chance, I'd like to visit the Holy City."

"I'd be most pleased if you could visit the Holy City and the Sacred Mountain at least once… But that journey holds many perils."

"It'd be suicide in our current state, right? How amusing."

Palmyra shot a stern look in the direction of Omega and Lysa's conversation. "There's nothing amusing about it!" she cried.

Omega was about to scold her on how wrong it was to eavesdrop, when Colette's face lit up, and her arm shot forward. "Oh! Look, look, everyone! Isn't that the church?"

Distracted by her words, the other two looked in the direction she'd indicated, but neither could see anything through the thick snow.

"The…church? I can't see anything like that…"

"Huh? Really? I wonder why…"

"Ah, Colette. That would be due to the bracelet. I told you, didn't I? It'll protect you. And if it's to protect you, it'll even help with seeing through this wind."

"Oh really… How odd. But thank you." As she spoke, Colette rubbed her hand over the ominous bracelet on her right arm.

Palmyra narrowed her eyes at the explanation, but Omega ignored her. "If Colette can see it, then we must be going in the right direction. Could you lead the way?"

"…Of course! Leave it to me. Leave it all to me."

Upon hearing Omega's words, Colette took up position at the front of the group, seemingly happy at being relied upon.

Luckily, of the three of them, Colette had the most stamina. While it was partly due to the bracelet, this was a situation in which they could finally rely on her physical strength.

Having taken over as head of the group, Colette shoveled the snow to make a route for the rest of them, surprising Lysa with her skill. They continued along, single file, without having to worry too much about their footing, and finally reached the church.

It was difficult to fully take in its exterior due to the thick covering of snow, but the building seemed to be made from stone. It was a rare choice for a church, but an architectural style unique to the area that prevented buildings from being swept away by snowstorms. It had a comforting feeling to it—one that didn't arise merely from the fact that it was unlikely to collapse while staying there, but more so the faint light that leaked from the windows, indicating the signs of life that lay within.

"We're in luck, it doesn't look like the head of the church is asleep yet either."

"…That seems to be the case. Hello… Hello…!" Lysa called out. "Is anyone there? Hello… Hello…?"

"Hold on a second," came a response from the other side of the door. Footsteps could be heard growing closer, and then slowly the door creaked open.

"Whoa, aren't these some unexpected guests? A group of four women," said a stern-looking, middle-aged man with wide eyes. At first, he had opened the door just a crack, clearly wary of the sudden appearance of strangers, but upon realizing it was a group of young girls, he swung it wide open.

"Come in, come in!" he said, inviting Omega and the others inside. "Hey! Someone bring something for them to wipe themselves with! We have guests!" the man called out, and a figure appeared from inside—an incredibly tall figure.

As that person's silhouette came into view, Palmyra let out a shriek. She had just entered the church and was busy brushing the snow from her clothes, when he had handed her a towel. The subject of her gaze had a strange appearance.

"Whoa, how incredible," praised Colette. "You certainly have a lot of hands, don't you?"

"M-Multi-Arm Clan… Here… Use."

"Thank you! That's a great help."

The group of girls counted two extra arms on the giant man with dark blue skin. The four arms growing from his shoulders made it clear he was a rare demi-human from the Multi-Arm Clan—a race you didn't often see in the snowy kingdom of Gusteko.

"H-Here…take…it's bad…if body is cold."

"Th-Thanks… Umm, I'm sorry about screaming just now," said Palmyra. "You surprised me is all."

"It's…okay…happens…lots."

Colette took the towel he handed her. The stranger from the Multi-Arm Clan didn't seem perturbed by the extremes of Colette and Palmyra's reactions. Omega and Lysa, also receiving towels, took him up on his kind offer and wiped the snow away.

"Even so, for a group of girls to be out at night in the middle of a blizzard… Isn't that a little reckless?" questioned the man.

"I'm a little offended at being called reckless," Omega replied. "When we set out, there wasn't any sign that the weather would turn like this. It's a little rash of you to call us as such without first knowing whether we decided to leave before or after the snow had already started."

"Oh… Wow, you're quite the talker…"

The man they had first met at the door was left in awe at Omega, who had protested at the slight to their honor. Seeing his reaction made Omega feel a little proud, but the other two did not seem so pleased.

"Well anyway, I'm glad you girls are safe. I'm Podoso; I'm a friendly guy who works as a guard in the town on the other side of the mountain."

"I-I'm Admonsah… Traveling entertainer."

The two men introduced themselves. The middle-aged man being Podoso, the Multi-Armed one being Admonsah.

Upon hearing Admonsah's introduction, Colette's eyes brightened. "A traveling entertainer! They're those people, right? The ones who travel between villages and towns, showing off their skills… What kind of skill do you have? I'm so curious!"

"Uh… My…skill…is…"

"Your skill is…?"

Hounded by the overly curious Colette, Admonsah suddenly sobered, and taking a short breath in, he raised his four arms behind his back. At a speed no one could follow, he swung his arms and threw something towards the back of the church. That something being four knives he had hidden at his waist. The spinning blades flew at a terrific speed, and stuck beautifully into the four doors on each wall of the church, and he had done all that without looking. It certainly was an exceptional talent.

The problem, however, was that a woman had just emerged from the door that one of the knives had pierced. With wavy bronze hair, she stared at the knife as though it had been thrown directly at her, and opened her mouth in shock.

"What if I'd died?!" she screamed, so loud that it alone could have robbed someone of their life.

4

The woman screaming introduced herself as Maqueena, a minstrel. The direction of her anger was at Admonsah, who had directly risked her life with the knife throwing, and lashed out at him accordingly. "I thought I was going to die; I thought it was all over…and then I found this church, and I could finally breathe easy. And even though I knew I'd avoided freezing to death, I never imagined I'd die by a knife. You just shortened my lifespan! Why did you do that?!"

"Uh…Ah…Uh…"

"If you 'uh' and 'ah' like that, no one can understand! Aren't you slacking on your public speaking skills just because people are interested in your appearance? Take this more seriously!" She bit at Admonsah for a completely different reason than the knife throw.

When her attitude became intolerable, it was Lysa who cut in. "Please calm down. Admonsah bore no ill will, and you don't seem to have sustained any injuries, Maqueena…"

"Huh?! What about the wounds on my heart? Who the hell are you to be getting involved, anyway? And what's with those massive breasts? I'm going to touch them!"

"What a rude thing to say… Hey, you can't say stuff like that. You can't…"

Having merely tried to intervene, Lysa was now both flustered and hurt at having been shouted at. As Colette and Palmyra tried to console her, Omega let out a sigh. "Well, well. Seems it doesn't matter what era it is, minstrels never change. Passionate and emotional, they don't think about the hurt they cause as they stomp all over other people's hearts with their dirty shoes."

"Hey! That tiny child seems oddly pessimistic about the world. Reflecting upon the best and worst parts of humanity with that appearance…that appearance…"

Catching wind of that murmur, Maqueena—despite having switched who she was angry with—suddenly found she had lost her momentum. She looked like a somewhat unperceptive girl, but it seemed her observance skills came directly from her skills as a minstrel.

Maqueena's round eyes noticed Omega's sharp ears. "Y-Y-Y-You… Those ears…"

"Oh? You have quite the eye… I didn't mean to say that as Omega just now, how foolish of me," replied Omega with a quick wink to the trembling Maqueena, but her playfulness wasn't really understood. Sighing, she gently pushed her peach-colored hair back, highlighting her ears. "It's just as it looks. Although only half the blood running through my veins is elf…that still makes me half elf."

"That's worse! Elves are slightly preferable! Half-devil! You're a half-devil!" Jumping around yelling, Maqueena ended up hiding behind Admonsah and Podoso. The conversation seemed to jump from topic to topic rather quickly, and it seemed rather strange for her to rely on the person she was abusing just a few moments ago.

It seemed Podoso also thought so. As his lip curled, he spoke. "Young miss… No matter what has transpired, that certainly wasn't very polite."

"Wh-Wh-What is with this? A snowy night, in a church, with a half-devil… Under these conditions, there’s no reason I shouldn’t start flirting with a man. I don’t want to die. I don’t want to die!”

“You’re exaggerating…”

Podoso’s face indicated how worn out he was by the fuss Maqueena was making. “I’m sorry, Miss Half-Elf. I try to be unprejudiced, but…”

“Ah, it’s no problem, really. It’s not uncommon to be treated as such. And besides…”

“Besides?”

“People who are usually so prim and proper will give you looks filled with animosity or distrust, and all because you’re a half-elf. The feeling is surprisingly addictive.”

“I-I see… You have a lot of guts… But looking at you, Miss Half-Elf, how old are you exactly?” Upon hearing Omega’s response, Podoso began to have doubts about it.

But it was because he had so rudely inquired about her age that the group of girls concentrated their attack. He was scowled at by Palmyra, received a shake of the head by Lysa, stared at sadly by Colette, and had his foot stamped on by Maqueena. “Wh-What’s with this? It’s bad enough being stared at by the little ones, but why are you stepping on my foot too? You were scared of Omega until just a moment ago!”

“That was different. Men who show no consideration are bad! Huge giants are bad too! And big-breasted women! And half-devils! I have no one I can rely on,” lamented Maqueena like it was the end of the world, her head in her arms.

But it was Colette, with a kind expression, who extended a hand out to her. Kneeling in front of the crumpled Maqueena, she said, “It’s okay. Omega is a good girl, so there’s no need to be scared. Admonsah, too, has really kind eyes. Podoso…well, his lack of consideration isn’t very good…”

“J-Just me, huh…”

"But he was the first person who opened the door for us!" she added. "He added firewood, and made the fire bigger… The only thing he doesn't understand is a woman's heart."

It was difficult to ascertain whether Colette was praising him or delivering the final blow, but Maqueena accepted her defense with a few sniffs.

"Do you see?" Colette went on. "Now, let's apologize to everyone, okay? That way they can forgive us, and then they'll let us into their circle."

"U-Um… S-Sorryyy. I don't want to be alone…"

At Colette's skill at getting Maqueena to apologize, Lysa unconsciously applauded. "Wow. You managed to tame her."

Palmyra watched with pride, and Omega moved next to her. "Are you happy Colette's skill has finally been recognized?"

"I really hate you sometimes," Palmyra said with a sigh.

"What?" replied Omega, astonished. "That's the kind of comment only a sweet, empathetic girl could make…"

When an accord had been reached amongst each person who had gathered there, it was Podoso who clapped his hands together and said, "May I say something? I think we should talk as the young ladies warm themselves. Seeing as we are all stranded in this blizzard for the time being, and are temporarily borrowing this church's roof… What do you think?"

Lysa nodded in response to his question. "I agree."

The others voiced no complaints, and he scratched his head. "I see."

And as he scratched the short, green hair atop his head, his expression was somewhat somber.

"Do you have something that's concerning you?" Omega asked.

"N—Actually, the pastor who should be living in this church doesn't seem to be here. Pastor Coatl is a great man, but…"

"Pastor Coatl…" At Podoso's words of admiration, Omega looked around at the church's interior. The place of worship had a direct connection to those who had greeted them at the door—the seven people who were currently warming themselves inside. There existed a section inside the church dedicated to the pastor's living quarters, but it didn't seem particularly large. At least, it certainly didn't seem large enough to conceal a fully grown man.

"Did you come here to see Pastor Coatl, Podoso?" asked Omega.

"Huh? Oh, yes, I did," he replied. "That's because…there's been lots of heavy snow. The pastor lives alone, so it could be bad if anything happened."

"Hmm. You worried for his well being in case anything happened to him. I see." Thinking over Podoso's words, Omega's eyes narrowed.

At that gesture, Podoso furrowed his brows curiously but wasn't given any time to question it. Catching up with the conversation, Maqueena leapt to her feet. "That's right! I also came here to see Pastor Coatl. I plan on writing a song about him—the hero who saved the local town!"

"…Umm, I also came here to see Pastor Coatl," added Lysa.

"Really? How similar we are, Big Breasts! I'm not happy about it, though!"

"Could you come up with a different name, please?"

Learning that they were searching for the same person, the mutual dislike that had built up between Maqueena and Lysa was put to rest.

In any case, it seemed like everyone wished to see Pastor Coatl.

"Did you also come to see the pastor, Admonsah?" asked Colette.

"N-No, not…me," he replied. "I'm…an…outsider."

"Did you plan to meet him?"

"Y…es."

Becoming rather close in such a short period of time, Colette translated his words for the rest of them. Watching this scene unfold happily, Palmyra tilted her head and interjected. "But Pastor Coatl isn't in the church. It's rather concerning."

"Well, the pastor has lived here for a long time, so he should understand the dangers of heavy snow. He's probably just gone out." As he spoke, Podoso turned his attention to the sound of the blizzard billowing outside the church.

As time went on, the blizzard only got worse.

I don't wish to scare the others, but even a person experienced in this sort of weather would be swallowed up by the tremendous snowfall. I'm unsure what type of person this Pastor Coatl is, but long life doesn't necessarily mean a high survival rate. "Even supposing that was true, it doesn't explain jeopardizing his life to go out like this… But then, I died at the age of 19, so I could be wrong."

"H-Hold on a second, what are you muttering about? Half-devils are scary."

"It's exactly because I'm half devil that I'm muttering—I'm deciding on how to eat you."

"Eeeeek! A cannibal! A cannibaaaal!" Falling over onto her back with a crash, Maqueena was so surprised she almost wet herself.

Omega was pleased with the result of her teasing, but her prank was, of course, questioned.

"That's not okay, Omega," admonished Lysa. "It's not fun to scare people like that."

"Whoops, I seem to have forgotten my manners in front of a member of the church. This is a home for followers of the Holy King Church, after all. Should I receive a punishment for my insolence?"

Omega shrugged at Lysa, who had scolded her for her behavior towards Maqueena.

Lysa, however, shook her head. “No. I’m not the head of this church; that would be Pastor Coatl. It isn’t my place to lecture you…but anyone with good sense should correct the mistakes of children, regardless of the teachings. That’s what I think.”

Accepting Lysa’s sincere opinion, Omega lowered her head. “…I see. The one without tact was solely me. I apologize.” The others surrounding them—including Colette and Palmyra—were astonished by her apology. “…Why exactly do you all look so surprised?” she asked.

“I wasn’t aware that you could apologize.”

“It does make me begin to reflect on things when it’s said by Colette rather than Palmyra.”

“You should reflect no matter who says it!” Palmyra barked at Omega, who was teasing her. Colette soothed her.

Ignoring the two girls, Omega continued. “Even then, Podoso called him a hero, and Lysa and Maqueena both said they came to see him, but is Pastor Coatl really that great of a person?”

“I have heard this, but—”

“Oh, oh, oh? Is it myyy turn? Let me explain!”

Maqueena’s nostrils had flared up at Omega’s question, and she leaped upon her own luggage, from which she pulled the popular stringed instrument of a minstrel—a lyulyre.

“What I speak of from now will be of the great disaster that struck this region and the story of the single clergyman who stood up against it! How sad! How saaad!”

As she sang, so did the story of Pastor Coatl begin—how he was adored by the people of the town and how he came to be known as a hero. But, regardless of the content, it was better not to mention Maqueena’s abilities in singing or storytelling.

5

This region was once struck by a huge avalanche, and a town was destroyed in the chaos. At that time, Pastor Coatl came running to the site of the incident without delay, and after successfully saving several lives, he offered up his savings to help restore what had been damaged. Afterward, he moved to a nearby church and continued to watch over the town.

“Is how I’d roughly summarize Maqueena’s song.”

“Huh? Why do you need to summarize it? I sang my heart out; it was full of emotion. Are you displeased somehow? Are you saying it’s lacking somehow?!” Having had her song summarized in such an unimaginative way, Maqueena raised a complaint. However, there wasn’t a single person who came to her defense, so one could very much imagine the quality of the song.

Anyway, the circumstances surrounding Pastor Coatl, at least, were satisfactory.

“That avalanche happened ten years ago…” explained Podoso. “The pastor, at that time, never took himself into consideration when carrying out the rescue operations. That’s how he lost his leg… And since then, he’s lived here.”

“Wow, that’s incredible. He really was an impressive man, wasn’t he?”

“Yes… Impressive. I think… Incredible.”

Admonsah and Colette clapped their hands together, under their complete mutual understanding. While their thoughts were completely in sync, Palmyra and the others hummed with far less enthusiasm.

“It seems Palmyra takes no interest in this,” commented Omega.

“Not really,” began Palmyra, “I neither liked it nor disliked it… I don’t think it was particularly interesting enough to be made into a song, though… That was a song, right? It sounded sort of like a song.”

“Yes, yes, that’s right!” exclaimed Maqueena. “Huh? What’s that? Was it a song? What do you mean?”

“Getting an answer to that question will only hurt you. Anyway, what’s that?” Palmyra was rather fed up with Maqueena’s snapping. Her caring nature was exactly why she could never become a bad person, but this place was an exception.

Encouraged by Palmyra, Maqueena slapped the lyulyre with the palm of her hand and exclaimed, “Actually, ‘The Saint of the Avalanche’ that I just sang isn’t very popular at the moment. The general opinion is that something is lacking from the climax of the story. So that’s why I came here!”

“That’s why you came to meet the pastor? Why?” questioned Podoso.

“Because I thought that the main character of the story would have more information to expand the story with! I’ll incorporate it into the story, and my song will be one step ahead of the others! That’s my goal!” Suddenly tightening her hand into a fist, Maqueena disclosed her aspirations freely. Then, weakly unclenching the fist, she groaned pitifully. “But…If I don’t manage to do that, there’s nothing in Gusteko for me to do. Lately, so many interesting things have been happening in Lugunica; it seems like there’s no end of subjects for songs.”

“Ahh, I have heard about stories coming from there, like the Royal Selection, the White Whale of the Three Great Witchbeasts, and the Great Rabbit,” added Podoso. “They’d probably be pretty easy to write songs about.”

“That certainly is a problem. If you’re going to do something interesting, do it over here, Mr. Unknown Hero.” Notwithstanding her grumblings, Maqueena’s despicable intentions were clear.

Omega looked over at Lysa. “Lysa, what was your reason for wanting to see the pastor?”

“…Actually, for the same reasons Maqueena spoke of. It’s a shame, really.”

Casting her eyes downwards, Omega sympathized with Lysa, who looked sorrowful. “I see… That’s indeed a shame.”

However, in this case, it didn’t mean making a song, but rather hearing the truth about the Saint of the Avalanche.

“Pastor Coatl’s name is famous even within the Church,” Lysa continued. “He was originally an itinerant preacher, just like me… I’d like to learn from my predecessor.”

“I see. Being so hardworking is a good thing. You should keep it up.”

“I can never guess what you’re going to say, Miss, but… Well, I get what you mean,” Podoso replied, giving a big clap and settling the conversation. “It’s a shame the pastor isn’t here, but perhaps another day would be better… By the way, did you three girls come here together? What for, exactly?”

“We were all chased out of our homes,” Omega explained. “My reason is exactly as you see. As for these two, it was because they were my close friends… Well, would you look at that? It’s all my fault. Ha-Ha-ha, I’m sorry I was even born.”

“It doesn’t seem like something to laugh about…” It had been her plan to make a hilarious joke, but unexpectedly, the atmosphere had soured.

Ignoring Omega, Colette called out to Maqueena. Her eyes were full of curiosity as she asked, “Do you have any other stories bar the saint one? I’m curious.”

“There aren’t many stories connected with this area… Ah, then shall I perform a story with a bit more adventure? It’s about the Ice Thieves.”

Colette tilted her head. “The Ice Thieves?”

Despite her previous negative experiences, Maqueena laughed and readied her lyulyre. Omega once again prepared herself for a truly awful performance, but Admonsah suddenly grabbed hold of the instrument and held it high into the air.

“Ah, hey, what are you doing?!”

“Oo… Everyone hates. No. I…won’t forgive.”

“Hate is a bit of a strong word!” Maqueena jumped up and down, but their height difference prevented her from retrieving the lyulyre. Eventually, having used up all her energy, she crumbled to the ground.

Taking over for the minstrel, who could no longer perform, Podoso cleared his throat. “The Ice Thieves is quite an old legend. A long time ago, there was a group of thieves who wreaked havoc in this area. The things they stole were hidden away very, very carefully. But one day, their cave got buried in an avalanche, and they became unable to retrieve their treasures.”

“In other words,” started Omega, “the moral of this story is that you shouldn’t hoard treasures without using them.”

“What moral? No, there are only idiots in this story,” Podoso said nonchalantly, declaring the characters in the story foolish. It might be the truth, but it was a rather blunt way of putting it.

“But, but… There were probably lots of gems and money amongst the treasure, right? And they’re all buried under the ice? It’s sort of exciting.”

Colette lightly pressed a hand to her chest—a gesture that Admonsah copied.

“Mmyes… exciting…”

“That’s true,” Lysa joined in, drawing in her chin. “I’ve heard that many people have tried to get their hands on the thieves’ stash. If found, it’d be worth a fortune, after all.”

“No matter the era, people’s sense of value is always so ridiculous,” Omega chimed in. “Nobody seems to understand what is necessary in order to live a full life.”

“What a profound opinion,” said Lysa. “Then what do you think is necessary in life, Omega?”

“It’s obvious—entertainment.”

“…”

At Omega’s immediate reply, Lysa and the others made a face.

But compared to the story’s content so far, this reaction was far more unexpected to Omega. “I don’t want to be the odd one out here, but that just now was not a joke. The thing people need to live a full life is entertainment. You could consider it a way to make life worth living. It does dictate your life, after all.”

“Then, how do you satisfy your heart’s desire?” asked Maqueena.

“By fighting ignorance. By learning of that which I do not know. I am the embodiment of a thirst for knowledge. Whether it be something I don’t know, or someone I don’t know… I long for every unknown,” Omega answered with a smile.

Maqueena, having listened to the answer to her question, considered it stupid and shrugged her shoulders. Both Podoso and Admonsah gave a curious laugh, but Colette and Palmyra were not laughing. Or, more accurately, they could not. The two of them knew Omega’s true character, after all. If they were to laugh at that, that would make them nothing more than reckless fools.

“Not that I’m the type to get angry at something as small as that, but…” Omega said with a small sigh.

But her sigh was quickly drowned out by Maqueena’s voice as she made her way into the church. “Ahh, I’m tired of talking about this… I have things to do.”

“Hey,” Podoso called out to her back. “Wait, wait. Where are you going? With it being so cold, you’re better off staying here.”

“Huh? Oh, yeah. I just need to take care of something real quick.”

“Take care of what? Pastor Coatl isn’t here, so what could you possibly need to…”

“You idiot! Don’t make me say it! I’m going to the toilet!” Having exposed her destination, Maqueena flung her towel at Podoso.

The towel smacked him right in the face, which he caught as it slid off. “Sorry…”

“Hah! As long as you are, then that’s fine. I’m off…”

“I’ll go with you,” Podoso announced. “Admonsah, I can leave the young ladies in your care, yes?”

“Huh?! I’m fine! I can go to the toilet by myself!”

Podoso’s attempt to go with her had astonished Maqueena. But despite her protests, he had a rather serious face as he spoke. “It’s okay,” he said, patting the girl’s shoulder. “You don’t need to act so modest. If I’m there, you won’t need to feel uneasy.”

“It’d make me more uneasy if you did come!” exclaimed Maqueena. “Hey, someone—anyone! Is no one on my side here…?”

“The gentleman is insisting,” asserted Omega, “and I must say, it isn’t very ladylike for you to continue refusing.”

“Quit saying stuff you don’t mean, half-devil!” In response to Omega’s insincere observation, Maqueena’s attitude soured, but then she wasn’t in a situation that would allow her to be patient. Glancing at Podoso—who showed no indication of backing down—she stamped her foot in submission. “Oh, alright! Fine, you can come along, pervert! But don’t think I’ll let you do whatever you want!”

“Aren’t you already letting him do what he wants?” Palmyra pointed out.

“Shut it, brat! You’ll have to go through the same thing soon enough!”

Maqueena and Podoso headed for the back of the church after pointing to Palmyra and giving one last parting threat.

As soon as they left, the atmosphere instantly relaxed around them, but it was not merely the foulmouthed Maqueena that had caused the tension in the air…

“Did Podoso seem nervous to you?” Colette asked with a tilt of her head. She was spot on. Unrelated to Maqueena’s attitude, Podoso had been strangely on edge. Accompanying Maqueena to the bathroom was definitely part of it, but it seemed as though he was concerned about something.

“Do you know anything about it, Admonsah?”

Admonsah shook his head. “N…o…”

He may have been enormous, and part of the Multi-Arm Clan that specialized in fighting, but his disposition was actually rather gentle.

“Well, if anything happens, then I’ll deal with it.”

“…Would that be possible, Lysa?”

“I’m an itinerant preacher, and a woman who travels alone as I do must be able to protect herself,” replied Lysa, flashing Palmyra a smile and tensing her bicep.

There wasn’t much to see on her arm, but there was definitely some truth to her words. Traveling alone as a woman was dangerous. That was part of why Omega had taken Colette and Palmyra with her—it hadn’t been solely because of how lonely it was to travel without companions.

“Anyway, nothing will happen to us when we’re gathered together in one place like this. If it comes to it, I’ll also show my true strength.”

“Your true strength… I’ll rely on you then,” answered Lysa, seeming rather amused by Omega’s remark.

She had most likely taken it as the drivel of a young girl, but Colette and the others who knew of her true strength gave a wry smile.

And just as the conversation had calmed down a little, so did the situation change. Abruptly, a noise could be heard as someone struck the church entrance from outside. “Excuse meee, hellooo. Open uuuup!”

“Seems like a new guest has arrived,” Omega observed.

The voice on the other side of the door was that of a young man. It seemed like there was another like Omega’s group, who had headed for the church in the midst of the blizzard.

After a brief moment of surprise, Lysa stood up.

“W-We’re opening it?” someone voiced in worry.

“…Yes, this is a church. It’s a place open to all. We’ll explain it to Podoso and Maqueena later,” explained Lysa before half-jogging to the door.

Admonsah, who had also gotten to his feet, dug for a fresh towel in his bag and brought it over. He’d given Omega and the others a towel each, yet he still seemed to have more with him. From the size of his luggage, it was entirely possible he carried the bags for the entirety of his group. Either way, the door to the church was opened, and a new character was ushered in by Lysa.

The newcomer flashed a radiant smile as he spoke. “Pheew. Thank you, thank you. I’m saved. I thought it was just going to be some light snow… I had no idea it’d be this heavy. How unlucky. What a pain.”

He was a young man in his early twenties, with moderately-long ashen hair tied behind his head, and gentle features that exuded charm. As he wiped the snow from his clothes with the towel Admonsah had given him, he spotted Omega’s group and raised an eyebrow. “Sorry if I startled anyone. I’m a humble peddler who goes by Trellock. Well, you can call me a peddler, but I’m currently destitute.”

Out of curiosity, Colette asked, “Destitute… You mean you have nothing on you? How did that happen?”

“Well, you see, young lady. It’s a terribly sad story… To cut it short, my wagon got stuck in the snow, and I was reluctantly forced to abandon it. Of course, I plan to go find it once the snow stops, but let's hope it's not buried," Trellock answered with a laugh.

It was clearly a personal story that involved feelings of loss, but the young man who told it—Trellock—exhibited no signs of sadness, leaving Colette and Palmyra unsure of how to respond.

At the girls' clouded expressions, Trellock flashed a smile and laughed. "Anyway… if it's possible, I'd like to spend the night. Who's in charge here? As it's a church, I'm guessing this young lady right here, yes?"

"Ah, no, you're wrong. I'm an itinerant preacher; the head of this church is someone else…" Waving her hands, Lysa explained her position and attempted to do the same for Omega and the others once more. However…

A scream cut across the church, interrupting their introductions.

"Eeeeeeeeeek!"

It was Maqueena's scream.

Although it wouldn't have been totally out of character for her to behave in such an erratic manner every time she used the bathroom, her scream was steeped in chaos and fear. Even as a spur of the moment performance, it seemed somewhat out-of-place.

"…Everyone, wait here!" Turning stiffly, Lysa's usually calm face was intense as she headed for the back of the church. In the wake of her pale face, Omega sprinted after her.

"Hey!" Palmyra shouted. "We were told to wait…"

"Palmyra! We're going too!" Tugging Palmyra's arm, Colette followed after them.

The sounds of Trellock's bewilderment could be heard in their wake.

The back of the chapel led into Coatl's living quarters. It contained a cramped living room, bedroom, bathroom, and another corridor that joined with the storeroom next door; however, Podoso and Maqueena could not be seen anywhere within the small area. There was certainly not enough space to have missed them, but the answer to the question as to why was soon discovered.

A section of the wall in the hallway had been slightly dislodged, and a small amount of light leaked through.

“A hidden passage…? It seems like it heads underground.”

“Omega, why are you here… Well, anyway, I’ll go first.” Realizing that attempting to stop her would be futile, Lysa widened the gap in the wall and descended the stairs.

Following after her, Omega and the others headed underground too.

They hadn’t gone far when they came across two figures.

“…”

One was frozen in place—Podoso—while the other that had sunk to the floor was Maqueena. Both had their backs turned, with their undivided attention focused on what was in front of them. In the gloomy basement, the only light came from a lagmite crystal—an ore that glowed upon impact. Amongst the dim light, Omega and the others finally saw what the two were staring at.

It was the sturdy body of a middle aged man—or rather, his corpse.

With his head split open, he lay in a pool of blood and spinal fluid. Cruel as it was to think so—with his legs in the position they were and his body so limp, a single glance was enough to know that it was already too late.

Seeing the dead body, a strangled sound came from Colette and Palmyra. Beside Omega, Lysa stiffened, her breath caught in her throat, and the corners of her usually gentle eyes tightened.

Maqueena, who had fallen over, was on the verge of tears. “H—h—h—w—why…”

Podoso’s face was pale, and his lips quivered as he spoke, calling out the name of the victim. “Pastor…Coatl…” Then, with a face expressing greater shock than when he learned of the pastor’s death, he fought to get his words out. “You really were inside the church…”

Admonsah and Trellock appeared on the stairs following the thundering sound of their approaching footsteps. And as they laid eyes on what everyone else had, they were also at a loss for words.

“Th-Th-This…” stuttered Admonsah.

“Ah?! A person? Is he dead? W-Wait a second, what the hell is going on?!”

The two men were terrified. In particular the one who had just arrived, sincerely lacking in luck—Trellock.

No, it might not be as straightforward as it seems. Amongst those expressing their confusion at the sight of the corpse, Omega closed one eye. Then, at no one in particular, began speaking. “So it seems that a cold-blooded killer—whether male or female—may be planning to murder us all.”

Then, fanning the flames of worry and confusion in the group, she gave a vicious sneer, worthy of a witch.

6

In the cold basement of the church lay the body of an old man with his head split in two. At the center of the group who had fallen into chaos at the sight was a young girl with long, peach-colored hair. She smiled in slight amusement, letting loose an evil cackle as she said, “So it seems that a cold-blooded killer—whether male or female—may be planning to murder us all.”

“Hey, Omega! Even with your bad taste in humor, this isn’t funny.”

The witch’s companion, Palmyra, scolded her for her insensitive comment, and hugged their other companion, Colette, who passed an unsteady gaze over the dead body. “B-Besides, is he really dead…? Are you sure you’re not mistaken?”

"Unfortunately, humans tend to die when they get their heads cracked open, contents spilling out. Well, there may be a handful who don't, but I don't think this old man is one of them." Stopping Palmyra's fleeting hope in its tracks, Omega's eyes moved over to the figure beside the corpse.

Podoso was a middle-aged man who worked as a guard in a town on the other side of the snowy mountains. And from what they'd discussed up until now, he was the only person who may have had a relationship with the owner of this church.

"Given the current situation, I'm guessing that the dead man would be Pastor Coatl, yes?"

"…A-Ah, yes. That's right. This is… Pastor Coatl."

"I see. The owner we thought was absent was actually already dead, right beneath our feet."

"H-H-H-Half-devil! Wh-Wh-Why are you so calm?! S-S-Someone has died… Died!"

Listening to Podoso's answer, Omega nodded in understanding before her shoulder was seized violently. The young woman who grabbed her had a pallid expression and brown hair—it was the minstrel, Maqueena. With her pale face, she shook Omega's slender shoulders back and forth relentlessly. "What was with that remark earlier?! What did you mean?! Cold-blooded killer? Murder us all?!"

"Sorry, I got a little carried away. I shouldn't have said that. So stop freaking out and calm down—my head is about to fall off."

"How dare you! You're telling me to calm down?! In this situation?!"

"Calm down, Maqueena. She's just a child." A woman in black church vestments intervened, grabbing the crying Maqueena's hand.

Lysa was an itinerant preacher, but despite her gentle demeanor, she yanked Maqueena's arm with great force.

Both Lysa and the one she was restraining—Maqueena—had come to this church seeking shelter from the blizzard. There were also two others in the room who were in the same position.

“U—A… Person…dead… child… can’t…look.”

“Ah, Admonsah…”

Blocking Colette and the other’s view was the traveling entertainer from the Multi-Arm Clan. He had a large build, blue skin, and went by the name of Admonsah. And from behind him, a man with ashen hair and a gentle nature peered into the room—the peddler, Trellock.

Trellock gasped, scrunching up his face at the gruesome scene before him. “When I heard the scream, I didn’t expect to come across this… I only planned on staying here for a night. What a thing to stumble upon…”

“Don’t make light of the situation… Who the hell are you, anyways?! Why is there yet another face I don’t know?!” Podoso shouted, confronting Trellock.

Trellock raised his hands in surrender. “Whoa, whoa, whoa…that’s what you’re upset about?!”

He had arrived at the church just as Podoso and Maqueena had left to go to the bathroom. With such unfortunate timing, it was only natural for Podoso to be wary of him.

“Podoso, please wait,” Lysa intervened. “We can explain his situation. But before we do that…”

“Before we do that?!” Podoso exclaimed. “What could be more important than seizing a suspicious character in this situa—”

“We should do something about the deceased,” Lysa interrupted, dampening Podoso’s vigor.

The old man’s fallen body in her line of sight was too painful to look at.

“Ah, I’ll get a sheet,” offered Maqueena. “It’ll be easier emotionally if we can't see him. Hey, get out of the way—there's one in the wooden crate behind you!"

"U…Ah…Sorry."

Shoving Admonsah aside, Maqueena pulled a sheet from a crate in the corner of the basement. It didn't seem particularly clean, but this wasn't a situation in which they could afford to be picky. She quickly covered the body with the sheet, and surprisingly, even went out of her way to shut his eyes.

"Oh, how unexpected. You lot live to sing about the failures and achievements of the dead—I wasn't aware you were physically able to feel respect for them."

"Huh? Are you looking for a fight? For the record, anyone that manages to go through life thinking over every single consequence would never make it as a minstrel, you bastard!"

"Hey, wait! Please don't fight!" Colette's voice was thick with anguish as she attempted to stop Omega and Maqueena from further distressing the situation. She shook her head with teary eyes. "Stop quarreling in front of the deceased. That's not okay. You're a good girl, aren't you, Omega? You understand, right?"

"I have things I'd like to say about the way you're speaking to me, but… It's not something I want to say so bad that it's worth making you cry, Colette. I'll stop. Besides, there's something that I'm curious about."

"Can't you just apologize properly… What are you curious about?" Palmyra asked Omega, who had lost the will to fight, in a chastising tone.

Omega looked directly at Podoso. "It's pretty simple." He stiffened under the young girl's gaze as the witch opened her lips. "You said something rather interesting a little while ago. I have a feeling you know more about the situation than us. But to what extent?"

7

"I told you that I was a guard in a town on the other side of the mountain, right? Well, actually, there was an incident near the town yesterday. I came to visit Pastor Coatl in order to inform him of what happened."

They left the basement where the body still lay and returned to the church, which was where Podoso now told his story. Pressed for an answer by Omega, he gave up all resistance and explained the true reason he had come to the church: to alert Pastor Coatl.

After considering his situation and his murmuring in the basement, Omega asked, "You said there was an incident near the town. Is it safe to assume it was a murder? Don't ask me how I know that."

"Well, it must be obvious after seeing the corpse. What else could it be?" Trellock pointed out, a hand on his chin.

At their conversation, Podoso nodded in agreement, covering his face with his hands. "The corpse was in a terrible state. The face was unrecognizable. I could barely tell it was a traveler, and all their belongings had been stolen…"

"A corpse without a face and without any identification on him… huh… It's still not enough."

"…"

Podoso hardened his expression at Omega's mutterings. But Palmyra objected with a tilt of her head and an exclamation of "Huh?!" Consoling the frightened Colette, she glared at Omega with a stern eye. "Omega, you're being too cryptic. If you know something, then tell us. It'll put both Colette and me at ease."

"I've said this before, but that look of anguish on your faces, it's…"

"Amusing, right? We know."

Faintly drawing her eyebrows together, Palmyra fixed her gaze on Omega. The pleas of this young girl, so brave at only fifteen—the same age as Colette—left Omega with no choice but to surrender. It would not be beneficial to spoil the high spirits of her two traveling companions. There would be no one to save her if she fell into a snowbank, slipped into a river, or burned herself in a fire.

“Frankly, Podoso’s reaction to seeing Pastor Coatl’s body and the circumstances revolving around seeing the body of the faceless traveler do not match up,” stated Omega. “It’s a bit excessive for a single corpse.”

“…S-S-So what are you saying?” Maqueena asked.

“This is just speculation, but…am I correct in assuming that the death of the traveler isn’t the first murder case?”

“…You have very good eyes, young lady.” Podoso dropped his shoulders in resignation and let out a long breath. Then, raising his head, his gaze wandered as he searched for the right words. “I didn’t want to scare anyone off if there had been nothing to worry about. But after Pastor Coatl was killed, I knew I couldn’t keep quiet… That’s why I’m telling you. Just as you thought, young lady. In the past few weeks, seven people have been killed in the area… and the pastor makes eight.”

“E-Eight?!” exclaimed Maqueena. “You kept quiet about eight whole deaths?!”

“As far as I knew, there were seven… I suppose that doesn’t make it any better, though.” The point of his story lost its focus, and Podoso shook his head languidly.

Maqueena, after lashing out at him, turned her cautious gaze on everyone in the church. The fear and strain in her bloodshot eyes made her intentions obvious.

“Ah, miss… Are you suspecting all of us, by any chance?” Trellock asked with an air of discretion, taking note of Maqueena’s evident alarm. However, his composed tone had the opposite effect on her.

“Of course I am!” she snapped. “Who did it?! Who killed that old man?!”

“C-Calm down, Maqueena,” Podoso said. “Pastor Coatl was murdered by a cold-blooded killer…”

“Which means the cold-blooded killer is among us! Are you insane?!”

"Wha…"

Maqueena shook off Podoso's attempts to calm her down, her voice only growing louder. He was lost for words, but she had more to say. "The blood on the old man's corpse wasn't even dry! That would mean the murder occurred pretty recently, right? Right? Then he was killed after the snow started falling!"

"The snow turned into a blizzard immediately. So if the culprit left the church, he'd have had to trudge through the middle of a blizzard," Lysa calmly assessed the situation.

"Ha-Hah…" Trellock exhaled. "That would be suicide. If it were me, I'd turn back and wait it out in the church… Maybe the culprit did that too."

Maqueena seemed to grasp the situation. Lysa and Trellock sided with her understanding of the events. Podoso, pressed into silence, was unable to present any counter-arguments. Admonsah was horrified at the realization.

"Hey, Omega." Tugging at Omega's sleeve, Colette's eyes grew with concern and doubt. "Is it true what the others are saying? Could the bad person who murdered that old man really be here?"

"It's highly likely," Omega replied. "Of course, there's a chance they're hiding somewhere we can't find them—just like where Pastor Coatl's body was—but it's hard to believe there's another basement like that. Speaking of which, how did you find that place?"

"Huh? Oh, that was Maqueena," Podoso explained. "I was waiting in the corridor while she finished her business, when she noticed the light leaking through the wall…ouch!" Maqueena kicked him for yet another insensitive remark.

He truly is a man who never learns. But that isn't important now.

"A lagmite crystal was used to light the basement, right?" Omega picked up where they left off. "If it was still on, that means the crime was committed in the last few hours."

“Umm… I was wondering, but what sort of group are you?”

“Ah, that’s right—you wouldn’t know anything about us, Trellock. Umm, well we all sort of gathered at the church by chance due to the blizzard…”

Palmyra took it upon herself to give a thorough explanation of everything Trellock had missed up until now, including unnecessary details such as Omega’s close-calls with death in the snow and the fire in her agitation.

“This may not mean anything, but in what order did you all arrive in?” Trellock asked, after receiving an explanation of the preceding events from Palmyra.

“Ah, I was first!” Maqueena answered. “Then that old guy Podoso appeared, and then that Multi-Arm Clan guy. Then it was…”

“Myself and Omega’s group,” Lysa continued. “The four of us arrived together.”

“I see,” replied Trellock. “But that doesn’t guarantee anything. You could have killed the pastor in the church, attempted to descend the mountain, then given up and come back… You’re not an exception.”

“Ouch.” Failing to clear her name, Lysa’s shoulders slumped.

Such an alibi was completely useless here. Not even Trellock, the last to arrive, was exempt.

“But those of us who have always been together in groups, like me, Colette, Palmyra, can’t be the suspects.” Omega suggested. “I mean, unless the serial killer terrorizing the public happens to be a gang of three innocent young girls.”

“Well, we’re not doubting that,” Podoso chimed in. “Apart from the half-elf girl, there’s no way those two could do such a thing. Especially Miss Colette.”

“…? Why especially me?”

"Besides, I saw the body with my own eyes… That blow was way too high to have been a woman or child," Podoso explained.

Omega tilted her head; Podoso paled and swallowed. The look of horror on his face was a testament to the gruesome corpse he had seen. "It feels cruel to ask you this, but… I'd like to hear more about the incidents," she asked. "In particular regarding the techniques of the killer."

"The techniques… You mean how they were killed? How would that help?"

"I'm just curious… I figured you'd give me that look, so I prepared a justification: Knowing might also help expose the killer."

Being met with such a blatantly disapproving frown, Omega pushed forward with a pretense. Nevertheless, although his skepticism persisted, he began to speak gradually. "The victims until now seem to have all been outsiders—either peddlers or travelers," he explained. "Their faces had all been smashed in, and they were stranded on the side of the road. There seemed to be no bias towards women or men."

"Outsiders, and smashed faces… Podoso, did you think Pastor Coatl was in danger because he lived alone?"

"Yeah, exactly. I thought being alone put him at risk."

"There were seven victims near your town, and the pastor made eight. Was the seventh victim's face the only thing damaged?"

"No, his body was… Hey, what sort of question is that?" Podoso vexed as he rubbed his chest as if growing ill from the awful recollection of events.

Omega shrugged. "The seventh victim was covered in injuries, while Pastor Coatl only had his head split open. Don't you think the killing techniques are different?"

"Why does that matter?" questioned Podoso. "Killers aren't right in the head—seems only natural that we wouldn't understand their methods."

“That viewpoint is way too simple,” Omega explained. “By most people’s standards, a killer’s behavior is abnormal. But to the murderer themselves, there’s a reason for their actions. In other words, murderers have their own standards. Same as witches.”

“Why mention witches now…? How creepy,” Maqueena added, distracted by the end of Omega’s explanation.

Ignoring her, Omega focused on the differences in the techniques of the latest two crimes she had heard from Podoso.

The possibility of the murderer forcing their way down the mountain in this blizzard was low. From that, she worked her way backwards from the events that had transpired, and began putting it all together.

“Admonsah, I have something to ask you.”

At Omega’s words, the youth from the Multi-Arm Clan pointed all four of his hands towards himself in question. “Oh…um…M-Me?”

“Yes, you. I believe you to be an honest young man. So you will answer my questions willingly, right?” Omega continued, smiling at him. “The seventh victim that was found near Podoso’s town… I believe you might have killed them. What do you think?”

8

Astonished at the question, the blue-skinned giant fell silent, affirming Omega’s accusation as ninety percent certain.

“H-Hey, what do you mean, calling Admonsah the murderer?” Podoso asked in surprise.

“So when did he kill the old man?!” Maqueena asked, equally puzzled.

“That’s a bit of a leap. That seventh victim… Well, in this case, it’s not actually correct to refer to him as such, seeing as his death had nothing to do with the other serial killer victims. It’s actually quite convenient that Admonsah here had something to do with the seventh victim,” Omega said, closing one eye.

Her explanation was an attempt to keep the agitated Podoso and Maqueena in check. But they were bewildered by this answer. Omega heaved a sigh.

“In short,” Trellock surmised, “the serial murders the guard mentioned, and the old man in the basement…you’re saying those are completely unrelated to the victim found in the nearby town? There were three different incidents?”

Palmyra added, “The serial murders, the victim in the town, and the one in the church…those three?”

Trellock and Palmyra worked together to summarize the explanation they just heard. Colette’s eyes widened upon hearing this, and she looked Admonsah’s huge frame up and down. “Admonsah?”

“Uh…I-I am…” Admonsah averted his eyes, a painful expression that, combined with his lack of denial, proved Omega’s speculation to be true.

“I was curious about his large baggage,” Omega admitted. “At first, I thought he was holding the luggage for an entire entertainment troupe. But then, I didn’t see the one person who should have been there in sight.”

“The one person who should be there?” asked Colette. “You mean…?”

“It’s obvious. The slave owner.”

The moment she uttered the word ‘slave’, Admonsah’s whole body shook. But it wasn’t out of anger; it was a subconscious reaction to his pain, or having his secret exposed.

“Did you say…slave?” Lysa asked. “But slaves are—”

“—not allowed in Gusteko?” Omega cut her off. “Maybe not officially, but in reality, they exist. And Admonsah is one of them. He doesn’t cloak his entire body in a long robe because of the region’s extreme cold. The traditional garb of the Multi-Arm Clan is quite distinctive, after all.”

“Distinctive?” Lysa replied.

“Their number of arms vary, so they don’t have any one-size-fits-all garments. It would also be difficult to use the garb of another clan. So they dress lightly because they must. That fact wouldn’t even change if they left their family. However, the reason he doesn’t dress that way is rather simple.”

“S-Stop…”

As Omega explained with one finger up, Admonsah trembled in fear. But his tongue-tied attempt to stop her had no effect. Omega narrowed her eyes and continued without mercy.

The reason Admonsah is clad in such a long robe is rather simple.

“It’s to hide the scars from his abuse as a slave. Under those garments, he’s likely covered in wounds. There may be traces of burns around his neck, too, a side effect from the scalding caused by those Collars of Submission they wear. If punished too often, they may even lose the ability to speak.”

“U…A…” Raising his voice at that, Admonsah sank to his knees.

Head in his hands, he tore his cloak off his back, baring his skin for all to see. Everyone was at a loss for words.

Admonsah’s body was covered in scars. Even his neck revealed twisted, white burns. Just as Omega had predicted, evidence of long term abuse.

“How terrible…” Palmyra commented inadvertently, clasping her hands over her mouth.

Fresh scars also adorned Admonsah’s body before them, most likely the result of a whip.

“…It’s all true. This must be what the half-devil was talking about, right?” While everyone else focused on Admonsah’s wounds, Trellock went a different route, holding something up for them to see.

It was a collar taken directly from Admonsah's belongings—the so-called Collar of Submission, used to restrain slaves. Fastened around the neck, it was used by the owner to administer electric shocks when slaves were disobedient. It was clearly something that Admonsah had worn for many years.

"So you found a chance to remove it," Omega noted. "I imagine the victim near the village was Admonsah's owner. From the wounds all over his body, he must have found himself in an unfortunate situation and fought back. His entire body was crushed…"

"A reflection of the extent of his hatred, I guess," remarked Podoso. Omega remained indifferent to his dumbfounded mumblings.

Admonsah, who had curled up, lifted his face at those words. "Y-You're…"

"You're wrong!" Colette shouted, cutting him off. "Totally wrong! You're completely wrong, Omega!"

"…"

Colette stood before him, arms spread out protectively as she faced the other adults.

"How is she wrong, Colette?" Lysa inquired. "Admonsah's guilt seems to have been proven immediately by Omega…"

"That may very well be," Colette continued. "But even if Admonsah was involved in one of these deaths as Omega said, it wasn't out of hate! Right?!"

"Uh…uh…"

Colette turned to Admonsah, their eyes level. His throat tightened at her question. However, she wrapped her arms around his neck and hugged him tightly. "I understand how difficult, and painful, and lonely it must have been. I, too, have had terrible thoughts in the past…but feeling sad and feeling hate are two very different things."

"…"

“Explain as best as you can,” Colette said sincerely. “Don’t worry. I’ll listen to you. Nobody will interrupt. So please, tell us your story.”

Still in her embrace, Admonsah cleared his throat and swallowed several times over. Then, lips slightly quivering, he spoke. “…I… was scared…”

“—and killed him in an attempt to protect yourself. Yeah, we know.”

“Omega!” Colette snapped.

The minute he’d tried to confess, Omega interrupted. Colette glared at her witch companion. “Admonsah is trying his very hardest to speak right now. And you…”

“I appreciate the consideration, but sentiment only hinders the truth,” Omega said. “At the very least, it’s fairly obvious that his actions weren’t planned, seeing as how he didn’t even use his own knives, but his fists, to do the deed.”

“The knives… Ah, yes…he’s a knife-thrower,” Colette recalled.

Admonsah, the traveling entertainer, had demonstrated his knife-throwing skills earlier in the church. Most had completely forgotten the extraordinary experience thanks to Maqueena’s outbursts, but there was no way that Omega would forget. On top of that, the blades were clean and unstained, never having known the taste of blood.

“The reason he didn’t use the very weapons he regularly carried on his own body in such a dire situation was likely because, as a traveling entertainer, he’s never considered his knives to be anything more than tools,” explained Omega. “That brings only one situation to mind where he’d mindlessly kill with his fists.”

“Wh-Which is…?” Maqueena hesitated to ask.

“If they were about to be killed themselves, and had to fight back.”

“Hence your self-defense theory, huh,” Podoso mused.

Speculating on the truth behind the circumstances, such a possibility emerged. Without so much as touching his knives, Admonsah murdered the very man who had fitted him with a slave collar. His scars and fresh wounds provided sufficient insight into the harsh environment he had lived in.

Once given permission to abuse another, humans become capable of any degree of cruelty, thought Omega. And there's no limit as to how far they can take it. "With that in mind, I believe Admonsah has been sincere with us," she stated. "In any case, he's from the Multi-Arm Clan… If he really wanted to, he could certainly kill us all."

When it came to physical strength, nobody in that church was a match for Admonsah. But despite his crimes being exposed, he seemed to have no intent to silence them. As it were, Admonsah's disposition was not one for hurting others.

"If it's true that he was abused and acted in self-defense, that should be sufficient grounds for consideration, right?" Podoso asked, scratching his head.

"Huh? You can't mean…" Maqueena's eyes widened.

"We have no choice, right?" Podoso continued, curling his lips. "Think about it, the one in the wrong was the guy who dragged Admonsah around. If I could, I'd personally have liked to send him flying with a punch myself."

"But he's a murderer?!" Maqueena exclaimed. "You don't care…?!"

"Hate the crime, not the person," Lysa remarked.

As Maqueena persisted, Lysa gently put pressure on her shoulders from behind. The itinerant preacher shook her head, and then turned to Admonsah—still in Colette's embrace. He raised his head slowly, still miserable, as Lysa extended a hand towards him. "You may have murdered someone. Every action is judged by the Silver Blessing. If there is to be a punishment, then so be it. But I do not believe that you deserve to be hurt."

“U…Y-You will…?”

“In short,” she concluded, “I forgive you.”

“…”

Admonsah was struck by Lysa’s smile and declaration. Colette gently stroked his surprised face. “It’s okay, Admonsah. No one here will hurt you. And if anyone tries it, I’ll have your back.”

“U…A…Aaaahhh…”

Touched by Colette’s words, Admonsah broke into a sob. The sight of the young girl soothing the weeping giant was like a scene out of a storybook.

“You must be proud to see that, huh, Palmyra?”

“You truly are a person without remorse.”

“Don’t be ridiculous. You should be praising me for learning to understand people’s hearts.”

Such was the punchline of Omega and Palmyra’s banter.

9

If only the issue could’ve been settled just like that, it would’ve been a great relief indeed. However—

“That settles Admonsah’s part in all this,” Trellock began, “but what about the old gentleman in the church? That certainly couldn’t have been Admonsah too…”

Admonsah shook his head. “N-No…not me…”

Trellock nodded. “I figured as much.”

In regards to Admonsah’s crime, he agreed to descend the mountain with Podoso and turn himself in afterwards. Due to the extenuating circumstances, he probably wouldn’t be treated too badly. However, that only resolved the seventh victim, who had been found on the outskirts of the town.

The incident in the church and the serial killer spreading fear amongst the public remained a mystery.

“Judging by what Omega said,” Palmyra recalled, “the serial murders and the pastor’s murder are completely unrelated, right? Then we only need to solve the pastor’s murder.”

“Well, technically we don’t need to solve the pastor’s murder either,” Omega sighed. “As long as we stay on guard, descend the mountain together, and submit ourselves for questioning, we’ll be fine.”

However, it would be inconvenient for the culprit if we all were to submit ourselves for questioning simultaneously. There’s a good chance he’ll attempt to silence us before we could do that. That’s what we should all be most concerned about right now.

But Omega left that part out, not wanting to worry Colette and Palmyra. “By the way, are there any valuables or the like in this church?” she asked.

“Again, such strange questions… Where did that come from?” wondered Palmyra.

Omega replied thoughtfully, “The most obvious motive for attacking an old man who lives alone like this would be to rob him, right? From what I’ve heard today, the pastor used his own personal funds to help rebuild the town that was struck by an avalanche. So clearly, he had savings.”

“As you can probably guess,” Podoso spoke, “I don’t know anything about Pastor Coatl’s savings.” Not even he, the most knowledgeable in the group, knew the contents of another man’s purse. As he relinquished his title as the walking encyclopedia of all things local, Omega looked around the inside of the church.

Surely not even the pastor, saintly as he was, would have donated enough money to endanger his own livelihood, she thought. Pastor Coatl would have had a rough idea of how much money he could use on the town. Which meant that his savings must be somewhere in this church. However, where it was, she wasn't sure.

"Well, it has to be hidden somewhere around here," insisted Omega. "Like a room in the basement. That would make the most sense."

"Like a safe or a secret treasury?" Trellock wondered aloud. "That would be a dream come true."

"…You joke, but you may just be onto something," Omega said.

"Huh?"

Trellock, even the quick-witted one, raised an eyebrow at Omega's remark. Although not intending to confuse him, she cast a glance toward the hall, or rather, toward the basement beyond. "There's something I want to check. Can I inspect the body in the basement?"

"Something you want to check? Just because the dead can't object doesn't give you the right to do as you please with them."

"Palmyra, you so regularly misunderstand me," Omega objected upon hearing such an unthinkable assumption as she headed for the basement. "I'm not just doing it out of curiosity, you know."

No one was willing to let Omega act alone, however, and so everyone soon followed.

"S-S-So? What do you need to check in this depressing place?" Maqueena asked in uncertainty.

"If you're going to be scared, perhaps you should wait up stairs?"

"Everyone else came—I didn't want to be the only one left behind! But I don't want to be around a corpse either!"

Out of consideration for Maqueena's complex feelings of grief, Omega promptly returned to the investigation. Hitting the lagmite crystal embedded in the wall, the room flooded with white light. But because the crystal's light would fade over time, she needed to strike it again every so often in order to examine the corpse, now covered with a sheet.

“Did you figure something out?” Lysa asked hopefully.

“The dead may not be able to speak, but they’re far more eloquent than when they were alive,” Omega suggested. “For instance, this body has been tortured.”

“Tortured?!” Podoso exclaimed, aghast. “Pastor Coatl?!”

“Although his split head may grab your attention, his fingers and the inside of his mouth are in terrible shape, too. It seems the culprit really wanted to know something. Also… Yep, just as I thought. They’re gone.”

Omega rummaged as she spoke—with absolutely no hesitation and much to the horror of those watching. Ignoring their stares, she furrowed her brow as she fumbled around inside Pastor Coatl’s breast pocket.

Hearing her murmur, Colette called her name. “Omega? Are you looking for something? Messing with someone’s corpse like that is bad.”

“Yes, it is bad. And the culprit did just that…”

“Huh?”

Wiping her bloody hands on the sheet, Omega stood up. Taking note of the others, looking expectantly for an explanation, she let out a long breath. “In all likelihood, the things Pastor Coatl had on his person…keys, or something like that, I suspect? They’ve all been stolen. That could very well have been the culprit’s goal.”

“K-Keys?” Maqueena asked, confused. “How do you even know?”

“He went out of his way to set up a secret basement. It’s obvious he was being cautious… Also, it’s hard to see, but there are chafe marks on his neck—most likely evidence that he usually wore something around his neck. What could be something that a cautious person like him would always keep on his person and has disappeared from his corpse that shows signs of torture…"

"I see. It must've been the key for the safe that held all the pastor's assets." Trellock snapped his fingers, arriving at the same conclusion as Omega. The others, although a bit late, eventually caught on.

"Then, Omega," Lysa inquired, "are you saying—the culprit who murdered Pastor Coatl is most likely carrying the key the pastor had on him?"

"It's just speculation," said Omega, shrugging her shoulders. "But it is certainly a more constructive conclusion than just recklessly casting suspicion on each other. If you're going to accuse someone, you need a reason. That's how witch-hunts go."

"Why do you use witches in every example?" Palmyra asked, rather fed-up.

However, she knew that Omega wasn't completely wrong, so made no attempt to object. It was, after all, an effective method. Even supposing that the culprit wanted to harm them, they still had the physical monster that was Admonsah.

"…?"

After her explanation, Omega felt a sudden heavy weight upon her head. At first, she attributed it to fatigue accumulated from their long journey in the snow. However, she quickly realized that wasn't the case. This was something caused intentionally.

"Uh…Ah…" With a small moan, Palmyra fell to her knees before Omega. But there was no one there to catch her. Everyone else had collapsed at exactly the same time.

The cause of their exhaustion came from a faint sweet scent that tickled their nose.

"This is your fault, half-devil…! You shouldn't have said anything…!"

The sorrowful words rained down on Omega, who had fallen to the floor herself. Hearing the trembling voice, Omega slowly—very slowly—closed her eyes. Her body was so heavy that doing anything at all seemed incredibly exhausting.

10

Once she was sure that everyone was out cold, Maqueena brushed away the remains of the pollen from the sleeping flower—more commonly known as Muskrim—that permeated the basement. Her precautionary measures had worked wonders. Muskrim’s pollen could induce any human into a deep sleep. Nobody should awaken for a while.

“In the meantime…ah, here it is.”

Stepping over Omega’s fallen body, Maqueena searched the floor. Tearing away a faintly discolored floorboard, she came face-to-face with the safe hidden beneath. With a slight inhale, she took out the key hidden in her breast pocket and opened the safe.

Inside lay a number of small bags, which upon inspection revealed a collection of high-quality magic stones. There were nearly a dozen individual bags in the safe, which could each be worth a fortune on their own.

“I’d better grab these and hit the road!”

Maqueena pulled another sheet from the wooden crate, bundled all the small bags together, and left.

Making her way out of the basement, she grabbed her belongings and peeked outside of the church. After judging the strength of the blizzard, she headed outside. The wind was cold, and the snow bit at her skin. But compared to when it was at its peak, the blizzard had weakened a considerable amount.

“I can do this… If I stay here, I’ll be killed for sure…!”

She knew descending the mountain in the dark would endanger her life, but staying in the chapel meant certain death. Opting for the path with the higher probability of survival—small as it was—Maqueena set off from the church.

Using the piercing white light of the magical lagmite stones from the chapel, she began her walk through the snow and darkness. Fortunately, she was used to walking in such conditions, which had nothing to do with her being a resident of the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko.

It was a skill that had been necessary for her job.

“Haa…Haa…”

The Muskrim that knocked everyone out in the church was just another provision for the job. She had crossed a dangerous bridge for that job, and continued to risk her life to this day. How utterly fateful it was to be saved by the very skills acquired through such work.

“It’s all Coatl’s fault for being such a fool…”

“Oh, how awfully interesting. I’d love to hear the rest of that story.”

The snide remark accompanied by a white breath was overshadowed by an unexpected—but gentle—voice. Maqueena’s breath caught in her throat in surprise as she turned to face the voice, only to be struck in the gut with a jolt.

“Ah, ugh!”

Maqueena tumbled through the snow, hissing in pain from the gut kick. Both the pain and the surprise accelerated her breathing, the persistent ringing in her ears only adding to her confusion.

What’s—what’s—what’s—what’s going on?

“It’s quite simple. No mediocre poison or drug can affect a temple knight…or an itinerant preacher. We are blessed.”

“A-And you, B-Big breasts… You’re the one who… Old Man Coatl…!”

“I thought I told you to stop calling me that…”

The figure looked down on Maqueena as if she were a naughty child. She was a woman donning black church vestments—Lysa.

She had coverings on both hands made of a dark-gray steel—which could easily make light work of smashing someone's head in. Just like what happened to the corpse in the basement.

"Rest assured, Maqueena. I will not torment you for very long."

"W-Wait! Wait, wait! H-How about money? Is that what you want? Here! Take it all! These magic stones will set you up for life! So—"

"Unfortunately, money is not what I seek. What I seek are the lives of Pastor Coatl…and you, Maqueena."

"Why?!"

"…Leanotte."

Maqueena, voice breaking as she pleaded for her life, suddenly stopped. Before her stood Lysa, an ice-cold gaze fixated on her own.

Leanotte.

That was the name of a town that once existed within Gusteko, but was now no more.

"It's the village that was destroyed by the ice thieves, which Pastor Coatl once belonged to. In their attempts to dig out their buried treasure, they caused the avalanche."

"You're from Leanotte…"

"I am a survivor, yes. After my family and neighbors all died, I passed through the gates of the Gustekan Church. And I have waited a long time for this day."

Lysa clenched one hand into a fist before her, hitting her palm with a clang. Gasping, Maqueena searched for some sort of salvation as the sight of Pastor Coatl's corpse flashed in her mind—it was the sight of a corpse that had been tortured up until the moment of his death.

"I-I-I…"

"Please apologize to my family, Maqueena. To the Silver Blessing."

She attempted to scream, but found her throat had closed up with fear. Lysa wordlessly raised her fist and…a flash of light came flying out of nowhere.

"…"

The light struck Lysa's raised fist and bounced off. Lysa spun around in surprise as Maqueena faced the same direction, dumbfounded to find a small shadowy figure looming in the blizzard.

"…Sorry to disturb, but could you hold off on making a second corpse, Lysa?"

With that, the witch pointed a finger at the preacher, stalling Lysa's opportunity to take revenge.

11

Maqueena lay slumped over in the snow, as Lysa stood before her on the verge of committing an execution. Staring directly at the two of them, Omega shrugged her shoulders and sighed. "Sleeping flowers sure make me nostalgic. I thought I'd pretend to fall asleep to smoke out the real villain, but…"

"…But what?"

"But I carelessly forgot to cover my mouth and nose and passed out for a bit. Luckily, the sense of danger woke me up in the nick of time."

If she'd slept for just a minute longer, Maqueena would have been the next victim. She didn't particularly have any attachment to Maqueena, but she didn't want her dead, either.

That would be a tragedy not only for Maqueena, but for her murderer, as well.

"Lysa, I know why you killed Pastor Coatl, and why you want to kill Maqueena, too. You were one of the victims, too, aren't you? Of Pastor Coatl, Saint of the Avalanche and affiliate of the Ice Thieves. You were a victim of his misdeeds, as well as of the good deeds that he did as repentance."

"How could you know that…"

"It's not that complicated—I heard you talking just now… But killing Maqueena won't fulfill your revenge. She's not the target."

"What?!"

Lysa's gentle eyes sharpened as she shouted at Omega, who interrupted her. But the witch in the snowstorm did not waver a bit. Omega looked past Lysa at Maqueena, who was buried in the snow.

"She must've been visiting that church for a while, right? Her discovery of that hidden basement was too much of a coincidence, and she even knew where to find the sheet to cover the body with. That's when she took the key from the pastor's neck, leading her into this situation."

"I-It was just an impulse… And now I'm in this mess because of you!"

"You're right. All because I haphazardly said that whoever was holding the key was probably the murderer. So you felt like you had to make a desperate escape. If you'd been found with the key, you'd have been treated as the murderer. For all you know you could have been beaten to death then and there."

Omega apologized to her, admitting her role in setting the stage. Originally, it was a pretext to smoke out the key thief. Besides—

"Lysa, you finished your revenge by killing Pastor Coatl, no? The pastor didn't crack when you tortured him, and people who don't talk won't talk no matter what is done to them."

"Well… How do you explain Maqueena coming and going in the church? Huh?! She was acquainted with the pastor, and she also knew about the Ice Thieves' money in the safe…"

"It's simple. She's a conman. The minute you hear her sing, it's pretty obvious that being a minstrel is just a front. She must've realized the connection between the Ice Thieves and the Saint of the Avalanche, then decided to extort money from Pastor Coatl. She's probably done it countless times."

"…"

Completely lost for words, Lysa stared at the fallen Maqueena. At Lysa's gaze and Omega's conjecture, Maqueena nodded her head frantically, appealing to the fact that she was unrelated to Lysa's revenge.

"The pastor regretted causing the avalanche and the disaster that followed. His attempts to restore Podoso's town to its former glory was a kind of atonement. After that, he lived a simple life in penance. Isn't that enough?"

"I…"

"Of course, there is also the possibility that Maqueena, being a sly creature, is taking advantage of my deductions and hoping I miss something. So, I'm not saying you absolutely can't smash her head in."

"Huh?!" Maqueena cried.

Maqueena froze in astonishment as she felt her bright future begin to slip away. But neither Omega nor Lysa paid her any mind. The only thing of any importance to them was each other.

Omega raised a finger, glowing with the same light that had reflected off the back of Lysa's hands. "Some friends of mine told me to be mindful of causing too many deaths for the sake of the young children I travel with, so I've made it my policy. Also, you saved my life, so I owe you a debt of gratitude. That's why I'm willing to overlook the fact that you murdered Pastor Coatl."

"…"

"But I won't ignore a second death. If you smash Maqueena's head in to exact your pointless revenge, the third death will be yours.

Choose carefully."

Itinerant preachers had power in line with temple knights—known as the executioners of the Gustekan Church. To have the responsibility of traveling to various places to spread the teachings, you had to be prepared to punish anything that contradicts those teachings.

Lysa clearly possessed abilities that belied her appearance. However, even she didn't dare act too brazenly in front of Omega—a witch.

"Well then. What's your decision? Whatever happens will be of great interest to me," the witch said, making light of the cruelty in the snow.

12

In the church basement where the presence of people had decreased, the man slowly began to move his body.

"…"

Three people had vanished from the room—the minstrel, the clergywoman, and the odd young girl. Setting aside the first two, it was the young girl he was most concerned about.

"She had a strange, dangerous air about her."

His feet and hands were still heavy, but the effects of the pollen from the sleeping flower were gradually wearing off. He had never fallen completely asleep—he only pretended to so that he could watch the events unfold. He had great interest in exactly who was using his name.

"Still, I never expected to be implicated in two murders I had nothing to do with. I was almost blamed for both of them… The masses must live with their own selfish preconceptions…"

It was superficial to apply one's own reasoning to that which one does not understand. In that respect, the young girl's outlook was rather commendable.

—That was living by one's own philosophy.

Not even he chose to harm people at random. He only destroyed the faces of those he yearned for. By stripping them of their face, by removing the mask of their persona, he could become anyone he wanted to be.

The owner of the personality that he currently employed had been an incredibly wary character, so he couldn't tear off their face. He had crossed paths with this sociable peddler on the road. If he had only managed to tear his face off, too, everything would've been absolutely perfect.

"This current face is imperfect. I should start searching for the next one…"

Unfortunately there were no respectable faces left inside the church basement.

With none to pique his interest, the incredibly pure lady was the next best choice. He would peel her face off, then chase after the young girl who went outside. Her face seemed to conceal infinite knowledge. He wondered exactly what kind of transformation such a face would bring him.

"So I'll be taking your face for now, young lady."

Pulling a glove over his hand, the razor blades attached to the fingertips glinted in the light. With this glove, peeling faces off was so easy, it was amusing.

Preparing to flay her face, the man leaned towards the fallen young lady. The stronger girl had her arms wrapped protectively around his target. He scoffed at their touching relationship.

He wondered what kind of face she'd make once she'd awaken and find the one she tried to protect dead in her arms.

However—

"What?!"

He pressed a palm onto the girl’s face, ready to remove it, when a strong impact struck his right arm, shattering his fingers, wrist, and shoulder—destroying the entire limb.

Surprise preceded the pain, and the man’s eyes shot open when he realized what happened. Slowly, the seemingly youthful girl rose up, releasing a terrible roar reminiscent of a ferocious beast.

13

“Sensing the danger of its bearer, it bestows tremendous physical power in exchange for their rationality… Yes, this is a demonstration of the true nature of the Beast Protection Bracelet. It certainly is a pleasure to behold.” Omega smiled as she offered her commentary.

“…Is that all you’re going to say?” asked Palmyra.

“Dear me, Palmyra, are you really pouting because everything was solved while you were sleeping?”

The morning sun shone into the chapel as Palmyra sulked. “Idiot,” she growled at Omega.

The night of the blizzard had passed, and morning had come again. Those who spent that night in the church could certainly be called fortunate to have survived the madness. However—

“When I woke, half the church had been destroyed, two people who should have been there were missing…and in the end, a conman turned themselves in. I have no idea what to do with all this.” Looking over the damage caused to the church, Podoso sighed, leaving a cloud of mist in the air.

Indeed as he had said, two people—Lysa and Trellock—had vanished from the church. But for the life of him, he could find no reason for that fact.

“So that skinny guy was the serial killer, and the preacher lady beat him up and seized him…am I getting that right?” Podoso asked quizzically.

“Yes,” Omega confirmed. “And to bring him to justice, she boldly took him down the mountain, leaving us with a delightful misdemeanor as a parting gift. What do you plan to do with Admonsah?”

“…There are a lot of things to take into consideration with him. Luckily, if there really is a serial killer and he’s beaten up, then his crime may well be mistaken as part of those serial murders.”

Laying the preparations for a happy conclusion, Podoso scratched his head as Omega raised an eyebrow. I thought for sure Podoso would make a more obstinate choice. I had prepared so many things in advance to persuade him otherwise.

“So then, you’re letting Admonsah go?” she asked.

“It would be irresponsible to throw him out like that, no? He has nowhere to go, so I’ll bring him to my town. I’ve always wanted an assistant at work.”

Hearing Podoso’s empathetic reply, it was clear that he was a man who was always genuine, both with people and work. He’s a fine fellow.

“I’m glad we’re leaving things in your care, Podoso,” Omega said. “Now if only you were considerate towards women, then you may even be able to get married.”

“Don’t be such a brat!” he spat. “Now get out of here! And have a safe trip!”

Saying their goodbyes, Omega and the others parted from the remaining group on their way to town. Although she knew he’d be pardoned, it was still difficult for Colette to leave Admonsah. They had grown close over their short period of time together.

“Goodbye, Admonsah. I’m sure…we’ll meet again. When we do, you’ll have to show me your knife throwing again,” Colette said, bidding farewell on the mountain.

Admonsah waved his enormous hand. “Y-Yes. Colette… Careful… I’ll…be okay.”

"Good!"

There they left Podoso and Admonsah, as well as Maqueena—who was bound with a rope.

"Just so you know, what happened last night—"

"I w-won't tell them!" Maqueena cut off Omega's warning in an attempt to secure her future, pale-faced and lifeless. "I won't say a word! I'll live a simple life, just singing and practicing my lyulyre every day!"

Maqueena had a predisposition for a rather loose tongue, but with her life at stake, she had no choice but to fight this urge. Even Omega prayed for a cure. Otherwise, it would be quite a pain indeed.

Parting from the other three, Omega and the others resumed their journey together. As they walked along the snowy path in the opposite direction to Podoso and the others, Palmyra narrowed her eyes and turned to Omega, asking, "So what happened in the end?"

As Colette also waited for an answer, Omega let out a sigh. "The events that took place were basically as you saw. A pitiful saint was murdered by a victim born from his past sins. Whether it's fate or not, a conman who connected the dots just so happened to be present to witness the revenge… I suppose Trellock's presence was the only thing completely out of place. He was unlucky, too."

Trellock had most likely been defeated by Colette, who transformed into a beast with her bracelet when he dared to reach out to her. They never found his body, but the bloodstains in the basement and church suggested that it was unlikely he'd survive fleeing down the mountain.

But if by some chance he did, there was no doubt he'd refrain from meddling with Omega's group a second time.

"It's a shame we never got to say goodbye to Lysa," lamented Colette. "It's thanks to her that we're all okay." Colette fully believed Omega's cover story, and regretted being unable to express gratitude to the one who had saved her.

The Beast Protection Bracelet—the Meteor used in the incident—was the reason Colette's parents were taken from her, so she didn't really like to use it. So if she were to believe such a half-hearted excuse, then it was best to just let it be. That was what Omega—no, Palmyra—had said, as the most sensible member of their party. Neither did Omega have any objections.

"To sum up: thanks to the serial killer, a man forced to commit a crime he never intended to commit was blessed with a second chance at life. A curious but reasonable coincidence," Omega concluded.

"But adding in the witch element as a secret ingredient still doesn't quite make it a stew, though…" Palmyra's face made it clear she was sick of it. It was a face she made often, but it was also a kind of symbol of her pessimistic nature, so it wasn't something that would ever change.

You can't control the nature you're born with. As a witch, that was just as true.

"Ah."

Next to the deeply-moved Omega, Colette's eyes grew in surprise as she noticed something. Following her gaze, they found the figure of a person standing along the snowy road.

Realizing who the figure was, Omega raised her eyebrows.

"Lysa! Oh, I'm so glad to see you again! I wanted to say thanks!" Calling out the figure's name, Colette broke off into a run towards her. For a moment, Palmyra—who only knew half of the story—froze. But Omega shook her head.

If Lysa had been plotting something, there'd be no reason to show herself like this.

She embraced Colette into her large chest, smiled, and stroked her head. "Are you saying that because I saved you all?"

“Yes, of course. You put yourself in danger for us. Thank you, Lysa.”

Lysa confirmed the situation with her question, receiving Colette’s thanks as she glanced over at the nodding Omega and Palmyra. Palmyra gawked at the awkwardness of the two embracing. “So what’s going on?” she asked. “I heard that you had a good reason for rushing off down the mountain.”

“Yes, I did… But that reason disappeared. And my path has suddenly darkened; I’m not sure what to do now.”

“Your reason disappeared? Did you lose your job?”

“…Yes, I lost my job…and my purpose in life,” Lysa mumbled solemnly.

Her motive behind becoming an itinerant preacher and gaining such unparalleled abilities was revenge. But Pastor Coatl would not divulge the names of his peers, causing her revenge to all but collapse.

All that was left was the empty shell of a woman named Lysa Conwell.

“I know!” Colette exclaimed, clapping her hands together in front of her chest. “Then why don’t you come with us? You seem well-traveled, and will probably be of great help to us.”

“…Me?”

“Hey, Colette! You can’t just—” Palmyra began to object.

“It’s fine, Palmyra. If Lysa is with us, then Omega won’t get hurt even if we’re careless.”

Lysa and Palmyra widened their eyes as they pondered Colette’s proposal. For some reason, Omega was used as a persuasive factor, although she couldn’t help but wonder why.

“Well, Omega? What do you think?” Colette asked.

“…You guys do whatever you want. You don’t have to decide right away. It’s a long, cold walk down the mountain. You have time.”

Omega shrugged off Colette’s innocent invitation. The gesture was awkward and puppet-like, affected by the frigid air and her own frost-bitten feet. Colette burst out laughing at the sight, and Palmyra giggled. And watching the girls brought a subtle smile to Lysa’s face, as well.

Omega gazed up at the remarkably blue sky and exhaled a misty breath. It would seem that more companions shall be joining us on our journey.

END

Short Story Collection 10

The Golden Lion and the Sword Saint: Riot in Flanders (Introduction) (Translation Pending)

The Golden Lion and the Sword Saint: Riot in Flanders (Incident) (Translation Pending)

The Golden Lion and the Sword Saint: Riot in Flanders (Sequel) (Edited Machine Translation)

1

“—And that concludes the earliest recorded account of how the Kingdom of Lugunica changed its name from the Lion Kingdom and went on to weave its history as the Dragon Kingdom.”

With that, he closed the book of historical records with a snap. He glanced over at the girl he had been reading to and noticed she had narrowed her red eyes, her arms crossed, wearing a serious expression on her face.

Her reaction seemed unusual. Had there been something lacking in his explanation?

However, before he could ask—

“Wh-What did you just say…? F-Felt actually sat through an entire lesson?!”

“Lord Rom’s surprise is entirely justified.” “Tomorrow, there will be a blizzard.”

The ones who spoke in astonishment were Rom, the elderly giant, and the twin maids of the mansion, Flam and Grassis.

Seeing their astonished eyes, the girl who had been wearing a serious expression curled her lips and said, ‘What?’.

“You guys are overreacting way too much. Even I can sit through a lesson if the story’s interesting enough, you know?”

“Lady Felt, that is not exactly something to be proud of…”

“Hah, I’m just telling the truth. In other words, your talk was boring. You should learn from Sensei a little, got it?”

"…I understand. I'll try to be as diligent as possible."

Sticking out her tongue with a mischievous grin, Felt muttered such rude remarks that made the young man with flaming red hair drop his shoulders. However, there was no real need for him to feel disheartened or reflect on anything too deeply.

After all, imparting knowledge was not the primary duty of the Sword Saint—Reinhard van Astrea.

"That's quite outside your area of expertise. Your role is to serve as Lady Felt's knight."

"Sir Ezzo…"

"You don't have to take on everything yourself. There's no need to worry—going forward, Lady Felt's education should be entrusted to a proper educator like myself. Although… I'm not actually an educator?!"

"Whoa, that was a surprise."

While trying to reason with Reinhard, he suddenly realized that he had gone off course.

Raising his voice in frustration, he caused Felt's slightly sharp eyes to widen in surprise. And right in front of her, the so-called Sensei—Ezzo Cadner—clutched his head.

Then, he shouted.

"I was recruited as an assistant for government affairs, not as a teacher!"

2

Ezzo Cadner, known as the "Gray" magician, was recently recruited into the Felt camp.

This connection began when he helped resolve a disturbance centered around the black market in the City of Earth Dragons, Flanders. Ezzo himself considered his decision to enter Felt's service a wise one.

From the beginning, Ezzo had a goal he needed to achieve, one that required overcoming several obstacles along the way. Working under Felt was a significant step forward in accomplishing what he had set out to do.

Beyond that, the opportunity to work with someone he could trust and respect was a rare stroke of good fortune. If that person also recognized and valued his abilities and character, there was nothing more he could ask for.

After learning more about the inner workings of the faction, he was shocked that it had managed to maintain even a superficial sense of organization up until now. And he saw it as an opportunity for him to show his worth. Now that he was no longer just a guest but an official member, he welcomed having a role to play.

Before he arrived, Old Man Rom had somehow managed to hold the faction together. He now cooperated with Ezzo to figure out which of the faction's many windows needed to be shut, and which should remain open.

At that moment, Ezzo let out his frustration—his work had been completely disrupted by Felt and Reinhard's noisy game of chase.

"I understand Sir Reinhard's point, but if studying becomes nothing more than a tedious task of memorization, it's no surprise that Lady Felt would want to run away from it."

"Right?! You get it, don't you?! Please say more, Sensei!"

"However, Lady Felt—you do realize that you lack the knowledge and refinement expected of your position, don't you? Sir Reinhard has a responsibility to uphold for recommending you. His strictness comes from his concern for you. You shouldn't speak ill of him."

"Yes, that's correct. Of course, I can't deny my incompetence and my inability to fully express myself, but there are some things I'd like Lady Felt to understand."

With Felt on his right and Reinhard on his left, Ezzo listened to both of their arguments, nodding at the validity of each point, as he struggled to mediate their dispute.

It seemed that the daily study sessions—focused on acquiring the knowledge and etiquette necessary for the Royal Selection—frequently caused cracks in the master-servant relationship between Felt and Reinhardt. This chase was apparently a routine occurrence, and simply brushing it off as another playful moment would be irresponsible.

At first glance, it may seem like Felt is just being selfish, but that was not the essence of the matter. Dragging her back and forcing her to sit at a desk wasn't the answer, what was important was—

"—Everyone feels discomfort when told to learn or memorize things they have no interest in. However, the joy of overcoming what once seemed impossible—and the satisfaction of resolving a puzzling question—is universal. It affects everyone. What's needed is a way to spark the desire to learn."

With that in mind, Ezzo had flipped through a history book of the Kingdom of Lugunica—the very one Felt had been using in her studies—and put his theory into practice. The result was the scene that had unfolded earlier.

Both Felt, who had been resting her chin on her hand with a dissatisfied expression at first, and even Reinhard, who had been keeping watch to make sure she didn't run away, leaned in with full attention as Ezzo explained historical figures and events. He touched on turning points in history that could be called twists of fate, engaging them in his discourse as he spoke."

Even Old Man Rom and the twins, at some point came in for a break, and watched the whole thing without interrupting.

Ezzo himself didn't mind having an attentive audience. In fact, getting carried away in the moment, he spoke with such enthusiasm that he ended up lecturing Reinhard on principles and reason.

And for that, he deeply regretted it.

"Damn it… I've made the same mistake again…"

"Mistake? What are you talking about? You didn't mess up at all. Honestly, I'm kinda impressed. Never thought I'd find studying fun. Guess there's a reason you get called Sensei."

"Lady Felt's words are right. I'm impressed."
"You're not just a noisy little guy after all."

"I'd take issue with how you phrased that, Miss Glasis, but please stop! I am not a teacher. At least, not in this faction."

Back in the flower district of Flanders, where he had once taught prostitutes how to read, write, and do arithmetic, it was only natural to be called Sensei. But here, Ezzo was determined to be something else.

Even if he firmly told himself that this was not what he should do, it was difficult to ignore.

"No, I will never do it again. It was a mistake of my own stupidity…"

"Hmm, seems like you've got a lot on your mind, but I must admit, I was somewhat impressed by your teaching style. Don't overthink it so much…"

"No, no, Sir Rom. I appreciate your feelings, but I am an adult. I know my own shortcomings. I can fix them"

"—? Is it because I'm not a good adult? I don't quite get what you mean by your reflection…"

Old Man Rom scratched his cheek with a thick finger, tilting his head at Ezzo's self-reproach.

The older man's gaze, as if he were looking at something immature, made Ezzo feel quite uncomfortable. However, it also prompted him to reflect deeply on his bad habit of constantly wanting to teach and intervene.

That very trait had complicated many of his past relationships.

Of course, there were times when speaking up was the right course of action. But Ezzo was still a newcomer in this faction, and he had no right to barge in and undermine its existing leadership.

“Ahem… In any case, my personal opinion is that the key to studying is cultivating interest and motivation. If we create the right environment, Lady Felt’s ability to learn will naturally flourish.”

“No need to add ‘personal opinion’ to that. It actually sounds useful, so you might as well just say it straight… huh? What’s up with you?”

“—. No, it’s nothing important.”

Ezzo began to wrap up, while Felt gave a wry smile. She then called out to Reinhard, who had remained silent throughout the conversation. He simply shook his head slowly.

Still, when someone said “it’s nothing,” it was rarely ever truly nothing.

“Huh. Well, if you say so. Guess it really isn’t a big deal.”

And with that, Felt cut the conversation off, and the opportunity to pursue the matter was missed.

3

“—And so, the concept of zero in numbers ended up greatly transforming arithmetic. Previously, people believed that something nonexistent couldn’t be accounted for in equations, but that perception changed.”

“I see. Now that you mention it, it makes sense, nobody would think of something that doesn’t exist as actually being there.”

“Exactly. Even in a brothel, there’s a huge difference between receiving a tip and not getting one.”

“I’d say that’s a bit of a different topic, but the way of thinking isn’t entirely wrong. By considering things we usually don’t even think about and seeing what's normally unseen, our perception changes."

"In a way, that's kind of like magic."

"Exactly!"

With a loud bang, Ezzo slammed his hand on the desk, startling the three listeners. Gaston, Camberley, and Rachins shuddered and exclaimed, "Whoa!!"

However, Ezzo paid no mind to their reaction. He leaned forward and continued.

"To think of something that doesn't exist, and to prove that something unreachable can be reached—that, too, is just another way of perceiving and understanding the world. Magic is merely one aspect of such differences in perception. The ability to think flexibly about such things is truly remarkable! You three are excellent students… or rather, not students at all?!"

"…Don't correct yourself like that."

"Still, I learned a lot from this, y'know?"

Holding his green-haired head in his hands, Ezzo agonized once again over how he had let himself get carried away with teaching.

He hadn't intended to give a lecture at first. It had started when the three came to collect their wages at the mansion, which turned out to be uneven. The discussion began with an explanation of why their wages differed—Camberley's lower pay was due to an incident in Flanders and his debts, whereas Gaston and Camberley had both received rewards related to the same incident.

From there, the conversation naturally drifted into the intricacies of arithmetic.

"I really need to stop this bad habit of mine."

"But isn't it just that—a habit? I heard you were even explaining to those twins why flowers and vegetables grow with just soil and water."

“I was just passing by and overheard a cute, curiosity-filled conversation, so I couldn’t help myself…”

Rachins had pointed out how Ezzo had ended up in a similar situation while chatting with Flam and Grassis as they peeled vegetables in the kitchen. What started as a simple explanation spiraled into a full-blown lecture, once again.

“Next time… Next time, I won’t let this happen…!”

“I don’t get it, but hey, don’t stress over it too much, Sensei.”

“Yeah! If you’re ever too tired from all that thinking, why not come to the red-light district with us for fun instead of just teaching?”

“Going out to party with the people you usually lecture? That’s a terrible idea.”

As they left, noisily chatting about something questionable, Ezzo watched them with a mix of amusement and exasperation.

He appreciated their concern, even if the way they showed it was unique. But that, too, was something you could only understand with time and familiarity.

“Still… rushing relationships never works out. My mistakes always come from acting too fast… That’s probably why I got along so well with the women in the red-light district. They’re experts at reading social cues and adjusting their approach accordingly.”

As he recalled his students from the district, Ezzo reflected on how, despite being older and more knowledgeable, he fell far behind them in terms of social skills and emotional intelligence.

He didn’t want to make mistakes here.

After all, for the first time, he truly believed he had found where he belonged.

“Sir Ezzo, may I have a moment?”

“Hm? Sir Reinhard?”

After the lively trio had bustled out, Ezzo welcomed Reinhard into the office space he had been generously provided. The red-haired Sword Saint gestured toward the hallway with a gentle expression.

“Those three just left, didn’t they? They seemed to be having a great time. What were you talking about?”

“It started as a discussion about wages, but then it turned into a breakdown of arithmetic. They’re quite curious, and before I knew it, I was deep into explaining things.”

“I see. That explains why they looked so entertained.”

After hearing the explanation, Reinhard glanced down the hallway once more, with a subtle furrow of his brow. His reaction gave Ezzo a familiar sense of unease.

It was a feeling he had experienced before.

“…I’m not sure if I should ask this, but can I?”

Battling his own reluctance to pry, Ezzo ultimately gave in to his nature.

At Ezzo’s words, Reinhard nodded, then, after closing the door behind him with one hand, he stepped further into the room.

“I actually have something I’d like to discuss with you, Sir Ezzo.”

“With me? Is it about the management of the territory? Or perhaps an update regarding the royal selection?”

“You’ve been helping with both, but I’d say it’s more related to the latter.”

Having settled on the topic of the Royal Selection, Reinhard hesitated for a moment. Though their acquaintance was brief, his demeanor was uncharacteristic of the Sword Saint, making Ezzo take notice. Then, Reinhard finally spoke.

“I would like your assistance with Lady Felt’s education.”

“Lady Felt’s…? Wait, but—”

“I understand. You’ve been deliberately avoiding interfering in that area. But this was the first time Lady Felt sat through an entire discussion without getting up or looking bored.”

Reinhard recalled the recent instance where Ezzo had read a history to her.

It had a greater impact on her than expected, and Ezzo himself didn’t mind teaching. However, he still felt some resistance to the idea.

“I just joined the camp, so I think it’s a bit excessive for me to be Lady Felt’s tutor, and even if it’s a sign of trust, you’re being far too careless.”

“I understand. Although I fear it may be a burden for you, please allow me to be present as well.”

“Sir Reinhard, you as well?”

“You’re worried about political manipulation or hidden agendas, aren’t you? My presence should ease those concerns. And…”

“And?”

“I, too, was deeply impressed by your teaching style. I want to learn from you, Sir Ezzo. —I don’t want Lady Felt to see me as a boring knight.”

That last part seemed like his true motivation, and Ezzo was momentarily taken aback. But Reinhard, despite his embarrassment, was completely sincere.

This was the great Sword Saint revealing his weakness. For Ezzo, that undeniable display of vulnerability was a sign of deep trust.

“Sir Ezzo, you believe trust should be built over time, don’t you? But the Royal Selection has a deadline, and neither Lady Felt nor I can afford to hesitate. Besides, I do trust you. I’m certain of it.”

“…How can you say that with such confidence?”

“Because the Divine Protection of Doubt lets me detect when someone harbors ulterior motives.”

Ezzo widened his eyes at Reinhard’s matter-of-fact statement, and in response, the knight playfully winked.

Whether it was a serious statement or a joke, Ezzo couldn’t be sure.

However—

“Not only Lady Felt… You are quite the fascinating person yourself, Sir Reinhard.”

“If that’s the case, then Lady Felt’s influence must be strong.”

Was that humility? Or simply a knight who took great pride in his master?

Either way, Ezzo felt his previous doubts fade. Perhaps, in this place, he could afford to keep being his talkative, over-explaining self. Because these people wouldn’t silently distance themselves from him—they’d yell at him to shut up first. And that kind of trust was a rare and precious thing.

END

The Witch's After Tea Party: One Wild Night (Translation Pending)

The Witch's After Tea Party:
One Wild Night Extra

It was after the events at the church on the snow mountain, following the moment when a new member had joined Omega's party.

"We need to discuss whether Noelle should accompany us."

The one who said this was none other than Palmyra, the group's troublemaker. She often brought up an issue to argue about, but only to voice her opinion and not necessarily to resolve it. Omega shrugged her shoulders thinking, there she goes again.

"There she goes again," Omega said, voicing her thoughts.

"What did you just say?" Palmyra retorted as everyone expected. Her sharp eyes were lit with anger. "What do you mean, 'there she goes again'?! Have I said anything wrong?"

"You haven't said anything wrong, per se, but I do think it is pointless to talk to you since you always end up doing whatever Colette decides anyways, right?"

"N-Not right. Don't make me sound like I'm subservient to Colette! Besides, she might have something to say about this matter too."

"Hm, something to say, huh?" Omega said as she tried to imagine Colette giving a different opinion than she already had on the matter. But no matter how hard she tried, she couldn't imagine Colette changing her initial attitude as Palmyra suggested. "Nope, can't see that happening."

Palmyra grabbed her twin tail hair with both hands and groaned, conceding to Omega. Her behavior reminded Omega how young she still was.

After having successfully descended the mountain, Noelle and the rest were heading to the town Podoso had told them about at the church. Luckily, they didn't have to worry about the weather based on how the sky looked and with the dry air. They took this opportunity to set up camp and have a rest. It was Colette and Noelle's turn to prepare the camp, while Omega and Palmyra sat in a tent facing each other.

"And as Noelle was working hard for her traveling companions, Palmyra schemed to gather votes to kick her out of the group," Omega snarked.

"Don't say it like that!" Palmyra yelled. "It's not like I want to kick her out!"

"Then what did you mean by your earlier remark?" Omega asked, tilting her head.

"Well… You get it, don't you?" Palmyra started mumbling. "There's Colette's bracelet to worry about, and about you too."

Palmyra's voice was too quiet for Omega to catch what she was saying. Omega twitched her half-elf ears. "I'm sorry, I couldn't hear what you just said. Could you repeat it loudly enough so that a person with half-elf ears, a peculiarity that's hated by many, like me could hear?"

"That's exactly my point!" Palmyra yelled into her ear, as if to scold her for joking around. "We're all dealing with one thing or another. Besides, I'll feel bad for Noelle if she gets dragged into our mess!"

"My ear's ringing," Omega said.

However, Omega was impressed by Palmyra's kindness. She was reminded that even though her personality may be aggressive, Palmyra still had a heart of gold. I mean, if not, she wouldn't have left her hometown where she did nothing wrong. So I guess it's natural for a person like her to worry about Noelle, who doesn't have an urgent reason to accompany us.

"Even so," said Omega, "you don't have to worry about my peculiarity, if that's what you're concerned about."

"Don't have to worry about it?" Palmyra questioned, directing a suspicious look at Omega. “That’s the most unreliable thing I’ve heard you say.”

Omega was deeply shocked by Palmyra’s mistrust. She had the same sort of look she gave the murder suspects at the church the previous night.

“But I’m sure you’ll see what I’m talking about very soon,” Omega said. “Since…”

“I already know Miss Omega’s secret,” a sudden voice interrupted Omega.

Palmyra yelped at the voice that came from behind her. She quickly turned around to find Noelle standing at the entrance to the tent, holding a pot with hot steam coming out from it.

“I apologize for startling you,” Noelle said, showing a soft smile. She then walked into the tent while carrying the pot. “I did not mean to eavesdrop, but I heard your discussion from the middle.”

“O-Our discussion?” Palmyra replied. “Wh-What are you talking abou…”

“Give up, Palmyra,” Omega interjected. “The cat’s out of the bag. Noelle already knows you were scheming to kick her out of the group.”

“No! I was saying that it could be dangerous for Noelle if she stayed with us—oops.” Palmyra quickly stopped talking, but it was too late. Noelle had heard everything.

Letting out a small laugh at Palmyra’s clumsiness, Noelle slowly placed the pot in the middle of the tent. “Thank you for worrying about me,” she said. “However, as I said earlier, I already know Miss Omega’s secret. I chose to accompany all of you despite that.”

“Do you…have a thing for odd people?” Palmyra asked.

“What a way to put it,” Omega remarked.

“Yes, I do have a thing for odd people. Just like you, Miss Palmyra.”

"I-I'm not traveling with her because I like her or anything," Palmyra said, turning red and pointing her finger at Omega.

Omega, however, knew Palmyra didn't actually mean it. "Actually," she reconsidered, "in this case I'm not sure if you are truly serious or just wanted to say something mean."

"Nobody cares about that right now," Palmyra dismissed. "Noelle, are you really okay?"

"Positively so," Noelle answered. "Besides, I probably should not say this, but I might be as odd as the rest of you," she said as she placed one hand on her well-developed bosom cloaked in black clothes. "I was an itinerant preacher of the Gustekan Church. However, due to the incident that occurred last night, I no longer have a reason to be a part of the Church and have no place to return to."

"That… Yeah I remember you mentioning that," Palmyra said. "Is the Church going to be ok with that?"

"It will not," Noelle responded swiftly.

"It won't?!" Palmyra said, eyes widening in shock.

"I am one of the followers who have made a vow to the Church. For me to abandon my duties and not return is something that should not be allowed."

"B-But a vow is like a promise, right? I guess breaking a promise isn't a good thing, but I wouldn't go as far as to say it's as bad as Omega's secret…"

"No, you're underestimating the Church, Palmyra," Omega said. "Or shall I say you're underestimating what the Church bestowed Noelle." It's the fact that Noelle made a vow to the Church that makes the whole situation tricky. Noelle is an itinerant preacher for the Church. And as we saw in the snow mountain, her body has been enhanced with great power through the Church's blessing. This isn't something that's bestowed upon anyone. It also can't be relinquished so easily. Palmyra compared it to a 'promise', but it's more of a contract between a devout follower and the Gustekan Church. “And what Noelle is doing is breaking the contract without any premeditation. Obviously, the Gustekan Church won’t be amicable about this.”

“I am deeply grateful to the Church,” Noelle said after a pause. “The fact that I have been able to survive until today and gain the power to achieve my goal has all been because of the Church and the power they have blessed me with. In return, I vowed to offer my whole life to the Church.”

“Your whole life…” Palmyra repeated.

“But it was all a lie.”

“It was a lie?! Well, of course it was! You abandoned your role after all!”

“What I did was receive the blessing I needed to achieve my life long goal, and completely abandon them now that I have.”

Palmyra said nothing. She was a rather empathetic person, but even she couldn’t find the right words to comfort Noelle.

It may seem like she made a bold decision, Omega thought. But there must be a part of her that’s just giving up and lashing out. And I’m partially responsible for pushing her into this state. I can’t let her be by herself. “So the idea that her being with us will be bad for her isn’t exactly correct,” she said. “After all, some people might come after her and we might get dragged into her mess,” she added, laughing.

“Stop laughing!” Palmyra yelled. “You better be ready to take off your disguise and brawl it out if the situation calls for it.”

“That isn’t something I can do so easily, you know?” Omega said. “Souls have a propensity to revert back to their original shape. It takes quite an effort just to make some changes on the surface.”

“Just, be, prepared, okay?” Palmyra said, grabbing Omega by her collars, shaking her.

“Okay, okay, I’ll do my best,” Omega conceded.

Noelle widened her eyes at her traveling companions’ interaction, and then let out a small laugh. “Miss Palmyra,” she said, still keeping a faint smile. “I am really happy you are looking out for my well-being when I should be the one asking you if I will be a burden by staying with you. Please do not hesitate to say so if that is the case. I will leave at once.”

“You being a burden…?”

“If you were planning on visiting other Gustekan churches, it could pose some problems keeping me, who is being persecuted by the Church, by your side.”

“Don’t underestimate me,” Palmyra responded, glaring at her. “I left my hometown with Colette after my village was destroyed by a half-elf looking witch. So I’m used to trouble.”

“You’re certainly the type who likes to take on trouble,” Omega teased.

Palmyra glared at her and quickly retorted. “Shut your trap.”

Omega shrugged and said nothing. Noelle, on the other hand, looked surprised by Palmyra’s aggressive words.

Palmyra pointed her finger at her. “What I’m trying to say is that your situation isn’t enough for me to push you away. The only concern I have is whether you’re fine staying with us.”

“If I am fine…?”

“Just so you know, you can’t use Colette as an excuse to back out. She’ll be more than happy to have you accompany us, no matter the situation. She isn’t the type to worry about potential problems.”

With Palmyra’s strong words, Noelle could no longer use Colette as an excuse.

But this means that Noelle just lost her only reason to back out from accompanying us, thought Omega. I’m sure Palmyra didn’t plan to do so, but she pretty much cornered Noelle into staying with us, and she's asking her to convince her otherwise. The whole situation is so ridiculous. "Good grief," she said aloud. "And to think that you wanted to kick Noelle out of the group, but instead, you took away her reason to leave."

"Could you stop talking and acting as if you know anything, when you in fact don't?"

"What?" Omega said, confused as she expected Palmyra to get flustered by her accurate assessment. "I was sure I perfectly figured out your hidden agenda that you yourself haven't even realized."

Then a voice came from the entrance of the tent. "Oh? Were all of you waiting for me?"

It was Colette. She had been preparing food with Noelle, but seeing as she came later, Omega speculated that she'd been cleaning up. Her words suggested she assumed they had already started eating without her.

"Not exactly," Omega said. "Actually, we could use your thoughts on this matter…"

"No, we were waiting for you," Noelle interjected with a faint smile. "I was hoping we could all eat together, including you, Miss Colette."

"Oh?!" Colette exclaimed, putting her hands together in front of her chest happily. "So that's how it is. I'm so sorry for making all of you wait. But I'm really happy we can all enjoy Noelle's tasty soup. It's incredible."

"Hmm," Palmyra said skeptically. "Are you sure you wanna set the bar so high?"

"Oh, are you doubting me, Palmyra? Then you're in for a surprise," Colette said with a laugh, showing confidence in her words.

It was a rare sight to see Colette like this, but Omega was rather disappointed to be left out of the loop. Seems like Palmyra and Noelle have decided to collude together to hide our earlier discussion from her. Well, it's not like I'm eager to tell her everything either. "But I wish this soup could uplift me from my disappointment."

"Well, now I think you're raising the bar a little too high," Colette commented.

They gathered around the pot, as Noelle served the soup to everyone. The warm aroma of the soup tickled Omega's nostrils, raising her expectations of the taste. She wasn't disappointed.

"It doesn't look like you added any more ingredients than we previously had," she said.

"I used my herbs and spices," Noelle explained. "I always carry them around when traveling as meals are one of the few joys we have on the road."

"Right? Right? It's good, right? Palmyra, how is it?" Colette asked, looking into her friend's face.

"It's good," Palmyra mumbled, making Colette flash a bright smile.

I see, no wonder Colette was enthusiastic about Noelle's cooking, Omega thought. This is really good. And, on top of this great quality…

"By the way, Miss Palmyra," Noelle started while she served everyone seconds, "I found a small nick on your bag, so I took the liberty of stitching it up."

"Eh? Oh, is that so?" Palmyra responded, dumbfounded.

"Yes, and the poles for this tent you and Miss Omega set up seemed unsteady, so I adjusted that as well. I will teach you both how to properly set a tent up later."

"I see," Omega said. "That'll be great, since knowing how to do something is completely different from actually being able to do it properly."

"And Miss Colette," she said, turning her attention to her, "let's make time after we eat for me to explain the teachings and manners of the Church to you like we discussed earlier. Knowing them should help you out in the holy kingdom.”

“Wow! Thank you so much!” Colette said. “I was really curious about it!”

And so, as she continued to diligently serve the group, she gave lectures on how to mend traveling equipment, the dangers of traveling in the snow, and even about the Gustekan Church, thoroughly impressing Colette and Omega.

Not only should we be thankful she’s so knowledgeable about traveling, I’m really interested in learning about the modern Gustekan Church. “Yeah, I think we found an amazing addition to our group,” Omega praised, sipping on her warm soup. Then, she noticed Palmyra also sipping on her soup, staring at Colette and Noelle with a sour look. “What’s wrong, Palmyra?”

“Now that I think about it,” Palmyra said, “would we have been able to travel safely without Noelle?”

Omega said nothing.

“Hey, say something!”

It was one of the rare moments where Omega had no retort. She just silently sipped on her soup.

END

Volume 37

Chapters 44-60

Chapter 44:
How to Respond to Faith

1

As all the muscles in his body throbbed, his canines were sharpened by a surge of fighting spirit.

The aftershocks from the fighting fissured, upheaving the street, and with his feet firmly plunked down onto it, the vitality flowing in from his soles overflowed in his soul; looking straight ahead, to the skies above, he glared at the majestic figure spreading its wings head-on.

The sound of his blood flowing got faster, the beating of his heart grew louder and more intense, as if it were a large drum invigorating his very existence.

That was to say—

???: "—'S THE BEST I EVER FUCKIN' FELT!!"

Gnashing his fangs, Garfiel roared as he smashed through the road with his foot, and advanced forth.

As the sky intercepted him, he saw himself reflected by the glint in the eyes of the dignified figure—the white Cloud Dragon; Garfiel's blood, flesh, and even his very soul, could not bear the applause.

As an arrow of the rebel army, he traded fists with one strong individual after the other in the decisive battle for the Imperial Capital.

A man who approached the Nine Divine Generals, and an individual ranked among the Nine Divine Generals; through battle against those who were undoubtedly strong, Garfiel truly felt the duty levied on him as a member of his faction.

Being able to clash with the extolled Generals of the Vollachian

Empire was truly an honor as a warrior.

However, having recognized that as a valuable experience, this was something he had been waiting for.

Garfiel: “Finally got the chance to throw down against a Dragon!”

For a citizen of the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, for any being who lived in this world, it was known just how mighty, and how far beyond the realm of human knowledge the beings known as Dragons were.

Of course, that went for Garfiel as well. He knew that Dragons were not beings that could be measured by the logic of the world of men.

However, at both the Pleiades Watchtower and at the decisive battle for the Imperial Capital, Emilia had gained the opportunity to clash with a Dragon, and had magnificently survived both of those encounters.

Emilia: “Dragons? Yeah, Volcanica and Mezoreia were both reaaally strong. Their bodies are big, and their breath is also dangerous… They kept on surprising me!”

Such was Emilia’s remark when talking about the threat of Dragons.

Combined with hand gestures, Emilia spoke of how Dragons were monumental beings, but regardless of the issue of her ability to express things, the full extent of that had not been conveyed.

The difference between that and the words Emilia had left unspoken, was now something he experienced first-hand here—.

Mezoreia: “—!!”

Splitting the ground beneath his feet, Garfiel ferociously closed the distance; facing him, the Cloud Dragon gaped its maw.

Garfiel stood on the ready, anticipating that another equivalent to the breath that had scorched the Imperial Capital just prior would be fired again; with aim locked onto him, Mezoreia unleashed the breath in accordance with his premonition.

However—

Garfiel: “Go-ah?!”

Struck by an impact accompanied by peculiar heat, different to that of scorching heat or extreme cold, Garfiel let out a cry of pain.

It was right after he had leapt to the side in order to evade the firing trajectory of Mezoreia’s breath. Having escaped to the side of the trajectory, Garfiel was assailed by a second firing of the breath.

Without doing anything to obscure its actions, it was obvious what his opponent was doing.

It was not that it had emitted a single breath to mow down the entirety of this block of the Imperial Capital in one go, rather, it had split it up into short bursts. Instead of letting out one long breath, it had released two breaths in quick succession.

—No, not two. If it was dividing one breath, it could do the same thing for a third and fourth time.

Garfiel: “Tch!!”

While scorching his left arm as it basked in the breath, Garfiel used his momentum from jumping to the side to smash through the wall of a private residence on the side of the road, and was hidden from the Cloud Dragon’s vision.

But, in the face of the Cloud Dragon’s breath, even a stone-built structure would not endure. It was different to the pig’s house that would not be blown down by the wolf’s breath, which Subaru had told him about in the past.

Struck with impacts from the succession of breaths, the walls very quickly flayed off the house; as the furniture and belongings were being destroyed, the damage reached Garfiel, who had plunged inside the house—at least that was what should have happened.

Garfiel: “OOOOOOORAAAHHH!!!”

Then, before the house exposed to the breath could be demolished to rubble, the roaring Garfiel had used both his hands to tear out the house from the very ground, and heartily hurled it through the air.

A house-cannonball that furiously gyrated as it scattered through the street—oddly enough, Garfiel was making full use of the same tactic that Natsuki Subaru had employed when evacuating the Imperial Capital. With the ball of mass hurled from those hands approaching it, Mezoreia took an especially large breath.

Mezoreia: “You’re in my friggin’ way!”

Roaring with a childish expression that ran contrary to its colossal and dignified appearance, the Cloud Dragon blew the house to smithereens before it could reach its destination.

However, it would be naive of Mezoreia to think it could catch its breath as a result of that.

Garfiel: “ORA ORA ORA ORA ORA ORA ORA ORAAHHH!!”

Since it had defended against the first house-cannonball, Garfiel grabbed them up from the systematically laid out townscape of the Imperial Capital one by one, and hurled them towards the Cloud Dragon in the sky with tremendous strength.
With the combination of Garfiel’s physical strength, and the fact that the ground of the Imperial Capital had softened through repeated impacts, the aberrant balls of mass were fired in quick succession; witnessing this, Mezoreia widened its golden eyes.

Mezoreia: “Youuuu’re aaaaaaaa friiiiiiigginnnnnnnn’ EYESOOOOOOOOORE!!”

As the house-cannonballs flew towards it, Mezoreia flapped its wings and intercepted them.

Its arms, furnished with sharp claws, rampaged in the air, blowing away two houses, and swinging its tail straight upwards from below, it destroyed three buildings altogether in one intense strike.

And then—

Mezoreia: “—Friggin’ die already.”

Garfiel: “—Hk.”

Using the wreckage of the destroyed houses as a foothold, Garfiel dashed up into the air; seeing through the surprise attack, Mezoreia seized him head-on, and slammed its dragon claws into him from both left and right.

Being pinched in a trajectory akin to striking one’s fists together before their chest, the mid-air Garfiel swung his shield-clad arms in order to parry; taking the Dragon’s left arm with his right, and the Dragon’s right arm with his left, he received the blows.

An intense impact ran through Garfiel’s entire body, his clenched teeth fissured, and his nose bled.

But, if this were anyone other than Garfiel, they would be smashed into a lump of meat without lasting even a second. Mezoreia’s whiskers also quivered at that outcome, its shock at the existence of a human that was not crushed laid bare.

At that shock of Mezoreia, Garfiel’s cheeks began to contort into a smile,

Garfiel: “How d’ya like—”

That; before he could display his vigor with those words, his body, still held by the two arms, received a direct blow from the tail that slammed into him from straight above—Garfiel was blown away with force such that his body left behind all notions of sound, and while altering the structure of the townscape with each impact, he tumbled over and over and over again, until he crashed into the bulwark of the Imperial Capital, and came to a stop.

???: “O-oi?! Oi, brat?!”

Amidst the dense plume of smoke hanging over the scene, the man who had witnessed the marks left on the street of Garfiel bouncing, scraping, and smashing against ground—Heinkel’s voice quavered.

The man who had been unable to do anything but dumbfoundedly watch as Garfiel and the Cloud Dragon clashed against each other, rushed over to Garfiel's side, the latter having received a direct blow that seemed to have enough might to turn one hundred ordinary people into ground meat.

Heinkel: "Dead… Are you dead? You gotta be dead! That sort of thing…"

Garfiel: "…I ain't gonna let it, kill me so easily."

Before the mountain of rubble, a voice reached Heinkel, who had imagined that the fickle life had been lost. In Heinkel's vision as he was taken aback, the mountain of rubble collapsed, and there was the figure of Garfiel, with both his legs stretched out.

Garfiel turned his back on the ramparts, and languidly hung his head without showing his face. Then, his mouth made a chewing motion, and he spat out his shattered fangs together with blood.

And then—

Garfiel: "Ahh, shit… They really are fuckin' outrageous, these Dragon things. Finally get why Emilia-sama spoke about 'em so softly."

Shaking his head, he slowly stood up.

Feeling around with his tongue, he found that a tooth which had been fractured in twain was failing to try and replace itself with new growth, so he thrust his finger inside and ripped it out from its roots. Right away, he knew that the tip of a new tooth had turned up below where the removed one was, and he loudly cracked the joints in his neck with a twist.

Heinkel: "Did that, really do nothing to you…?"

Garfiel: "Ain't no way that it did nothing to me. I got hit with a blow from a Dragon… Nah, even got hit with a second and third blow. Seems like it's a case of "the miraculous survival of Manfroy"."

Heinkel: "…"

Garfiel: “But ya know, my amazin’ self can keep going. —I’m glad that my amazin’ self’s still able to keep going.”

As his entire body grated with appeals of pain both blunt and sharp, Garfiel clenched both his fists, and with shaky breath, he voiced his pride as such.

Even having taken the onslaught of a Dragon that surpassed human knowledge head-on, he still stood back up.

He was truly glad that he was able to do so.

Heinkel: “…What the hell, what the hell is wrong with you?!”

Hearing Garfiel mutter, Heinkel involuntarily cried out.

With Garfiel reflected in his wide-open blue eyes, the man violently and messily scratched at his head with the hand that was empty, and,

Heinkel: “Why the hell did you come back? I don’t understand! It’s a Dragon… It’s a fucking Dragon?! There’s no way you can win. You’re an idiot to come here! And yet!”

Garfiel: “Well we’re in the same boat there, Pops.”

Heinkel: “Ah…?”

Garfiel: “I’m sayin’ that if the act of bein’ here, ‘n the act of facin’ off against a Dragon is what an idiot would do, then doesn’t that go for Pops as well?”

Left speechless by those words, Heinkel stopped the hand that was scratching his head, and gazed in wonder.

His demeanor was entirely as if to say not to lump them together, but if that were truly the case, he was hopeless. That was because, in Heinkel’s hand, opposite to the one that had been scratching his head,

Garfiel: “You’re still holdin’ onto yer sword, ain’tcha?”

Heinkel: "…"

Garfiel believed that was proof that Heinkel had a faint wish which he had not thrown away.

He might have just become unable to open his fingers out of fear. —No. Try to understand.

He might have just forgotten about himself, and was just carrying it. —No. Try to understand.

He might have just been about to sheath it and run away at this moment. —No. Try to understand.

The weak thoughts, the crushed spirit, the reasons for being seized with fear, he would try to understand all of it.

After having thought through absolutely all of it, he continued to try to understand, because he believed that the face of a man was only complete if he grit his teeth through the pain and stood up to fight for the wishes of others.

Garfiel: "Captain and Ottobro're also the same. That also goes for my amazin' self."

Heinkel: "I… I'm…"

Trembling, Heinkel looked down at his hand, still gripping the sword as it quivered. With Heinkel in the side of his vision, Garfiel vigorously slammed his back against the bulwark, and straightened his posture.

Then, to Heinkel, who had not straightened himself,

Garfiel: "Ya asked why my amazin' self came back, didn't ya?"

Heinkel: "—Ah?"

Garfiel's quiet voice caused Heinkel to widen his eyes.

As Heinkel waited for the words that followed, Garfiel delivered not a continuation of his words, but instead a fist to Heinkel's chest, sending the latter flying.

Heinkel was thrust away, and the street was upheaved on a massive scale.

The next instant, the breath of the Cloud Dragon was unleashed from the midst of the city's air, and it rapidly closed in on Garfiel, his back to the ramparts—leaping up, Garfiel managed to evade it.

Garfiel: "Oh, OHHHHHH…!"

With the wall to his back Garfiel flew directly up, and pursuing him, the heated ray of white breath inclined its firing trajectory upwards. Scorching the townscape, while reducing the bulwark to dust, the breath went higher, higher, and higher as it pursued Garfiel as he escaped into the skies above.

Hot on Garfiel's toes, before it could burn his body entirely—

Garfiel: "'S because Captain told me this."

As the breath of the Dragon trying to scorch the world grazed the soles of his feet, there was not a hint of irritation that could be heard in his voice. What was present however, was pride in the act of responding to faith.

Curling himself up mid-air, Garfiel planted his feet on part of the wall that still retained its original form. —Immediately after, he kicked off the wall with strength that caused a crater to fissure within it, and flew forwards.

Forward, forward, forward, towards the Cloud Dragon that soared in the skies of the Imperial Capital, and with his mouth wide open, closing in as the sharp newly grown fang basked in the wind—

Garfiel: "—He told my amazin' self this! To go 'n bring down the loud ass Dragon that's flyin' in the sky!!"

Mezoreia: "—Rah?!"

Having flown above the breath and approached the Cloud Dragon, Garfiel let blows loose from both his wounded back arms, and the destructive power of a cannonball seized Mezoreia’s nose.

A sound as loud as a warehouse that was stuffed with magic stones exploding reverberated through the sky; the Cloud Dragon was knocked back having received a direct hit, and the next moment, blood spurted forth.

The Dragon spilled a nosebleed through its broken snout, and having been slammed back into the ground from the recoil of his own fist, Garfiel basked in the greatness of his action. As he basked in it, Garfiel laughed.

Garfiel: “Da-ha-ha-ha! I went ‘n gave a Dragon a nosebleed!”

Mezoreia: “You, little!!”

Mezoreia raged at the impossible humiliation, and Garfiel laughed even more upon seeing that state.

Seeing that from afar, having been thrust away and saved from the breath, Heinkel sat with his buttocks on the ground, gazing in dumbfoundment,

Heinkel: “…That’s not sane.”

As Heinkel weakly muttered, a battlefield was created by the faceoff between Garfiel and the Dragon—and that happened at roughly the same time as when changes in atmosphere of a similar scale were yielded in various other places within the Imperial Capital.

As if not paying any mind to that, the fight between tiger and Dragon unfolded, and with that scene before him, Heinkel did not move an inch.

Unable to flee, unable to even stand, he did not move an inch.

—But, upon his sword, his right hand still remained, continuing to hold on.

2

—Turning back the clock, to a slight bit before the conclusion of the battle between the Dragon and the tiger.

???: "…"

The feeling of cold water hitting his cheeks and forehead caused Subaru's consciousness to become fully alert.

It was neither drowsiness, nor bodily fatigue that he was experiencing. And yet, as if with a click, he felt something within him switch and exhaled deeply.

Before him, on the surface of the water that rippled within the trough, his own shaken and distorted visage could be seen. It was a face with sharp eyes that had retained its youthfulness, or rather that could only be described as childish.

He was already accustomed to seeing it, and he did not want to think that he could let his face remain this way. While thinking so, as he delicately squished his face with his fingers—

???: "Subaru, are you okay? By any chance, is there something wrong with you?"

Abruptly, as a voice called out to him from beside him, Subaru looked up from the water trough. In front of his raised face, he saw Emilia looking at him with her beautiful amethyst eyes.

As Subaru's heart fluttered upon unexpectedly seeing Emilia's face so close to his own,

Subaru: "I-I'm alrighty, Emilia-tan. Just needed to loosen up my cheeks a little. You see, I always want to show Emilia-tan my best smile."

Emilia: "I'm not picky though, as long as it's not a forced smile, I'm happy with any kind of smile Subaru shows me…"

Subaru: "Oooh, my heart is pounding… bum bum."

Said with a finger held to her lips, Emilia's words that held no hint of pretense left Subaru flustered. As he tried to wipe his face with his sleeve in an attempt to hide his reddened cheeks, a hand towel was offered to him from the side. —Two hand towels were offered from his left and right, by Beatrice and Tanza.

The two were shocked at the fact that their own action was performed by the other, and their usually round eyes became even more round, then instantly narrowed upon becoming aware of each other,

Beatrice: “Deergirl, Subaru wants Betty’s towel, in fact. You can take that back, I suppose.”

Tanza: “Schwartz-sama did not say anything of the sort. To speak of your own thoughts as if they were Schwartz-sama’s, are you not going too far?”

Beatrice: “Agrrh, such an infuriating girl, in fact!”

Subaru: “Wait wait wait wait, why are you fighting! See, I’m using both! I’m wiping the left and the right sides of my face with the towels from both of you.”

Intervening in the quarrel that had suddenly broken out for some reason, Subaru attempted to diffuse the situation by using both of the hand towels he had received from the pair. However, the two in question simply sighed at his response. He failed to settle the dispute.

At the sight of Subaru who slumped his shoulders, placing her hands on her hips, Emilia said “Seriously”,

Emilia: “Beatrice and Tanza-chan, stop causing trouble for Subaru. As it is, with the hardships he’s continuously facing, Subaru is about to collapse…”

Subaru: “Ooh, Emilia-tan’s thoughtfulness is so touching… that said, I’m not implying that the two of you don’t care about me, okay? In fact, the two of you are always helping me… the more I say it out loud, the more it feels like I’m making excuses, doesn’t it?!”

Beatrice: “Good grief, I suppose.”

Tanza: “As expected of Schwartz-sama.”

Seeing that Subaru was at his wit’s end, Beatrice and Tanza had no choice but to soften their attitudes in response.

Unexpectedly being cast as the villain, Subaru tilted his head in protest, but upon receiving Emilia’s gentle pats on Subaru’s head, he decided to accept his predicament.

Anyhow—

Subaru: “But, I’m not putting on a brave front, I really am alright, Emilia-tan. I was able to take a proper rest at the fortress before we set off… besides, if I were to carelessly collapse from a lack of sleep, the entire Pleiades Battalion would also fall apart.”

Held together by strong bonds, the strengths and weaknesses of the Pleiades Battalion were clear.

The united battalion was a group with unstoppable enthusiasm, but what held them together was Subaru’s presence—it was nothing that could be boasted about, Subaru’s Cor Leonis.

And this effect, it would be cut off if Subaru were to fall asleep or faint, and so from this point onward, he could not allow himself to carelessly doze off.

Subaru: “I know that, so it’s alright. Trust me, Emilia-tan.”

Emilia: “Is that so? In that case, it’s fine, but can you truly promise not to overdo yourself?”

Subaru: “Emilia-tan really doesn’t trust me at all…”

Emilia: “If you’re wondering why that is, try properly asking your own conscience.”

Trust, it is the accumulation of past actions. That was the implication of Emilia’s remark, and it left Subaru at a loss for words.

However, it was a fact that Subaru’s body and mind were in such good shape that he himself was surprised. In all likelihood, as the excessive tension seemed to be the reason for his mind being so alert, once the present conflict was solved in its entirety, that debt would gush forth all at once and topple everything.

However, if he could make it through on borrowed energy, he was more than willing to take on the debt that followed.

—Presently, having departed from the Fortified City of Garkla and heading towards the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, the "Rescue the Vollachian Empire from Destruction Squad" was in the process of exchanging dragon carriages in order to ensure their arrival at their destination.

On the route from Garkla to Lupugana, having stopped at one of the many camps scattered along the route, while Abel and the other strategists were reviewing the war situation, the exhausted ground dragons were being exchanged with those in perfect condition, as a part of the preparations for the decisive battle.

Subaru: "Of course, Patrasche will always be with us, though."

Reaching out his hand, Subaru touched his beloved jet-black dragon who was harnessed to the dragon carriage—Patrasche, whose neck he caressed.

Patrasche, upon safely reuniting with him in the Empire, without any consideration of holding back despite Subaru's shrinking, delivered a powerful blow to him with her tail in retaliation for causing her to worry.

That one blow that had sent him crashing into the wall with a loud thud, it was reminiscent of the injuries he had sustained while fighting the Guiltilaw during Sparka at the Gladiator Island, and he was glad that it ended with just one.

Since then, after having accepted Subaru's sincere apology, she had been giving her all to accompany them.

???: "—Heh, this ground dragon young'un, she's one of y'all's, ain't she?"

And then, arriving where Patrasche and Subaru were frolicking was Halibel.

The tall wolfman shinobi, holding his kiseru between his large teeth, while bobbing it up and down with his lips,

Halibel: “When I was fightin’ with that Dragon zombie, she was doin’ a splendid job ‘n I thought she was real admirable.”

Subaru: “Ohh! Halibel-san also gets it, our Patrasche is amazing!”

Halibel: “Ain’t that the truth. You’re a lucky fella. —Lil’ Ana ‘n the others, everyone’s worried ’bout’cha.”

Subaru was overjoyed to receive open approval from the strongest and most renowned person from the City-States, Halibel. His eyes opened wide at the words that followed, then he earnestly nodded.

He did not need to be told, but having it mentioned made him think about it again. —He, was truly blessed.

Those in the Emilia Camp, along with Julius and Anastasia, not only did they break through various unfavorable obstacles to enter the Empire, but they also went along with Subaru’s selfish request to see this through to the end.

Just how reliable and reassuring that was, he could not thank them enough.

Subaru: “That’s why, I need to do everything I can to help.”

Emilia: “Subaru? The promise you made to me earlier, do you remember it?”

Subaru: “I remember, I remember, no being reckless! But, if push comes to shove…?”

Emilia: “See, doing that again would be too much to bear.”

With her lips curled into a frown, Emilia pouted at Subaru while he scratched his own cheek.

Chuckling at the sight of that, Halibel seemed to be really enjoying himself. Even though what awaited him might be a battle for the Empire's—or perhaps, the world's very existence, he steeled his resolve.

???: "Halibel-dono, I'm suuure~ you don't want Subaru-kun to heeear~ that."

Beatrice: "There he is, in fact."

???: "Of course, since we're together, why would I not be heeere~. Though I do wish that the Empire would recognize me as an ally, alreeeady~."

Shrugging his shoulders in disbelief, Roswaal chuckled at Beatrice's attitude.

As he appeared at the edge of the camp where the dragon carriage was parked, Emilia tilted her head at him while asking "Are you sure?".

Since Roswaal was currently more or less in charge of intelligence in the Emilia Camp, he was supposed to be accompanying Abel as he was speaking with the representatives of the camps.

Emilia: "Even though I do consider Roswaal a proper ally, I wonder if other people like Abel share that sentiment…"

Roswaal: "If that's the case, then I'm in quite the bind since I don't seem to belong in the Kingdom nooor~ the Empire. —Don't fret, His Excellency Vincent is currently addressing the soldiers in the vicinity, and they've entered the phase of boosting their morale.. If anything, I would only be in the waaaay~."

Emilia: "Yes. That's good to hear. And don't worry, Roswaal's rightful place is at our side. Just so long as Roswaal doesn't try any tricks."

With parted lips, Emilia gave an angelic answer to Roswaal's self-deprecation.

However, Roswaal could only put on a wry smile at those words, not answering whether or not he would be up to any trouble, which was extremely telling.

Subaru: “But, I’m pissed that things are working out so perfectly for Abel’s triumphant return.”

As he said so, Subaru glanced toward the center of the camp, where he could hear the cheers of a multitude of Imperial Soldiers coming from that direction.

Instead of a morale-boosting shout to prepare for battle, the cheers were those of joy, coming from men who were so moved to be addressed directly by the Emperor whom they served.

It was not surprising that Abel’s sour look, which Subaru was not only familiar with but even tired of seeing, was something that most of the citizens of the Empire were not allowed to see up close.

Subaru: “If I was in the same position as those people, and I knew nothing but Emilia-tan’s face and name, how would I feel… oh, no, I’m going to cry just thinking about that.”

Emilia: “What’s wrong, Subaru, aren’t you supposed to be my Knight? Get a hold of yourself!”

Subaru: “I know, you’re right! This isn’t a dream after all! Man, that was a close call, all because of Abel.”

With a quiet remark that would have made Abel frown if he could hear it, Subaru welcomed the fact that the Emperor-like idea was having the desired effect in itself.

Then again, in an effort to raise the morale of the Imperial Soldiers, after the war ended, Medium was also being shown off as a potential Empress without any consideration for her feelings, so one could not help but hold off with the praise.

Subaru: “With Spica constantly staying by her side, Medium-san can hopefully get her mind off it all a bit… that bastard, what the hell does he think marriage is?”

Emilia: “That’s right. I think Abel is reaaally smart, but that part of his views is not that good, I think.”

Subaru: “He should get kicked off the throne for doing this.”

Subaru and Emilia nodded in unison, agreeing that Abel was hopeless in that regard. At the sight of the two of them, as Halibel chuckled again,

Halibel: “Facin’ off against the Vollachian Emperor, them kids sure don’t know fear.”

Beatrice: “No matter who the opponent is, as long as Betty is with Subaru, there’s no reason for him to be afraid, I suppose.”

Tanza: “Having rejected Yorna-sama, it is a well-known fact that His Excellency the Emperor is heartless.”

Roswaal: “Truly, we wouldn’t want the people of the Empire to hear this conversaaation~.”

Within the camp roused with excitement regarding the Emperor’s triumphant return, where speaking ill of the Emperor would inevitably lead to bloodshed, Roswaal chuckled amidst the sharp comments being made towards Abel. With a wry smile, Roswaal closed one eye and said, “So”,

Roswaal: “Since he hasn’t shown up despite all this talk, Garfiel seems to be quite focused. —After having been selected by Subaru-kun for a grand task, it seems like he’s sufficiently moootivated~.”

Subaru: “—Right.”

With the yellow eye that remained open, Roswaal turned his gaze toward Subaru, who nodded in response to his words.

Garfiel, who was not participating in the conversation with Subaru and the others at the moment, was currently inside the dragon carriage that was tethered to Patrasche, quietly meditating and sharpening his concentration.

It was evidence that he was doing his utmost to meet Subaru’s expectations with all of his might. —To meet the expectations of Subaru, who had requested him to match up against the Cloud Dragon, Mezoreia.

Subaru: “It’s got agility, and its destructive power is overwhelming, so I want to do something to contain Mezoreia’s movements. Currently, Garfiel is the one most suited to being entrusted with that duty.”

Halibel: “Can I ask why that is? Lil’ Ana told me to follow y’all’s instructions for the time bein’, but… I’m stronger than that tiger cub, y’know?”

In response to Subaru’s judgment, Halibel tilted his head as he puffed out smoke.

If he felt angered by the notion that his abilities were being underestimated, there might have been a need for Subaru to come up with an excuse, but Halibel’s manner of speech remained flat.

He had purely voiced a question regarding their fighting potential, and as Subaru automatically pulled back his chin,

Subaru: “There’s no doubt that Halibel-san is the strongest among our current members. But, it’s a matter of putting the right person in the right place… rather, there’s someone else I’d like Halibel-san to subdue.”

Halibel: “Golly, what a frightenin’ story. Puttin’ off a Dragon ta focus somewhere else… are ya sayin’ there’s somethin’ even more troublesome than the Dragon?”

Subaru: “In a sense, yeah.”

Knowing that there was no use in beating around the bush, Subaru clearly affirmed this.

Upon hearing Subaru’s assertion, Halibel momentarily closed his mouth. But, his large mouth, characteristic of wolfpeople, immediately twisted into a smile,

Halibel: “I see, I see. Well then, I gotta get myself pumped up too.”

With that, he accepted Subaru's instructions, showing a willingness to comply.

Emilia: "Garfiel and Halibel-san… in addition, there's also places you want the rest of us to go, and things you want us to do."

Once Subaru and Halibel's exchange came to a close, Emilia, with a serious expression, looked at Subaru. As she touched the magic crystal at her chest with her fingers, her amethyst eyes pierced through him.

Emilia was not the only one. Beatrice, Tanza, and Roswaal were also looking in his direction.

Subaru: "That's right. For everyone here… including Abel's group on the other side, it'll be an all-out war."

Beatrice: "—. Fortunately, Subaru has a general idea of the enemy's whereabouts, in fact."

Emilia: "Indeed. Um, he also used it at the Pleiades Watchtower, that special power called an Authority."

Subaru: "Yeah. It's thanks to that."

In response to Emilia and Beatrice's words, Subaru pounded his chest with his fist.

The achievements of Cor Leonis that were displayed at the Pleiades Watchtower—grasping the whereabouts of separated companions, which helped them deal with problems inside the tower, was what Subaru had made Emilia and the others believe in.

The enemies waiting in the Imperial Capital of Lupugana—in order to oppose those formidable foes, Subaru had made them believe in the "lie" of how he had acquired the knowledge of the best choices regarding where to send each person.

Subaru: "—I will do what I can."

Emilia, Beatrice, Spica, Tanza, Garfiel, Roswaal, Halibel, Abel, Medium, Jamal, Olbart, he would direct them all.

Making use of every card available in his hand, in order to emerge victorious in this battle for the Imperial Capital—.

Subaru: “Of course, I’m counting on you too, Patrasche.”

Reaching out, Subaru once again stroked Patrasche’s neck, who neighed in response.

As everyone’s spirits were being heightened at that sound of Patrasche’s voice—

Roswaal: “—Subaru-kun, this is the best course of action, correct?”

Firmly, Roswaal trained his gaze on Subaru’s face.

To Roswaal’s inquiry, Subaru gave a deep nod, and answered.

Subaru: “Yeah, this should be the best. —I’ve gone and made sure of it.”

This, was merely Natsuki Subaru doing what he was capable of.

Thus, this should not be a breach of his promise with Emilia to “not overdo himself”; so he thought.

Chapter 45: How to Fell the Stars

1

—Thus once again, time returned to the same time as when a battlefield was formed by the fray between tiger and Dragon.

Having stormed the southern gate of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, the first bastion of the star-shaped fortress, Garfiel clashed against the one who ruled the heavenly skies, the Cloud Dragon, Mezoreia.

In the distance, the oddly thick collection of clouds in the sky was either proof that the Cloud Dragon was rampaging, or perhaps that it was preparing to exhibit its maximum performance.

Either way, the die had been cast, and the battle for it to roll onto the desired side had begun.

Entrusting Garfiel to spearhead the raid, having him suppress Mezoreia at the onset, was because the mobility and aggression of the Cloud Dragon served as the greatest obstacle in the battle to capture the Imperial Capital.

A single blow from the Dragon, capable of fleeing to high altitudes and attacking over extremely long distances by way of its breath, would be impossible to endure for those who did not possess extraordinary fighting strength.

For that to be fired at them recklessly, being unable to do a single thing about it would be the worst possible outcome for the “Rescue the Vollachian Empire from Destruction Squad”. —Garfiel had been able to crush that possibility.

However, even if Mezoreia was subdued, by no means would the rest be smooth sailing.

If there was a mistake in their response, there were other “formidable enemies” that could unleash catastrophic damage in a single move.

Therefore—

???: “ORAHHHHHHH!!”

Contrary to that vulgar warcry, twin swords carved out an elegant trajectory.

With swordsmanship that covered his front and rear with nimble movement and a dexterous stance, he forcefully parried the tip of the halberd the opponent had thrust forth, and caused their posture to break.

That instant, a fluttering drawn blade cut through the wind to fatally sever the opponent’s neck—

???: “You idiot, don’t kill them!”

???: “Uuoooh?!”

As the interjecting voice tried to restrain him, the trajectory of his sword immediately shifted.

The blade that ought to have beheaded the opponent bisected their left arm from their shoulder instead; having suffered the attack, the enemy swiftly jumped back, and handling their halberd with just their right hand, they tried to start their next attack.

But, that halberd would not reach any of his allies.

???: “—The White Cloud Lord, Gaoran Peyshit.”

Gaoran: “…”

The quiet, yet clearly audible, voice of a man spoke both the name and alias of the undead.

At that moment, the movement of this large white-bearded undead that ought to have thrust the halberd forward was stopped. Without overlooking that opportunity, a row of three small figures got right up close to the undead.

Then, they locked eyes with the undead as he looked down at them. —They stared into the eyes detached from those of the living, with the white parts stained black, and golden irises looming within.

And then—

???: “Gaoran Peyshit!!”

???: “E ea.”

Stripping that off, that of a being who was once alive, as if to ascertain it as proof of the time they had been alive, the star known as Spica ate the role that exploited them as an undead.

Passing by him with speed that seemed to whittle the street down, behind Spica who had just touched him with her small hand, having had his role eaten, the undead—no, Gaoran Peyshit’s body was reduced to dust.

Gaoran: “…”

In the end, thrusting his halberd into the ground as he crumbled, he bowed to the man who had called his name.

Though, it was unclear just what sort of emotions had caused the fading undead to do so.

???: “Atlem Nevi, Diphone Trevola, Gaion Talfou, Lescar Bhrain, Niolf Tradd, Yaren Swoker, Vellum Joytoh—”

The same voice that had called out Gaoran’s name, called out other names one after another.

The speed made it feel like they were just listing every single name that came to mind, but that was not the case. Those were the names of people who had each certainly had their own individual life.

Those were the names of the undead appearing one after the other in order to intercept the “Rescue from Destruction Squad” moving through the Imperial Capital—.

They, whose state and appearance had completely changed from the time they were alive, the black-haired Emperor—Vincent Vollachia would say their names without mistaking even a single person, and light the path for Star Eating to devour.

And what was especially aggravating about that was—

???: “Isn’t that a little too cool, dammit!”

???: “In that case, Betty can’t let her Subaru lose, I suppose!”

As Subaru’s cheeks contorted upon seeing Abel imposingly fulfill his duty, Beatrice pulled his hand.

In the midst of the Imperial Capital where the undead roamed—no, in the midst of Lupugana, now transformed into the Undead Capital, she guided Subaru with her unchanged appearance and unchanged love; waving the hem of her splendid dress, Beatrice truly was reliable.

Pointing the hand opposite to the one firmly fastened to Subaru’s towards the street, she weaved magic with her cute lips and lovely voice towards the deceased individuals blocking the way.

Beatrice: “El Minya!!”

At the same time as the incantation, amethyst crystals were yielded from Beatrice’s palm and glided through the air; dispossessing the undead of their arms, legs, and weapons, it reduced their fighting strength.

Beatrice’s Yin Magic could attack the undead in a unique way, but fully shattering their opponents went against the goal of their strategy.

That was why they intentionally tuned it down; borrowing the power of his lovely partner, Subaru leaped forward. Then, on the opposite side of the right hand linked to Beatrice—as he pulled up the left hand linked to Spica with all his might,

Subaru: “Here we go! Atlem Nevi, Diphone Trevola, Gaion Talfou, Lescar Bhrain, Niolf Tradd, Yaren Swoker—”

Spica: “Au! Uu! U~u! Aau! Uau! Uu~uu~!”

The names Abel had called out, accurately listing them in the correct order, while matching them to the faces of each undead who were turning hostility towards them, he made sure Spica reached them without fail.

Spica also understood her own role, and with her outstretched hands as the undead approached, sometimes she touched, sometimes she pierced, sometimes she firmly struck, and sometimes she pushed, but in all cases, she activated the Authority of Star Eating—.

Subaru: “Last one! Vellum Joytohhh!!”

Spica: “E ea!”

From the fore came a sword slash that aimed to split Subaru’s forehead open, and exchanging glances with the pale, wrinkly face of the undead who had unleashed it—Vellum Joytoh, Subaru clenched his molars.

Just before it could reach his forehead, the opponent’s blade was stopped by crystallization which extended from their shoulders to their hips, making them unable to move at will.

Grateful to Beatrice for providing covering fire, Subaru urged Spica, and her hand touched Vellum’s chest.

Then slowly, the undead turned to dust with a look of satisfaction on its face.

Subaru: “Buh, hah…”

Ascertaining that they had neutralized all the undead in the surroundings, including Vellum, Subaru deeply sighed.

This close combat similar to crossing a bridge gave Subaru a vivid reminder of the violent days he had spent on the Gladiator Island. With a deep inhale, Subaru was patted on the back by Spica, who looked at him with an “Aau~?”, and then he exhaled.

Contrary to Spica, Beatrice placed her hands on her hips and glared at Subaru,

Beatrice: “You’re blindly charging in too much, in fact! Betty told you she wants to see you look cool while making great efforts, I suppose. Even if you die in a cool manner, Betty doesn’t want to see it, in fact.”

Subaru: “I know. Just now was a move that presumed Beako would follow up. I’m sorry I did such a thing.”

Beatrice: “…If you understand, that’s fine, I suppose.”

As Subaru apologized upfront, Beatrice, who was in scolding mode, pouted her lips.

Though they could not hold a long evaluation meeting on the battlefield, her expression was nevertheless that of disappointment. However, it was not as though he had half-mindedly let it in one ear and out the other. Beatrice’s scolding was advice he ought to firmly take.

Even now, he was just about to have his forehead split open and die. If he had taken just one step further; the thought made him shudder. —Such a death would have been useless.

Vincent: “You nearly died by rushing out as soon as the battle had commenced. Do not act rashly.”

Subaru: “You…”

Scolded by Beatrice, and appreciated by Spica, Subaru grimaced as he turned around at that statement which lacked any consideration. Standing there with arms folded, Abel did not even pretend to help Subaru and the other two with their hard fighting.

Subaru was rather impressed to see the refreshing sight of the Emperor relying on others.

Subaru: “All sorts of things have happened up until now, but I’ve never thought of you as Emperor-like as I do now.”

Vincent: “We have just settled a bit of work. For the sake of the two by your side, I shall overlook that comment.”

Subaru: “You know, it’s best if you properly understand that from an outsider’s point of view, you look like the horrible nobility role that merely folds his arms and watches as children go to battle.”

An Emperor spectating a battle between children and undead was a sight akin to the unsightly amusement of a post-apocalyptic world after a zombie pandemic. There were limits to how bad one’s reputation could get.

But, considering Abel’s position, role, and fighting strength, as someone traveling alongside him, Subaru had to be grateful that he did not imprudently go to the front lines, so this was quite the dilemma.

And, thereupon—

???: “Tch, we dealt with the lookout right after entering the Imperial Capital, but… with this method, there’s no helping that it’s gonna take a while.”

Speaking thus, it was Jamal who provokingly spat onto the ground.

Having taken on many undead, he had contributed greatly to the triumphs at the outbreak of the battle; holding onto his twin swords, he adjusted his eyepatch while surveying the surroundings.

Jamal: “Even though this’d be much faster if we just cut down every undead that appeared. Why ain’t we doing that?”

Beatrice: “…A man who persistently doesn’t listen, in fact. If we did that, we wouldn’t be able to use Spica’s Authority to give the undead “Joubutsu”.”

Jamal: “Ahh? The hell is joubutsu?”

Beatrice: “It’s the way of making sure the undead don’t keep getting back up after being defeated repeatedly, in fact! This should have been explained to you so many times by now, I suppose!”

Beatrice stomped her short legs on the ground in frustration, and Jamal made a confused face at her appeal. That reaction only made Beatrice's face get more red, but unfortunately, it was not worth the effort as Jamal's head rejected any slightly complicated reasoning, no matter how many times it was explained to him.

For that reason—

Vincent: "Jamal Aurélie, obey these individuals. That is the best course of action, for I have judged it myself."

Jamal: "If Your Excellency says so, I'll do whatever you want!"

Beatrice: "Grrrr, in fact…!"

In the end, Abel had butted in presenting a tasty treat, and Jamal responded with money at the ready; seeing that, Beatrice ground her teeth in frustration. How cute.

As that exchange had put Subaru at ease a little, Spica stopped patting his back, and gazed at him.

Spica: "Uau?"

Subaru: "Ah, I'm fine. How about you, Spica, is there anywhere that feels weird or anything?"

Spica: "Uu! Aauu!"

When asked, Spica made a face that conveyed her crisp feelings, and in order to give Subaru peace of mind, she puffed out her chest with an appeal of how well she was doing. Since it seemed like there was no lie in her appearance, Subaru tightened his fist at the fact that Star Eating was not causing any harm to Spica, and at the fact that their operation was progressing.

Seeing Subaru's side profile, Abel narrowed his sable eyes, and,

Vincent: "Though it is resentful, it seems your judgment was right on the mark."

Subaru: "I don't get why that would make you resentful, but about what exactly?"

Vincent: "Need I even say? —The main force of the enemy's army is headed for the Fortified City, where the majority of our military assets remain. What lingers in the Imperial Capital is a portion of the undead, and soldiers unfit for war."

Subaru: "…Right. They left behind the guys who can't act cooperatively. I hate how each and every one of them is strong, but that poor Imperial Way thing is advantageous for us."

Surveying the state of the Imperial Capital, Abel made such a judgment, and Subaru nodded in agreement.

As Abel had said, the main forces of the undead were laying siege to the Fortified City of Garkla as a large army. Those who stayed behind were confined to the strong city fort, and were drawing the attention of the opponent—if they put in as much effort as they could, there was hope that the numerical disadvantage at the Imperial Capital would be mitigated.

The nature of this strategy was a blitzkrieg to defeat the ringleader in the Imperial Capital while the enemy was distracted by the Fortified City.

However, if the enemies at the Fortified City had an emphasis on "quantity", then the emphasis in the Imperial Capital was that of "quality".

Starting with the Cloud Dragon, Mezoreia, which covered the skies of the Imperial Capital, the rest of the fighters left behind for the city's defense were each a match for a thousand, all of them transcendent beings possessing stupendous power.

That was precisely why—

Subaru: "—By attacking each bastion at the same time, we have a second-stage diversion."

As Subaru spoke those words, Abel, Beatrice, and Spica tightened their expressions.

Currently, Subaru and his group were in the northwest of the Imperial Capital—in the vicinity of the fifth bastion. He had heard that it was through Garfiel's achievements in the battle for the Imperial Capital that the star-shaped wall had been greatly destroyed here.

He could not fathom just how reliable Garfiel had become in such a short period of time, but entering through the gigantic landmark he had made was the combination of Subaru & Beatrice with Spica, along with the rugged lord and retainer duo of Abel and Jamal—generally, it appeared as if their division was unreliable in terms of fighting strength, but this was actually the best possible configuration.

With anything other than this combination, the operation of the "Rescue from Destruction Squad" would certainly fail.

However, even if they went with this formation, it amounted to nothing more than them simply standing at the starting line.

Subaru: "We're the arrow of the main objective, and there's no doubt that our target is that massive Crystal Palace. Even if someone other than us were to quarrel with Sphinx, she could just run away, so there'd be no point."

Spending many long months and years, this was a being who had rampaged both the Kingdom and the Empire. If they failed to catch the one behind the Great Disaster, Sphinx, what kind of disaster she would plan next was not something they knew.

In order to defeat Sphinx, who had turned into an undead, Spica's Star Eating was the only method.

But—

Jamal: "Then, before more needless nuisances get in our way, let's make a mad dash for the Crystal Palace and fucking kill the boss of the enemy. Then with His Excellency's declaration, we'll have retaken the Imperial Capital!"

Spica: "Uu~ uu~!!"

Subaru: “While that would be ideal, it’s not that simple.”

Jamal: “Ahhn?”

Spica: “Aauu?”

Pointing his sword to the Crystal Palace, considered to be the base of the enemy, Jamal’s enthusiasm earned Spica’s agreement. Having their vigor discouraged, they turned to the one who had discouraged them, Subaru.

However, Subaru slowly shook his head sideways,

Subaru: “There’s not a chance we can head straight for the Crystal Palace. We actually shouldn’t even heedlessly get close to it.”

Jamal: “Bastard, don’t tell me you’re chickening out…”

Beatrice: “There is also no chance that weak-heartedness is his reason, I suppose. What awaits there, in fact?”

Subaru: “—A curse. Because of that, merely approaching the palace will make us unable to move.”

Interrupting Jamal as he ground his teeth in anger, Beatrice looked at Subaru and received that response. He firmly placed his hand on his chest, as if he was remembering an unavoidable, unbearable pain.

As long as that obstruction remained, they could not approach the palace. —If anything, nobody in this Imperial Capital would be able to operate in a proper manner.

Jamal: “Why do you say so much about something you haven’t even done yourself? Ahh?”

Of course, there were also some who could not swallow Subaru’s explanations so easily.

Jamal was at the top of that list. Different from Emilia and Beatrice, there was no such trust between them so that he could believe Subaru without asking anything like where Subaru’s ideas came from.

And, the same thing could be said about Abel.

Between Subaru and Abel, too, there was no trust similar to that which he had with Emilia and the others.

Therefore, Abel would—

Vincent: “Within this conduct, which seems reckless and roundabout at first glance, your intentions are present.”

Jamal: “Your Excellency?!”

Vincent: “Restrain yourself, Jamal Aurélie. There shall not be a third time. Obey these individuals—this individual.”

Emperor Vincent Vollachia did not have trust in Subaru, but he had judged Subaru’s actions and intentions by his own ingenuity.

At the repeated order from the Emperor, Jamal widened his single eye and fell silent, then he struck the hilts of his twin swords into his forehead. Striking, striking, striking so much that blood spilled from his forehead,

Jamal: “—Understood. I will absolutely not cause you to say it a third time.”

With all hesitation having vanished from his face, he gave a deep bow.

At Jamal’s answer, Vincent nodded, and as Beatrice’s eyes became angered,

Beatrice: “Why would you injure yourself, I suppose?! It needs to be healed right away, in fact!”

Jamal: “Ahh?! Shit, don’t do anything unnecessary pipsqueak! This is part of my oath…”

Beatrice: “Even though you only have a single eye, what would you do if blood got into that eye, I suppose?! There’s nothing but people who don’t think about the consequences of their actions, so it’s tough on Betty, in fact!”

As they loudly argued, Beatrice quickly healed the wound on Jamal’s forehead.

To the side of that exchange, Abel glanced at Subaru once again with a “Well then”,

Vincent: “If we cannot enter the palace like this, are we to silently wait for the others to deal with their matters, and create a path for us? That is not what you have in mind, is it?”

Subaru: “You’re speaking like you’re asking me to show you what I’ve got… There’s an important purpose in our fighting as well.”

Responding to the inquisitive gaze, Subaru placed his hand on the head of Spica at his side. As Spica, the keystone of the strategy, stared at him with an “Uu?”, and Subaru gave her a nod.

To thoughtlessly charge into the Crystal Palace was suicide, but having said that, there was no way for Subaru to work against the “curse”. Currently, nobody could get inside the palace.

Even so, if they wanted to square off against Sphinx, who was inside the palace, there was only one thing they could do.

Subaru: “And therefore—”

Indeed, as Subaru was about to speak, a sound of destruction suddenly jolted everyone’s eardrums.

Several buildings collapsed, and as smoke and rubble were scattered about, the structure of the street was being altered. As Subaru’s group all quickly turned to where the sound had come from, Beatrice and Jamal, who had been quarreling, stood to protect Subaru and Abel as they could not fight, and scowled at the eruption of smoke.

Then, at the tip of all their vigilant gazes, appearing from behind the smoke was—

Jamal: “…As expected, being His Excellency’s guard ain’t gonna be easy.”

Seeing the being that had emerged from within the smoke, Jamal’s cheeks contorted as he spilled out that comment.

Subaru and the rest held no objection to Jamal’s words. After all, his feelings were more or less the same as what everyone else was also feeling.

???: “—Oooo.”

As a sound akin to wind escaping from a deep, eerie cavern was produced, a grotesque figure dragged its body along as it proceeded through the Imperial Capital. It might have originally had the form of a person, but both the number and form of its limbs were far removed from its original state; it was a figure akin to how a young child would paint by freely moving the brush as they pleased to depict their parent for the very first time, an embodiment of innocence and chaos.

It swung its oddly long right arm, branching at its joints, like a beast’s tail, and it used its large but short left arm to grip the ground and drag its torso forward. On the contrary, it seemed to have four meager legs, but they did not function well, so it languidly continued by dragging itself with its arms.

The thickness of the grotesque being’s body completely varied at the chest, abdomen, and shoulders, but only the part which seemed to be the head had a single, large golden eye in its center—.

Beatrice: “—Subaru.”

Subaru: “Yeah, I know.”

His name having been called out by Beatrice, Subaru nodded to signal she need not speak any further.

The strange, grotesque being, this was not the first time Subaru and his friends had encountered it. A reunion with that which he had thought had surely been finished off with the dust explosion—

???: “—Ó̸̡̞Ǒ̖Ô̡̭Ȍ̶̟!!”

Without even the time to wipe his cold sweat as that fact was fully conveyed to him, the defective undead opened its mouth which seemed to have been torn open, and gave a loud, loud bellow.

2

—Then, at the same time Subaru and Abel’s team squared off against a grotesque being.

Shortly after the battle for the Imperial Capital, the Imperial Capital of Lupugana was transformed into a battlefield once again.

For the battle concerning the Empire, while the ones casting their moves upon the board may have changed, the essence of the conflict remained ever the same. To take the head of the one who ruled over the beautiful palace towering in the innermost core of the Imperial Capital, the Crystal Palace, was the aim of this decisive battle.

That was not just in the case of the victory condition; even the way the battle must progress remained the same—that was to say, the star-shaped fortress that enclosed the Imperial Capital, fighting for control of its five bastions, would determine victory and defeat.

Ergo—

???: “I ain’t done yet! “No winning chance in hell Ifluse” is only just gettin’ started, ya nosebleedin’ Dragon!”

Neglecting the pain with his fighting spirit and morale, trying to respond to an unyielding faith, the boy set his very body and soul alight and challenged a legend.

???: “Bear witness, Observers of the heavens above. —Witness the choices the world shall make.”

Reciting the verse with pretensions, guising himself with a smile, as he danced on the boundary of what was both characteristic and uncharacteristic of himself, the lightning of childish form cut towards the overflowing second sun together with the personification of refusing to give up.

???: “—At last. At long last, I was able to meet you again.”

With a voice unable to conceal her delight, the kimono-clad girl with antlers on her head, accompanied by snow, arrived at the predicament of the treasured person whom she had eagerly awaited a reunion with.

???: “Jeez, I won’t let you go off wherever you please anymore. Come and talk to me properly, Ballebro.”

Straining the expression that was typically as bright as the sun, the girl who had settled her resolve for this cruel reunion, receiving help from a magician, locked eyes with the dragon rider soaring across the heavenly skies.

And then—

???: “Golly, guess there really are some casters who got nasty personalities. —There ain’t an ounce of love in this.”

Clad in a black kimono and black fur, the repulsive beast, presented with a curse far more repulsive than his own existence, laid bare irises of golden hue that had previously been concealed by the thread-like thinness at which he usually kept the opening of his eyes.

And thus, on the decisive battle for the Imperial Capital, on the siege of the five bastions, on the battle to fell the very stars, the curtain now truly rose.

Chapter 46:
The Taste of the Wind

1

—Projected within a shimmering blue jewel, was a scene of glimmering flames that seemed like the end of the world.

Locked and confined in a dungeon, before the eyes of the hanging Priscilla, being projected by the deathly pale-skinned Sphinx, was the fierce battle that was happening in one of the vertices of the Imperial Capital.

On the one hand, taking in the very core of the Empire for oneself, while on the other, fighting against a formidable foe and standing one’s ground, the reality of these two extraordinary circumstances coming together was already for the verses of legends.

As such, the many songs and stories that have been passed down from long ago were themselves thought to have been born in this way.

???: “—However, that is only if there remains someone to pass along what they saw and heard.”

???: “Do not force your desires on others, much less upon mineself. When boorishness reaches its zenith, even getting angry is irksome.”

While witnessing the same scene within the jewel, such was Priscilla’s response to her addressee’s weak in enthusiasm words.

Weak. Yes, it was a voice that was weak in passion. Not completely lacking passion, just weak. Feeling so, with her shapely eyebrows drawn into a frown, Priscilla observed the person beyond the jewel.

The undead confronting her—Sphinx, who had introduced herself as the ringleader of the Great Disaster, had expressly come down to meet Priscilla, as if to flaunt the tragic situation in which Arakiya, with whom Priscilla held deep ties, was presently in.

Priscilla did not know what exactly Sphinx imparted to Arakiya while she was captured and isolated. But, the result was reflected in the jewel, and the purpose of doing so was before her eyes.

Arakiya was on the verge of exploding while trying to hold on to an existence that was too great for her, and Sphinx was observing Priscilla as she witnessed Arakiya's suffering.

By those golden pupils the black was vanquished, as they hinted at a curiosity that failed to be fully concealed, as well as a tinge of expectation.

Sphinx had an expectation. —That Arakiya's suffering would cause Priscilla's heart to waver.

Without a doubt—

Priscilla: "—You are obsessed with mineself."

Locking eyes with Priscilla who had spun it that way, Sphinx parted her lips without saying a word.

It was a confirmation, an expression of delight. Thus, being that the very impetus behind the Great Disaster, Sphinx's obsession with Priscilla was unquestionable.

Although how that originated was still unclear, any deed motivated by obsession was something to be despised.

Sphinx: "To have something that was bestowed, forcibly taken away. It is an extremely heart-rending feeling, such is my learning from observation. How will it affect you? Confirmation: Required."

Priscilla: "Your wishes are being fulfilled. Are you in high spirits?"

Sphinx: "It is true. I affirm it. As you said, I feel a sense of elation. I used to take for granted that everything would proceed according to the plans made in advance, but… my past self should have understood this sense of accomplishment. In that case, the outcome of the Demi-Human War would have been different."

Priscilla: "…"

Sphinx: "—But, that would mean that I could neither give, nor could I earn anything."

Taking a glance at Priscilla, Sphinx, who had been speaking with great eloquence, placed a hand over her own chest, and cast her gaze downward as if reflecting upon something.

There, noticing an emotion that was different from both joy and wrath directed towards her, Priscilla understood.

It was a figure that invoked a sense of mournful sorrow. —And, it was also what drove Sphinx to instigate the Great Disaster.

Priscilla: "…"

Setting aside her thoughts about Sphinx's motivations, Priscilla once again directed her attention to the scene projected in the jewel.

Regardless, the battle that unfolded on the battlefield was one that could completely change the very state of the world, a clash between what could be said was the embodiment of the Empire itself, against ineluctable lightning.

However, in the midst of it all, Priscilla had not failed to notice the weakness, which seemed to vanish into thin air.

Priscilla: "Weak, fragile, timid, born with nothing and resisting the notion of becoming anything; can such a one leave traces in the verses of myths?"

Sphinx: "What do—"

Priscilla, who averted her gaze, prompted Sphinx's consciousness to wonder what she saw in the jewel. However, she did not try to ascertain the true nature of what caught Priscilla's attention.

The reason was that earlier, tremors that could reach even the underground dungeons had erupted in various parts of the Imperial Capital.

Priscilla: “I presume that must be my elder brother.”

Sphinx: “Emperor Vincent Vollachia?”

Puzzled by the situation, Sphinx furrowed her slender eyebrows at Priscilla’s murmur.

For her, that possibility was not particularly high. Priscilla in the underground dungeon had no way of knowing what was the total number of forces Sphinx had at her disposal.

The Emperor, who once abandoned the Imperial Capital, found a way to break through the hordes of the undead.

Sphinx: “The swordsman who ended my life is in the midst of a one-on-one battle with General First-Class Arakiya… Even if the Emperor of Vollachia is a wise man, there are situations where one cannot overturn a hopeless board. —No.”

With a finger running along her lips, Sphinx tried to dispel worrisome possibilities. However, in the midst of that contemplation, she narrowed her black eyes.

And—

Sphinx: “—The foreign entity that prevented Valga’s stratagem, was involved?”

Priscilla: “Ho, did something come to your mind?”

Sphinx blurted out as if suddenly realizing.

Putting her thoughts into words, she then immediately denied them by shaking her head. At that time, Priscilla deliberately interjected.

The moment Sphinx glanced over, Priscilla, smiling enchantingly,

Priscilla: “Hastening when it does not stand to reason? If that is the case, then mineself shall give you “advyce”. —Call it intuition, what you have taken a hold of.”

Sphinx: “Intuition…”

Priscilla: “Think of it as the taste of the wind sensed by your heart. It may be ironic for the dead.”

Snorting in response, Sphinx fell silent, pondering Priscilla’s words.

Neither dismissing with laughter nor dismissively rejecting was in line with her innate habit—calling it innate was also ironic, but Sphinx continued to contemplate regardless of the concept of life and death.

Eventually, she slowly looked up—

Sphinx: “Let us acknowledge it. There is a foreign entity that could disrupt my plan. —Adjustment: Required.”

With Sphinx, standing in front of her, admitting her own change, Priscilla also gazed upward.

What was visible was the dimly lit, dark ceiling of the underground dungeon, faintly illuminated by the light of the jewel, yet unable to conceal the weight of history.

However, it only served as evidence of the narrowness of the view.

Priscilla did not look up at the sky to inspect the dirty ceiling.

For her heart would not miss the opportunity to sense the taste of the wind.

2

—Having begun unexpectedly, and concluded pragmatically, the battle started anew sacrilegiously.

As innumerable swordsmen of the same face assailed her from all directions, Iris, after a moment of shock, shattered them head-on.

Iris: “Strange, yet it is nothing more than a paper tiger.”

As the dress-clad Iris swung her arms, the approaching blue-haired swordsmen—the group of Rowan Segmunts had their heads, torsos, hips, and legs mowed down, being blown away like leaves off a tree.

But, there was also a Rowan who had slipped past her initial attack, and made it to a distance at which his blade could reach her. As he threw himself at her with all his might, Iris easily intercepted the attack with two fingers, inclined her body to evade the sword, and swung down her upraised legs to shatter what remained of him.

It was quite literally a total beatdown, for even if he had amassed more numbers, he was not worthy as an opponent.

That was the difference in strength between Iris, and the undead-turned Rowan.

Only—

Rowan: “Next.” / “Kahaha.”

Iris: “…”

As the opponent who had been kicked senselessly sprang up one after the other, her thoughts froze.

Raising smiles of satisfaction as if to say they had placed their hands upon their desire, the men closing in—no, the group made up entirely of the same Rowan, turned their blades toward Iris.

Reflexively fighting back against the berserking sword slashes, while she was countering all of them—what flashed through Iris’s mind, was the guilt that she had erred.

By causing surrender through brute force, and chasing people away without taking lives, she had tried to decrease the number of casualties, even if only by a few.

Iris had ignored the fact that her arrogant ideals crushed the hearts of those who were dyed in the Imperial Way, likely causing them to suffer.

As a result, as a victim, Rowan’s state had become like this before her eyes.

Iris: “I am…”

Evading the swung blades, she struck her kiseru into several of the approaching faces. Kicking one of them up with the inside of her long leg, she grabbed the leg of the airborne body, and heartily slammed it towards the Rowans in the surroundings, blowing away another ten of them that were approaching.

However, no matter how much she struck and whittled them down, she did not know if the vigor of the reviving Rowans could be stopped.

Iris: “I am…!”

Having suffered Iris’s attack, the body of the undead Rowan shattered, unable to endure.

Rowan was shattered to pieces like a ceramic bowl, however the next Rowan trampled over him with his zori without paying him any mind, and was also shattered upon jumping in.

Repeating that so many times, it was the same as being placed in the position of an executioner with no end in sight.

By nature, there were some people who thought nothing of destroying things that took the form of people.

However, in most cases, the act of destroying the human form, the receptacle of life, was something that took great resolve and determination, or perhaps accustomation or resignation, in order to be possible.

Iris could be said to be the extreme of the latter case.

Now still, even if it was an opponent that showed hostility against her, she could not kill them without feeling any anguish in her heart.

For that reason, Iris had manifested the Soul Marriage Technique, a power that could not be mastered without compassion for others.

That was what had propelled Iris to the apex of strength known as the Nine Divine Generals, though its origins lay in the malicious miracle that fettered her soul to the vast lands of the Empire.

Either way, even if it was an aberrant existence like that of Rowan Segmunt, even if that was a being that would continue to appear no matter how many times it was shattered, it grated Iris's heart each time she shattered them.

Tormented by unbearable pain, as it intensely gnawed at her heart, Iris was laid bare.

Each time she plucked a life, each time she destroyed something with form, each time she made the world lose the way it currently was, lose something from how it was, Iris's soul would fissure, and she was laid bare.

Iris: "I am—hk."

And thus, the final destination of her fissured soul.

For Iris, who had unwillingly continued to live on for a long, long time; for Sandra Benedict, who had tragically lost her life giving birth to Prisca; for Yorna Mishigure, who was shaken by a beloved reunion after hundreds of years, this was an unknown state of mind —

Iris: "—ah."

A hoarse breath spilled from her red lips, and the next moment, blood sprayed.

As some of the splatter landed upon the cheek of the blade's wielder, he stretched out his tongue and licked up the blood.

A smile escaped. —The wicked smile of the swordsman, escaped.

Rowan: "—The steps of the Heavenly Sword, the tips of my toes are thus placed upon them."

3

The stretched-out arm slipped through, and the naked blade brushed the bare shoulder of the woman.

A beat later, the spray of blood dyed the gray street a vibrant hue, and the finest swordsmanship of Rowan's life —no, now that he was an undead, he was no longer alive, so the finest swordsmanship of Rowan's existence was renewed.

Rowan: “Not there yet, I'm still just getting started.”

However, as his heart had ceased to pulsate, that insatiable desire spurred his whole body forth in place of flowing blood, and the being known as Rowan evolved at an accelerated pace.

The beautiful fox lady he faced off against was dreadfully powerful. An unbelievably formidable enemy. The difference in strength that made it impossible for him to fight against her, easily smashed through the piling-up Rowans.

By all rights, Rowan's attempt to challenge her should have ended back when he was defeated. However, these strange circumstances threatening the Imperial Capital, the Empire, and the very world, had not put an end to Rowan.

Fastening a blade to his own neck, he gave up on his futile, worthless life.

Believing that there was a territory only reachable by casting away his life, he exerted his blade, knowing that he would rot away and fade to obscurity if he could not reach it, and when he did, Rowan's vision opened up in the truest sense.

Rowan: “Ahh, ahhh, AHHHH! What a plain world I've been seeing until now.”

Within his opened vision, the domain that he had reached during his lifetime with bloodshot eyes was easily surpassed by Rowan.

Life truly was useless. Life was not a good thing. Due to it being the first thing one is granted upon being born, even recluses like Rowan harbored an unwise attachment to it.

Only when he cast all of that away, did Rowan obtain the freedom to head for the Heavenly Sword.

Without a doubt, this lack of attachment was the precise qualification to ascend the steps to reach the Heavenly Sword.

Rowan: “Well now, take a gander, foolish son of mine. This’d be impossible for ya.”

This was a state that those who had lost their lives could finally reach.

That was to say, it was scenery that even Cecilus Segmunt, unable to conquer death, would never lay his eyes upon.

To think it could only be reached through dying, what a sadistic place for the Sword God to have placed the Heavenly Sword.

He had won his gamble. —Hence, he would receive his inflated winnings.

Rowan: “HahahahaHAhaHAHAhaHAHAHAHA!”

As Rowan roared with laughter, his swordsmanship began to reach heights that had once been so distant.

No matter how much the approaching Rowan swung his sword, he was felled time after time by the opposing Iris. Unable to reach her as she kicked the ground, he had become unable to stand up just from a blow by her slender arm.

Such an overwhelming disparity, began to be closed at an unbelievable pace.

—Here, the misfortune of the man known as Rowan Segmunt shall be narrated once more.

Rowan Segmunt held a long-cherished desire. Something he kept pursuing. A prayer he continued to long for.

However, he had never come across an opportunity to fulfill it; he had never come across a worthy opponent.

That had been the tragedy of Rowan Segmunt, a man who had been plagued by misfortune until his life came to an end.

—Here, the miracle of the man known as Rowan Segmunt shall be narrated.

Rowan Segmunt held a long-cherished desire. Something he kept pursuing. A prayer he continued to long for.

And, he had finally come across an opportunity necessary to fulfill it; he had finally come across a worthy opponent.

Without having lost his deluded obsession towards the Heavenly Sword even after death, Rowan Segmunt was reborn as an undead; no matter how many times he was shattered or not, he produced beings that shared the same soul one after the other, transforming him into a monster incomparable to the man he was during his lifetime.

There were cases when those who faced off against a formidable opponent, bearing witness to abilities far and above those of their own, and using the battle on which their life was staked as a source of nourishment, would experience rapid growth.

Rowan was trying to invoke that same phenomenon as a miracle within himself.

Facing off against the formidable enemy Iris, bearing witness to abilities far and above those of his own multiple times, and using the battle as a source of nourishment as he quite literally was shattered over and over; that was his current environment.

If Natsuki Subaru were here, he might have even dubbed that act of learning through death as “Learn by Death”.

The undead’s unusual obsession, combined with his desire to learn, resulted in Rowan’s sword being sharpened.

Having left behind the sword of his lifetime, the undead sword technique designed for killing—the work of the Undead Swordmaster, Rowan Segmunt, was hot on the heels of Iris's life.

Iris: "Uh, ah…"

Besieged from every conceivable direction, Iris could not deal with all the incoming sword attacks; her arms and sides were sliced by the blades, and she gave a slight groan as her blood spilled.

Hearing that frail breath, Rowan shook his head in disgust.

He did not want to hear it. He did not want to hear it. He did not want to hear the weakness of the strong.

Rowan was grateful to Iris. It was thanks to her that he had become strong. Dying itself was nothing more than an impetus. It was something that had been necessary for him, who was to eventually reach the Heavenly Sword. There was absolutely no need for Iris to worry over that.

After all, he did not want to hear it; after all, it was grating on his ears; after all, even though the one who was inferior was surpassing the one who was superior, what he wanted to hear was not weeping, but cheers.

Therefore—

Rowan: "Don't be crying now, young lady. You're making a mess of yer lovely visage."

Iris promptly hoisted her kiseru to block the sword being swung down from overhead, and with her opposite hand, she bore a hole right through the center of Rowan's torso.

That was the end of this Rowan. But, it mattered not. Another Rowan subsequently leaped out, and approached Iris as her hand was still stuck in the pierced Rowan until he fully crumbled.

Her leg sprang up and smashed that Rowan. She thus had one arm and one leg occupied. Then, as a Rowan thrust his sword from behind her, she quickly slammed her tail into him, but blood spurted from the base of her tail. The slashing attack had connected. Iris's expression contorted in pain. Not good. This was truly not good.

Rowan: "Won't ya also die and resurrect, to keep me company forever?"

That would truly be an exhilarating future, however it was likely a future that would not come to pass.

Iris: "…"

Rowan's gaze collided into Iris as he stepped forward, but her eyes were turned to another place, irrelevant to the life or death before her.

Her perspective was not that of the victory or defeat, the life or death in front of her, but something different, as if she were looking at the past, so to speak.

To those who look not at the future, but at the past, glory would not come.

That alone, from the very bottom of his empty, hollowed heart, Rowan regretted—

Rowan: "—Your life, is mine."

A silver flash was sprung at full speed, and as the finest swordsmanship of his existence was renewed, it bolted towards the woman's slender neck.

Then, an artistically brilliant beheading was enacted—or, it should have been.

Rowan: "Wha…"

Hindered by a firm, solid, stiff, and hard sensation, the sword technique reaping the life was stopped.

The woman who was a formidable enemy, who was the finest worthy opponent, who could even be called his teacher of sorts, as his brandishing of gratitude towards her was stopped, Rowan widened his black-stained golden eyes, and was struck with wonder.

It was regrettable that his attack had been stopped, but the person who had stopped his attack was another matter.

It was not Iris, whom he had recognized as a tough, formidable, and worthy opponent. It was not a latent strength that she had shown while in the grips of death, but rather an undoubtable interference.

???: "—Yorna-sama."

Indeed, calling out the name of a nobody, the young voice had obstructed Rowan's sword.

Through sheer force, a whole body wedged itself between them to stop the strong sword, but even so, from Rowan's perspective, that was something that should have been impossible.

Even if the entirety of that slender body was used to try and get in the way, the slashing attack ought to have had enough power put into it to completely bisect the body. And yet—

???: "You all have the same face, but everyone get out of the way!"

Subsequently, a voice akin to the sound of bells courageously resounded, and the sound of the atmosphere tensing rended the world.

That instant, flowers of ice blooming on the surface engulfed the surrounding scene in one fell swoop; Getting caught up within that, Rowan, Rowan, and the rest of the Rowans were turned into nourishment for the flowers.

Seeing his selves being frozen still in his peripheral vision, as Rowan jumped back and readied his katana, he gazed over what had occurred.

And there—

???: "—At last. At long last, I was able to meet you again."

In a quiet, yet deeply emotional voice, the antlered girl muttered as she held Iris in a tight embrace.

Shedding blood and having fallen to her knees, Iris was embraced in the thin chest of the short girl, and while her blue eyes widened in surprise, she accepted the embrace.

Then, the young girl who had hugged Iris turned her dark eyes to Rowan, and,

???: “Scoundrel who turns a blade to Yorna-sama, though I may be unworthy, I shall serve as your opponent.”

With that, the antlered girl had made a clear declaration.

Chapter 47:
Tanza

1

—This was a complex feeling, but just like Natsuki Schwartz, Tanza hated the Vollachian Empire.

The people of the Empire must be strong, such a way of thinking was given wondrous praise, and in accordance with it, those who lacked strength were oppressed, and even were they to lose their lives, it would be declared that their weakness was at fault.

The weak were unqualified to be people of the Empire. —If that were the case, she would like to be excused.

None could choose where they were born.

Therefore, neither Tanza nor anybody else had been born into the Vollachian Empire of their own volition.

Tanza hated the Vollachian Empire.

She hated the Empire that had taken her mother and father; the Empire that, for some incomprehensible reason such as the Imperial Way, had tortured her sister to death: the sister who had assiduously raised Tanza; the sister who had been relieved upon finally finding a place where they could live in peace; the sister whom Tanza should have been able to finally repay for everything she had done for her.

She was sure that had been why.

???: “Do you happen to hate this country?”

When posed that question, her expression which seldom showed emotion became stiff, and she held her breath.

Something which must not be noticed, a thought which must not be known, an ideology which one would naturally have from being ostracized; she thought it had been found out.

However, upon seeing Tanza cast down her eyes as she trembled, the beautiful woman who had seen through her heart smiled, and tenderly stroked Tanza’s stiffened cheek.

The warmth of those fingers felt similar to that of her sister, whom she had already lost.

It felt similar to that of her sister, who had devoted herself to Tanza without consideration for herself, who had died without knowing any happiness that seemed to be her own.

Woman: “I do, too.”

For a moment, not understanding what exactly that meant, Tanza was perplexed.

After that confusion, she comprehended what the woman’s words were expressing feelings about, and she gulped.

If a child like Tanza, unknowing of how things worked, were to say that, it would merely end with them being scolded and punished. However, this person was unlike them.

She was not merely an adult, for she was a person with status.

Within this Empire, that believed in strength, she was one of the nine people who were a symbol of strength—.

Woman: “—I, too, despise the ways of this country.”

Indeed, while giving a tender, affectionate smile, that person confided her true feelings in Tanza.

2

Tanza: “Please, send me to Yorna-sama. I wish to be by her side.”

In the battle on which the survival of the Empire was staked, she was aware that what she was asking was selfish.

That was why she had been prepared to endure all sorts of verbal abuse. Thinking that being spoken to in such a manner was unavoidable, that even if she were to be showered with cursing and scolding, she still needed to be honest with her feelings.

And even though she had thought that.

???: “—Yeah, that’s what I intend to do. Let her see your face well, and properly go talk to her.”

Despite always selfishly putting Tanza’s feelings on the backburner, only at a time like this did he speak to Tanza’s feelings directly, almost like he was giving her an order.

That was an aspect she disliked about this black-haired boy.

Tanza: “—Yorna-sama.”

And right after she had called that out, Tanza stretched out her small body as much as she could, and receiving the flash of silver head-on, she saved the precious woman who was about to be decapitated.

The shock ran through the entirety of her being, sending a tingling and numbing sensation to the tips of her limbs.

But, in order to hide the fact that she felt pain, she bit down on her molars. Not for the opponent who had unleashed the sword attack, but in order to hide it from the precious woman she had protected.

Tanza: “—Hk.”

Firmly stifling her cries of pain and her expression, she endured.

She usually found it frustrating, but at this time she was grateful for her cold face. It must have appeared like she had withstood it with a face as if to say that it was not a big deal.

Even though in truth, without the shield of ice concealed inside her kimono, she would have undoubtedly been split right in two.

???: “You all have the same face, but everyone get out of the way!”

Following Tanza's bluff, a courageous voice with a tone akin to silver bells could be heard.

The reason why Tanza had not been cleaved in twain, the one who had hidden an ice shield for her, the silver-haired half-elf—Emilia gallantly swooped down on the Imperial Capital, and pointed her hands at the rows of undead who bore the same face.

Right after, a high-pitched sound like that of cracking glass enveloped the area; clear ice had shot out of the ground, entrapping the undead one after another in glacial prisons.

The undead immediately either tried to jump away and escape, or tried to evade by ducking low, or tried to cut off the freezing with their swords. —But, those who had selected the correct answer were few.

Those who jumped, those who ducked, and those who drew their blades, were made part of the blooming ice flowers in the sky, on the ground, and with their drawn swords respectively, and were quite literally frozen in ice wherever they were.

Engulfing nearly twenty of the undead in their entirety, there were merely a few who had escaped.

She wished to exhaust her vocabulary in praise of that, but right now—

Tanza: "—At last. At long last, I was able to meet you again."

The severed shield of ice fell from her kimono, and diffused into mana before it could hit the ground.

Then, with the chest from which the hard sensation had been removed, Tanza embraced the head of the woman who had fallen to her knees. Even though Tanza had been held like this by her before, since she was a tall woman, it was the first time Tanza was embracing her in such a manner.

To be frank, she had thought it was embarrassing to have this kind of thing done to her.

She had thought it would not set a good example, and it was frustrating being treated like a child. But, she had never disliked it, and her thoughts on being treated like a child had also changed.

Was it not the case that Schwartz and Cecilus could do as they pleased, regardless of being small or being children.

Even if being a child became an obstacle when trying to do something, it was by no means a reason to give up. Tanza tried to return that to this person with her whole body.

Shedding blood, the woman whose blue eyes were widened in surprise—while embracing Yorna, Tanza turned her dark eyes to the enemy, to the nuisance who was getting in the way.

And then—

Tanza: “Scoundrel who turns a blade to Yorna-sama, though I may be unworthy, I shall serve as your opponent.”

With that clear declaration, she asserted her own standpoint.

Undead: “…”

Accepting Tanza’s proclamation, neither the undead men, nor Yorna, embraced in her chest, made a sound.

Were they perhaps shocked by the foolish action, or was it Tanza’s sudden arrival that was the reason for their shock? It mattered not either way, and Tanza readied herself while still holding Yorna.

Thereupon—

Emilia: “Teiryaa!”

Undead: “Uuooou?!”

Emilia’s sprinting attack was even faster than Tanza’s movements.

Stepping forth with her long legs, Emilia swung the ice mallets that she had created in both of her hands down on the motionless undead. The undead man who had been focused on Tanza was taken aback as he swept those aside, and he squared off against Emilia.

Emilia: “I’m the opponent of all of you!”

Undead: “Though, that lass over there just said she’d be my opponent?”

Emilia: “Right now, Tanza-chan has finally encountered Yorna-san, who she’s been longing to meet. You… you guys? You all have the same face, but… I won’t let you guys get in the way!”

Undead: “It might be difficult to understand, but even if there’s more, I’m me… Rowan Segmunt, the individual. Ain’t no need for ya to get confused over that.”

Emilia: “I won’t let you get in the way!”

Emilia produced twin swords of ice in her hands as she corrected herself, and the callously smiling undead—all of the multiple Rowans, took the same stance as they faced off against Emilia.

From behind, as Tanza tried to back her up with an “Emilia-sama!”,

Emilia: “It’s okay, you can talk to Yorna-san first. —Subaru requested this of me.”

Tanza: “…”

As Schwartz’s name came up, Tanza hesitated to speak.

During that time, Emilia left behind a smile as her expression shifted to a stiff one, and taking a step towards the Rowans who were readied with their katanas in their sheaths,

Emilia: “—Icicle Line.”

After Emilia’s lips spun those words, the surrounding scene was dyed with even more white.

Every color was mixed with a silvery white, and trying to counter the twin swords of the snow-clad Emilia, Rowan smiled in satisfaction—thereupon, an icicle storm assailed.

Rowan: “OHHHHH—?!”

Rowan: “OHHHHH—?!”

Emilia: “Here I come!”

Rowan, who seemed to have thought that a contest of swordsmanship was starting, while stupefied at the bombardment of ice, fought against Emilia’s incoming attacks.

The light ice weapons clashed with the undead’s katana, and the sword dance commenced.

In the background of that sword dance, Tanza depended upon Emilia’s consideration, and looked to Yorna once again. Still, her expression appeared as if she had not caught up with the situation.

Tanza: “This is the first time I have witnessed Yorna-sama make such a face.”

Yorna: “—Tanza, is that you?”

Tanza slightly lowered the corners of her eyes in happiness, and while staring at that face, Yorna spoke words with meaning for the first time since their reunion. At that question, Tanza nodded. Since their parting at Chaosflame, she had been separated from Yorna for nearly two months.

Since there had been no correspondence, it would have been natural for Yorna to have assumed that Tanza was dead.

Tanza: “However, I have remained safe and sound. For the sake of returning to Yorna-sama.”

Gazing back into Yorna’s eyes, she reassuringly spoke those words.

The words that had hit Yorna as her eyes quivered at this reality, for being something she had spoken herself, there was an unthinkable reassurance to it.

Maybe this had been due to the influence of the people who could say things without any pretensions.

It was proof that Tanza had been through all sorts of things in the two months she had been separated from Yorna—but, Tanza was not the only one who had changed, as so had Yorna.

Yorna was wearing a beautiful, blue dress. Without the kimono that Tanza was used to seeing, she was wearing her hair down; more so than giving excitement over the novelty, that appearance gave Tanza some misgivings.

It was not that she was skeptical of a change in tastes. Yorna's ornaments—the articles presented to her by the inhabitants of Chaosflame, the fact that she was not wearing them was suspicious.

The inhabitants who dwelled in the Demon City of Chaosflame, they all loved and respected Yorna very much.

In order to convey their heart of hearts, they would take parts of their unique features as demi-humans, something that served as the primary reason for them being ostracized, put them to good use, and design them as ornaments to present to Yorna.

Everything from hairpins to earrings, to obidome to pins or threads for her kimono, Yorna clad herself in the affection of Chaosflame's inhabitants, and had come to present herself in a majestic manner.

Among those were combs carved out from a part of Tanza's, and of Tanza's sister's horns.

Yorna: "Tanza…"

Her name called out by trembling lips, Tanza waited for Yorna's discomposure to subside.

She also wanted to assist Emilia as she fought Rowan, but right now before her eyes, she wanted to put all her energy towards sorting out Yorna's emotions. Nervously, Yorna's fingers reached out towards Tanza's cheek; after ascertaining that feeling, Tanza would exchange words with her.

However, Yorna's fingers did not come into contact with Tanza's cheek.

Tanza: "Yorna-sama?"

Just as they were about to touch, Yorna held back her fingers and tightly shut her eyes; instead, she pushed Tanza's chest, which had been embracing her, and sent her a step backwards.

Tanza and Yorna, after having finally embraced, the two of them were separated once again, and Tanza blinked her eyes. As Tanza could not decipher the intention behind that action, Yorna opened her mouth,

Yorna: "For what reason, have you come to a place such as this?"

Tanza: "…"

Yorna: "At present, this Imperial Capital is the Capital of the undead… this place that was abandoned not just by the soldiers of the Empire, but even by the Nine Divine Generals and the Emperor, what business does a girl like you have doing here?"

Getting up from her knees, Yorna glared at Tanza in a stern manner. Being stared down by those almond-shaped eyes, Tanza's slender shoulders slightly shrunk.

For a moment, she did not know what she had been told. But, she immediately understood that those were words of rejection.

Yorna, the compassionate woman who accepted all things, had rejected Tanza.

Yorna: "This place is far too harsh and savage for the living to be. It would be wise to leave at once. If you cannot, shall I send you off by my own hand?"

Tanza: "…If you are distinguishing between the living and the dead, then for Yorna-sama too, that condition is…"

Yorna: "The same? —You believe that you and I are the same?"

Though she had been struck with shock, Tanza had tried to protest, and Yorna reached her hand towards her. However, that was not for the sake of stroking Tanza's cheek, but to seize her by the collar.

Five of Yorna's slender fingers grabbed the overlap of the kimono, and the legs of Tanza's small body were suspended.

She had been held up before. But, it had never been done to her in this kind of violent manner.

Yorna: "You and I do not stand on the same side. I have… someone whose side I wish to remain by. At long last, I can be with that person again. That is why…"

Tanza: "Yor…na–sama… hk."

Yorna: "I no longer have any need for you or the other children."

At a distance close enough that their breaths could reach each other, Yorna looked into Tanza's face. That which Yorna had spoken, was the reason she had remained in the Imperial Capital, filled with undead as it was.

The reality was not that she had been held captive, but that she had remained here of her own volition.

Tanza: "…"

Just as Yorna was looking at her, Tanza had also been looking into Yorna's blue eyes.

Deep within those irises, while Yorna was passing the days in the Demon City, while she was gently attending to Tanza and the inhabitants of the city, fragments of a longing that never disappeared could be seen.

Yorna Mishigure had always been searching for something.

That was certainly something that was unfathomably large and distant to Tanza, and even Yorna was unable to reach it; it seemed to her like searching for something akin to a star.

Something that was known to be bright, shimmering, and to have a dazzling gleam, but could not be reached.

Yorna had always been searching for that.

That she was someone who sought such a thing was known to Tanza, and to everybody else. She prayed that Yorna's wish would come true, and if it would not, then she desired to offer something in its place.

It was not just Tanza, everybody had thought that way.

And now, she had finally found it, Yorna's wish had reached the stars.

If that was the reason why she was grabbing Tanza's collar like this —

Tanza: "—Please be happier as you reject me, Yorna-sama."

Indeed, Tanza gripped the other's wrists, and told that to the poor liar whom she treasured dearly.

3

—Ah, I have become a bad child.

Gripping the slender white wrist, Tanza deplored her utterly changed self in such a way.

It was not supposed to be this way. For Tanza, Tanza's ideal self—that was, the idealized image of wanting to be like her dead older sister, Zoey.

—Zoey was a very strong-willed, and kind-hearted woman.

The reason Tanza's birthplace had been destroyed was because of the prevalence of a superstition that boiling the antlers of the deerpeople tribe would create a panacea, causing them to be attacked by bandits who aimed to sell the antlers at a high price.

With both her mother and father killed, the still-young Tanza was pulled by the hand of her sister, and they were able to barely escape with their lives.

But, the sufferings of the two sisters did not end there. The evil clutches of those hunting their antlers caught up to them many times, and even without that, it was customary in the Vollachian Empire to prey on the weak.

Many a time, their lives were in danger, and the extent to which her sister went through harsh experiences in order to obtain one plateful of soup, was something Tanza could only conceive of after a few years had passed. At the same time, she detested that she was entirely dependent on her sister, unable to do anything, so much so that she wanted to kill herself.

Zoey: “Tanza, you must not curse anyone. People who can easily curse others, will also be easily cursed in a similar manner.”

While emaciated and clad in tattered clothes, Tanza’s sister would tell this to her on nights when they shared a single plate of soup.

Without anybody treating them kindly, everybody was cold towards Tanza and Zoey. Whenever she spoke ill of that world, Tanza’s kind sister would, without fail, scold her by saying that.

Not out of frustration, but out of parental love, Tanza’s sister would scold her. —Despite being her older sister, and at an age where one would still depend on their parents, it was far too early for her to become a parent.

The superstition regarding the antlers of deerpeople did not peter out, so the sisters never settled in one place.

They were always fleeing, fleeing, continuing to flee, and when they had become fatigued from all the fleeing, what caught the ears of the two sisters, was a rumor of the Demon City, Chaosflame.

It was told that in that place, many demi-human tribes lived together and that it was a paradise for the ostracized.

The mistress who ruled there was said to be strong, filled with compassion, and a wonderful person who did not tolerate the weak being oppressed. —Such a prospect was ridiculous, Tanza thought with her childish heart.

There was no way such a person existed. It was impossible for such a convenient person to exist.

Even if such a person did exist, then why had her mother and father died? Why was her sister, so emaciated and ragged as she was, leading Tanza by the hand like this?

Therefore—

???: "—You have done well, Zoey, Tanza."

Finally, having reached the paradise that should not have existed, when the woman in the beautiful kimono brought the two ragged, dirty sisters up to the castle and embraced them as they clumsily introduced themselves, Tanza heard her sister raise her voice and cry for the first time.

Even on the day their mother and father died, even on the days that a spectacle was made of her for a plate of soup, and even on the days when an unreasonable Tanza would curse at her with inconsiderate words, Zoey never cried.

Seeing Zoey shed tears and sob as she clung to the woman's chest, Tanza also raised her voice and cried, and as she did so, she had a thought from the bottom of her heart.

She thought that she would never lose the paradise created by this woman—no, that she would absolutely never lose this woman, Yorna Mishigure; her childish heart firmly believed so.

—They were provided with meals and a bedroom, and the kimono-clad Zoey was beautiful. She was Tanza's pride.

There were many who adored Yorna and earnestly wished to serve her. Among them, Zoey was the most serious and hardworking, and Yorna came to appoint her to a responsible post.

Tanza was proud that Zoey was serving the amazing Yorna and doing important work.

She had thought that she would be like her sister one day, wholeheartedly serving Yorna, and wanting the existence of the paradise known as Chaosflame to be known to many more of the weak who suffered.

Her sister had died two years after that life had begun.

Outside of the Demon City, there was a group of demi-human tribes that sought the protection of Chaosflame.

When they were passing by a fortress of Imperial Soldiers conducting a military campaign, her sister was in contact with the group as Yorna's representative, and was in the middle of guiding them to the Demon City.

The Imperial Soldiers attacked the group of demi-humans under the guise that they were potential enemies, and her sister was abruptly killed. Tortured to death for a reason unrelated to the antlers of deerpeople, her corpse was subjected to disgrace.

Zoey: "Tanza, you must not curse anyone. People who can easily curse others, will also be easily cursed in a similar manner."

The words of her older sister flashed through her mind, and in the midst of sorrow, Tanza's heart was ripped to shreds.

Even after this, was it something she must not do? Even after this, was she not to curse anyone? After her older sister, who was finally supposed to be happy, was killed, was she still not to curse anyone?

Yorna: "Do you happen to hate this country?"

Tormented by despair, as Tanza suffered as if her own antlers had been broken, a voice called out to her.

She had put on a kimono to imitate her sister, but with her scant knowledge of being an attendant, it was impossible for her to imitate her sister, and her weak, brittle heart could not hide what she truly felt.

As Tanza lamented that those feelings of hers had been found out, the woman's hand stroked her cheek.

Yorna: “I do, too.”

While stroking it, the woman affirmed Tanza’s rage, affirmed her cursing.

And, in place of Tanza, who did not have the power or means to give that curse form, she took action. Even if that meant she would need to face off against the mighty, mighty Empire, she cared not.

Yorna: “—I, too, despise the ways of this country.”

Whenever the Flamboyant, Yorna Mishigure, rose in rebellion against the Empire, it was always for the sake of another.

Since Tanza knew she was a woman who would do so, she did not want to be the cause.

She wanted to remain a child who did not cause Yorna to face danger.

She wanted to remain a child who did not cause Yorna to face sorrow.

Like her sister Zoey, she wanted to be a good attendant, one who did not trouble Yorna.

—And yet, Tanza had become a bad child.

Tanza: “Yorna-sama saved my older sister.”

Tightly squeezing the wrist grabbing her by the collar, Tanza’s lips spoke.

Perhaps because Tanza’s reaction, conduct, and words had all been unexpected, Yorna’s blue eyes widened, and her lips faintly quivered.

The fact that those trembling lips mouthed the name of her older sister, “Zoey”, would not go overlooked by Tanza.

Tanza: “Yorna-sama acceded to my selfish request.”

After the rebellion that clashed directly against the Imperial Capital when Zoey lost her life, Yorna had gotten revenge for Tanza's older sister, and Tanza had requested to serve in her sister's place.

It was a request akin to the height of impudence, and she was extremely insufficient for the role, but Yorna accepted it with pleasure.

And, Tanza had served her wholeheartedly. She had been permitted to do so.

Tanza: "Yorna-sama has brought about happiness, for a great deal of people."

Outside of herself and her sister, just how many people had Yorna supported?

Just how many people had been saved and protected by their connection to Yorna? Tanza's words and actions were nothing more than a small fragment of that cluster of gratitude.

If Yorna was leaving all of that behind and proceeding without reserve, that would be fine.

If Yorna thought of them as a heavy burden, and wanted to become light in order to fly up and reach the stars, that would be fine too.

If Yorna was unhappy, they would not want her to stay with them. If they were to say they wanted Yorna to stay with them even if she was unhappy, that would be as selfish as a curse.

That was why, if she was going to shake free from the hands holding onto her, Tanza wanted her to at least smile, wishing for happiness.

If she could not do so—

Tanza: "—Yorna-sama, you still love us."

Without letting go of those emotions, which were not in the past tense, but were still present even now, Tanza clearly declared so.

In front of her, Yorna's eyes were widened past their limit, and she fell into a state of astonishment. Her face was as if it were completely inconceivable that Tanza would ever talk back to her.

In reality, that must have been so. Tanza had wanted to serve Yorna well. Like Zoey, she had quietly obeyed Yorna's words, and put in the utmost effort to make them come true.

But, a glimpse of her ineptitude for that should have become apparent when she was separated from Yorna.

The Emperor and the fake Emperor who visited Chaosflame; in order to prevent them from dragging Yorna into their war, Tanza had acted independently from Yorna, and ended up unnecessarily amplifying the disorder.

As a result, Tanza was separated from Yorna during the events that followed, and she experienced many things.

And now, having finally reunited, Tanza was directly objecting to Yorna.

She was a bad child. She had become a bad child.

The person she wanted to be happy, she did not want that person to compromise in the act of becoming happy. For that purpose, Tanza would even overcome that person's words and prayers.

What a bad child she had become.

Yorna: "—ah."

Eyes wide open in astonishment, a feeble breath spilled from Yorna's lips.

That was Yorna's reaction to the pain from her wrist being firmly gripped. As Tanza's collar was being held up by Yorna's wrist, she firmly gripped the wrist in return.

Supposing it was as Yorna had said, that she did not care about Tanza or the others, and that she was freely doing what she desired, then this ought to have never happened.

Yorna's Soul Marriage Technique distributed power to those she loved.

The effects would also apply to Yorna herself, due to the logic of self-love—the feelings of affirmation towards oneself, which could even be called a manifestation of the belief that one's actions were right.

As long as she sincerely believed that she was correct, extraordinary power would surge within Yorna Mishigure.

But, if she did not believe that was the case, what would happen then?

Though she was one of the Nine Divine Generals, an apex of the Vollachian Empire's military, if Yorna could not affirm her own deeds, she would rapidly lose strength.

And unmistakably, that very phenomenon had occurred, to the extent that the sword of the Undead Swordmaster, who had parted ways with life, had surpassed her in strength.

Yorna could not support those whom she could not love, those whom she could not affirm.

That was why, she could not support her current self.

That was why—

Tanza: "—Yorna-sama, those feelings of love are the only thing you cannot feign."

A blue flame alight in her left eye, Tanza believed in Yorna's love without a single shred of doubt.

Yorna: "…"

As the suspended legs returned to the ground, and Tanza looked at her while her eye flamed, Yorna was at a loss for words.

Pressing down on the wrist that had been gripped so tightly, Yorna looked at Tanza's face in front of her; there was no proof of "love" as great as the flame housed therein, and she stared at it as if it were unbelievable.

It was as if she was under the impression that she could completely deceive her own heart.

Tanza: "Yorna-sama, you are not a very skilled person. —To tie up your hair and get dressed up in your kimono, were you not always relying on the strength of me, my sister, or of everyone else who loves you?"

Saying that, Tanza stood up on her tiptoes and stretched out her back, and with her stretched-out hand, she stroked Yorna's cheek.

Just as it had once been done to her, and just as she would one day do to somebody she wanted to lovingly cherish. At the sensation of those fingers, Yorna's blue eyes greatly wavered. They wavered.

Just like when her older sister raised her voice and cried for the first time, it was as if a stout heart was fissuring.

Thereupon—

Emilia: "—Hk! You can't! Tanza-chan!"

Behind Tanza as she faced Yorna, the voice of a cornered Emilia, and the sound of zori firmly stepping on the ground, seized her eardrums.

At the same time, the sound of a blade was unsheathed—she could conceive that a single Rowan had slipped past Emilia's interference, and was trying to approach in this direction.

Rowan: "Outta the way, missy. This over here's the stage I've yearned for in my dreams!"

Along with a selfish remark, the enemy ran like a strong wind.

Yorna had likely seen him from over her shoulder. Right away, she reached her hand out to Tanza's shoulder, and tried to push her body out of the way to protect her.

As if to return the favor from earlier, this time she would try and serve as Tanza's shield.

Tanza: "However, I cannot allow that."

Yorna: "Tanza…hk?"

Standing firm and enduring the hand that tried to push her out of the way, Tanza rejected that action. Instead, she turned around to protect Yorna behind her, and faced off against the hideous golden irises heading in her direction.

The unleashed sword aimed to slash through Tanza's neck, and to cut Yorna in half behind her. The stroke of the blade was enough to scorch the chilled atmosphere, and as it approached Tanza's neck—

Rowan: "—Hk."

Tanza: "The stage of your dreams, was it?"

Stifling the shock in the back of his throat, Rowan widened his golden eyes.

That must have been so. There was no doubt that he had not expected for the attack he had unleashed with all of his strength to be caught by such a small child.

With her raised hand, Tanza caught and intercepted the flash of silver that scorched the atmosphere.

—Yorna's Soul Marriage Technique distributed power to those she loved.

If one believed that they were correct, and there was no doubt that they were loved, if they selfishly believed that from the bottom of their heart, its effects would be tremendous.

???: "Tanza's also mine, so it's like she's basically on our side, right?"

Ahh, how irritating. She was confident that she was loved; she had been infected as a bad child.

That was far too irritating and unbearable. She was truly glad that it was in her nature not to show it on her face.

Tanza: “Apologies. I am quite busy, so I do not have the time to be watching happy dreams unfold.”

Putting strength into her hand and crushing the katana grasped within, with an astonished reaction to her front and rear, Tanza aimed at the face of the nuisance before her, and drove the fist that had shattered the katana right into it.

Giving a strike that went through his nose, and caved it into the inside of his head, Tanza made a declaration.

Her days of merely dreaming of paradise, and continuing to pray for the sake of her precious person, were over.

Without taking action herself, she would never be able to grasp paradise or her precious wishes.

Having been saved by her older sister, having been aided by Yorna, having met Natsuki Schwartz and other comrades in the Pleiades Battalion, and having finally arrived here, Tanza’s answer was—.

Tanza: “—Because there is a harsh, cruel, but lovely reality that awaits.”

After all, in order to reach the stars, she did not have time to stop in her tracks.

Vic.ll2o

Chapter 48:
The Curse of Thorns

—The name Eugard Vollachia, Emperor of the Briar, was known not just within the Vollachian Empire, but also far and wide across the rest of the world.

The reason for that lay in the tale of tragic love engraved into the history of the Empire, “Iris and the King of Thorns”.

The tale that depicted the meeting and parting of the kind-hearted girl named Iris, and the Vollachian Emperor feared as the King of Thorns, along with the tragic nature of its ending, struck a chord within the hearts of many readers.

The fated meeting between the two and their first parting. Thereafter, betrayed by his vassals, the King of Thorns was ousted from the throne and reunited with Iris, and hand-in-hand the two of them began their rebellion—since then, a long, long time had passed, and though the way of reciting the tale may have deviated from historical fact, the most important, core aspect, that of two people who were deeply in love with each other, remained completely unaltered as the story continued to be told.

Such was the extent to which the story of immutable love known as “Iris and the King of Thorns” continued to be beloved.

However, as a result, the story, being told as a tragic love tale which lit a fire within the hearts of people, ignored and concealed a part of the original historical truth.

Iris and the King of Thorns, the two of them peacefully spending their time cultivating their love, had not been the case.

During those tumultuous times, in an Empire where treachery and lamentation intertwined, they spent their days together risking their lives, fighting day and night for the sake of their desired future as they engaged in a burning love.

And indeed, Iris and the King of Thorns turned the entirety of the Vollachian Empire upside down, and finally succeeded in taking back the Empire. —Of course, the tragedy which followed need not be said.

But, before that tragedy occurred, the two had certainly achieved their goal.

With her compassionate heart and her devoted way of being, Iris had won many allies over to their cause. With that Iris by his side, the King of Thorns achieved results in warfare befitting an Emperor of Vollachia.

Results in warfare befitting an Emperor of Vollachia—remaining unchanged from times of yore, that was the embodiment of the Vollachian Empire's law of iron and blood. In other words, that was proof of power.

—The Emperor of the Briar, Eugard Vollachia, was the strongest Emperor in the history of the Empire.

???: "Go FUCK yourseeelf!!"

As a bursting roar thunderously boomed out of his throat, Groovy Gumlet leapt high into the air, and discarded the kusarigama which had had its handle cut in half.

A moment later, the kusarigama which had left his hand burst into deep red flames midair.

Had he hesitated for even a moment, those flames would have likely consumed him; his fur instinctually stood on end as he realized he had nearly been burned to death. But, he did not have time to feel relief.

Eugard: "Thou doth dance well, pup. However, when it cometh to dancing, Mine Star is far more of an impressive sight to behold."

While speaking fondly of his lover in a detached, emotionless tone, his onslaught of red streaks was relentless, as if blooming in profusion.

The weapon he wielded, which had received a blow from the kusarigama and had made it instantly burst into flame without even permitting an exchange of blows, was truly the worst—as one would expect from the treasured sword which bore the name of the Empire, it was not just its sharpness, but even its special characteristic that was exceedingly troublesome. If it were possible, he would have very much liked to produce an article rivaling its excellent quality with his own hands.

Groovy: "If only His Fucking Excellency had let me a get a nice close look at it!"

Given that no one apart from the rightful owner could possess the treasured sword, opportunities to see the genuine article were extremely few and far between.

While expressing dissatisfaction at how he had been treated as a General First-Class, Groovy made full use of his small stature, which had been made fun of by his opponent, and evading the crimson strikes with his nimble body, he dodged, dodged, and dodged once more.

He evaded because getting hit was not an option; though it was primitive, it was the optimal solution to use against such an enemy. If it had been Goz or Moguro here, they would have received the blow without evading, meeting their ends in a fiery blaze.

As the aftermath of the slashes incinerated the cityscape, Groovy's nose took in the burning smell as he successfully managed to dodge the gale of the crimson sword. However, he was still unable to catch his breath.

Even if he dodged the Yang Sword, which scorched the world as it cut through, the subsequent flash of blackness would bisect the world.

Groovy: "—Hk."

Not even his habitual cursing was able to escape his mouth.

As the barrage of powerful swings came from the Yang Sword, Eugard twisted his body and unleashed a brandish of the Fiend Sword, causing Groovy's fur to stand on end as he ducked while the blade scythed just a centimeter above his head.

The result of this slash did not end with just his relief at his head not flying off.

Along the trajectory which the blade had traced, a few dozen meters in front of where the stroke had cut, the cityscape of the Imperial Capital slanted diagonally, a series of severed buildings crumbling in its wake.

Its cutting edge was so plainly absurd that even making a dedicated sheath for the blade had been rife with difficulties, such was the might of the blade known as the Fiend Sword Murasame.

This Fiend Sword, which manifested such impossible power, naturally required a suitable compensation in order to be wielded. If the wielder were an ordinary person, it would be an untread area which could cost them their very life—.

Groovy: "Going whoosh whoosh whoosh with it, you have some nerve swinging it around so fucking casually…!"

Eugard: "Dost thou hold concern for I whilst we face off against each other? If such is the case, thy fears art unwarranted. Diminutive beings such as thee need only worry over thyselves. In regards to worrying over mineself, Mine Star alone is sufficient."

Groovy: "You don't make any fucking sense!"

In his right hand, the Yang Sword Vollachia, and in his left hand, the Fiend Sword Murasame.

Though the foe who dual-wielded the worst possible combination of two swords that Groovy could possibly imagine had not given his name, so long as he held the Yang Sword without bursting into flames, it showed that he possessed the due qualifications to wield it.

Additionally, green hair with a crown of thorns, this situation in which the dead were revived as the undead—the identity of the person dual-wielding the two worst blades, a terrible possibility rose to the surface in Groovy's mind as he spat out an endless string of curses.

Hence—

Groovy: "Eugard Vollachia…"

Eugard: "Even if thou dost not call out to mineself, I am aware of mine own personage. However, for recognizing mineself even though we art separated by time, I bestow mine praise unto thy discernment."

Bearing blades of instant death in both hands, he stated this in a crushing voice to his foe who had opened up some distance between them.

And then from the front, the undead, standing atop the burning wreckage of the buildings, drew back his chin solemnly at Groovy's call.

Hearing the undead's—Eugard's reply, Groovy snorted his nose with a bad attitude, and,

Groovy: "Even so, I'm still somebody who actually reads books among the fucking Generals of the First-Class. And I may as well just fucking say this while I'm at it, I'm one of the Nine Divine Generals."

Eugard: "Nine Divine Generals… Ah, so it yet remaineth in existence, that position."

Groovy: "Though it seems like it completely fucking vanished in your era."

In front of Eugard, whose inflectionless speech did not indicate whether he was interested or not, Groovy put his arms behind his waist, drawing two hatchets from it and holding them at the ready.

He still had plenty of Curse Tools. The problem was not Groovy's remaining number of Curse Tools, but rather his remaining amount of lifeforce.

Groovy: “…”

While interlocking gazes with Eugard, he glanced down at his own chest at the edge of his vision. Like before, his chest, in which his heart was stored, was being stabbed by sharp, transparent thorns as they writhed.

It was good that he had hastily prepared to deal with the Curse of Thorns that gnawed at his heart by running poison through himself, but this daredevil strategy was not designed for the long haul.

The Curse of Thorns was, by how it had looked, a powerful curse that indiscriminately engulfed a wide area centered on the caster. Therefore, he had anticipated that the user would be the type to hide while focusing on operating and maintaining the curse.

That had been naive. Very naive. His guess was completely off the mark, and far from being in hiding, the enemy was imposingly wielding powerful weapons—no, the weapons were indeed powerful, but the weapons alone were not the reason for this tough fight.

It was because the wielder of the weapons was a person of extraordinary power.

In the current Vollachian Empire, the status of General First-Class indicated the position of the Nine Divine Generals.

That system had been restored by the current Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, and though it had been repeatedly revived and erased several times throughout history, it was during the reign of none other than Eugard Vollachia that the system of the Nine Divine Generals was first lost.

For what reason had the system of the Nine Divine Generals been eradicated during Eugard’s reign?

That was—

Eugard: “—Naught else could hath been done. For those weaker than mineself hadst made an attempt on the life of Mine Star.”

—That was the reason why the Emperor of the Briar himself had executed all the Nine Divine Generals of his time with his own hands, not sparing even a single one.

Of course, Groovy had not been a part of the Nine Divine Generals at that time, nor were there transcendent figures such as Cecilus or Arakiya. But even so, he did not think that the powerful individuals who bore the title Nine Divine Generals were so weak that they could not hold a candle to Groovy and the rest of the current Divine Generals.

In short—

Groovy: "—Gonna be a fucking short-term decisive battle!"

Eugard: "Cease from piling on more impure utterances. 'Tis irreverent."

Kicking off the streets where slash marks had been etched, Groovy's body flew toward Eugard.

Groovy was readied with two hatchets, and while pointing out his manner of speech rather than those weapons, Eugard was calmly poised to intercept with the Yang Sword. To his opponent who stood ready to intercept him, Groovy furiously bared his fangs, and he struck with his hatchets in a vertical attack.

Naturally, the strike was blocked by the Yang Sword, which had been raised overhead, but that was just what he wanted.

Eugard: "Hm."

At the moment the Yang Sword collided with the hatchets, cracks formed in Eugard's face. Literally.

The crack on the cheek of his pale, prim face was proof that Groovy's blow had permeated through his opponent.

Groovy: "It worked, but fuck off!"

At the puzzled Eugard, Groovy laughed with a sidelong glance as the hatchets were blown away in a blaze of flame.

To avoid the spread of fire, he had let go of the hatchets the moment they hit the Yang Sword, but the effect of those Curse Tools—not cutting them, but forcing an impact through them, was activated.

Originally, it was a Curse Tool that had been made to kill opponents who wore thick armor and steel helmets even when they were still clad in that equipment. The blade of the hatchet vibrated immensely at such a minute scale that it could not be seen; even the slightest contact would cause the vibrations to be sent throughout the opponent's body, pulverizing their bones and viscera.

Though would be lethal damage for a living person, he was not sure how effective it would be against an undead—

Eugard: "Enthralling. But if thou art incapable of continuing onward—"

Groovy: "Who ever said anything like that? I've got a fuckton of Curse Tools left!"

As if one or two axes were not enough, Groovy pulled out two more hatchets and readied them in both hands. Upon hearing Groovy's answer, Eugard slightly raised the eyebrows of his cracked face.

A hatchet was thrown, Eugard gyrated his body to avoid being hit, and then fired off a slash. Groovy also avoided the slash by jumping, and continued to throw hatchets one after the other.

Groovy: "Ora ora ora ora ora ora oraahhh!"

Eugard: "…"

Between the barking Groovy and the silent Eugard, a momentary combat between the two turned into a fierce struggle.

As Groovy threw his Curse Tools as he pleased, Eugard continued to fire blows from his combination of the Yang Sword and the Fiend Sword in return.

At a glance, the battle appeared to be evenly matched with only one move from either side needed to tilt the odds in their favor, but in reality, Groovy was at a major disadvantage.

His remaining strength, his number of remaining Curse Tools, and the lethality of each of their weapons, were all unfavorable to him.

The deadly poison that coursed through his veins was draining his life, and the Curse Tools that he kept using would eventually run out. While these Curse Tools might have caused great damage when they connected, the opponent's swords would spell certain death if they were to hit.

Even to an untrained eye, it was obvious which side had the advantage, and even more so for the two parties involved in the fight.

That was why Groovy capitalized on being at a disadvantage.

Groovy: "I'll fucking show you something."

Groovy did not consider himself to be particularly strong among the Nine Divine Generals.

He once prided himself on being the strongest in Vollachia. However, after being recruited by Vincent and seeing others who had been given the same rank of General, those illusions vanished.

He desired to be strong, but he did not want to step out of line, and he was not qualified to do so.

He was no match for Cecilus with his strength, Arakiya with her explosive power, Olbart with his versatility, Chisha with his intellect, Goz with his caliber as a General, Moguro with their survivability, Yorna with her unorthodoxy, Madelyn with her anti-army capabilities, and Balleroy with his anti-unit efficiency.

That was Groovy's self-assessment and the point he'd arrived at as a general.

However, aside from that, Groovy had strengths that the other Generals did not possess.

—Groovy excelled in his relentless dedication and method of killing his opponents.

Groovy: “chomp”

During his throw, a large amount of blood poured out of Groovy’s mouth with a bloodshot look in his eyes.

This was the result of the poison circulating throughout his body, causing blood vessels to break, which then overflowed as they broke all over his body. At the sight of Groovy vomiting blood, Eugard’s expression did not waver.

He, too, was a master martial artist, and he must have known that Groovy was approaching him with some means of resisting the Curse of Thorns. But also, that this was placing a burden on Groovy’s body that he would not be able to endure for long.

The blood he vomited only confirmed this belief.

Even if Eugard’s blades did not reach him, Groovy would die of exhaustion on his own. Indeed, Eugard must have discerned this with his insight.

Because of this, he would not be able to fully avoid Groovy’s mist of blood, as he spewed all of the accumulated blood from his mouth.

Eugard: “…”

Eugard frowned slightly, evaporating the mist of blood with the flames of the Yang Sword.

The blood contained the poison that Groovy had taken in, but even if one were exposed to it, the damage would be negligible. The goal, however, was not to poison his opponent.

It was to apply Groovy’s blood. —It was successfully applied to his sleeve, which he could not shake off.

Groovy: “Like fish in a fucking barrel.”

Immediately after, Groovy smiled, his bloody fangs showing. Around Eugard—the countless hatchets he had dodged so far drew close to him, as if pulled by a string.

Using Groovy’s blood as a medium to acquire its target, it was a guided tomahawk application of Curse Tool known as “blood hatchets”.

Eugard: “This is…”

Eugard dodged the incoming blood hatchet, but then his eyes widened as he saw it circle around and come back again.

Eugard, with his incredible physical prowess, dodged, dodged, dodged, and continued to dodge the storm of blood hatchets coming at him from all directions, but unless he knocked them down, they would eventually catch up to him as they came flying at him endlessly.

However, Groovy was not so well-behaved as to wait for that eventuality.

Groovy: “You’re probably wondering when it’s gonna fucking end, aren’t you? I’ll give you the answer!”

As he said this, Groovy was not holding an additional blood hatchet, but rather the severed weighted chain from the kusarigama that had been burned by the Yang Sword in the initial attack.

A specially engineered chain weight, it was briefly spun, and then was thrown with arrow-like speed at Eugard’s feet as he struggled to evade the blood hatchets.

Eugard: “—!”

Eugard turned his wrist to catch the chain weight with the middle of the Yang Sword.

Immediately seeing the difference between it and the blood hatchets, it was a brilliant move on his part deciding that it would be safe to defend against it. However, in the arsenal of the Master of Curse Tools, Groovy Gumlet, there was nothing one could safely touch.

At the moment of impact, the chain weight glowed red, and a tremendous explosion enveloped Eugard.

Eugard: “Ohhh—”

Tossed by the blast and flames, Eugard finally let out a distressed cry and was blown away. Nevertheless, Eugard straightened up his limp body, and he immediately tried to prepare for a follow-up attack.

Aiming toward Eugard, the blood hatchets swarmed the motionless target.

One blood hatchet could shatter bones, two could crush internal organs, and three or more could end a life.

With ten or twenty of them pouring down, not even Eugard could withstand it.

Therefore, Groovy felt sure that he had killed him—

Eugard: “—Stand tall. Thou art stronger than all the Nine Divine Generals of mine era.”

A moment later, Eugard’s fearless face appeared before Groovy’s eyes.

A slash from the Fiend Sword sliced off Groovy’s right ear as he leaned forward, and a kick from his leaping opponent hit him in the midsection, sending his small body flying backward.

But, as he was being sent flying, Groovy undid his waistband, swung his snakewhip sword, which was made from a series of snakepeople fangs, and began to cleave at the head of the pursuing Eugard.

Eugard: “If thou hadst been among the insurrectionists, the life of Mine Star may hath even been in danger.”

As it unwinded, the snakewhip sword unleashed a long, undulating blow akin to the body of a serpent.

Unsparingly dismantling it with the Fiend Sword as it approached him, Eugard appraised Groovy's fighting strength by comparing it to his own experiences.

And as proof of his honor at that evaluation from the strongest Emperor in all history, Groovy aligned his feet, and fired two grappling hooks from the cuffs of his trousers in an attempt to shatter both shoulders of his opponent.

Eugard: "Even under such circumstances, thou art as sumptuous as ever."

As the heels of his feet were whittled down by those grappling hooks, Eugard delivered a kick to Groovy; coughing up blood as a result of that kick, Groovy ripped off the cloth wrapped around his neck, and unfurled it into the air.

For a moment, the line of sight between Groovy and Eugard was obstructed.

Groovy: "Go, fuck, yourSELLLLL—!!"

From the one side of that unfurled cloth, Groovy flicked the magic crystal embedded in his throat, and hit Eugard with a surging roar that rumbled the very atmosphere.

From an unseeable position, with an onslaught equivalent to sound itself, it was a surprise attack that was impossible to dodge.

But, against that sound, Eugard displayed the true ability of the Fiend Sword.

—"To get to the point", there existed such a saying.

It meant to get down to the heart of a matter, but in all things there was an appropriate "point". No matter the object or phenomenon, or even concept, there existed a "point" that signified its essence.

The Fiend Sword Murasame, was an Enchanted Sword that bisected that perceived "point".

Murasame hated Groovy, who had melted it down, and reforged it in the past, so in order to prevent his outstanding sense of smell from sniffing it out, it cut the point of its “scent”.

Since then, it has become impossible for anybody to pursue the Fiend Sword Murasame by scent.

And here, Murasame had cut the surging roar that Groovy had unleashed.

Groovy’s eardrums heard the sound of the magic crystal embedded in his throat shattering, and the moment he realized that, the slash of the sword was about to cleave Groovy in twain—

Groovy: “…”

A sudden gust of wind had saved the life that should have been severed.

???: “Deary me, that was a real close call. I was just takin’ a stroll and happened ta save yer life, fella.”

With the Curse Tools he had sent forth for an emergency evacuation having all been made powerless, Groovy’s life had been on the verge of eradication; carrying him, the tall figure who had unexpectedly appeared spoke in a laid-back tone.

Groovy was surprised by that sudden interloper, but Eugard could not conceal his shock either.

Not only had he interrupted this fierce battle, but his presence drawing closer had not even been felt until this moment.

Groovy: “Bashturd…”

???: “Ah, pushin’ yerself ain’t no good. It was the technique that got cut, but the effect is goin’ all the way ta yer voice. If ya try force yerself ta speak, you’ll never speak again.”

Responding to Groovy’s voice, which sounded like it was clotted with blood, the person who had perfectly ascertained what had happened—the wolfman with black fur, let Groovy down.

Then, with his eyes that were as thin as threads, he looked over towards Eugard, who was glaring at him,

Wolfman: “I see. A Curse Tool that can chase ya down ta the ends of the world sure is useful, and yet it was made powerless with a single arm. However…”

Pausing his words there, the wolfman watched as Eugard’s missing right arm grew back.

As the wolfman had said, the moment the storm of blood hatchets exploded, Eugard had pruned off the entirety of the right arm which had blood on its sleeve, and had managed to avoid it.

It was not as though that method of evasion had been outside of Groovy’s consideration, but if one lost an arm, their actions would dull accordingly. Even when keeping the fact that they were an undead in mind, that should not have changed.

Despite all that, Eugard displayed immutable movements before and after losing his arm.

That had been beyond Groovy’s expectations, and if not for the wolfman’s interference, he would have connected with a fatal opening that caused him to lose his life. —But, the significance of that was.

Groovy: “Oi, fuhgger.”

Wolfman: “…Just now, did ya call me a fucker?”

Groovy: “Moar impohrtuntlee…Hk.”

Wolfman: “I know, I know. I’d be fully aware even if ya didn’t tell me.”

Nodding at the appeal, the wolfman put his golden kiseru in his mouth, and set the tip alight.

Then, while puffing out smoke, he slightly lowered the pitch of his voice and continued.

Wolfman: “Golly, guess there really are some casters who got nasty personalities. —There ain’t an ounce of love in this.”

Seeing the same thing as the wolfman as he spoke those words, Groovy harbored a similar impression.

Eugard ascertained the feeling of his regrown right arm; holding the Fiend Sword in his left hand, the powerful Emperor of yore threw off the garment that had been singed by the explosion.

—Just like Groovy, the Curse of Thorns had also been planted upon Eugard’s chest.

Chapter 49:
The King of Thorns

1

—As the one known as the Admirer, Halibel made full use of his title as the Kararagi City-States’ strongest individual.

Even if one surveyed the entirety of the Four Great Countries, they would have no choice but to say that there were no shinobi who surpassed him. Even the Empire’s strongest shinobi, Olbart, would have to make a bitter expression and admit he was the most powerful. Evaluated as an equal to the Sword Saint, the Mad Prince, and the Blue Lightning, alongside the strongest of each nation he had a track record which one could not be ashamed of.

There was only one difference between Halibel and the other three: he did not belong to any nation, proclaiming himself a masterless ronin.

The Sword Saint who was bound by treaty to the Kingdom, the Mad Prince who had been branded a national traitor and confined in the northernmost tower, even the Blue Lightning whose selfishness was renowned around the world held a position.

Only the Admirer Halibel was a free man who held no official position.

Of course, Halibel himself held a sense of gratitude and belonging to his homeland and would sometimes be asked to investigate and resolve serious problems in Kararagi. But, as far as the idea of his existence being owned by someone else was concerned, being used as a bargaining chip in negotiations and transactions was something he was extremely averse to.

—He would side with those he wanted to help, and he would turn his nose up at those things which did not interest him.

That was Halibel’s motto as one of the strongest, the owner of such a whimsical nature naturally caused the assessments of those who knew him to be divided into two extremes.

On one hand, there were those who were rejected with a “Without me y’all would be just fine, just fine, you’re remarkable.”

On the other hand, there were others who were accepted with an “It’s amazin’ that you’re able ta move someone like me, you’re remarkable.”

Either way he always relaxedly spoke of his praise for others, and so he was always called the Admirer.

Naturally, this was not the only reason for his nickname; no matter what opponent or action he was faced with, it was Halibel’s way of being to give an objective evaluation.

And so—

Halibel: “Golly, guess there really are some casters who got nasty personalities. —There ain’t an ounce of love in this.”

Puffing smoke from his kiseru, there was no admiration in the words that escaped Halibel’s mouth.

The tone of his voice was slightly lower, making him sound irritated, something that those who knew him would be surprised by as he was rarely ever displeased.

Halibel did not have a favorable impression of the undead, but there had been a moment when the scope and result of the technique made him feel some admiration for the opponent caster.

But, for the state of the opponent right in front of him, not a single shred of admiration could be found.

Halibel: “…”

Slightly opening his eyes which were as thin as threads, Halibel looked at the opponent in question with his golden irises—throwing away his tattered garments and wielding an incredibly famed sword was Eugard.

Just moments ago, one of the Nine Divine Generals, Groovy, had been facing off against this formidable enemy, but now he was unable to stand due to the burden of a technique that had become intertwined with his soul.

Seeing that same thing, Groovy, who was beside him, wiped up the blood coming from his mouth.

Groovy: “Oi, dat’s…”

Halibel: “I said don’t force yerself ta talk. I can see it too. —That kid, he said that he wanted ta leave this ta an expert on curses.”

Stroking his beard with one hand, Halibel recalled the boy that had assigned him to the fourth bastion.

Vincent had acknowledged the boy, who had gathered immense trust for his judgment of his surroundings, enough that even Anastasia held high hopes for him and told Halibel to respect his opinion as much as possible.

Due to his deep knowledge of curse techniques, that boy had assigned him to deal with this opponent who was said to be a decisive factor in the battle for the Imperial Capital. With all of Anastasia’s boasting, he was eager to fully display the true strength of Kararagi’s strongest.

Halibel: “Really didn’t see this comin’…”

The unenthusiastic Halibel, and Groovy who was at his side, both looked at the same thing.

They were both aware of the left side of Eugard’s chest, where the human heart would be and where a semi-transparent venomous looking thorn now appeared—the very same Curse of Thorns that had been indiscriminately disseminated across a large portion of the Imperial Capital was also eating into Eugard.

From this mysterious fact, two possibilities emerged.

The first was that the Curse of Thorns had even engulfed the caster, Eugard, and was an indiscriminate curse in the truest sense of the word.

However, Halibel evaluated that the second possibility had a higher likelihood of being true.

That was to say—

Eugard: "—Demi-human, answer mine query."

After he had finished ascertaining that his right hand had regenerated, Eugard cast his voice towards them.

Naturally, the one who was told this and was pierced through by his gaze was the sudden intruder, Halibel. To that statement Halibel asked "Me?" and pointed to himself with his finger, to which Eugard nodded.

Eugard: "If mine judgment does not err, thou art a wolfman, yes?"

Halibel: "Ahh, that'd be right. I'm a wolfman… since Vollachia went ta the extremes, we're in a position where we gotta feel ashamed of ourselves throughout the world. Seems like we're gonna die out soon."

Eugard: "I see. —I see."

The second part of his phrase was filled with an intent to eradicate him, but Eugard nodded quietly, as if to confirm it. Halibel was suspicious of this situation, meanwhile Groovy raised his hoarse voice to say "Oi!"

Halibel: "I told ya, don't force yerself…"

Groovy: "Dat's naut impoartunt, FUHG! Dah Emprouhr of duh Braiyer ish..!"

Eugard: "—I bear no grudge against thee personally."

Before Groovy could finish speaking with blood running through his voice, that declaration was made along with a physical form.

The casually wielded Fiend Sword flashed with black, and disregarding Groovy’s presence, it cleaved through Halibel, splitting him in two from his groin to the top of his head.

In just a blink of an eye, Halibel had been split vertically in twain.

Groovy: “—Hk!”

At the terrible scene, Groovy, who hadn’t been able to speak in time, was at a loss for words while Eugard, the one who had cut through Halibel, remained in a posture with the Fiend Sword raised overhead,

Eugard: “However, thy race was once complicit in causing the death of Mine Star. Therefore, akin to the molepeople who bear the same sin, I shall eradicate all of thy kind as an example.”

Halibel: “…Ahh, I finally managed ta remember. Ancient Emperor-san, ya were the original cause of us goin’ extinct.”

Eugard: “Hm?”

After speaking words to the opponent he had slain, Eugard scowled when a response was given.

In front of Eugard, the person who answered was Halibel, whose body had been severed into left and right parts right down the middle. Eugard blinked slowly at Halibel’s body, as each half gradually parted from the other.

Eugard: “That is a surprise. That thou hath yet to perish even in that state, is it perhaps beyond the final destination for those who train themselves to the extreme?”

Halibel: “That’s quite the amusing evaluation. But that ain’t it. —It just ain’t my real body.”

Just as Halibel laughed playfully, the left and right parts of his body instantly collapsed, and a large amount of black fur fell on the spot.

Drawing attention to such an unrealistic scene, behind Eugard—

Eugard: “Do not heedlessly sneak upon mine back. It shall not be pardoned for any other than Mine Star."

Halibel: "Heh, now ain't that quite the big deal."

On the opposite side of his collapsed clone, Halibel's body was cut in half by a slash from Eugard's right arm—by the Yang Sword that was held there once again.

However, the bisected upper and lower body that immediately burst into flames was not the main body either.

Having just dealt with the sudden attack to his back, Eugard exclaimed "Ngh" in surprise as his body abruptly sank down.

The cause was a third Halibel, who had grabbed him by both of his legs and dragged him down into the street. Halibel slipped out of the ground, and swapped positions with Eugard who was thus buried up to his waist. It would have been ideal to bury him up to his neck to restrict his movements, but,

Halibel: "It ain't gonna go so swimmingly, as expected."

The third Halibel grumbled and was torn to shreds above the burning remains of the second Halibel.

With vertical, horizontal, and diagonal slashes, he made cuts in a grid pattern and blew the pieces of the body apart; having also cut the ground into pieces with those slashes, Eugard jumped out.

With the Yang Sword in his right hand and the Fiend Sword in his left, he had recovered his fighting stance.

While dual wielding two Enchanted Swords that surpassed human knowledge, Eugard readied himself and was assailed by two new Halibels from left and right. It was a sort of revenge against the inexhaustible attack of the undead, but the increase in Halibels was something different to that of the common undead.

Eugard: "Thou art a devoted menace."

Accepting the fact of Halibel's clones with equanimity, Eugard swung the two Enchanted Swords simultaneously.

Against the Halibels as they came from the left and right, each Enchanted Sword was readied to unleash a deadly attack—but, a third Halibel who had appeared behind Eugard, grabbed his arms, and stopped him.

Halibel: "Sorry 'bout this, but I can actually go up ta three."

Having detained both his arms, the two Halibels belatedly used their hands to pierce the immobilized Eugard's head and torso.

As a master of the Flow Method, the sharpness of Halibel's spear hand was more akin to that of a famed sword rather than a mediocre cutting tool.

Without missing their aim, they pierced Eugard's right eye and solar plexus, demonstrating their might which was enough to cause an instant death.

However—

Eugard: "Do not attempt to scheme against mineself. For any other than Mine Star it is irreverent."

Stating this, his unpierced left eye met Halibel's and immediately afterwards, the radiance of the Yang Sword shone more brilliantly. The next moment, the red glow burst into flames, and including Eugard, the entire area was instantly engulfed in an inferno.

The explosive spread of the fire engulfed three Halibels who were in contact with Eugard, and burned them to a crisp.

Then, a beat later, the flames disappeared like an illusion, and the three Halibels were all reduced to cinders. Eugard, who had also been scorched, regenerated the burnt surface, and stepped forth unperturbed.

Then, looking around with his golden eyes—he noticed that Groovy, who had been there just a moment ago, had disappeared.

Eugard: "I had not thought him so courteous as to back down. —What is thine aim?"

Halibel: "—I ain't likin' this. I hate it when someone figures out my tricks."

Having left Eugard far behind on the battlefield, Halibel shook his head and sighed at how troublesome he was, not just because of his swordsmanship.

Eugard masterfully handled the powerful magic swords without being overpowered by them.

In addition to his considerable strength, he was virtually immortal due to being an undead and possessed a high level of insight. He had also seen through the deception that there was a limit of three clones, and had skillfully responded to deadly situations.

Halibel: "That's what I'd expect of a man who almost turned the tide of a losin' war single-handedly. Do ya think he's prideful?"

Groovy: "If you're asking me that, fuhg…"

Halibel asked this while holding him, and Groovy thrashed about in his arms as he was being carried away from the battlefield.

If they had remained there, they would have been caught in Eugard's final burst of flames, making their situation even more unbearable, but there was no cause for him to be so grateful.

After all, as a warrior himself, he could understand why he would not want to be kept back from the battle.

Halibel: "But, ain't there a chance you'll die from this? To begin with, ya forced yerself to move yer body with poison… that's quite the reckless thing to do."

Groovy: "…"

Groovy was slightly surprised that he had pointed that out, and Halibel flicked his own nose with his finger.

As a Shinobi who was familiar with all kinds of poisons, he could surmise what the faint strange odor mixed with Groovy's blood was. As for its use, Halibel would never have imagined or attempted it, and the thought of it caused him to shudder.

Halibel: "Honestly, the people of Vollachia sure are determined 'n scary. Not to mention Olbart-san, who's still grinnin' even tho he's missin' his right hand. Despite bein' an old man, I ain't no match for him."

Groovy: "And, what abouht youh…"

Halibel: "Hmm?"

Groovy: "It's gonna fuhgging get worse, that's how it usually is, clumsy curse…!"

Halibel: "—That's a problem, ain't it?"

Responding with a hint of confusion in his voice, Halibel replied to Groovy, who slurred as he dealt with his bloody throat that was rapidly getting worse.

This was why he was taking Groovy away from the battlefield, not to abandon his duties and flee the Imperial Capital, but as part of the strategy for victory.

Recklessly challenging an opponent without knowing anything about them is a fool's errand. Halibel's strength was such that it could defeat most opponents by sheer force alone, but this was not the case with this opponent.

That was not to say that his opponent was not superbly talented.

Halibel: "Well, if I were to keep fightin' with him like we were, I'm sure I'd be stronger than him. That's the truth, but—"

Merely defeating Eugard was not enough to fulfill the task that had been given to Halibel.

Halibel was tasked with dealing with the "curse" that would determine the outcome of the decisive battle for Imperial Capital, and simply defeating Eugard would not solve that problem.

That fact was the biggest problem.

Groovy: “Yhour, thornshh are…”

Halibel: “They’re all gone. That’s the second clue.”

Groovy: “…The first one, is that Emperor’s fucking thorns.”

Groovy, who was being held by Halibel as he ran and kicked the ground agilely, peeked at Halibel’s chest. Beneath his wasou, the Curse of Thorns that should have been on Halibel’s chest was gone.

It emitted an oozing pain, so it was no wonder that it was expected to be the biggest obstacle to be eliminated in the fight against the undead. However, Halibel had yet to take any proactive action to remove it.

The thorns had disappeared despite nothing having been done. On the other hand, it was not Halibel that had made the thorns disappear.

What that meant was—

Groovy: “That fucking bastard…”

Halibel: “From the sound of it, it looks like you ‘n I are havin’ the same thoughts. It’s reassurin’ to hear that the Master of Curse Tools is sharin’ the same opinion as me.”

Groovy: “It’s a fucking mishmash of shit all mixshhhed togetterh. That fucking bastard, the solution is fucking annoying…!”

Groovy cursed out his undirected anger as if spitting.

In the same frame of mind as Groovy, Halibel once again regained his initial misgivings and was convinced that the second possibility, which came to mind when he saw the thorns on Eugard’s chest, was the correct one.

The Curse of Thorns, the logical reason why they were entangled in Eugard’s chest was simple.

Halibel: “Them thorns weren’t the Emperor cursin’ the people ’round him, but…”

Groovy: “His Excellency Eugard was cursed by some bastard, and now the curse is being amplified like a motherfucker.”

3

—Eugard Vollachia, Emperor of the Briar, had received a curse as part of the sabotage concerning the Imperial Selection Ceremony, a rite of succession for the Imperial throne that had persisted for a long time within the Vollachian Empire.

After all this time, which of his opposing Imperial siblings had been responsible, and how distinguished of a curse arts user they had been involved with, were not certain things.

Only, intended for the forthcoming Imperial Selection Ceremony, the brutal strategy which had intended to diminish the competing opponents, greatly distorted the fate of the young Imperial who went on to become Eugard Vollachia.

—The Curse of Thorns placed upon Eugard, was a terribly cruel yet simple thing.

That was to say, through the binding of thorns, an unbearable agony that gnawed at his heart was bestowed upon him.

And, that was also something that applied to those in Eugard’s surroundings.

If the young Eugard cried and screamed at the pain of the curse, his family members and servants would try to save him from it. But, when they would try to get close to him, they would all be caught up in the curse, and thus would refuse to approach.

Within such solitude, the curse aimed to kill Eugard amidst the pain—that was the true form of the Curse of Thorns placed upon Eugard.

Due to the dreadfully ruthless Curse of Thorns, Eugard should have been unable to even reach the Imperial Selection Ceremony, and should have been a tragic Imperial whose life came to a quick close.

That would have been the synopsis that the person who had ordered for the curse to be placed upon Eugard had in mind; but here, a huge, huge, so huge that it would go on to change the destiny of the Empire, coincidence had arisen.

By birth, Eugard had “congenital analgesia”, the inability to feel pain.

Therefore, the constantly active Curse of Thorns did not bestow pain upon Eugard himself, but instead only continued to grant pain to those around him; as a result, he was left completely alone.

Even his family and servants did not approach him, and living by himself in the mansion which had been bestowed to him, Eugard spent his childhood without any opportunities to make contact with others; he thought that this was the reason why his expression was always so stiff, but it was fifty-fifty between that and his natural disposition being the reason.

In any case, Eugard and the Curse of Thorns had miraculously continued to coexist.

His contact with others had been limited to an absolute minimum, but even so, there were times where he had no choice but to make contact. During each of those times, the people who got caught up in the Curse of Thorns naturally reported that “Eugard was the one who placed the curse”, and Eugard had never denied it.

In reality, regarding the true form of the Curse of Thorns, Eugard did not know whether it was something placed on him by somebody else, or if he was the one invoking it for some unknown reason.

Furthermore, the curse arts user who had placed the curse, and would thus have the answer, never appeared in Eugard’s life afterwards, and the one who had ordered it remained unknown.

Therefore, with the true form of the thorns that haunted his every step unbeknownst to him, the King of Thorns continued his walk for a long, long time.

If the curse had never been placed upon him, then those steps would have been interrupted somewhere during the Imperial Selection Ceremony, bringing them to a permanent halt.

The thorns isolated Eugard, and the goal of the one who had placed the curse upon him was fulfilled, albeit not in its original form.

???: “Would it not be more comforting to count the stars in the sky than to look out into the darkness?”

—That was, save for his encounter with the girl, who had stepped into Eugard’s thorns, and had approached him.

4

Eugard: “I assumed thou hadst fled, wolfman.”

Halibel: “Well, it ain’t like I didn’t think ‘bout it… Sorry, that’s a lie. I didn’t think ‘bout it in the slightest.”

Eugard: “For what reason hast thou made an attempt to deceive mineself?”

Halibel: “It’s a habit of mine ta be ramblin’ on with loose lips. I’d be delighted if ya could forgive me without takin’ it too seriously.”

Eugard: “The act of deceit against the Emperor is irreverent. Yet, judging how thou hast confessed thy mistake, I shall disregard thy lie from a moment prior.”

Greeting Halibel as he returned to the stage, Eugard drew back his chin in a composed manner.

Without being disagreeable regarding Halibel, who had at one point left the battlefield and then returned, Eugard’s imposing stance had the dignity of an Emperor to it as he spoke.

Even without his strength, his caliber was undoubtedly worthy of being called Emperor.

Halibel: “Ta go ‘n make such a person as angry as lava, just what kinda things did ya guys do, my ancestors?”

At his undetachable connection with Eugard, Emperor of the Briar, Halibel scratched his cheek.

From Halibel’s perspective as a wolfman, Eugard could be called the archenemy of his entire race.

Needing to feel ashamed of their race throughout the entire world, the Vollachian Empire was still to this day an environment in which wolfpeople, and half-wolfpeople of mixed blood—werewolves, would be unable to escape the death penalty if they were to be discovered. The one who had cemented that as law to last forevermore within the Empire, was none other than this very Eugard.

The two races of wolfpeople and molepeople were established as the sworn enemies who had betrayed the Vollachian Empire, and amidst a long history, many of their brethren had lost their lives, and they were massacred to the verge of extinction.

In the future, that trend was unlikely to be completely lost.

Therefore, from Halibel’s perspective, it was natural for him to harbor an equal amount of hatred towards this opponent, but—

Eugard: “—Turning such a gaze upon mineself shan’t be pardoned.”

Halibel: “What kinda eyes does it look like I’m makin’?”

Eugard: “Eyes Mine Star would make on occasion. Anyone but Mine Star who turns such eyes upon mineself, I shall not pardon… Nay, ‘tis not to mine fondness.”

Hearing Eugard’s answer, in which there was likely no lie or falsehood, Halibel took a deep breath, and placed his hand over his left breast.

Thereupon, the Curse of Thorns was not present. Upon him, who ought to have been an abominable, detestable wolfman to Eugard, the curse was not being invoked. —That was something that more so ruffled Halibel's feelings.

Halibel: "Supposin' that kid went 'n sent me here predictin' that I'd get these feelin's, then, lil' Ana, ya really gotta watch out."

On the back of his closed eyelids, envisioning the girl whom he had known since she was a young child, and who had not ended up growing to be very tall, Halibel held the kiseru in his mouth as he said those words.

Then, setting the tip alight, he got a good whiff of the smoke before puffing it out.

Breathing out, he made up his mind.

Halibel: "It's fine if ya don't forgive me, Emperor-san. That's the kinda relationship between us, ain't it?"

Eugard: "That sort of relation would be?"

Halibel: "Between wolfpeople, 'n the Emperor of the Briar."

They each had a reason to hate the other, and a reason to destroy the other.

Pointing at himself and his opponent, Halibel spoke thus, to which Eugard's expression did not change. He did not know just how many things were locked on the other side of that invariant expression.

And though he did not know, Halibel had made up his mind.

By merely defeating Eugard, the duty he had been entrusted with, and his own determination, would not be fulfilled.

Therefore—

Halibel: "I'll set ya free from that darn disgustin' curse, 'n make ya nothin' more than just a king, O King of Thorns."

Chapter 50:
Eugard Vollachia

1

—Eugard Vollachia was a King who had been forced into solitude.

Having been afflicted with the Curse of Thorns for as long as he could remember, he was forced to grow up in a terribly unbalanced environment, with even his family and servants unable to approach him.

With his painless condition, Eugard did not have to experience the suffering of the Curse of Thorns, of which he was the source, but understood from the expressions of pain and screams from those around him that his existence was a source of torment to people, and so he accepted his life of isolation.

As for the Imperial Selection Ceremony, his chances of winning it were doubtful as well.

Common sense dictated that since he was afflicted with the Curse of Thorns, it would be very much inadvisable for him to assume the Imperial Throne and be in charge of the national government of the Vollachian Empire.

Even if he could become Emperor, he thought that an Emperor who could never appear in person to meet with important state officials or to negotiate with the leaders of other countries must not exist.

Therefore, once he decided that he should not win the Imperial Selection Ceremony, Eugard had settled that his life would end at the age when the ceremony begins.

Until that age, Eugard would gather all the knowledge he could and serve the Imperial Family—namely, for the improvement and peace of life of Imperial Citizens.

With the Curse of Thorns gnawing at him, Eugard had been forced into solitude.

However, despite his circumstances, Eugard did not consider himself unhappy. He did not feel that he was cursed, and as long as there was a rational answer to the “why”, he did not resent the person who had done it.

Some people were born blind, some were crippled. He thought that his inability to live side by side with others was just one of those things.

And, in a world where people constantly lost their lives due to blindness or crippled limbs, he considered himself lucky to have survived thanks to his position as a member of the Imperial Family.

Thanks to his origins from the Imperial Family, Eugard had been able to continue living without family or anyone close to him, as well as never knowing of starvation. Because of that, he would fulfill his duties as a member of the Imperial Family.

While he was sorry for his mother and the people of his house, he would never be able to seize the throne of the Emperor. —Then, at the very least, he would use the not-so-long years of his remaining life for the sake of the world that encompassed him.

—Hence, meeting her had been the biggest mistake of Eugard’s life.

It was not because he came to wish for the Imperial Throne, which he had ought to have given up on. Nor had he abandoned the mission of the Imperial Family.

Only, he had ended up with the desire to live. —To live with Iris, he had ended up desiring so.

2

The Curse of Thorns was something that had been cast upon Eugard Vollachia, and its effects had been designed to force Eugard into solitude.

To achieve that objective, what might be the conditions under which it would manifest its maximum effectiveness?

The opposite of isolation could be said to be love. That was to say, the Curse of Thorns was a curse that kept the people one loved at a distance.

In other words—

???: “The thorns went ahead ‘n disappeared from my chest, ‘n the fact that they haven’t disappeared for anyone else has gotta be the answer.”

Biting lightly on the mouthpiece of his kiseru, Halibel murmured while patting his own chest.

Having betrayed the King of Thorns, wolfpeople and molepeople had ended up being labeled as traitors in even the fairy tales that had been passed down for a long time; being one of the former himself, the reason that the thorns had disappeared from his chest, was that Eugard had recognized Halibel as a wolfman, and thus he had fallen outside of the conditions for the Curse of Thorns.

The Curse of Thorns would not be activated unless directed at something one loved.

Halibel: “Bein’ someone with immense affection, I can’t help but wonder who that was bad for.”

Mixing his frustration with the purple smoke, Halibel took a deep drag from his kiseru.

The special tobacco dropped onto the bowl burned out in a single puff, filling Halibel’s unusually large lungs with smoke. In the subsequent instant, biting down on his teeth and tossing the kiseru upwards, Halibel in his black kimono tilted his upper body, and the black hair on his back was slashed by the Fiend Sword that was swung diagonally.

Behind him, as the cityscape of the Imperial Capital tilted diagonally in the aftermath of that slash, Halibel’s towering stature stepped forward, along with another three tall figures doing so simultaneously.

Those tall figures were Halibel, each one an exact duplicate of the others.

However—

Eugard: “That acrobatics feat of thine, I have witnessed erstwhile.”

The Yang Sword wielded in his raised right hand descended, and flames covered the path of the four Halibels.

The hue of the scorching flames was too intense, creating a curtain of flames on the street that even appeared white, forcing Halibel and his duplicates to make a choice. Namely, the options were to leap over the flames or to take a detour—however, Halibel took neither of these two choices, and instead went for a third.

Halibel: “It’s a lil bit different from the trick I showed ya earlier.”

Two of the four Halibels took the lead, thrusting their palms into the rising curtain of flames.

Halibel’s palms, released in conjunction with a step that caused the cobblestones to explode, moved like battering rams that could blow away a poorly constructed castle gate in a single strike. However, these two strikes were stopped just short of the flames simultaneously, and the generated wind turned into a storm, blowing away the fire.

Eugard’s expressionless brows moved slightly at the strike, but it was still too early to be surprised.

The two who had lagged behind surpassed the two who had advanced earlier, forcefully slamming the same battering ram palms into Eugard’s torso.

Eugard: “—Hk.”

Suppressing the groan in the depths of his throat, Eugard was blown directly backwards by the impact. However, it was shallow. In an instant, Halibel’s palms were caught by the flat side of the Yang Sword, and he himself was propelled backwards.

Even so, though Halibel’s attack could not be completely nullified, Eugard was forced to recognize his extraordinary martial skills despite his position as Emperor.

Without assuming the position of an Emperor, he would have felt as if he had lost face, as his opponent was solely a shinobi.

But, it could not be helped.

Given Eugard's constitution, he could not rely on subordinates to protect himself. The Emperor had no choice but to protect himself.

Halibel: "I ain't gonna hold back."

Disregarding the circumstances, the pursuit did not ease for Eugard, who had been blown away.

To kill the inertia of flying backward, Eugard slid his toes on the ground and turned towards the voice of Halibel that had sounded nearby, and he attempted to deliver a slash with a twist of his body.

However, the Halibel who was there received the diagonal slash, and promptly disappeared in a scattering of fur. From directly below, another Halibel kicked up, catching Eugard with widened eyes.

Eugard: "Muggh…"

Kicked in the back, Eugard floated in the air and as he was pounded by Halibel from all directions. From all sides, there were mirror images of wolfmen who swung their hands in karate chops. Eugard, however, was not about to let himself be defeated, and used the Yang Sword's pulverizing ability against them.

In essence, in the explosion of the atmosphere caused by super-rapid heating, their movement would be disrupted.

The bright, red-hot Yang Sword spun in the explosion, and Eugard's slash circled in the air as it cleaved all four Halibels in half.

Instantly, the four Halibels erupted in flames—all of them turning into fur.

Instead, from directly above, an elbow strike as powerful as a battle-axe smashed Eugard in the head, and the Emperor crashed into the streets of Imperial Capital as he spun vertically, creating a circular crater accompanied by the sound of an explosion.

Landing beside the crater, Halibel quickly reached out, catching the kiseru that he had tossed with his mouth just before the collision.

And then—

Halibel: “That’s somethin’ that’d usually kill ya, but I’m guessin’ things won’t go that easy?”

Eugard: “—Indeed.”

Amidst the dispersing smoke, Halibel’s voice as he looked down into the center of the cavity was met with a calm response.

Though it was quite harsh to not have inflicted any damage despite everything he had done, the outcome was as expected, so the emotional toll was kept to a minimum. With this current confrontation, Halibel revised his evaluation of the Yang Sword and the Fiend Sword. He had initially considered the Fiend Sword to be more dangerous, but the Yang Sword was proving to be more than formidable.

And more than that—

Eugard: “Art thou employing both clones with substance and clones that are hollow?”

While raising his body within the crater, Eugard analyzed their combat from just moments prior.

Neither confirming nor denying the observation as correct or incorrect, Halibel licked the blood dripping from the cut that had emerged on his left cheek with his tongue, offering silence as his response.

Eugard: “Such technique would require a blood-curdling ordeal to master. ‘Tis worthy of commendation.”

Halibel: “Well, thanks for that.”

His responses were kept minimal to avoid giving up information unnecessarily, but Eugard’s observation was correct.

Halibel’s “clones” could be divided into two types, those that were merely illusions made of fur, and genuine clones with substance on par with Halibel’s real body.

With this combination, the essence of Halibel’s fighting style evolved around toying with his opponents, and even just the illusory clones were equipped with the ability to completely subdue any average opponent.

The problem was that Eugard was not any average opponent, and furthermore, Halibel’s signature tactic of cursecraft would not work against him.

Techniques designed to kill would not be effective against an opponent who was already dead.

Not to mention that Eugard’s soul had already been inflicted with a curse so strong that no others could surpass it in that regard.

However—

Halibel: “If I don’t follow through on the things I’ve decided to do, I’ll be in for a scoldin’ by lil’ Ana.”

Spinning the kiseru around in his hand, he placed the next piece of tobacco into the bowl and lit it.

Same as before, he filled his lungs with smoke in one go, and deceived his brain with the illusion that his limbs were coursing with strength. Then, towards Eugard, who was in the center of the cavity, his next attack would—

Eugard: “This shan’t do, as thou art too formidable. I have no choice but to display mine true strength.”

In the next instant, Eugard leapt out of the crater and raised the Yang Sword before him.

As the Yang Sword descended, Halibel promptly intervened, not with a sword, but by catching Eugard's right arm which held the weapon to block the attack.

Immediately after, the released shockwave passed behind Halibel, reducing the mangled and incinerated remains of the Imperial Capital's buildings to scattered embers.

At this moment, Eugard only held the lone Yang Sword in his hand. The Fiend Sword he had wielded in his left hand until then had been thrust into the cavity, abandoned.

That was not a decision to relinquish a powerful weapon.

Eugard: "Rather than dual wielding a combination of twain swords I have yet to grow accustomed to, I shall face you with the single blade in which mine mastery doth reside."

Halibel: "Really now, you're a darn unpleasant person, Yer Excellency the Emperor."

In all cases, choosing the opponent's least favored option was originally the style of a shinobi.

Against Eugard, who implemented that with insight and determination, Halibel kept Eugard's arm restrained, and had his clones step forward from three other directions.

A palm blow and a kick, together with one of them delivering a scatter shot of flying debris by striking a stone they had scooped out from the ground—Eugard, with his arm held, deflected them away with his overwhelming swordsmanship.

The Yang Sword in his right hand had instantly vanished, then had reappeared in his left hand, and through that he was able to blow the three approaching Halibels away whilst scorching them.

Two among them were clones made of fur, but the one who had performed the scatter shot was a genuine body.

Sensing the burnt smell of his own fur being scorched, Halibel delivered a karate chop, boring into the cheek of the Eugard as it grazed past, and a few seconds of ultra-high grade combat had begun.

3

—Herein, there lay an irony that ought to be called a twist of fate.

The Curse of Thorns had forced Eugard into solitude, but the curse itself brought no pain whatsoever to Eugard, who had congenital analgesia. However, even if Eugard was divorced from pain, it was a fact that the curse still ate into his body, and that he continued to receive its effects.

In truth, though the young Eugard had not felt pain either, he did experience a suffocating sensation due to the oppressive nature of the curse, and his actions had thus been limited. But, that influence had determined the amount of time he had left, and was rather inconvenient for Eugard, who had already made up his mind concerning the things he wanted to do.

The level of concord between his body and mind was uncertain.

But, at some point, the effects of the Curse of Thorns had stopped having any disturbance whatsoever on Eugard's body, and Eugard became fully capable of taking action for the sake of fulfilling his own objectives.

That was to say, Eugard's body had grown to be able to deal with the danger that constantly threatened his life. —The details of how the strongest Emperor in the history of the Empire had been born lay within that irony.

Having optimized itself in order to simply live, Eugard's body worked incredibly as a foundation for nurturing his mechanical diligence.

In a position where no guards could be assigned to him, Eugard had trained himself in order to protect himself; having been granted talent, as well as a body that could fully utilize that talent, he continued to grow stronger beyond comparison.

Since the Curse of Thorns had made Eugard stronger, this was a meaningless supposition, but his strength and ability with the sword were such that even if the Curse of Thorns had been absent, he still would have been able to wipe out the Nine Divine Generals of that era.

Of course, Eugard's battles, in reality, almost always consisted of him beheading an opponent who was suffering from the effects of the Curse of Thorns, and his battles against the Nine Divine Generals went mostly the same.

For Eugard, battles were not a contest of strength, but rather a situation in which he must perform the duty of executioner.

Eugard: "I bestow mine praise."

This was not a widely known fact, but among the Vollachian Emperors throughout history, Eugard Vollachia was the Emperor who spoke those words the most.

Precisely because they stood not on the same base, precisely because he understood he had been granted a position that differed to that of others, Eugard was generous in his praise towards others.

Therefore, this was quite the ironic encounter.

The ironic fact that the Emperor of the Briar, who had given the most praise to others in the history of the Empire, and the wolfman who took that way of being upon himself in the modern day, naming himself the Admirer, were clashing here like this, separated by life and death.

But within this chance encounter, there yet remained another irony that ought to be called a twist of fate.

As mentioned previously, battles were always a one-sided affair for Eugard.

As the Curse of Thorns ate into his target, Eugard would face off against enemies that could by no means be said to be in perfect or usual condition, and he would behead them; he never attained victory by any other means.

That general conception Eugard Vollachia held of “battles”, began to change.

Through his fierce clash against the Admirer, Halibel, a wolfman who did not receive the curse, that change was yielded.

Eugard: “Hah—”

As a breath leaked out from his slightly opened mouth, a flash of Eugard’s blade dyed the world in crimson.

The fiery flash of the sword diagonally cut through the air, yet within the path it carved, the figure of the tall wolfman was nowhere to be found. His opponent had ceased producing clones at random, and had altered his movements towards a thorough evasive maneuver.

His objective was not to buy time, but rather to ascertain Eugard’s swordsmanship.

Eugard: “A fine decision.”

Honest praise, complimenting that the correct choice had been made, filled Eugard’s heart.

This resurrected body was in great shape despite the poor quality of its skin, and Eugard even harbored the misapprehension that he could move inexhaustibly.

Of course, that was not the case in reality. This body was not something that could surpass his strength in life, and he ought not to desire anything more excessive than the restoration capabilities whenever the body was broken.

Even the bodies of the undead still felt pain all the same.

Ergo, Eugard stood here alone as the guardian of this location. Even if the others were undead, so long as they entered the range of the curse, they would still be tormented by the binding.

For even if they were undead, Eugard had no intention of indiscriminately inflicting pain upon the peoples of his country.

And above all—

Eugard: “I do not wish to allow any personage to disturb mine battle against thee.”

A battle, this was indeed a battle.

Contesting his skills against Halibel’s, while altering the very form of the Imperial Capital, Eugard funneled all his might into the arm wielding the Yang Sword, and absorbed himself in his rendezvous with an enemy who refused to die.

Since his birth, since his death, this was the very first time he felt his spirits surge within himself while swinging his sword at another.

The first time Eugard had fatally wounded a person was when an assassin, having broken into the mansion where he lived in isolation from his family, writhed in agony in the courtyard as they held their chest, begging for Eugard to kill them.

Ever since taking his first life at the age of seven, as far as Eugard was concerned, drawing a sword was tantamount to performing an execution.

Though, how was that?

The sensation of wielding his trained swordsmanship to the fullest, yet still only pursuing a life it could not reach, oh what a luscious and esteemed sensation it was.

Eugard: “…”

His thrust-out arm was caught from above and below by his opponent’s karate chop and knee, pulverizing his elbow. The Yang Sword which had parted from his hand vanished into the air, and transferring it to his intact right hand, it flashed with a horizontal strike.

His opponent evaded it by slipping into the ground, and brushing Eugard’s left hip with his fingertips as he slipped through, a hole around the size of a fist was gouged into his hips.

As he turned around, he made an attempt to reach the distant back with the Yang Sword, but he was thwarted by the outstretched arm of a clone from another direction; simultaneously unleashing kicks at the chest of the other, he was furiously blown away. Blown away. Away.

Eugard: “Half a step.”

Next time, he would take half a step further.

Even though Eugard’s swordsmanship had failed to do so just ten-odd seconds prior, he was confident that he would be able to do so the next time around. It was a feat he had never performed during his lifetime or after his death, however, he could envision innumerable derivative techniques.

That was the growth of an undead, greedy to the point of desperation.

—Forced into solitude by the Curse of Thorns, and with his notion of battles having been altered to that of executions, Eugard Vollachia had never had the opportunity to improve his strength as a warrior.

For the purpose of self-defense, his sword could be trained as much as was necessary due to his unique circumstance, but naught more than that had been required.

That swordsmanship of Eugard’s was now rapidly gaining a vast amount of experience, becoming greatly polished.

Eugard was completely unaware that the being he was facing off against was the strongest being of the Kararagi City-States—namely, a being among the top five most powerful individuals within the current world.

But, absorbing such enormous amounts of combat experience through this confrontation of which he was ignorant, as an undead, Eugard was allowed to grow into a being that greedily became stronger, to an extent much greater than he had been during his lifetime.

Eugard: “I bestow praise… Nay, I thank thee.”

Therefore, what spilled from Eugard’s mouth was not commendation, but rather gratitude.

A descendent of the abhorrent wolfpeople, had brought about a powerful emotion which Eugard had never felt during his lifetime. Since that was not a displeasing sensation, there ought to have been an appropriate evaluation of the one who had presented it.

That was something that had come from the bottom of Eugard’s heart.

Halibel: “Ya don’t gotta thank me. ‘Cuz after all, I’m gonna win.”

As ever, Halibel’s quick comebacks were irreverent, but even that irreverence was refreshing.

When he thought back on it, Eugard had scarcely experienced being talked back to, perhaps because people did not want to oppose the Curse of Thorns. Excluding those who had chosen to betray him, it was essentially only Iris who had ever expressed her opinions to Eugard—.

Eugard: “—O Star of Mine.”

In front of Eugard as he muttered so, the figure of the wolfman faded like mist.

Combining a peculiar walking technique with an unbelievable movement speed, an optical illusion occurred in a form differing from that of the clones. At the sensation of afterimages being left in his consciousness, Eugard could not help but admire that versatility.

However, there was no need for him to be deluded by such a cheap trick. The approaching presences were from directly above, and from his left and right; at the signs that lethal strikes were furiously closing in, Eugard turned the other way, utterly undaunted.

Then, going half a step further than last time, he stepped towards the rear.

Eugard: “Thou plainly scatterest thy presence. —Ergo, the direction bereft of any presence is where thou truly residest.”

Halibel: “Guh.”

His angle of turning around had been insufficient, but still the bottom of the Yang Sword’s hilt sunk into Halibel’s side. The moment he received the sensation of his opponent’s bone shattering, Eugard immediately channeled heat into the Yang Sword’s blade—the yielded explosion allowed the bottom of the hilt to bury itself even deeper, crushing Halibel’s insides.

Eugard: “OHHHHHH—!!!”

With an impact so powerful that it broke his own wrist, Eugard blew Halibel away.

Realizing that he had involuntarily roared as he blew his opponent away, Eugard gained a slight shock. Within Eugard’s vision, the blown away Halibel crashed into the rampart, and the wall violently fissured; the tall wolfman threw out his legs, and lowered his head.

That had been all of Eugard’s might. He had unleashed a tremendous blow, the most polished blow he had ever fired off in all his time both alive and post mortem.

That sensation was being updated again and again during his fight against Halibel. Half a step, he had taken half a step further. Next time, he might even go half a step further, and then half a step further again.

Or even further, further beyond, to where scenery, the likes of which Eugard had never before seen, was stretched out.

If Halibel stood back up and continued to fight, he might be able to grasp that. Henceforth, rise, rise, rise and do battle; as Eugard recognized that he was thinking this from the bottom of his heart—.

Eugard: “—I must hasten to the side of Mine Star. I am finished with thee.”

Taking the upsurge of spirits approaching their peak and his strong emotions as a warrior, he twisted them into love towards Iris.

Halibel: “…”

He shall admit to it. His battle against Halibel had indeed raised his spirits.

In every conceivable meaning, this had been a stimulus which he had never experienced in either his lifetime or his time after death. He had gained the perspective that upon that path of enhancing himself, which he had not gone down before in his life, such scenery existed.

He did not know whether he would ever be able to have an experience as significant as this in the future.

However, even so, no matter what.

Eugard: “It doth not compare to having Mine Star within mine sight, even if that is for but a blink of an eye.”

That was Eugard’s sense of values, something that had never changed in both his lifetime, or after his death.

No matter the unknown stimuli or elevation of spirits, they would not be able to reach Eugard, who knew Iris.

Despite having understood that he ought to relinquish it, that he ought to give up on it, the reason Eugard had desired the Imperial Throne was because he understood that without it, he would not be able to keep the time he had with Iris for even a second longer.

Since he had obtained the Imperial Throne in exchange for that selfishness, even though the time after he had lost Iris was far longer than the time he had spent with her, he continued to fulfill his duties as Emperor.

Eugard Vollachia was the Emperor who had spent the least amount of time in the Crystal Palace of the Imperial Capital during his reign.

After losing Iris, Eugard spent most of his life as Emperor by his lonesome. He even concluded the objective of producing successors with a minimal amount of contact, and had dedicated his life to the Empire.

Everything else in his life, he used for the sake of Iris.

Therefore—

Eugard: "—I slay thee, O sable wolfman."

Declaring that any further time was unnecessary, Eugard took the Yang Sword in his hand, and turned his feet towards the rampart.

Then, he aimed to burn the collapsed Halibel to a crisp with a flash of the sword—he had been unable to do so. Having just attempted to swing the Yang Sword, Eugard's right arm burst open at the shoulder.

Eugard: "What?"

At the impact that gave him no sensation of being pierced, Eugard raised his eyebrows. But, the pinnacle of his shock lay at what occurred right after. —The arm of the undead did not begin to regenerate.

Having been shattered like ceramic, fragments of his right arm scattered, and the Yang Sword was thrust into the ground.

And then—

Halibel: "—Finally found the deadspot."

Akin to an exhale, Halibel spoke in a low voice as he stood up from the rampart. The wolfman, leaning his back against the fissured wall as he stood up, placed his kiseru in his mouth once again.

Slowly, he placed tobacco into the bowl, snapped his fingers to set it alight, and breathed the smoke into his lungs. While beholding that action, Eugard placed his hand over the injury of his right arm which was not recovering.

The arm that had disappeared from his right shoulder onwards showed no signs of starting to regenerate.

He clearly understood. Eugard's right arm had been the first part of his resurrected body to die anew.

The one who had done that was Halibel who stood before his eyes, and it seemed to be the result of the "deadspot" of which he had spoken.

Eugard: "There yet remaineth an abundance of things of which I am unaware."

Halibel: "Ain't that right. It's fantastic that I was able ta teach ya that. The wolfpeople were 'bout to be wiped out just before I could do so."

Clearing his throat with a smile, Halibel nodded as smoke escaped his nostrils.

The versatility of this wolfman had impressed him repeatedly, but this was the highest grade. To think he was even equipped with a technique to kill the undead, his skills and expertise were terrifying.

Eugard: "In the same manner as thou hadst rended mine arm, shalt thou take even mine life?"

Halibel: "That was my intention for observin' ya after all. Seems like it'll be a lil' tough, but… well, I think I'mma be able ta do it, don't ya agree?"

Eugard: "Thy boasting is irreverent. However, as it is refreshing, I shall forgive it."

Drawing the Yang Sword out of the ground with his remaining left hand, he faced Halibel. Though he could not read the expression of Halibel, who stood with a loose posture, that statement and demeanor were audacious, and they were no bluff.

Eugard's opponent had also made preparations to slay him. As the bugging passion within his chest, something he had become aware of for the first time, surged once again, he immediately trampled it.

Feeling an unknown avarice within himself, he could clearly state this.

There existed no radiance in this world that could satisfy Eugard more than Iris.

That was why—

Eugard: "—Sixty-first Emperor, Eugard Vollachia."

Halibel: "—Admirer, Halibel."

They gave their introductions, and in the next moment, the figures of both Eugard and Halibel disappeared, as time itself vanished.

Eugard: "…"

Behind each of them as they plunged forth, the kicked ground exploded, and clouds of smoke immediately erupted. Using those explosions as a propelling force, the dozens of meters between Eugard and Halibel had disappeared.

With such extreme speed that it appeared as if the world had shrunk, Eugard's blade sliced through the air in anticipation. The unleashed slash of red dyed its diagonal path a deep crimson, and releasing heat a moment belayed, a scorching temperature capable of melting even stone and turning it to liquid was produced.

However, Halibel slightly inclined his body to evade that slash, and only suffering the flesh of his back being slightly singed red at his right shoulder, he pressed forth.

Then, towards Eugard, who lacked an arm, Halibel sprang his front leg up and kicked; Eugard raised up his knee and caught the blow, and a shockwave exploded between the two of them.

The shockwave blew the flames and rubble around them away, and at a distance where they could feel each other's breaths, they furiously traded blows. Between karate chops and the treasured sword of crimson, between kicks and elbows, ramming and grappling techniques interlaced, and the blink of close combat chipped away at Eugard's body, piece by piece.

But, his opponent had also sustained damage.

Strangely enough, despite having an arm missing, the degree of wear and tear on both sides was around the same.

Therefore, in order to secure victory, Eugard took half a step further mentally.

Eugard: “—The Yang Sword Vollachia.”

In the midst of their rally, the treasured sword, its name having been called out, vanished from Eugard’s hand.

Sheathed into the sky, it was a supreme treasured sword that could be freely drawn again. Having relinquished it, the left hand that had become empty caught Halibel’s knee, and he crossed gazes with his opponent’s thread-like eyes.

As irony would have it, the eyes of the wolfman and the undead were both of golden hue; just what did those eyes see? Putting strength into his jaw, enough to bite through the mouthpiece of his kiseru, Halibel’s body greatly bent backwards.

Above his head, the Yang Sword, which was unsheathed from the sky, nearly grazed him.

The Yang Sword that had been sheathed in the sky, was drawn again from the sheath that was the sky. By utilizing that mechanism of sheathing and unsheathing the sword, Eugard performed a deadly strike—though it was the first time he had used it, it had been magnificently dodged.

However, with his stance broken, Halibel used his momentum from bending backwards to place his hands on the ground, and furiously performed backwards somersaults to avoid, avoid, and avoid the successive slashes.

As Halibel escaped from him, Eugard took a moment to charge up his next sword slash—he noticed something.

Eugard: “…”

Beyond the backwards somersaulting Halibel, there was the crater in the ground which Eugard had made.

And towards that cavity, a small figure from outside the battlefield leapt—it was Groovy. Groovy Gumlet, who ought to have withdrawn from the warfront, leapt whilst coughing up blood.

In the direction he was headed, the Fiend Sword was lodged within the crater, and reaching his hand towards it—

Eugard: “Magnificent coordination. —However…”

He did not call the sudden intrusion an act of cowardice.

He had been aware of Groovy’s existence from the outset. For Groovy to assist Halibel in the eleventh hour was only natural, since they were allies, or rather, anything else would not have made sense.

But, he would not allow that action. Overcoming even that, Eugard would be victorious.

Eugard: “—I shan’t allow thee to take the Fiend Sword.”

Holding the Yang Sword aloft, Eugard threw it at Groovy as the latter leapt towards the cavity.

That instant, the speed of the treasured sword accelerated as it spewed fire, and becoming a ray of crimson light, it went past Halibel’s flank, and made a mad dash towards Groovy.

Even if he had let go of it, the forte of the Yang Sword was such that he could return it to his hand at any given moment.

After the treasured sword skewered Groovy, he would recall the Yang Sword to his hand and challenge Halibel. Rather, at this moment, it was a delightful miscalculation that his body was now lighter without the Yang Sword as he pursued Halibel.

Of course, he had also considered the possibility that Halibel had aimed for this, and would counterattack, so he readied himself, and —

Groovy: "—Hk."

The thrown Yang Sword flew in a straight path and skewered Groovy's small body.

Even though Groovy twisted his body, the treasured sword of crimson still pierced his right side. As the blade bore deep into his body, Groovy widened his eyes and coughed up a blood clot at that impact, and then, an ear-splitting screech—

Groovy: "—We got you, fuckface."

Had not been let out.

Instead, Groovy's bloodstained mouth smiled, and he stretched out his finger to point at Eugard. There was disrespect, but surpassing even that, there was a shock that occurred within Eugard's vision.

With just one more step to go ahead of him, Groovy's hand did not reach the Fiend Sword, but even though he had not touched it, it snapped out of the crater as if to escape from his hand, and flew away.

Groovy: "Just so you know, this bitch-ass katana fucking loathes me…"

It was reasoning beyond his comprehension, however, such strange idiosyncrasies were an unavoidable part of Enchanted and Treasured Swords.

Snapping out, the Fiend Sword fled from the cavity while revolving, and caught by a hand covered in black fur, the bewitching luster of the blade flickered.

—With the Fiend Sword in hand, Halibel readied himself before Eugard.

Eugard: "…"

For a brief moment of combat, Eugard immediately recalled the Yang Sword; with the treasured sword no longer inside of him, Groovy's abdomen spilled a vast amount of blood.

But, Eugard had certainly taken up a weapon, and brandished it towards Halibel, who shouldered the Fiend Sword.

Then, as the flash of crimson swung down from overhead, it was unleashed as a blow that updated the most supreme swordsmanship in all Eugard’s time both alive and after death—

Halibel: “Really now, that’s just so darn praiseworthy. —If it weren’t me, that woulda completely destroyed anyone on the receivin’ end.”

Eugard: “What an arrogant manner of speech. However, taking that preeminent feat into consideration, I shall forgive it.”

As Halibel made that statement at such a close distance, Eugard drew his chin back without altering his expression.

Suffering a conclusive blow from the Fiend Sword that surpassed even the finest brandish of Eugard Vollachia, Eugard’s body was severed obliquely.

Halibel had been the one to perform that feat, and around the left side of his chest, the Curse of Thorns was coiled.

The fact that Eugard Vollachia truly felt admiration from the bottom of his heart in regards to the Admirer, Halibel, was something that, without a single word needing to be said, was exceedingly obvious between the two who had crossed swords.

Vic.II2O

Chapter 51:
Tennozan

1

—Through the strategy devised by Natsuki Subaru, the “Rescue the Vollachian Empire from Destruction Squad” had dispersed to various places in the Imperial Capital.

It was a strategy that aimed to have them all coordinated and to not interfere with each other as they each accomplished their respective roles, but the most important part of it was not actually any of the faces fighting in the Imperial Capital.

The key to this strategy was, decisively, all the strength of the Empire that had been left behind in the Fortified City of Garkla.

With the military forces deployed throughout it on a mass-scale, it was a large city carrying personnel equivalent to the brains and heart of Vollachia.

For how long would they have to hold back the hosts of undead marching on the city in order to seize it? That was undoubtedly the time limit imposed on the ultimate decisive battle on which the survival of the Vollachian Empire was staked; not only that, but in addition to the Empire, the destiny of the entire world would be divined by this important point.

By gathering as many of the undead to the Fortified City as they could, it would become easier for the “Rescue from Destruction Squad” to take action in the Imperial Capital. But at the same time, if the Fortified City were to fall, even supposing the Imperial Capital side were to succeed, it would likely be impossible for the Empire to rebuild in the aftermath.

That was to say—

???: “—Undoubtedly, this shall be as decisive as “Tennozan”.”

Wielding a Knight's sword, while speaking words that were not very familiar to his ears, Julius Juukulius ran across a rampart of the Fortified City with his tall stature, and gallantly fluttered through the air.

The elegant Knight directed the tip of his sword towards a horde of undead clinging to the rampart, trying to invade the city. Thrusting their weapons into the wall, the enemies climbed up while making improvised footholds; spinning as he swooped down upon them, Julius's sword flashed unrelentingly.

Julius: "I will not allow it!"

The arms and backs of the undead clinging to the wall were showered in slashes as they were felled to the ground.

And, as Julius jumped upon one of the blades they had been using as a foothold, he turned his eyes to the countless weapons that had been thrust into the wall, and,

Julius: "Aro! I wish to borrow your wind!"

After calling that out, a green wind burst forth, and as if coiling around them, it pulled all the weapons out from the wall they had been lodged into, and the toils of the undead that had been building up those footholds, were reduced to naught in a single stroke.

Finally, breaking the sword he stood upon with a jump, Julius returned to the top of the rampart.

While tickling the green light of his contracted spirit, Julius took a slight breather.

He had succeeded in hindering the enemies that had been clinging to this wall, but he could not afford to be careless.

Even if they broke past the city's utmost outer wall, there was still a second-most, and third-most outer bulwark, and even more sturdy fortresses, but nevertheless—

???: "It is faster than we had expected for them to have already gotten this close."

Julius: “—Miss Taritta.”

Standing atop the rampart, calling out to Julius as he caught his breath, was a dark-skinned woman with part of her black hair dyed blue—the female warrior who commanded the People of Shudraq, Taritta.

Since every member of the tribe wielded bows, the Shudraqian warriors could attack the undead from afar, and they were one of the primary forces in holding the Fortified City against the siege. Taritta, whose skill with the bow especially stood out even among the excellent archery of the Shudraq, was one of the cornerstones of the current defensive battle.

In fact, just like Julius, who had just removed the weapons that had been thrust into the rampart, she was obstructing the undead from surmounting the wall by firing arrows from atop the rampart.

He admired how truly reliable her skills were, but her words were a cruel reality that could not be ignored.

Julius: “—In such a short period of time, the front line has been pushed back to this extent.”

As he said that, Julius turned his gaze to the outside of the ramparts and stroked the scar underneath his left eye.

Ahead of Julius’s intrepid gaze, the heads of the advancing hosts of undead could be seen swaying all the way to the horizon, so it was visually apparent that an extraordinarily large army was approaching.

The line of defense that had originally been deployed outside the ramparts was broken through, and the Imperial Soldiers fighting on the outside were forced to draw the warfront back and downsize. Though of course, when considering the enormous number of enemies, there was no doubt that they had foreseen that this would happen eventually.

Taritta: “The occasional formidable undead among them are quite difficult to deal with, aren’t they?”

Julius: “I concur. As soon as they are found, there is no choice but to have a capable individual in close vicinity deal with them, but…”

Indeed, it happened right as Julius uttered those words.

???: “—Hk!!”

On the battlefield below them, the group that had been fighting together as one single mass were blown away all in one go.

Looking down, what flew through the air whilst raising thick screams, were members of the Pleiades Battalion, whom Subaru had hastened to the Imperial Capital with as reinforcements.

Through some perplexing strategy, it was a battalion composed of individuals who each boasted bizarre strength; having blown away its members, scattering them, was someone holding large swords in both of their arms—no, with both of her arms entirely transformed into large swords, was a female undead of a dreadful, heinous appearance.

???: “Fuck… now you’ve really gone and done it…!”

???: “Wait wait wait wait! Don’t go rushin’ in without a plan! Bro’ll need to shoulder the burden!”

???: “Fall back! We’ll have everyone surround her and then take her down!”

Before the heinous undead, the group that should have been done for stoutly stood back up.

Without incurring any casualties, their undeterred fighting spirit was worthy of praise, but even from Julius’s perspective, the strength of that female warrior was unmistakably first-class.

Thinking that he must rush there at once, Julius was about to leave the rampart to Taritta, and jump down below—

???: “—Nah, Lion Knight-kun is already there.”

Striking upon Julius’s eardrums, was a voice disproportionately cheerful for the battlefield. The information brought about by that voice, did in fact give rise to change on the battlefield beneath them.

Having rushed over to the warrior who dual-wielded large swords, golden mace in hand, was Goz.

Goz: “I have never had the opportunity to face you, but neither is there a chance that I could mistake you! So you have been resurrected, Gladiator Empress!!”

As Goz roared, his mace and the female warrior’s large swords collided, and a shockwave blew violently across the battlefield.

Between the two of them, extremely heavyweight weaponry which an ordinary person would never be able to lift traded blows, and the ensuing violence scattered the surrounding Imperial Soldiers and undead, tossing them around like a storm.

It was a skirmish where one must stand their ground, but he had ceased advancing towards it. It was best to entrust that place to Goz.

Julius: “I thank you for stopping me, Flop-dono.”

Flop: “Ha-ha-ha, no problem! It’s just because I had to let Finest-kun and Taritta-san focus on the battle right in front of them! This is about all that my powerless self can do to be useful!”

Smiling without getting worked up was Flop, whose bright attitude remained unchanged even on the battlefield.

As a non-combatant, and brother to a candidate for Empress Consort, he should have been ordered to be on stand-by within the fortress. He had shown up on a rampart which could have even been called the front line, so Tarrita was shocked.

Taritta: “Flop?! Why are you here…?”

Flop: “Huh, it’s because the situation appears to be an all-out war. Providing aid to the wounded, repairing equipment, there’s tons of stuff like that for people who can’t fight to do. Naturally, I’m also one of those people.”

Patting his slim chest, Flop held out a quiver to Taritta.

Taritta accepted it without a second thought; she already carried a quiver on her back, but the remaining number of arrows was not an amount she could depend on, so Flop’s resupply was just what she needed.

So then, he had probably also walked along the rampart distributing quivers to the other Shudraqians.

Including the non-combatants, everybody was taking part in this battle. His attitude embodied those words.

Flop: “How’s the war situation?”

Taritta: “—. Everybody is fighting hard. If we keep up the defensive battle, we will be able to defend the wall for some time. But also…”

Julius: “It would be a different story if a flying dragon rider were to appear among our opponents.”

Taritta responded to Flop’s question, and as she hesitated to continue, Julius provided the conclusion in her stead. At that reply, Flop’s expression earnestly stiffened.

Given that he was a young man who was always cheerfully smiling, that slight action was strangely impactful. But, it was only natural for his expression to become severe.

The people of the Vollachian Empire were more than aware of how incredible flying dragon riders were.

Flop: “…”

Right after the battle had begun, through a simultaneous attack by Julius and the People of Shudraq, the deceased flying dragons that had closed in as the first wave—the undead flying dragons had been deterred. Thereafter, all the threats from the sky that sporadically came flying in were reliably dealt with by the Shudraqians, who had been granted the duty of undead flying dragon hunting.

However, that was only possible because there were no undead serving as flying dragon riders among their opponents.

The ability of untamed flying dragons was incomparable to that of flying dragons that were united with a flying dragon rider.

Just a single pair of flying dragon and rider would likely be able to overpower even a flock of one hundred flying dragons in a clash. That was how exceptional flying dragon riders, who tactically utilized the sky, were.

—In the past, Julius had once crossed blades with a flying dragon rider.

Back then, he had miraculously seized victory thanks to the assistance of Ferris, who was traveling with him, but if Julius had been by himself, the positions of winner and loser would have surely been flipped.

There would likely never be another flying dragon rider to that caliber within the Empire, but, if rather than just undead flying dragons appearing on this warfront against the undead, there were to appear an undead flying dragon rider mounted upon one, the situation would completely change.

Flop: "Of course, a deceased flying dragon rider and their beloved dragon being revived together… because the precedent of that is extremely rare, it's conceivable that the city's skies have still yet to be taken."

That opinion of Flop's was likely correct when inspecting the current siege situation.

Flying dragon riders were a threat, but it took a long time for riders and their flying dragons to build trust, and without man and dragon undoubtedly becoming one, their true value could not be displayed.

That rule was something that could not be ignored, even supposing they were dead people being resurrected via principles beyond the realm of reason.

Without an undead rider and undead flying dragon that had been together since they were alive, the phenomenon of “undead flying dragon riding” could not be actualized.

At present, that was likely the reason why there were no undead flying dragon riders seen in the skies of the Fortified City.

Julius: “…But, it is ironic that the one rare instance of it occurring happened to be the most formidable flying dragon rider.”

Denying that faint relief, was the existence of the undead flying dragon rider which Julius had ascertained with his own eyes.

The undead who had appeared in the midst of the battle on the coupled dragon carriages—Balleroy Temeglyph, sitting astride the deceased beloved dragon with whom he had been together since his lifetime, had plunged into the midst of the enemy with his overwhelming mobility.

If he were to participate in this battlefield, it was quite likely that he would destroy the Fortified City’s warfront as a single rider.

Even if he had not yet shown up at this moment, that possibility could not be excluded.

Flop: “—I don’t think you need to worry about that.”

Julius: “Flop-dono?”

Flop: “It’d be different if there were other flying dragon riders who were being resurrected, but I don’t think you need to worry about Balleroy showing up.”

With a tone and expression of extreme conviction, Flop denied Julius’s vigilance.

Julius knit his brows at that statement, and while firing arrows at the undead clinging to the wall, ascertaining that she had hit the opponent’s knee, Taritta spoke,

Taritta: “How can you say that definitively?”

Flop: “Because Balleroy knows that Medium and I were on the coupled dragon carriages. Naturally, he'd also be thinking that we're in this Fortified City. It'd be hard for him to come and lay waste to this place, right?"

Taritta: "That's…"

Flop replied with a single eye closed, to which Taritta was at a loss for words.

Julius was in agreement with Taritta's reaction. It was impossible to say that Flop's point had any persuasive power to it. If he had hopes for the undead Balleroy's emotions and compassion, then—

Julius: "Unfortunately, there is likely no hope for the humanity that they possessed during their lifetimes. The thoughts of the zombies… of the undead are being twisted. If not for that, it would be impossible for so many of the dead to participate in the ruin of their own country."

In fact, there was such an enormous number of undead mobilizing that they had blanketed the plains all the way to the horizon.

It was difficult to imagine that all of these undead had truly resented the Vollachian Empire since their lifetimes, and were all trying to carry out their long-cherished desire as soon as they were revived.

It was natural to think that the caster who had resurrected them, was manipulating the undead for their own benefit.

As Julius pointed that out, Flop scratched his cheek with a "Yeah" as he nodded.

Flop: "I have the same opinion as Finest-kun. In the first place, the thoughts of all the dead people are being changed. But still, I've seen that there are parts that haven't changed."

Julius: "So, are you saying that only Balleroy-dono still retains his emotions and compassion?"

Flop: "That would be a great shock to my feelings! But, that's not it, Finest-kun. Though, I think that you and Taritta-san would have an easier time noticing it than I did.”

Taritta: “We would?”

Without having any idea, Julius and Taritta exchanged glances.

Something that not Flop, who had shared a relationship with Balleroy during his lifetime, but rather Julius, whose blade had clashed with his spear, and Taritta, who had never even seen his face, could notice, that was—

Flop: “—It’s their fighting style.”

Julius: “…”

Flop: “Even if their thoughts have changed from when they were alive, to dispossess them of their fighting style would make it meaningless to resurrect the person in question. That’s why, all of the dead people have the same fighting style as they did during their lives. Am I mistaken?”

Julius: “…I cannot say anything for certain, but that possibility seems high.”

It was not as if he was deeply aware of the forms that the undead he fought took during their lifetimes, but Flop’s conjecture should have been right on the mark.

At Julius and Taritta’s affirmative reaction, Flop smiled.

With some traces of nostalgia and sorrow, it was a terribly melancholic smile.

Flop: “Supposing Balleroy were to come here, he would have come here at the outset before anybody else, shooting out the vital points of this city. The Magical Sharpshooter, Balleroy Temeglyph, didn’t serve as the vanguard. That’s my basis for thinking that Balleroy isn’t coming to this battlefield.”

2

—Balleroy Temeglyph was a man of principle who hated letting his subordinates recklessly die in vain.

However, that did not mean he hated the “law of iron and blood” employed by Vollachia, nor did that mean he was a philanthropist who stood in opposition to imperialism.

The Imperial way of thinking, which esteemed the strong and oppressed the weak, was something rather convenient for Balleroy, who had been born into a humble commoner household. It would not make sense for one to use that construction of society to rise in the world, and then flip-flop when they gain status.

But then again, Balleroy himself had not thought so deeply about it, and he was not particularly committed to imperialism. He had just been lucky that what was already there was compatible with his nature and talents.

Ergo, Balleroy’s hatred for his soldiers dying in vain was ultimately unrelated to imperialism.

This was a way of thinking that Balleroy had acquired from teachings given to him by others.

—In the formation of Balleroy’s character, there were two primary individuals who had imparted a great influence.

The first had found promise in his talents and picked him out, granting him opportunities such as receiving education and meeting his beloved dragon; his benefactor, Serena Dracroy.

The other had used an undiscerning Balleroy, still a young boy, to successfully deal with the pursuers who were after him for stealing; having met the embodiment of mischief itself, he was someone like a big brother to him, Miles.

Through his encounters and days spent with those two people, who possessed a mix of qualities that were both befitting and unbefitting of the Empire, the character of the individual known as Balleroy Temeglyph was constructed.

And, having been constructed, Balleroy’s humanity very much hated for his subordinates to die in vain.

Subordinates were individuals who were within his reach, they were his people. —He hated for his people to be sacrificed.

That was why, with the odds of victory having been decided beforehand, when he took part in the rebellion devised for the Emperor's convenience, Balleroy had not taken any of his subordinates with him, and instead joined by his lonesome.

In the end, he had lost his life because of that, so Balleroy's decision had been mistakenly correct.

—If one were to fight, the deaths of enemies and allies alike would be unavoidable.

He would also take the lives of others. He could not say that he wanted for that rule to only not apply for his people. But if he was to try to have things go that way, he could not rely on outside help, for it could only be fulfilled by his own strength.

Therefore, the conclusion Balleroy Temeglyph had arrived at, was that of the fastest sniper.

As the wings of his beloved dragon raced through the sky, he would create an ideal opening, and would shoot out the beings that were the vitals and heart of the opposing side—that was the best method for his desires to be granted.

Balleroy was a man of the Empire. No matter how many of his enemies died, his chest would not ache in the slightest.

But, he did not want his own people to die. That was why, Balleroy's sniping desired the fastest conclusion. Without regard to enemies or allies, he was confident that this was the best method of preventing casualties among his people.

Hence—

Balleroy: "—I gotcha, Carillon."

Responding to the call of his deceased beloved dragon, Balleroy stood up from the side of the bed.

In the bed before them, an unconscious Madelyn was silently asleep. —Currently, her consciousness was back inside the dragonhusk, Mezoreia.

Needless to say, the violent force of a “Dragon” was far too dangerous an excessive force to wield in the Imperial Capital.

But, it was frightening that when considering the enemies that could potentially face off against it, “excessive” was not a term that could be employed with certainty.

Balleroy: “I know I’m someone who once served, but you guys are absolutely nuts, you Empire folk.”

A “Dragon” was supposed to have been the toughest life form in this world, so it was a strange notion to have an idea of monsters that could not only compete with, but surpass one.

With his title, he had also been ranked among those individuals, but Balleroy himself did not think that his skills were on par with those who towered above all else like that.

Only, it was just that there was absolutely no correlation between being strong and seizing victory.

Stroking the sky-blue hair on Madelyn’s forehead, Balleroy began to head towards the balcony where his beloved dragon awaited. Midway through, he grabbed the spear that was leaning against the wall, and Carillon directed its back toward him, wings folded as it stood on the white balcony.

As he stroked the base of one of its wings, his beloved dragon nuzzled against Balleroy’s shoulder with its long neck.

That was exactly the relationship they had shared since Carillon had hatched from its egg. Carillon’s habits had not changed from the time when it was still small and weak, a baby flying dragon.

Balleroy: “Habits and preferences won’t change even if you die… Though, I guess I can’t speak for others.”

Saying that in a self-deriding tone, he flicked up the hand that had been stroking and gave a firm pat to the back. As Carillon lowered its posture at that signal, Balleroy gallantly jumped upon its back, and faced to the fore.

Taking in a sweeping view of the vast Imperial Capital just outside of the Crystal Palace's balcony, the beautifully organized cityscape was devastated, destroyed, and engulfed in the air of a battlefield all throughout.

This atmosphere was not just present in the Imperial Capital, but throughout the entire Empire—it was especially potent around the Fortified City of Garkla, where great hosts of undead were being sent.

The Fortified City had received the refugees and Imperial Soldiers who had evacuated from the Imperial Capital, and a vehement battle was now unfolding there. Originally, Balleroy also should have been an attacker in the siege of that city.

However—

???: "—The sensation of losing your nerve, I am also in the process of understanding it. Since there is fear that you may be unable to perform to your usual ability, it cannot be said to be appropriate. Command: Required."

The caster who had revived Balleroy—the Witch who called herself Sphinx, spoke thus as she decided to keep Balleroy in the Imperial Capital. Rather than concern for Balleroy, it felt more like she wanted to ascertain the unknown flavor of the sensation that was budding within herself for the first time.

Of course, there was also no doubt that there were expectations for Balleroy to control Madelyn, who had defected to this side, in order to secure the Cloud Dragon, Mezoreia, as an ally.

He had several reservations about the duty that was expected from him, but even without that, it was convenient for Balleroy to remain in the Imperial Capital.

Because, then things would end without him needing to encounter his siblings who had likely entered the Fortified City—was not the reason.

This was something Sphinx had judged, and it was also something Balleroy himself had intuited, but,

Balleroy: "If it were His Excellency, he'd come for sure, wouldn't he?"

The Vincent Vollachia that Balleroy knew was a cool-headed, stern Emperor.

Even if the castle lord would never move during times of peace, they would always try to stand with their own legs in the location of the ultimate conclusion. That was not just limited to Vincent, as it was customary for all Vollachian Emperors.

This could also be said to be the influence of the "law of iron and blood" which was considered to be the Imperial way.

Thus, while he hated the Vollachian Empire more than anybody else, Vincent would try to faithfully fulfill the duty of Vollachian Emperor, so he would be coming to the Imperial Capital no matter what.

In order to destroy the ringleader of the Great Disaster, Sphinx, he would come with Yang Sword in hand.

Balleroy: "—I sure got completely fooled by Chisha."

At the genesis of the Great Disaster, in a situation where he had not yet grasped the existence of the undead or of himself, despite there being no opportunity more ideal than that, Balleroy's surprise attack had not reached Vincent.

Chisha's meddling had saved Vincent, and the Great Disaster's fastest victory had been deterred.

However—

Balleroy: "Next time, nobody's gonna serve as His Excellency's shield."

He would absolutely not miss his next opportunity.

If Vincent himself was coming to the Imperial Capital, Balleroy would shoot him through the heart with certainty. Once he accomplished that, the hope of the Vollachian Empire would be severed.

And then, the threat of the Great Disaster would head north, and then even the Kingdom of Lugunica would—.

Carillon: "—Kiryararahhh."

That instant, the neighing of his beloved dragon drew Balleroy's attention towards "that".

Balleroy: "…"

Looking up as he felt a tingle on his neck, Balleroy doubted his own eyes.

Riding on Carillon's back, Balleroy had been seeking his target, the figure of Vincent, with a bird's-eye view over the battlefield-turned Imperial Capital, so he had been straining his eyes to see every detail and to not miss any changes on the battlefield.

From somewhere outside of Balleroy's vigilance, something had boldly taken aim for the Crystal Palace.

—Directly above the most beautiful palace in the world, blazing balls of flame rained down one after the other.

Balleroy: "Carillon!"

At his sharp call, his beloved dragon instantly spread its wings, and with the lift generated from their flapping, its large body soared up into the skies of the Imperial Capital. With each powerful flap of its wings, its speed and altitude swiftly climbed, and taking Balleroy up along with it, the undead flying dragon ascended to the sky.

As if to obstruct the ascending Balleroy's flight path, the flaming spheres, around the size of a human, relentlessly fell towards them. —And towards them, he aimed his spear.

Balleroy: “Ain’t gonna letcha!”

The tip of the spear within Balleroy’s hand contained a faint light as he pointed it towards the sky, and in that instant, the fired bullet of light collided with the descending blaze, and as an explosion occurred midair, the sky was dyed red.

It was not a single shot. Two shots, three shots, firing successively until thirteenth total light orbs shot down the flaming spheres; with a thunderous sound enveloping the skies of the Imperial Capital, Balleroy and Carillon pushed through the swelling flames of the explosion.

Balleroy: “What kinda stuff d’ya think you’re doing, passing above the clouds like that?”

He had swept away the fiery rain, yet Balleroy was amazed by the skill of his opponent.

If the balls of flame had come straight for the palace, or if they had flown in a parabola like an arrow or a stone, they would have easily been detected from the Crystal Palace. The reason why Balleroy’s eyes had been unable to do so was obvious: the flaming spheres had come from far away, flying above the thick clouds in the sky of the Imperial Capital, and then went straight downwards when they were directly above the Crystal Palace.

When putting it into words, what had been done was plain and simple. But, when compared to actually performing it, there was a difference between heaven and earth—the divine feat of throwing a stone above the clouds and hitting a target from a place several kilometers away, this was a deed more dreadfully difficult than accomplishing that without even using one’s hands.

But, Balleroy was in a position that, while seldom seen within the Empire, was capable of using magic, even if it was only specialized to one trick.

Balleroy: “I’mma hafta return the favor!”

Having finished dealing with the flaming spheres that had pierced the clouds and fell from the sky, Carillon soared to the heavens. Firmly holding onto its back, Balleroy's attention shifted to the far south of the Imperial Capital.

Due south of the Crystal Palace, the area around the gate of the Imperial Capital was being safeguarded by Mezoreia. From the distance and angle of the unleashed balls of flame, he judged that the enemy in question was a little to the west from there—Balleroy's undead left eye, dyed black with a golden iris looming within, the vicinity around it subtly wavered.

That was not due to any change yielded in Balleroy's face, but due to a change yielded in the atmosphere surrounding his left eye.

Using magic to bend light, Balleroy created a scope in order to see far into the distance. Looking through it with his left eye, he imposingly aimed his spearhead in that direction.

Securing the sniping angle and distance from his flying dragon's speed, he specialized in the one trick of firing bullets of light to achieve ultra-long-range sniping, and in combination with a scope of light that prevented him from losing sight of his target, Balleroy would fight.

Supposing it was an open plain with no obstacles, Balleroy's light orbs could hit a moving target from several kilometers away.

Balleroy: "…"

This time, too, Balleroy closed his right eye with the intention of doing so, and focused his attention to his left eye.

The non-existent scope created from the bending of light leapt across the cityscape of the Imperial Capital, and going even further beyond, grasped the figure of the enemy who had thrown those flaming spheres towards the Crystal Palace—

Balleroy: "—Medi."

Muttering out in a husky breath, Balleroy Temeglyph's scope clearly projected that figure.

Golden hair glistening in a manner akin to the rays of the sun fluttered, and having risen to the sky while being held in the arms of a man in a long cloak, the girl's blue eyes were trained on Balleroy, whom she should not have been able to see.

And then, clearly perceiving the inaudible words spoken by those lips, a chord was struck within Balleroy's heart.

Medium: "Jeez, I won't let you go off wherever you please anymore. Come and talk to me properly, Ballebro."

Chapter 52:
Medium O’Connell

1

Serena: “—Such unskillful command.”

Standing by the window of the command center within the Fortified City of Garkla, Serena Dracroy muttered so whilst gazing through the sole gap in the towering walls that defended the city.

Among the soldiers of the Vollachian Empire, there were none who did not grasp the importance of controlling the skies.

It was to the extent that, even in this besiegement, the greatest concern was the allocation of air defenses. The People of Shudraq, powerful masters of archery, had exceptionally numerous opportunities to play an active role.

The reason why so many of those women were being instructed to keep watch on the sky was because the opposition’s potential aerial assets required that level of vigilance.

And yet, with sporadic attacks from the deployed undead flying dragons which could hardly be called successful, the Scorching Lady herself, owner of the foremost flying dragon squadron in all of Vollachia, even felt a sense of irritation towards the enemy.

Serena: “Though if I was the enemy’s commanding officer, I’d be able to bring down this city far more efficiently.”

???: “…At the height of this decisive battle, could you please not say such frightening things?”

Serena had clicked her tongue with dissatisfaction towards the opponent’s tactics, and interjecting upon having heard that was a delicate man occupying the same command center, Otto.

He was a man who had guts despite his gentle appearance, and

Serena also had a high evaluation of his character, but regrettably he had a tendency to not let others take risks.

Serena: “You only let yourself take risks… that’d be fine for a subordinate, but you’d be a boring man to have as a lover.”

Otto: “If you were to say that you have taken a fancy to me, Countess Dracroy, I would feel as if I was being told there was a flaw in my personality, so I do not object to your assessment, but…”

Serena: “Hmph, I see. So you don’t like a woman with a scar on her face?”

Otto: “I can say with confidence that my attitude does not change based on one’s appearance. It is far more important to be able to converse and come to a mutual understanding with each other. And even with your scar, I do find you to be quite beautiful, High Countess.”

???: “Whatcha two talkin’ ‘bout? Get yer acts together.”

Serena folded her arms as she stood near the window, and Otto had responded to her with a look of dumbfoundment. And having been dumbfounded by his response, was the emissary from Kararagi, Anastasia.

Opposite to the dumbfounded Anastasia, Berstetz, paying no concern to what the rest of them were going on about, looked over a laid out map as he restlessly exchanged words with a soldier who served the role of dispatching orders.

For some time now, the war situation was being reported without interruption, and orders were being shouted back and forth loudly. The hectically changing situation and the bursting of blood and lives—it was the fragrant scent of the battlefield.

Serena: “This is precisely what it means to be in the Empire. My sense of smell for battle has grown dull under the reign of His Excellency. I of all people had forgotten that war is a part of everyday life.”

Anastasia: “If ya try ‘n say that’s what the Empire is, ya ain’t properly repayin' the Emperor-san who tried to rule in peace."

Serena: "What, I'm a poor loser. If I was discontent with His Excellency's rule I ought to have done something about it through my own strength. Since I have not done so, the likes of my words are nothing more than jest. He attempted to impose a reign that was contrary to imperialism, and the method he used to implement it was imperialism… sadly, His Excellency is symbolic of the Empire."

While the person in question would likely not desire sympathy, she could not help but pity how he walked a path of solitude.

Though it was true that Vincent shunned battle, if he twisted the tenets of others for that purpose, then that would fall into the realm of the "law of iron and blood".

—Only in the midst of conflict and struggle, could precious things be born.

Regardless of whether the Vollachian "law of iron and blood" declared so or not, that was Serena's own interpretation of the Imperial way, and she had accepted those values. She understood that it was ephemeral to love things that could only be born amidst that, but it was in her nature.

Therefore—

Serena: "—So you haven't come, Balleroy?"

Staring at the vast, desolate sky, Serena muttered as if she still had one final regret.

The battle had been ongoing for quite some time, and the armies of both sides had suffered no small amount of casualties. The first wave and vanguard of this battlefield had been completely finished off—that was to say, the Magical Sharpshooter, who followed the principle of concluding battles with minimal casualties, was not flying in the skies of this battlefield.

If he had come, Serena's heart would have been shot out a long time ago.

Serena: "…"

Tracing the vertical scar that ran across the left side of her face, Serena closed her eyes for a few seconds.

Emerging on the back of her eyelids, was the slightly dirty boy she had found during her younger days. The figure of him growing up, losing his life, and in the end, revived as an undead, pointing his spear towards her—

Serena: "That last one is merely my own delusion."

With pallid skin and lifeless golden eyes, the undead form of Balleroy was something that Serena had never seen.

In the battle for the Imperial Capital he had aimed for Vincent in the Crystal Palace, and at the coupled dragon carriages he had carried Lamia away with her shattered soul. However, during both of those opportunities, Serena had been unable to meet Balleroy.

And, Balleroy was not here at the Fortified City either. That was reality.

Serena: "…It would probably be fine for you to hate me."

Muttering so, Serena stood by the window while picturing the undead Balleroy who had not appeared. While standing there, she had no choice but to admit to her unforeseen state of mind.

She would not have minded being killed if it was by Balleroy. That was why she had gone out of her way to expose herself via the window, and had been awaiting the sniping of the Magical Sharpshooter.

Anastasia: "I thought you'd already settled yer feelin's?"

Serena: "…"

Closing one eye, Anastasia was examining Serena's expression from the side.

As Anastasia looked at Serena with her round turquoise eye, it seemed as if that gaze was seeing through her inner thoughts; along with Otto, merchants proved to be quite shrewd.

It must have been under unthinkable fortune that Flop and Medium had been able to survive in the cunning world of commerce.

Thus, to the extent that she was mentally dodging it with useless thoughts, the bullseye that had been struck was not shallow by any means.

Anastasia: “If the enemy’s aimin’ for the commandin’ officer first, that’d be the same as targettin’ the people in this command center. So, you’ve gone ‘n put yerself right in the firin’ line… couldn’t’cha at least consult with us first before doin’ that?”

Serena: “Sorry. I had thought it would have been easier to deal with a situation in which it was obvious who was going to be targeted, instead of a situation where it was unknown who would be shot. With all the wise people present here, you guys would be able to calmly deal with things if my head was suddenly blown apart, wouldn’t you?”

???: “Even supposing that were the case, I think it would be best to search for a route where it is not blown apart, and I am not confident that Ana or I could remain so composed. We are not like Otto-kun.”

Otto: “Though even I would jump bolt upright if you were to suddenly die?!”

Otto raised his voice upon receiving an unexpected evaluation, but Anastasia exchanged glances with the Spirit accompanying her—Echidna, and shrugged her shoulders.

Serena would generally be in agreement with them, but in any case, Serena’s expectations had been off the mark.

